designed for the his apartment; and was exempted from prostrating himself in his presence. According to a the court-scandal, the king had this prince by one of his concubines, whom he politically married to an Ok-kown, as soon as he found her with child; and let him pass for that officer's son, till he saw how he should deport himself when grown up: however, as soon as he was born, he had him brought into his palace, and publicly adopted him for his son. Chaw Naraya finding him to answer his early wishes, designed him as a husband to his daughter, who discovered an affection for him; both by her sorrow at his turning Talapoy, about the year 1682, and the joy she expressed when she heard he had renounced the profession^a. Kæmpfer, in his relation, speaks as if they were married; for he calls Mompe Totto (D), the son-in-law, as well as adopted son of the king^c. But others, who speak of the great revolution which happened in 1688, say no such thing: nor is it likely it could be so, since they were not married in b February that same year, when the French ambassadors left Siam; and Mompe Totto was put to death in the May following.

Several re- CHAW NARAYA did not give himself up to effeminacy and sloth, like other Indian princes, but immediately put himself at the head of his army; and having defeated his neighbours who had invaded his dominions, returned to his capital, and applied himself diligently to the affairs of government. He stifled the seeds of civil war in their birth, by his prudent conduct: and several cities, which designed to revolt, were contained within the bounds of duty, by the privileges which he granted them; while others, which had actually thrown off their subjection, were reduced to obedience without much bloodshed. Some traitors about him, who intended his assassination, being discovered, he caused them to be put to death privately, c rather than with any noise: but the conspiracy which put his life most in danger, was that of the *Talapoy*s. These good religious, these priests of the law, says our author, who, in appearance, lead so holy a life, assembled by agreement, on their chief festival, in the principal of their temples, with a design to murder the king, who was to assist on that occasion. As it is the custom for his guards to remain without the pagod, and they had resolved, as soon as the king, with only five or six of his officers, were entered, to shut the doors, they thought themselves sure of their blow: but, by good fortune, two officers having been sent before, to see if every-thing was ready for celebrating the day, they were much alarmed at the extraordinary number of *Talapoy*s; and more so, when they perceived arms to be hidden under their gowns. The king was secretly informed of this; and the regicides, having been convicted d on the spot, were all put to the sword by the soldiers, who were sent into the temple for that purpose.

Insolent Sankrat THIS action of Chaw Naraya, though strictly justifiable, yet got him the character of a cruel and bloody prince: nor were the priests at all industrious to remove that prejudice out of the minds of the people. After this a Sankrat took the liberty to tell the king to his face, with some warmth, that his subjects murmured against him, and were offended at the rigour of his punishments. The king received this charitable remonstrance with a good grace: but, a few days after, sent the prelate one of those great baboons, so much abominated by the Siameses; with an express command to feed him well, and let him do what he would in his house, till farther orders. The mischievous animal no sooner got into the Sankrat's house, but he began to make dreadful havock: he broke a great quantity of the most e costly china-ware, and gnawed to pieces the richest carpets; bit some of his domestics, and beat others. In short, the Sankrat, unable to bear the creature any longer, went and begged his majesty to deliver him from so wicked a guest. What, reply'd the king, smiling, you cannot endure the inconveniency of an ape for only three or four days, yet would have me suffer the insolence of my subjects, a thousand times more insupportable than the most malicious apes, all my life long. Go, added he, and learn this lesson, that if I know how to punish the wicked well, I know how to reward the good better. In effect, there was no kind of favour which an honest man might not reasonably expect of him: nor did he ever turn away unrewarded any person, who did service to either the public or himself^d. f

Bishops sent to India. ABOUT the time that this prince ascended the throne, great endeavours were employed in Europe towards propagating the Romish faith in the east, with more success than hitherto had been done. In this bold undertaking the French aspired to have the principal hand. The pope, who had been long importuned to send bishops into the East Indies, in order to make priests of the natives, to supply the want of missionaries from Europe, pursuant to the scheme of Alexander de Rhodes the Jesuit, had at length consented; and three persons, all Frenchmen, were nominated for that purpose; Francis Pallu, canon of St. Martin of Tours; M. de la Motte Lambert, formerly counsellor of the court of aids in Normandy, and afterwards director of the great hospital of Des Valides in Roan; and Ignatius Cotolendy, rector of the principal a parish in Aix. The first was made nominal bishop of Heliopolis, and had Tong-king for the principal place of his mission: the second was appointed bishop of Berytus, whose jurisdiction extended over the kingdoms of Champa, Kamboja, and Kochin-china, with the three southern provinces of China, the island of Hay-nán, and other parts: the third was consecrated bishop of Metellopolis, and had the northern China committed to his pastoral care^e.

THE eastern Asia being thus divided among the three French bishops, who were to act as Mission of apostolic vicars, in their respective departments, they left Europe in 1660 and 61, accom- Siam. panied with about ten ecclesiastics. The bishop of Berytus, being arrived at Siam, resolved, in 1663, to repair to China, in order to execute his pastoral function in that empire. He accordingly left Siam to go by sea, but was driven back by a furious tempest: and, under- b standing afterwards that a persecution was begun in China against the converts to the Romish faith, he resolved, in concert with the bishop of Heliopolis (for the other bishop was dead) to settle in Siam a fixed residence for the French missionaries. To this they were induced by the situation of the country, which lay conveniently, as the center, from whence they might easily convey themselves, or send ecclesiastics, into the neighbouring kingdoms, whenever the way should be open.

PURSUANT to this resolution, they established a seminary there, for educating youth, and The Jesuits learning the languages of the circumjacent nations, who had all settlements, or camps, as they baps are called, at the capital. The French named theirs the camp of St. Joseph. The seminary proved of so good effect, that, in 1665, the bishop of Berytus sent missionaries from thence c to China; and, in 1667, built a church, the ground of which was given to them by the king, who also shewed a regard for the missionaries, and put questions to them, to inform himself concerning their religion. These condescensions in his Siamese majesty, encouraged the bishops to attempt his conversion. To this end they presented him with a book of cuts, containing the mysteries of the life and passion of Jesus Christ, the apostles, and evangelists; in hopes that he would enquire into their history; which he did a few days after. On this occasion P. Laneau, who spoke and wrote the language of the country, inserted an explanation of them in the blank leaves of the book. This being shewn by the king to his chief doctors of the court, they confessed the religion of the missionaries was good, but said, that what his d majesty professed was as good. This is what the bishop of Berytus reports in one of his letters. He adds, that the king has often said their religion pleased him; and to this good opinion of it imputes the favour which he shewed the missionaries, and the orders which he gave to furnish materials for building them a church.

ALL these good signs, continues the bishop, might well afford matter of joy to the mis- to convert the sioners, in hopes to see some act of providence in the conversion of Siam, by the example of the king, king. But this prelate not only found that these were no proofs of the king's inclination to be baptized, but had the integrity to confess it; saying, that they have reason to fear those favourable tokens proceeded from the same condescending disposition which he shewed to others, who endeavoured to persuade him to change his religion. For he observes, that, since the time when the queen of Achin had invited him to embrace the Korán, he had treated the e Mohammedans more favourably than before: and, in a subsequent letter, declares, that the greatest obstacle to the propagation of the Romish religion in Siam, was the credit of the Mohammedans, and their extreme zeal to establish their faith. For as they were numerous in the country, drove a great trade thither, and possessed many considerable posts in the state, they made no small progress by their intrigues at court; and endeavoured to influence the king, particularly, by alleging the example of so many neighbouring monarchs, who had renounced their idolatry, to become the followers of their prophet. In 1668 there arrived two ambassadors, one from Achin, and the other from Golkonda, on the same account; and the last of them obtained leave to build a mosque in the capital city. These assiduities, concludes the bishop, joined to the signal services which the Mohammedans do the Siameses, makes it rea- f sonable to fear, that Siam will at length become Mohammedan^f.

THIS was a judicious way of reasoning; and the missionaries would have done well to have il' grounded. conformed themselves more considerately to his sentiments: for the Indians can never see any reason to change their native images for those of a foreign manufacture: and although the Korán has succeeded in converting such numerous islands and countries of the Indies, yet the gospel of the Jesuits has not yet converted one. But the Romish missionaries are too sanguine and presumptuous to give over the attack, while any of them are left on the breach; and the smallest prospect of hope will embolden them to renew it. For, presently after, they formed expectations of converting the king's brother, on his having the curiosity to see the above-mentioned pictures, and hearing them explained by P. Laneau; after which, we are told, he g declared, that he acknowledged only one God, the Creator, and daily worshipped him. Now, although this is the common profession of the Indians on both sides the Ganges, yet from a thence the missionaries would have it believed, that the above-mentioned prince was inwardly persuaded in favour of their religion, and would openly profess it, unless restrained by reasons of state^g; the common salvo for errors of judgment in such cases.

Audience of

THE bishop of Heliopolis went back to Europe in 1665, on the affairs of the mission; and returned to Siam in 1673, with letters from the king of France and pope Clement IX. accompanied with presents, to thank his Siamese majesty for the favours bestowed on the French bishops, and to desire a continuance thereof. On this occasion the bishop, on the 18th of October, obtained an audience of the king, as ambassador from France and the pope; and had the privilege of sitting in his presence, without the accustomed prostrations during the ceremony; concessions never before granted to any foreigners. At the end of the audience, b in which the letters above-mentioned were read, the king told Mr. Lambert, bishop of Berytus; that as he had the advantage to commence an alliance between the two kings, it was also his business to seek out the means of keeping it up. A few days after they received notice, that his majesty intended to send ambassadors the next year into Europe, with answers to the letters of the two sovereigns, whom the bishops had written to. The 19th of November following they were admitted to a private audience, wherein the king discoursed with them for three hours, about the state of Europe, and its princes, particularly the grand monarch. He then enquired what might be the motive which had induced the bishops to cross so many seas, and the king of France to send his subjects to countries so far from home. These questions furnished them with the opportunity which they wished for, to inform his Siamese c majesty; that zeal for the salvation of souls, and a strong desire in their prince to extend the kingdom of God, was the sole cause of their voyage. The king of Siam made answer, that he was willing to promote their monarch's glorious designs; and, to give him proofs of the esteem which he had for his virtue, he resolved to make him an offer of a port in any part of his dominions, where a city might be built, to the honour of Louis the Great, and where, if he thought fit, he might send a viceroy to reside^h.

Their hopes revived.

THESE favourable dispositions in the king of Siam renewed the hopes which the missionaries had first conceived of his conversion, and, consequent thereto, of all his subjects. We are told, that the honour done the French bishops, on occasion of these audiences, filled the whole court with esteem, both for those prelates, and the holy law which they professed. It d is added, that the noise which this news made in the provinces augmented much, when they came to hear, that, some time after, the king had promised to build a church to the God of heaven and earth; from whence it was judged, that several persons would immediately embrace the religion of the French: which, saith our author, accordingly happened. These conversions gave occasion to some of the natives to make a great noise, and complain openly, that they were going to introduce an unknown religion, without the king's authority. But these murmurs, which in another country might have given rise to a persecution against the missionaries, proved a favourable occasion, which they laid hold of, to open a way for preaching their religion throughout the kingdom: for they forthwith presented a petition to the king, requiring that he would permit his subjects to embrace the Romish faith. Hereupon his e majesty declared, in a public assembly of the grandees of his court, that he would leave all persons at liberty to embrace it, who had a mind, without hindering them: and soon after sent one privately to acquaint the bishop of Berytus, that he would in time permit the preaching and exercise of the Romish religion, by a solemn edictⁱ.

Missioners sent for.

THIS was the state of the mission in Siam in the year 1674, at which time they had three schools in the capital, and the seminary was vastly increased. For all this, and notwithstanding the recruits which had arrived from time to time, they were in great want of missionaries in the year 1675; so that the bishops wrote very pressing letters into Europe for a considerable number to be sent them, in order to carry on the work of conversion among the f Indians^k. We have been the more particular in relating the establishment of the French mission in Siam, because it seemed necessary, in order to explain the occasion of the two famous embassies from Louis XIV. to Chaw Naraya, several years after, as well as to give light into the cause of the great revolution, which happened immediately after.

In the interval between the year 1675 and the first of those embassies, which is the space of ten years, we meet with scarce any thing farther concerning the affairs either of the mission, or of the Siamese history. Gervaise, the only author who has undertaken to give an account of this king's reign, says nothing more about it than what has been already related; excepting a few particulars touching the part which Chaw Naraya took in the wars of Kamboja, with which, and the other neighbouring states, the Siameses seem to have been continually a embroiled (E), for many years. Kamboja, indeed, had been distracted with civil wars, occasioned by the ambition of its princes, ever since the year 1628, or thereabout. Towards the year 1680, Nak Sore-shit having killed Nak Protien, who intended to make away with him, seized the throne; and resolved to marry the wife of Nak Kotrey, a prince of the blood, who had fled to Kochin-china, upon this assassination. The lady made the less resistance to the tyrant's pursuit, as she had determined to revenge upon him the death of her brother-in-law; and accordingly stabbed him in his bed, the first night of her marriage. At the same time she dispatched two couriers, one to Nak Kotrey, to give him notice of what she had done in his favour: and the other to Nak Sesta, son of Nak Protien, signifying, that it was time for him to come and share the kingdom with the prince her spouse.

b WHEN Nak Sesta arrived, instead of acknowledging the service which this princess had done him, he killed her with the same dagger wherewith she had slain his mortal enemy. Revolution there. Mean time Nak Kotrey returned from Kochin-china: but when he heard of his wife's death, he took it so to heart, that he retired into a distant forest, where turning Talapoy, he ended his days in peace. While he was alive, Nak Sesta, intimidated by the guilt of his crime, durst not appear in public, or assume the title of king: but as soon as he was assured of Kotrey's death, he assembled his friends, and, by their credit, got possession of the whole kingdom. However, not thinking himself absolutely secure without the king of Kochin-china's consent, and knowing that monarch had no reason to be satisfied with him, he sent him very rich presents, in order to engage him in his favour: but this good prince, who was not to be c bribed to do injustice, adjudged to Nak Sesta that part of Kamboja which his father had formerly enjoyed; and gave the other half to Nak Non, son of Nak Prasbousa, who had been adopted by Nak Shan, the former king¹.

NAK SESTA, dissatisfied with the king of Kochin-china, refused to stand by his arbitration, and declared war against Nak Non. The two kings fought several battles; but the equality The Siamese forces of their forces always held the victory in suspense. Nak Sesta died three months after, and left for his successor Nak Son, who was very young. As soon as Nak Non, who was a very good prince, received advice of his death, he had the generosity to send his son very considerable presents, and a large number of *Talapoy*s, to perform his father's funeral with the greater pomp. But they who governed the kingdom during the young prince's minority, d received those presents with great contempt, and were so base as to put all those poor priests to death. This cruel action kindled a war between the two kings. Nak Non, to strengthen assist Nak his interest, applied for succours to the king of Kochin-china; and Nak Son put himself under Son: the protection of the king of Siam, who sent him troops, and furnished him with money. The two armies coming to a battle, after a bloody fight Nak Non was defeated, and obliged to retire into Kochin-china. But Nak Son did not long enjoy the peace which this great victory seemed to promise him: for two or three years after, 3000 Chineses, whom the Tartars had driven out of their native country, joining the Kochin-chineses and Kambodjans, who were of Nak Non's party, with this prince at their head, fell on Nak Son; and having defeated him in several battles, wherein the Siameses were all cut in pieces, he was forced to fly into the e forests, to avoid falling into the hands of the conqueror. His only resource in this extremity was to demand new succours of the king of Siam, who sent him 500 of his best troops: but these being too few to resist the great number of enemies, almost all of them lost their lives; although, contrary to the character of the Siameses, they sold them dearer than could have been expected.

THUS matters stood, towards the end of the year 1685. And, when our author was about to quit Siam soon after, Chaw Naraya designed to send Nak Son 18,000 men by land, and a most of them slain. squadron of four or five great ships, commanded by Portugueses and English; together with sixty large barks, to which they give the name of gallies, under the conduct of the bravest Siamese officers^m. The king's counsel were much against his intermeddling in this war. They f represented to him, that it would be a means, one day or other, of bringing upon himself the whole power of Kochin-china, who had declared against Nak Son: that this prince had already been defeated several times: and that the forces which he was going to lend him could not possibly be strong enough to prevent another overthrow. Chaw Naraya replied, *It signifies nothing; the honour which the king of Siam will acquire, by protecting an unfortunate prince, who is allied to him, and from whom he can never expect any-thing, will make him amends for all his losses*ⁿ. However that was, we find that the event of this war was such as the king's counsel feared it would be: at least we are informed, that his army was not successful by land^o, and that this assistance given to Nak Son had intailed a course of hostilities on the Siameses, with Kamboja and Kochin-china, which had not terminated in the year 1720^p.

Siamese embassy to France. Mr. De Chaumont sent to Siam: His memorial to convert the King: Chaw Naraya's acute answer. History of Lord Faulkon. Another Siamese embassy to France.

Siamese embassy to France.

LET us now return to the affairs of the French mission. It has been already mentioned, ^a that the king of Siam proposed to send ambassadors to Europe in the year 1674. Whether he did or not, is a circumstance which does not appear from the authors before us: but it is certain, that two were dispatched from that country, if not in that year, yet a few years after. For, about 1682 or 83 there arrived in France two officers of the king of Siam's court, with Mr. Le Vachet (A), a priest of the foreign missions settled in that country, in order to enquire after two ambassadors who had been sent some time before by the king of Siam to Louis XIV. These ambassadors first passed over to Bantam, in the island of Java, for the conveniency of a ship to carry them into Europe, and embarked on board the Rising Sun, a ship belonging to the East India company, with magnificent presents for his most christian majesty. But not returning to Siam within the time expected, and a report being spread in that country as if ^b the vessel had been cast away, therefore the king thought fit to send the three persons above-mentioned, in order to enquire into the truth of the matter.

French embassy to Siam,

THOSE officers arrived in France (B) just at the time when Louis XIV. was about sending some Jesuit mathematicians to China, in order to make observations there, for the improvement of geography and navigation. The king of France, considering how earnest the king of Siam appeared to be in seeking his friendship; and that there were hopes besides of his becoming a convert to his religion, in case an ambassador was sent thither, nominated the chevalier De Chaumont for that purpose. The ambassador carried with him the Abbé De Choisy, who was to continue with the king of Siam in quality of ambassador till his baptism, in case he should become a profelyte to the Romish faith; the two Siamese officers, Mr. Le Vachet ^c above-mentioned, four other churchmen, and six Jesuits, destined for China^a. Mr. De Chaumont arrived at Siam the 24th of September 1685, almost six months after he had left Ereft; fully determined, out of his great zeal, to push the affair of religion to the utmost: but it soon appeared that there was not so much ground to hope for the king's conversion, as the Jesuits had pretended: for the Abbé De Choisy observes in his journal, soon after he arrived in Siam, that the king's conversion was a thing not to be expected suddenly: that although he favoured the missionaries and their religion, yet he was far from being baptized: that he had not declared himself on the subject of religion, nor done any-thing tending that way for eighteen months before.

IN short, according to this author, all the hopes they had of the king's conversion were ^d grounded on this contingency: that Lord Faulkon, called by the French Lord Constance, who was of the Romish religion, being then prime minister, would have interest enough to prevail on his master to become a Christian: but the Abbé was so far from placing any dependence on this circumstance, that he considers it as a very precarious argument, saying coldly, we shall soon see how it will turn out. He adds, indeed, that the juncture was very favourable to make the king do what one would: that the ambassador would first insist on matters of religion, to the end that if nothing was granted on this head, he should be obliged to grant every thing else. However, that the French did not despair of having, at least, their religion permitted and approved of, by proclamation through the kingdom of Siam. This indeed they obtained, but this was all; and what the king had promised to the missionaries many years before^b. Let ^e us see how they proceeded.

Chaumont's speech

ACCORDING to the above-mentioned plan, Mr. De Chaumont, in his speech at his first audience, earnestly recommended to his Siamese majesty to forsake the worship of the images of his own country, and embrace the religion of his master^c. On this occasion, we are told, that when Chaw Naraya read the king of France's letter, he said he saw that monarch wanted to make a Christian of him, and dropt some words of encouragement: that he mentioned the same in council, and promised Lord Faulkon to protect the religion of the missionaries throughout his dominions: that the Barkalon repeated the same to one of the missionaries; adding, with some earnestness, that the religion of the pagods was near its end. However says Choisy, who was

(A) Le Vachet went to Siam in the second embarkation from France, made in 1669; and returned thither on the occasion mentioned in the text.

(B) Hamilton says, that in 1683, the first year of Faulkon's ministry in Siam, the Jesuits got the king to send an embassy to France, and that the same ambassador came also to London, and settled a treaty of commerce for the English who should trade in Siam. New acc. of E. India, vol. ii. p. 171.

a not so sanguine in the matter as others, we are not fools enough to believe this in the strictest sense^d.

MEAN time the ambassador was wholly taken up about the conversion of the king, which was the subject of his embassy: and the rather, as he understood the Persian ambassador came upon the same errand, with whom he was resolved to be before-hand. Hereupon Mr. Dé Chaumont drew a short memorial on that head, and gave it to Lord Faulkon, in order to deliver it to the king. The minister seemed astonished at the proposal; and in a long conference on this occasion, would have dissuaded him from pressing the king upon that point. He advised him not to speak of the affair; alleging, that the king, who was extremely attached to the religion of his ancestors, would be strangely startled at such a motion; that it would cause disorder, as things then stood; and could produce no good. But the ambassador very prudently, says Tachard, persisted in his opinion, and intreated Lord Constance to present that writing to his majesty. The minister, being thus earnestly pressed by the zealous Chaumont, took the memorial, and carried it to the king: intimating, at the same time he delivered it, how solicitous the king of France was to have his majesty of the same religion with himself.

ON this new attack Chaw Naraya asked, who made the king of France believe that he entertained any such sentiments? and after hearing the memorial read, bade Lord Faulkon tell the ambassador: “that he was exceedingly troubled to find the king of France, his good friend, should propose so difficult a thing to him, and with which he was not in the least acquainted: that he referred it to his most christian majesty himself to judge, whether the change of a religion, received and followed through his dominions for 2229 years, without interruption, could be a thing of small importance to him, or easily complied with: that, besides, it was matter of astonishment to him, that the king of France should so much concern himself in an affair, which, though it related to God, yet the Deity did not all seem to interest himself therein, but left it wholly to human discretion. For could not the true God (added the king), who created heaven and earth, with all things therein, and who bestowed on mankind such different natures and inclinations; could not he, when he gave to men the same kinds of bodies and souls, have also, if he had pleased, inspired them with the same sentiments for that religion, which they ought to follow, and for that worship which was most acceptable to him; and have made all nations live and die in the same laws? That, since order among men, and unity in religion, depend absolutely on divine providence, who could as easily introduce it into the world, as the diversity of sects which in all times have prevailed in it, ought not one to think that the true God takes as much pleasure to be honoured by different worships and ceremonies (C), as to be glorified by a prodigious number of different creatures, who praise him every one in his own way? Would that beauty and variety, which we admire in the order of nature, be less admirable in the order of supernatural things, or less becoming the wisdom of God?”

“HOWEVER that be,” continued the king of Siam, “since we know that God is the absolute master of the world, and that we are persuaded nothing comes to pass contrary to his will, I wholly resign my person and dominions into the arms of the divine mercy and providence; and, with all my heart, beseech his eternal wisdom to dispose thereof, according to his good will and pleasure.”

So discouraging, as well acute an answer, which, in effect, amounted to a flat denial, convinced the Abbé De Choisy, that he had no pretence to remain in Siam, as the king of France’s resident. “Although,” says that author, on this occasion, “his Siamese majesty builds churches, daily grants advantages to the Romish religion, has a crucifix in his chamber, reads the gospel in the Siamese language, speaks of Christ with great respect, and has conferences with the bishop of Metellopolis (D); yet all this is not sufficient to make me stay here;” as he was to have done in case of the king’s conversion. Afterwards, speaking directly in relation to the king’s answer to the ambassador’s memorial, he says, it appears from thence that this Siamese majesty was not yet sufficiently instructed to embrace the Christian religion (meaning the Romish); but observes, that he promised to instruct himself^e: which, however, amounted to no more than such an enquiry as is only the effect of curiosity, and a desire to be informed in the religion of other countries.

To return to Chaw Naraya’s answer, it appears, even from the account of one of the most zealous missionaries, that the king of Siam, how desirous soever of cultivating an amity with France, was so far from any thoughts of changing his religion, that he seemed, from his method of reasoning, to have been firmly fixed in it; and however well pleased Lord Faulkon

^g CHOISY,

(C) This is the general sentiment of all the Indian nations on both sides of the Ganges: and this alone is sufficient to account for their not admitting of persecution, which the contrary opinion has produced in Europe.

(D) His name was Louis, or Leavis: so that Lancan, who succeeded Cattendi, must have been dead. This Louis seems to have been a Portuguese, who, by consent of his superior, had joined the French missionaries about 1674.

might have been to hear his master declare himself a profelyte to Christianity, yet he was, at that time, quite averse to making any proposition of the kind to him.

*The Jesuits

For all this the missionaries did not give over the hopes of converting Chaw Naraya. These hopes were founded on the great privileges which were promised on the score of religion, and which made the bishop of Metellopolis declare, “that he expected new churches would, in four years, be built throughout the kingdom of Siam.” Those privileges were granted according to the ambassador’s memorial; after which Choisy himself seems to have conceived a better opinion of the issue: for he says, “Nothing was then wanting to complete the work but missionaries; and believed, that, at the news of this success, they would flock to Siam from all parts of the world.” They were farther encouraged in their hopes, by observing, that the king not only desired to keep up a friendship with France, but even that twelve Jesuits should be sent over; promising to build them churches, and allow them the liberty of propagating their religion in his dominions. But their chief dependence, doubtless, was on Lord Faulkon; who, by his post of prime minister, and the great influence he had over the king, was in a situation to serve them, the most advantageous they could possibly wish for. This was, in effect, confessed by the bishop of Metellopolis, who, on occasion of the king’s concessions in favour of his religion, often declared, “that the mission had the utmost obligations to Lord Constance; so that his advancement to the high post which he then enjoyed in the court of Siam, ought to be looked on as a special providence in their favour.” And here it may be proper to give some account of this extraordinary personage, whose merit had raised him to the highest honours in a foreign country, very distant from his own; and who was no less remarkable for his tragical fall some years after, than his surprising elevation, which happened two years before.

CONSTANTINE FAULKON, for that was his name, was a Grecian by birth, born in the island of Cephalonia. His father was a noble Venetian, the son of the governor of the island; and his mother sprung from one of the ancientest families of the country. But his parents having reduced their affairs to a low condition, their son Constantine, when but twelve years of age, resolved to seek a livelihood in foreign countries. Accordingly, about the year 1660, he shipped him aboard an English vessel returning to England. Here his wit, humour, and agreeable behaviour, made him known to some lords at court: but finding little hopes of advancing his fortune by that course of lifeⁱ, he applied himself to the more substantial affairs of trade. After a stay of some few years in England, during which time he became a protestant, he determined to pass into India; and arriving at Siam, put himself into the service of Mr. White, a considerable East-India merchant. In this gentleman’s family he lived for some years, and continued his factor when Mr. White returned for London. By this means (E) he gathered some money; and then quitting the English service, he set up for himself. The first step he took was to buy a ship, and put to sea; for he had passed through all degrees of sea-faring: but he had the misfortune to be beaten back by bad weather, and was twice cast away in the mouth of the river of Siam.

Siam.*

PUTTING to sea once more, he was shipwreck’d the third time, and much more unfortunately, on the coast of Malabár. There he was in danger of perishing; and could not save, of all his substance, above 2000 crowns. In this sad condition, being oppressed with grief and weariness, he laid himself down on the shore; and, whether asleep or awake (for he often protested to our author Tachard that he could not tell which), thought he saw a person full of majesty, who, with a smiling countenance, most obligingly said to him, Return, return, from whence you came. These words so wrought on him, that he could not sleep the rest of the night, his thoughts being taken up with contriving how to return to Siam. Next day, whilst he walked by the sea-side, meditating on the same subject, he saw a man coming towards him, dropping-wet, and with a most dejected aspect. It proved to be an ambassador from the king of Siam, who, in his return from Persia, had been cast away on the same coast, without saving any thing but his life. As both spoke the Siamese language, they soon became acquainted with each other’s adventures. The ambassador having thus discovered himself, and told what extreme necessity he was reduced to, Mr. Faulkon condoling his misfortune, offered to carry him to Siam. To accomplish this design, with the money he had saved he bought a small bark, and provision for the passage. This generous behaviour so charmed the ambassador, that, when he got home he related it to the Pra Klang, or Barkalong, then chief minister; who was so pleased in his turn, that he had a mind to know so rare a man.

court.*

THE minister sent for Mr. Faulkon: and, on discoursing him, liked him so well, that he resolved to keep him about himself; in which station he soon gained the esteem and confidence of his master. This chief minister was a man of parts, and well versed in business, but, as he

a loved his ease, he was glad to meet with a person so capable to relieve him. He often spoke of him to the king, and his majesty soon found reason to take notice of him: for, being disposed to send ambassadors to some foreign prince, as he loved magnificence, he was willing to spare no cost: but the Moors, or Mohammedans, whom he made use of on those occasions, demanded such an immense sum to furnish out the embassy, that he complained of it to the Pra Klang. The Pra Klang mentioned the thing to Mr. Faulkon, who said, if the king would honour him with that commission, he would undertake to provide every-thing for less money than what was offered the Moors, and yet prepare much finer presents than they had inserted in their inventory. The king being informed of this, sent for Faulkon, and gave him orders for the purpose: which trust he executed so much to his majesty satisfaction, that from b thenceforth he conceived a great opinion of his abilities. The Moors, vexed to find their exorbitant demands rejected, thought to make themselves amends, by a petition to the king, for payment of what he owed them, in which they brought him in their debtor, to the amount of a considerable sum. But the account being put into Faulkon's hands to examine it, he found that, instead of the king being indebted to them, they owed his majesty above 60,000 crowns.

THE Pra Klang dying not long after (F), the king would needs put Lord Faulkon (G) (for as Male prime such thenceforth he ought to be considered), into his palace: but he declined it, as well as minister. that of Chakri, to avoid the envy of the great men^k (H). Nor would he ever accept of any place, though every-thing passed through his hands, and nothing was done without him: so c that he was, in effect, prime minister, which rendered him the object of envy, as much, perhaps, as if he had held the post to which it was then annexed: for the Malay, who succeeded the deceased Pra Klang, looking on him with a malicious eye, made use of one Mr. Bacon, an Englishman, to create an ill impression of him, and render him suspected by the king. But Chaw Naraya perceiving that minister's malice, deprived him of his office, and had him bastinado'd to death^l.

WE know not what it was which Mr. Bacon laid to this minister's charge; and the affair of Captain Hamilton, before related, will always make us judge with caution of accusations laid by the agents of interested companies. Perhaps his turning papist, after he left their service, might induce the English to think that he would support the Portuguese or French interest d against theirs: although we are told^m, he took all occasions to do our nation service.

HOWEVER that be, he was certainly a person of more than ordinary abilities, of which his His great being advanced to so high a post by a judicious prince, is a sufficient proof. He was admired abilities. for his affability, dexterity in business, and eloquence; for which Tachard highly commends his speech made to the king, on delivering Mr. Chaumont's memorial. The same author says, he was much surprised, considering Lord Constance was a man of no studies, at the reply which he made the king, who asked him what he thought the ambassador would say to the reasons contained in his answer to the same memorial? and that the most consummate divine would have been hard put to it to make a betterⁿ.

THE Abbé De Choisy often speaks of him in raptures, praising him for his wit, address, sincerity, and charming conversation^o. He says Lord Constance did more business in twenty-four hours, than all the officers at court in fifteen days^p: that he heard 100 men, and answered their petitions, all in half an hour: that, with all the vivacity in the world, he was prudent: that nothing embarrassed him^q: and that, when he found out no expedients, it was because there were none^r. This, it is true, is the character given of him by the French, whose favourite he was: but writers of other nations have spoken very disadvantageously of him, as we shall see hereafter.

MR. Chaumont left Siam about the middle of December, in the same year 1685, accompanied by the Siam ambassadors, and Tachard the Jesuit, one of the six destined for China, Siam embassy to France. who was sent back to Europe to solicit the twelve missionaries, and other affairs. The Siam ambassadors were three in number, all persons of the first quality at court. The first had (I) transacted in all the affairs of Siam for fifteen years, under his brother, who was the Barkalong, or Pra Klang. He was very polite; a man of parts and abilities. The second had been twice

They were attended by twelve officers of the court, who embarked with them, and carried very rich presents to the king of France, in return for those which had been sent to their master^a. But the chief end of their embassy seems to have been to solicit engineers to fortify some of the king of Siam's most considerable towns, and a certain number of forces to garrison them. In the mean time Mr. Le Mare, an engineer, was left behind, at the king's request; and likewise the chevalier De Fourbin, a well experienced officer, who was soon after posted at Bankok, with some troops under his command, which proved of service two years after, in suppressing the Makassars^b; of whose revolt we are next to treat.

Revolt of the Makassars. Plot to kill the king: its discovery. Intrepid behaviour of a Makassar. Obstinacy of their prince. Slain with all his people.

Revolt of the Makassars.

THIS revolt happened in the year 1687, and might have had as fatal effects as that of the Japaneses in a former reign, if it had not been timely prevented, by the vigilance of the king, and diligence of his first minister. After the Dutch had vanquished the king of Makassar, a kingdom situated in the island of Selebes, or Celebes, about the year 1664, one of that monarch's sons, with many of the natives, retired to Siam (K); where the king generously received him, assigning him land, two cannot-shot distant from the capital, for his followers to build houses on for their habitation; and this was called the camp of the Makassars, according to the custom of that country. This camp is situated partly on the great river Menam, and partly on another called Kachon, which falls into the great one in that place. It was allotted them that they might be next to the Malayans, who, being also Mohammedans, might be ready to assist them, and accommodate them with their churches.

Plot to kill the king,

ABOUT five years before, a plot was laid for taking away the life of Chaw Naraya, and placing the younger of his two brothers on the throne. The treason having been happily discovered, his majesty generously pardoned not only his brother, but also the prince of Makassar, who was concerned in the conspiracy, and all his accomplices. This act of grace ought to have laid an eternal obligation of gratitude on the fugitive prince. But instead of repenting of his former crime, about April 1687, he entered into a new plot, at the solicitation of the princes of Champa, fled likewise for shelter to the court of Siam; who intended to have placed on the throne the same brother of the king, and then oblige him either to turn Mohammedan, or put him to death. Nay, in case he had so far complied, their design was quickly to have deposed him again, in order for one of themselves to ascend it, on whom the election should happen to fall. After this, all the inhabitants of Siam, both Christians and Pagans (if our author's intelligence is to be relied on), were either to change their religions, or to be slain^a.

THESE princes of Champa were three brothers, sons of the late king of that country, who, on their eldest brother's coming to the crown, fled hither for fear of him. One of the three was made an officer of the king of Siam's household, and was not in the conspiracy which was set on foot by the younger of the two others, who lived like private persons. The young prince having communicated his design to a Malayan captain, born also in Champa, a man of parts and learning, as well as courage; this officer entered into his measures, and, with the assistance of one of their priests, conducted the whole affair. He began by giving out, in the camps of the Malayans and Makassars, "that he had seen in the heavens a sign which he had often seen before, and was every time attended with some extraordinary events, which affected those of the Mohammedan religion." He advised them therefore to pray their prophet, that it might turn out to their benefit; and, in the mean time, to be upon their guard. After he had, by this means, filled them with terrible apprehensions, without declaring his design, he disclosed it to each of them by degrees, as he found they gave into it; so that, in less than three months, he inticed them all into the snare, excepting 300 Malayans. When matters were in this state, he assembled the three chiefs, to know what was to be done with those who were in the opposition: and it was resolved, when the plot was ripe for execution, to assemble the 300 Malayans with the rest, flattering themselves that they would not stand out, when they saw their countrymen so readily embrace the party of the conspirators. Their

a design was also to set all the prisons open, and free the galley-slaves, in order to augment their forces with such desperate recruits; and their first exploit was to seize the palace, and give the plunder of it to their men.

THE time approaching for putting this plot in execution, which was the 15th of August, at is timely discovered, eleven o'clock at night, the two princes of Champa wrote to their brother, who was at court, acquainting him with what was intended, and advising him to make his escape as fast as he could. At eight in the evening the letter was delivered to the prince; who, suspecting something more than ordinary, from the haste with which the messenger made off, carried it unopened to Lord Faulkon, who having read the contents of it, ran with it to the king. His Siamese majesty, without seeming concerned, sent 3000 of his guards to defend the palace of Siam, and dispatched the chevalier De Fourbin to Bankok, to prevent its falling into the hands of the rebels. The rest of his guards, to the number of 5000, were posted in the palace; and other troops to defend the avenues and walls of the city ^b.

THE hour being come, the conspirators met in a long tongue of land, which separates the two rivers, opposite to the camp of the Makassars. But as soon as the 300 Malayans understood their prince's design, they refused to obey him, declaring their abhorrence of such an act of ingratitude to the king their benefactor. This resolute answer having wrought upon others, who had their scruples before, they began to disperse; which the priest observing, resolved to go and discover the plot himself to the governor of the city, lest any-body else should be beforehand with him. As soon as the governor received this information, he posted the few men he had in the palace in such a manner, as to let the conspirators see that the plot was discovered, and he was on his guard. This news greatly alarmed the princes, who were still more surprised next morning, to see 3000 of the king's soldiers arrive in the palace, and all the inhabitants of the city in arms upon the ramparts.

MEAN time Chaw Naraya being informed that the rebels had returned home, sent Lord Faulkon to Siam, to reclaim them by gentle methods, and learn all the circumstances of the conspiracy. By a promise of pardon the captain, who laid the scheme, surrendered himself to the minister, and discovered the whole affair, so far as to confess that his real view was to declare himself king, and make away with the three princes. After this, Lord Faulkon published a general pardon to all those who should, within four days, come in and discover their accomplices. The Malayans accepted of this grace, but the Makassars stood out, resolving to perish rather than submit. Their prince was several times summoned to give an account of his conduct, but still refused, alleging, "that he never would enter into the conspiracy, though much pressed; and that, if he had committed any fault, it was only in not discovering the authors of so black a design: but that he judged his quality of a prince and a friend, would excuse him for not doing the office of a spy, and betraying those who had intrusted him with a secret of such importance ^c."

AN answer so very improper, determined the king to bring him to reason by force; which resolution, instead of intimidating the Makassars, only roused their courage; and an action which about the same time happened at Bankok, helped to render them the more daring. The captain of a galley, which came from the king of Makassar with a present of money and slaves to the prince his relation, seeing the bad success of the plot in which he had been himself engaged, thought it his best way to retire in time. But accordingly he applied for a fara, or passport, and obtained it. But, at the same time, orders were sent (A) to the chevalier De Fourbin to stop him, and his men, at the passage of the chain which was drawn across the river at Bankok. On his arrival the chevalier sent for him, to come and let him know the number of hands on board his galley. The captain, after many excuses made to avoid this danger, sent word he could not come, unless he was followed by his men in arms; and, to take off his suspicion, it was at length agreed, that he might enter the fortress with eight men, armed only with the Krit. This is a kind of poniard, from twelve to eighteen inches long; the blade is flat, and about two inches broad at the handle; from whence it goes tapering (often in scollops) to the point, which is very sharp. Some of these blades are poisoned; and this is done two ways; either by applying the poison every time it is used, or else working it in the temper of the metal. Krits of this sort are a long time in making, and some blades cost 1000 crowns. To be asked to give up his krit, is a great affront with a Malayan; and to draw it, without killing his man, a mark of cowardice ^d.

THE captain, at landing with his attendants, took leave of the rest, declaring, that if they demanded his krit, he would run amuk; and they promised to follow his example, and revenge

his death. As soon as he entered the citadel, he was ordered to send for his men to be counted; a Fourbin's design being to surround them with a company of soldiers, and thus oblige them to deliver their arms. The captain answered carelessly, that he had fifty men on board, and they might take his word for it: but as the thing was insisted on, and he found himself under a necessity to obey, he sent two of his eight followers to acquaint the rest with what was required of them. The chevalier De Fourbin took that opportunity to plant some pikemen and musketeers at the entrance of the hall where the Makassars were. The captain, seeing the danger he was in, discovered great agitation of mind, inasmuch that the sweat fell from his face in great drops. Mean time the chevalier sent an officer to demand his krit in the king's name. The captain made him no answer, but plunged the weapon into his breast, and laid him dead at his feet. The blow was so violent, that he cut through three of his ribs. Two Siamese b soldiers, who attempted to seize him, were served in the same manner; and having killed a fourth, he ran furiously to force his way through the pikes. But finding that impracticable, after receiving a few wounds, he leaped with three of his people through a window, into a port-hole of the bastion, on which the hall stood, with design to jump down from thence; but the leap seemed so desperate, that it required some shot to make them take it: another volley was sent after them in their descent. For all this, some of them had strength enough to rise, and run staggering upon the soldiers who were posted thereabout, but they were soon dispatched. A French captain perceiving the Makassar chief not quite dead, though pierced with several balls, advanced to take his krit from him: but laying hold of the scabbard, instead of the handle, the almost expiring man had yet strength enough to draw it, and rip up his belly: for c in striking they give the arm a twist, which makes a wound as large as that of a halberd.

The rest revenge them.

FOURBIN finding by this sample what the rest of the Makassars, who were on their way to the fortress, might do, was obliged to alter his measures; and drawing out his garrison of 3 or 400 men, post them so as that the enemy would be surrounded when they came up. These desperadoes hearing the muskets go off, and being in pain for their captain, sent to demand him. The chevalier gave then good words, to gain time to make his preparations. On the other hand, the Makassars put themselves in a posture of defence, rolling the cloth which covers their thighs about their arms, to serve as a shield. When every thing was ready for the attack, an English captain advanced with some soldiers, sending the French commander word, that he would bring all that rabble bound neck and heels before him. The Makassars think- d ing this a proper time to fall on, ran to meet them; and, after they had lost a few of their party, with the fire-arms, or pikes, cut him in pieces, with all his followers. Some were found pierced with no fewer than a dozen stabs of the krit. The remainder of the garrison were so terrified at this first charge, that they would not wait a second; but fled in such disorder, that Fourbin, who endeavoured in vain to rally them, had much ado to escape himself e.

Are all destroyed.

HAD the Makassars taken the advantage which this panic gave them, they might easily have become masters of the fortress: but they contented themselves with killing all who came in their way, without distinction of age or sex; and then fled to the woods for shelter themselves. Here they remained ten or twelve days; and, though weakened with hunger and other miseries, yet they were strong enough to kill five or six more of those who went to exterminate them. A youth, not above ten or twelve years old, who with some others had gotten into a temple, made two sallies with the krit in his hand, and killed a man each time. Some were taken still alive, though mortally wounded: one of whom, when just expiring, cried out, Alas! I have killed no more than six; if they will suffer me only to kill seven, I shall die contentedly. Others desired to be dispatched quickly out of the way, that they might go find their companions again, whom they were not willing to survive.

WHILE matters went on thus at Bankok, the king of Siam, unwilling to come to extremities with the Makassar prince, sent Okpra Shula, one of the chief lords of his court, to bring him to a sense of his duty. The prince owned that he was extremely culpable, and desired the Okpra to intercede for him; but could not be prevailed on to go in person, and ask his majesty's pardon, notwithstanding the grounds which he had to expect it, from the lenity which had been shewn to others no less guilty than himself. This obstinacy provoked Chaw Naraya still more; yet being averse to shed royal blood, and unwilling to destroy a prince with a whole colony of people, without being absolutely compelled to it, sent the same lord once more to try to reduce him by fair means: but the Makassar prince, moved neither by the indulgence shewed him on the one side, nor the example made of his countrymen on the other, would not so much as see the court officer, pretending he was sick. Hereupon the king, resolved to punish his obstinacy, or force him to submit, detached 5400 of his guards, under the command of the Lord Faulkon, prime minister; imagining that the fear of such a considerable power might oblige him to what gentleness could not f.

a THE operations being fixed to the 27th of September, at half an hour after four in the morn-^{Preparations}ing; Lord Faulkon set out from Siam the evening before, in a balon, or bark, accompanied by ^{to attack him.} captain Yjoudal (A), commander of an English man of war than at the bar of Siam, several other Englishmen, who were in the service of the king of Siam, a missionary, and a private person. When he arrived at the point of the horse-shoe, where the other balons and galleys were assembled, facing the camp of the Malayans, he sent all the English, excepting captain Yjoudal, on board two of the king's vessels which lay half a league below the enemy's camp or habitation. The order of the attack was to be in this manner: Ok-louang Mahamontri, captain-general of the guards, was to inclose the camp behind with 1500 men; making a strong hedge, with all his soldiers, from the Menam, or great river, to a brook five fathoms broad, which was at the end of the camp. Towards the right, there was a pool behind the camp, b which reached from the Menam to within two fathoms of the brook; so that the Makassars had no more room to fight in than that narrow spot of ground, which made a kind of causeway: but the general had orders to make a barricade of stakes in that place. Okpra Sbula was to post himself on the other side of the brook, and line it with 1000 men. On the two rivers there were twenty-two small galleys and six y balons, all full of men, to be employed on occasion; beside 1000 more on the tongue of land over against the Makassars camp.

THE hour being come, and the signal given, Mahamontri set out briskly, followed by ^{Siamese general killed.} fourteen of his slaves, without ordering his troops to follow him, or taking the post which had been assigned him. He advanced thus without thought to the causeway, along which he proceeded to the very houses of the revolvers, where he stooped, calling softly Okpra Sbula. c One of the Makassars, whom he could not see for the darkness, answered in Siamese, What would you have? Mahamontri, believing him to be Sbula, went forward; asking, Where are you? Here, replied the foreigner; and at the same time coming out from his ambuscade, with twenty-five more, killed the general, and seven of his slaves, the rest escaping by favour of the night. After this, one part of the Makassars passed to the other side of the brook, before Okpra Sbula had taken possession of it^e.

HALF an hour after five, Mr. Cotre (B), an Englishman, captain of a vessel belonging to ^{Other losses.} the king of Siam, attacked them on the side of the great river, at the extremity of the point of their camp. The captain caused several fire-balls to be thrown to burn their houses, d with a continual discharge of small arms, which obliged them to return to the upper part of their camp. As soon as he perceived this, he landed, followed by ten or twelve Englishmen and a French officer: but seeing the enemy running towards them, and their own men fly at their approach, they threw themselves into the river to get off. The French officer escaped by swimming; but the English captain was shot in the head, and died of the wound.

AFTER this blow, the Makassars abandoned their camp, which was already half burned, ^{The Makassars remove.} and bent their course towards the upper part of the rivulet, with design to pass on to the camp of the Portugueses, and there discharge their fury on the Christians. Their drift being perceived by Lord Faulkon, he set forward in his balon, followed by about fifteen others; in one of which was Mr. Veret, chief of the French factory, with all those of his nation whom e he brought from Siam, in order to hinder the enemy from passing the river half a league above the camp. As soon as he overtook them, he ordered the Siameses to land, and at the same time going ashore himself, went directly up to them, followed by two Englishmen, two Siameses, and a Japanese soldier. The Siameses having passed through a long hedge of ^{Lord Faulkon retires;} bambú trees, 250 paces from the river, and entering into the plain where the enemy were, killed two or three of them, with the loss of one or two of their company. The Makassars then divided themselves into two parties, returning to the bambús with a design to surround the Siameses; and having taken their opium, ran headlong to attack the royalists. The minister prepared himself to receive them, though sixty in number; but perceiving thirty or forty others hastening to fall on his rear, he was obliged to make a precipitate retreat, in which five f of the twelve who accompanied him were slain; four Frenchmen, and captain Yjoudal killed on the spot with five stabs of the krit in his body, and two of the Frenchmen had no fewer than twelve wounds each.

LORD Faulkon, not at all discouraged at this misfortune, landed a second time, followed ^{renews the} by several English and French, who killed several of the Makassars, without losing one man: ^{attack.} however, this minister, finding that there was no reducing them without a much superior force, detached Okpra Jumbarat with 400, to advance beyond the place where the enemy then were, with orders to fight them, if they offered to pass that way; and at the same time made a descent himself near the brook, at the head of 3000 men, among whom were all the French and English, marching towards the revolvers up to the middle in water. In his way, perceiving those desperadoes, after a vigorous attack on the 400 men sent before, to retire a for shelter to the houses and bambús which were on the brook-sides, he detached 800 musketeers, to beat them out of that retreat by a continual fire, which they performed very well. A little after he sent the remaining 2200 men who were with him, to join the 400, and caused the balons to advance, in order to hinder the enemy from passing the rivulet. The Makassars, seeing themselves attacked thus on all sides, were struck with a panic, and began to separate; the greater part of them retired into the houses, two or three in each; others hid themselves among the bambús; and twenty-two of them took shelter in a mosque. These places of retreat being fired by the Siameses, the revolvers waited till they were half-burnt about their ears, and then sallied out, making amuk; that is, rushing upon the thickest of the troops, with the lance or sword in hand, and fighting continually till they are slain. b

The revolvers slain,

Not one of all these Makassars escaped. The prince, who had hidden himself behind a house, and was wounded in the left shoulder by a musket bullet, perceiving that he was discovered, rushed out with his lance, and ran directly towards Lord Faulkon, who likewise presented his own. The prince hereupon stopp'd, and making a feint, as if he intended to dart it at the minister, at the same time turned upon an English captain, who was to the left of him; but a Frenchman, who was near Lord Faulkon, making a shot at him in the same instant, killed him; at length all the Makassars were either killed or taken. They who had fled to the Mohammedan temple surrendered without fighting; there were thirty-three others taken, who were all ran through the body. A son of the unhappy prince, about twelve year of age, came and surrendered himself. Being shewn his father's body, which he c knew, he said, That indeed his father had been the destruction of people; but that, notwithstanding, he was very much grieved to see him in that condition; greatly blaming those who had slain him. Lord Faulkon ordered a Christian of Constantinople, then in the king of Siam's service, to take care of him. He was afterwards sent with one of his brothers (C) into *France*¹.

Their arms.

THE bodies of no more than forty Makassars were found, the rest perished in the river: most of them had breast-plates, made of flat pieces of iron, fastened by the ends one over the other, so that they could easily move in them. None of them had fire-arms, nor do they know well how to use them. What renders them so formidable through the East, is that fury and contempt of danger which opium inspires them with; but still more that wonderful dexterity which they have in throwing darts and lances, as well as in using the sabre and krit. d Some had long trunks, out of which they blew poisoned fish-bones fixed in shafts, wherewith some Siameses who were wounded died in three hours time. There were likewise found on the dead certain scrolls or billets, which (as charms) contributed to render them more daring. The Siameses lost no more than seventeen men, reckoning seven Europeans among the number, in all this action (D), which lasted from half an hour after four in the morning till four in the afternoon. Lord Faulkon, having ordered the heads of the slain to be cut off and exposed in their camp, departed to give an account of what had passed to his majesty; who commanded him to thank the French and English for the share they took in this expedition. e

AMONG those taken alive there were four Makassars of the king's guards, who deferred the day on which the conspiracy broke out; for which the king resolved to punish them in an exemplary manner. They beat them terribly with sticks, ran iron pins under their nails; broke all the joints of their fingers; burnt the flesh off their arms, and squeezed their temples between two boards: all this they bore with inexpressible resolution (E). What is more, they had the constancy to refuse being made converts by the Jesuits; who imagined, that people, weakened by such terrible sufferings, would more easily have complied with their proposal. After this, at seven in the morning, they were fastened naked to the ground, tied hands and feet, and a tiger let loose on them: but the beast only smelled to them one after the other, and then attempted to get away by leaping over the inclosure, which was fifteen feet high. At noon, the executioners f being impatient, drew off the tiger, and fastened them standing to thick posts, as if this posture was more proper than the former to irritate the animal. He slew three of them before night

(C) Count Fourbin says, they saved the lives of none of the prisoners excepting the prince of Makassar's two sons, who were carried to Louvo. They were brought afterwards by P. Tachard to France, where they served in the marine.

(D) Fourbin speaks of an action two months before this, in which were killed seventeen Europeans and above 1000 Siameses; but La Maire, who was on the spot, says nothing of it.

(E) As an instance of their intrepidity, Count Fourbin relates, that seeing one of the first six, who were killed at the fort, running up to him, he plunged his lance into his breast: the Makassar, as if insensible of any hurt, still pressed forward, making incredible efforts to get at Fourbin, by thrusting his body on the lance; and would certainly have gained his end, if he had not been kept back by the guard which gave breadth to the blade, he had no way to save himself but to give back, without daring to draw out his lance to repeat the thrust, until some others came up and killed him.

^a and the fourth before morning. What is admirable, they were never once heard to bewail themselves, or even so much as to fetch a sigh. One of them saw the tiger eat his foot, without offering to draw it away; another, without making the least complaint, felt him breaking all the bones of his back; the third suffered the animal to lick the blood which fell from his face, without turning away his eyes, and without shrinking: one of them alone went round his post, to avoid the sight and onset of that furious creature; but he died at last, with the same resolution and patience as the others had done ^b.

Embassy of Mess. Loubiere and Ceberet. The Siamese murmur at the French Forces and missionaries. Petracha's conspiracy. Lord Faulkon imprisoned, and the French arrested. Chaw Naraya dies; his character and family.

^b THE very same day, viz. the 27th of September, on which the revolt of the Makassars Second embassy was suppressed, four ships arrived at the bar of Siâm from France, bringing with them, ^{from France.} besides the Siam ambassadors who had been sent thither two years before, two envoys from Lewis XIV; namely Mess. Loubiere and Ceberet, with a letter to the king of Siam; the twelve Jesuits, and a body of French soldiers, under the command of Mr. Des Farges as general, and Mr. Bruan (Z), lieutenant-general.

In a day or two after their arrival, a treaty was drawn up between P. Tachard and Lord Faulkon; which, as that Jesuit expresseth it, was very favourable to religion and the interests ^{ed.} of France. At their first meeting they went both together into a bark, and remained there by themselves the rest of the day, and all the night following ^a. As no other person was

^c present, we know nothing of what passed in this long private conference; however, we may presume something was done towards furthering those very important designs which we are told were on foot between the kings of France and Siam, for the good of religion and trade ^b.

To give our readers the best light we can in this affair, we shall relate what Count Fourbin ^{Occasion there-} hath written upon the occasion. This author informs us, that Lord Constance having, besides ^{of.} the circumstance of his being a foreigner, incurred the hatred of the whole Siamese nation, by his ingratitude to the Praklang or Barkalong, to whom he owed all his good fortune (A); the Mandarins and other grandees, incensed by a proceeding which put them all in fear for themselves, conspired secretly against the new minister; and proposed to destroy him in the ^d same manner as he had done his benefactor. But Constance was before-hand with them, and had so wrought himself in credit with Chaw Naraya, that more than 300 of those who would have done him the ill office, lost their lives on that occasion. After this, he knew so well how to make use of his good fortune, and the foible of his master, that he gathered immense riches; partly by extortions, and partly by commerce, the whole business of which he had seized to himself. So many oppressions, which yet he exercised under the pretence of public good, had set the whole kingdom against him; however all stood quiet, waiting for a revolution, which, from the king's age and bad state of health, they judged not to be far off.

^e CONSTANCE was not ignorant of the ill-will which every body bore towards him, and knew ^{Constance} better than any one how little he had to reckon on the life of the king, as well as what he ^{disguis the} had to fear from a revolution. He plainly saw that nothing could secure him from the ^{Siameses.} resentment of the Siameses, but the protection of some foreign power established in the kingdom, and therefore began his scheme by proposing to the king the introduction of strangers into his state, to whom he was to intrust the care of some principal places. He so dexterously set forth the advantages which would arise from an alliance with foreigners, that Chaw Naraya ^{Contrives to} blindly gave into every thing which the minister recommended. The difficulty was to deter- ^{secure himself} mine on the choice of a prince to be addressed on this occasion. Constance durst not trust

(Z) He is by some named Bruant, by others Bruhan.

(A) This minister, Fourbin says, he destroyed, by rendering him suspected by false insinuations to the king. But whether the count had been misinformed, or Tachard, to save the honour of Constance, has represented the matter falsely, we find a different account of this affair, as already related: by which, if true, it appears that the Barkalong, who was put to death, was not his benefactor, but one who succeeded him.

any of the neighbouring potentates, whose ministers, inconstant like themselves, might, after getting all they could out of him, sacrifice him to the resentment of the Mandarins; his view therefore was turned towards the Europeans, yet without all the encouragement which he might have proposed from that quarter. He saw that it would be in vain for him to apply to either the English or Dutch, because the trade of Siam was not considerable enough to allure them to settle there: for the same reason he could not address himself to the Spaniards or Portugueses. He had therefore no other course to take but to apply himself to the French, whom he judged most easily to be imposed on. With this view he persuaded the king to seek the alliance of Lewis XIV. by ambassadors, who had in charge particularly to insinuate, that their master had an inclination to become a Christian; although, says our author, he never had the least thought that way.^a by foreign assistance.

THE king of France, in the belief that religion obliged him to concur towards so good a work, sent, in his turn, ambassadors to Siam; while Constance, perceiving his project to succeed in part so well, began to contrive how to carry the whole into execution according to his own views. He first opened his mind to Mr. Chaumont, by acquainting him, that the Dutch, with a design to enlarge their commerce, had for a long time desired a settlement at Siam, which yet the king would never listen to, for fear they should make themselves masters of his dominions: but that, if the king of France, on whose integrity he could more confidently rely, would enter into a treaty with his Siamese majesty, he would undertake to put into his hands the fortress of Bankok; a place of importance in the kingdom, and, as it were, the key of it: on condition, however, he should send thither troops, engineers, and all the money necessary to begin a settlement.^b Impress on the French.

MR. CHAUMONT and the Abbé Choisy, to whom this affair was communicated, not judging it to be practicable, declined to take the management of it upon them; but P. Tachard, blinded with the advantages which he imagined would accrue to the king of France from such an alliance, readily embraced it. He was drawn into this delusion by the artifices of Constance, who, concealing all his own private views under an appearance of zeal, rated to extravagance the benefits which would flow from such an union, as well with respect to Louis XIV. as to religion: assuring him that, one time or other, the king of Siam would declare himself a proselyte to Christianity; and insinuating the liberty which the missionaries might propose in the exercise of their ministry, under the protection of a French garrison at Bankok. Nor was he less flattered by the promises of Mr. Constance to make a considerable settlement in behalf of the society of Jesus, for whom he was to build a college and an observatory at Louvo. In a word, this Jesuit, seeing nothing in the whole scheme but what appeared very advantageous for the king, for religion, and for his society (A), undertook to negotiate the affair without hesitation: he even promised to bring it to bear, provided P. La Chaise would embark in it. From this time the whole secret of the embassy rested in P. Tachard, who was resolved to return into France with the Siamese ambassadors.^c

Poverty of Siam.

COUNT FOURBIN had no opinion at all of this project, which he foresaw would involve his native country in a vast expence, and, after all, turn to no account. He had scarce entered within the river of Siam, before he perceived how much Europe had been abused, by the brilliant relations which had been published there of the riches and splendor of that country. He particularly expresses his surprize, how the Abbé Choisy and P. Tachard could agree to write things so little conformable to truth: for, although Mr. Constance did all he could, during the few months of their stay in Siam, to conceal from them the poverty of that kingdom, yet, he says, they must have been extremely prejudiced not to see what appeared so visibly to their eyes. On his first landing at the bar he observed three or four little houses, built of reeds, and covered with palm-tree leaves, in which, he was told, the governor of the bar resided. He went into one, and found three or four Siameses sitting on the ground, cross-legged, without slippers, stockings, caps, or any thing on their bodies but a plain piece of cloth to cover them: nor was the house better equipped than the people, as having neither chairs, nor any other furniture. On asking for the governor: one of them answered, he was. This first appearance diminished much the ideas which he had formed of Siam. He was still more surprized, when, on asking for something to eat, the governor presented him with some rice; and told him, there was nothing else to be had.^d

AT Bankok he found not much better fare; nor was there either herbs, fruits, or any other refreshments to be purchased for love or money. Those handsome houses, magnificently furnished, which, in the language of Tachard, were built at certain distances on the river-side for lodging the ambassador and his train, were nothing but cabins of reeds, hung with coarse cloth painted. They were likewise moveable; so that, as soon as the ambassador and his people left them, they were conveyed to the next stage, or landing-place: and thus the

- a same sett served all the way to the capital city ; of which he gives but a very mean picture. He falls foul on those who have published relations, for speaking of a pretended city of Siam, capital of the kingdom, which they represent as big as Paris, and very brilliant in appearance : whereas, our author says, it is a city merely of the imagination, for that Siam has no other capital but Odia, or Judia ; and that it is scarce to be compared to a city of France of the fourth rank : that the ambassador's house, though the best in the town, was little and ill-built, only it was of brick ; all the rest of the place, which is very nasty, being composed of houses made of wood or canes ; excepting one street, where the Mohammedans and Chineses dwell, of about 100 brick houses, but small, and no more than a single story high. The temples also are of brick : as for the king's palace, it is very large, but without either proportion or taste.

b This is the account that Fourbin gives in general of the country and metropolis, to which every thing else is suitable. But Constance, to dazzle the eyes of the French, employed all his arts to give them a grand idea of the kingdom. He made them continual feasts, served up with all the pomp imaginable: he displayed to their view the riches of the royal treasure, which were indeed worthy of a grand monarch, and capable of imposing. But he did not tell them that it was the work of a long succession of kings, who are esteemed illustrious only in proportion as they augment it; and never meddle with it, how great soever the occasion may be. He carried them likewise to the principal temples of the city, whose statues, he would persuade them, were of massy gold ; whereas they were nothing but plaister, very artfully gilded (B). There was one fifteen or sixteen feet high, which Tachard and Choisy took to be solid gold, and have reported it as such in their voyages; but, soon after their departure for France, the chapel, in which it was, falling, broke the statue, and discovered the imposture of Constance; on which occasion Fourbin could not forbear rallying him.

c In short, that minister's earnestness to give the French an high opinion of the wealth of Siam, was seen in nothing more than the presents destined for the king and court of France; to compose which, he almost exhausted the kingdom, sending even to China and Japan for the most rare and curious things. Nay, that nothing might be wanting to promote his design, the very common sailors had bounty-money given them. It was thus that the ambassador Chaumont and the French were imposed on by this artful minister. However, he knew that Fourbin had already seen too much to be deceived; and, for fear he should discover all, in case he returned to France with the ambassador, and so blast his project, he therefore urged the king, who had taken a fancy to the count, to require the ambassador to leave him behind. Considerable offers were made to dispose him to comply : but Fourbin was so well acquainted with the poverty of the country, that nothing could have prevailed with him to stay, had not Mr. Chaumont ordered him to continue there on the behalf of the king of France. Four days after, he was created high admiral, general of the king's armies, and governor of Bankok (C) f.

d But the more opportunities he had of being acquainted with the affairs of the country, the more he was convinced of the miserable state of things, and dissatisfied with his own condition. After the ambassadors were gone, he went to Louvo with Mr. Constance, where he was introduced to the palace for the first time. The situation in which he found the Mandarins surprised him: they were all sitting in a ring on osier mats, with a single lamp which lighted the whole court: and when any of them had a mind either to read or write, he drew a piece of wax candle out of his pocket, and lighted it at the lamp, stuck it on a piece of wood; which turning on a pivot, served them for a candlestick. On asking Constance, If all the grandeur of these Mandarins consisted in what he saw? The minister said, Yes; and, taking him aside, told him, " The country was really poor; but your fortune shall not suffer on that score; I will take care of it." After which he let Fourbin into all his designs, such as have been related. He went daily to the palace for two months, without seeing the king more than once; afterwards he saw him oftener; and, on a time, being asked by his Siamese majesty, If he was satisfied to stay at his court? He confesseth, that he told a great untruth by answering in the affirmative.

e He was shocked particularly at the rigour with which the smallest faults were punished; as the cutting open the mouth from ear to ear, for not speaking enough; or sowing it up, for speaking too much: cutting off the buttocks, burning the arms with red hot irons, and

(B) Or perhaps covered with very thin plates of gold, as the Challes observed some to be.

(C) Mr. Fourbin was afterwards honoured with the dignity of Oktra-jak-di-jon-Kracm; that is, a divinity who has all the lights and experience for ever. This new mark of the king's favour inflamed the jealousy of Lord Constance to such a degree, as to attempt to poison him by milk, which he sent him; on eating of which, four of his slaves died immediately. What gave first rise to his malice was to see how, for a word speaking to the king in behalf of that minister, Fourbin had delivered him out of an ugly scrape, in which he had involved himself by an act of tyranny and oppression.

running cane splinters under the nails to the very roots; a punishment which scarce any a escape, at least once in their lives. Fourbin, surprized to see the great Mandarins exposed to such kinds of treatment (nor are the sons and brothers of the king more exempt than others), asked Mr. Constance, if he had the like to fear from the laws? That minister answered, No: but in that, says our author, he lied; for he was bastinado'd himself under his predecessor, as I understood afterwards. In short, the count thought he had no great reason to be pleased with the provision made for him, as not suitable to the high posts which were conferred upon him. The king ordered a very little house to be given him, with thirty-six slaves to wait on him, and two elephants. The whole subsistence of his family cost him but five pence a-day; so temperate are the men, and so cheap the provisions: he had his own table with Mr. Constance. The furniture of his house was of no great value; to which were added twelve silver b plates, and two great cups of the same metal, but all very thin; four dozen of cotton napkins, and two candles of yellow wax a-day. This, says he, was all the equipage of monsieur the high-admiral, and general of the king's armies^e. Having related these particulars, so necessary for understanding the state of Siam, the occasion of the French embassies, and cause of the revolution which followed, we proceed in our history.

Their mean appointments. THE French ambassadors having discharged their commission, Mr. Loubiere had his audience of leave on the 22d of December; at which time the king, who had been for some while sick, was much altered in his countenance. That ambassador departed from Siam on the 4th of January 1688; with him went three Siamese officers of state as envoys, who carried their king's letter to Louis XIV.; and Pere Tachard, with the character of Chaw Naraya's envoy c extraordinary to the king of France and the pope. He had orders from the king of Siam to carry with him twelve Siamese youths, to learn the French language; but was so hurried away that he could take with him no more than five. After they were gone, the twelve Jesuits performed their functions of teaching their religion, and the mathematical sciences, in the colleges erected for them in the two royal cities of Siam and Louvo^h.

THE major part of the troops were posted at Bankok, within the mouth of the river Siam, under general Des Farges; and the remainder were sent to keep garrison at Mergbi, a port on the western coast of Siam, in the bay of Bengál, at the mouth of the river which washes *Tenasserim*ⁱ, under the command of Mr. Bruan, his lieutenant-general.

The people uneasy THE introduction of foreign troops and foreign priests into the kingdom, occasioned d various conjectures, and induced the people to suspect that the king had a design to make some considerable change in the laws, as well as religion of the country. The odium on this occasion fell chiefly on Lord Faulkon, as the person who, influenced by these foreign priests, had given Chaw Naraya this bad advice.

THE missionaries themselves thought he was their tool: for although that nobleman continued a protestant for a considerable time after he was settled in Siam, yet falling at length into the hands of the Peres Thomas and Maldonat, they prevailed on him to renounce the church of England, and embrace his former religion, which was that of Rome^k.

SOME say, not only that he had recourse to the French to secure his power, but even that he had views of usurping the crown^l. But this is not likely: it is certain however, that the measures which he advised the king to take, gave much discontent, and at least furnished a handle for those suspicions, which soon after produced an extraordinary revolution in the kingdom.

at the court THE intrigue was carried on at court, under the plausible pretence (B) of freeing the gulf of Siam from the oppressive yoke of the Dutch; who being possessed of the strong fortress of Malakka, situated at the entrance of the streights leading into it, had imposed a toll and duty on all the Indian ships which traded or passed into that bay. However, the Siameses were of opinion that the true design was first to bring the kingdom under the French power, and then to change the established religion of the country: towards the attainment of which two ends Lord Faulkon had prevailed on the king to appoint for his heir and successor, in prejudice to his two brothers, his adopted son (Mompi Totso), whom the Jesuits were said to have converted to the Romish faith (C). It was under this successor that the conspiracy was e

^k TACHARD,

(B) The following account is taken from a pamphlet, printed at London in 1690, and intitled, A full and true relation of the great and wonderful revolution that happened lately in the kingdom of Siam, &c. It is said to contain the substance of several letters, written from Siam in October 1688, and from the coast of Choromandel in February 1686; never before published in any language, and now translated into English.—They seem to have been written partly by the Dutch, and partly by the French officers, who were then at Siam; and therefore we rather follow the account given in this relation, than that of Kæmpfer, or some others.

(C) We rather put it thus, than as it is in the original: that he had been bred up in the Romish religion by the Jesuits, and had been adopted by the king, on the persuasion of Lord Faulkon; which facts are contrary to what is related before of Mompi Totso turning Talapoin for a time, and being adopted from his birth by the king, whose son he was supposed to have been.

a to have taken effect. The French were already in possession of Bankok and Mergbi, the two chief places which open a passage into the kingdom of Siam; they were also allowed to have a command in the guards about the king's person.

THESE things were said to be done for the security both of the king and his kingdom. The French It is true, the French were better able to fortify and defend the frontier places than the natives, who are not at all skilled in that necessary art; they were likewise more capable of serving the king on all military occasions. But the Siamese officers of state and great men considered these proceedings in the worst light imaginable; so that it was with the greatest impatience and resentment that they suffered them to be carried on. They concluded, that these great French squadrons, filled with such numbers of men, and so plentifully provided with warlike stores, aimed at something more than securing the commerce of the French company of merchants; all whose stock, says our author, was not of importance enough to occasion the expence of fitting out one of those fleets. Neither could they believe that those exceeding rich presents, which arrived so frequently from France, were sent for no other end than to keep up a strict friendship between the two kings^m.

As for what concerns the Jesuit missionaries; they were looked on with an evil eye by the Siameses, who could not, without indignation, hear their specious discourses, wherein they endeavoured to persuade them, that all the fatigues and dangers which they ran through in coming to live among them, proceeded solely from the strong desire they had of doing them good: whereas, it was obvious to every-body, that their true design in teaching physic, surgery, astronomy, and mathematics, was to have the better opportunity of making converts of those who applied to them to learn the sciences. They called to mind likewise, that that were the methods which the same set of men had practised in Japan, and what a formidable party they at length made in that empire, by virtue of their conversions (D). These were the reflections which the grandees of Siam made on this occasion: as they judged the constitution both in church and state to be in danger, by the measures which were pursued at court, they resolved to obstruct them; but they were loth to attempt any thing that way during the life of *Chao Naraya*ⁿ.

As soon as the king fell ill, which was in March 1688, Pecherachas, or Pitrachas, who had taken his measures long before-hand to establish himself, in case of accidents, glossing his designs under pretence of the good of the state, began to insinuate to the people; that the French were come into their country with no other view than to destroy the royal race, and their religion and their customs, by obliging them to submit to Pra-pye (or Monpi) and Constance, who would be the second person in the kingdom, in case their designs succeeded. By these artifices it was easy for him to gain all the grandees, as well as the people, on his side, and inflame them in a strange manner against the French: the rather as the princes, who were the true heirs to the crown, always looked upon him as a faithful subject, who acted in favour of their interests; whilst they considered Pra-pye and Constance as their most avowed enemies^o.

CONSTANCE, from whom these intrigues could not be hidden, notwithstanding the fair appearance which Pitrachas put on to amuse him, in February sent general Farges an order from the king, to come up to Louvo, with the greater part of his troops. When that order came, he had in all under his command no more than 200 men: Mr. Bruan had three of his best companies at Mergbi; and, after his departure, the general was obliged to spare thirty-five choice soldiers, with two or three officers, to send on board ships which the king of Siam had sent out to cruize; besides, the small number of men which remained, diminished every day by sickness. He departed from Bankok with seventy men and five officers, under great uneasiness of mind, on account of the rest of his garrison whom he left so weak in the fort; of which there still remained unfinished two bastions, two curtains, and a cavalier (E).

On his arrival at the city of Siam, near which they were obliged to pass, they found all the gates shut; and he was informed by the bishop of Metellopolis, the Abbé De Lionne, and the chief of the French factory, that it was reported the king was dead: that all were in arms at Louvo, and on the roads: that they talked of arresting Mr. Constance, spread a thousand stories to the disadvantage of the French; and, in short, that they had advice, a great body of Siamese troops were marching for Bankok, to make themselves masters of it. On these tidings, general Farges did not think it prudent to continue his route: but, halting in the

(D) Some authors give the affair another turn. They say, that the king, in his sickness, being desirous to secure the crown to his adopted son, Lord Faulkon took the proper measures with that prince to fulfil his master's intentions. To strengthen his party, his relations were in high post, and had troops under their command; the French too were in his interest. Pitrachas therefore, to give a colour to his conspiracy, pretended that designation was unjust; and that what he did was to secure the crown to the king's brothers, as the rightful heirs. (La Martiniere introduction a l'hist. d'Asie, &c. tom. i. p. 251.) And indeed this is more likely to be the fact, than that the French intended to subdue Siam, with so small a force.

(E) A kind of high platform for cannon.

neighbourhood of the capital, he wrote without delay to Mr. Constance, to acquaint him with a those unlucky reports; and let him know, that he judged it much better, for the good both of himself, as well as the French, that he should repair to them, and go offer their services to the king's two brothers, heirs of the crown, who were then in the city of Siam; and by that means remove the suspicions which the princes had conceived against them^a.

BUT that minister, either thinking the evil not so great as it was, or not being at liberty to retire from Louvo, or, in short, being in the interest of Pra-pye (as, it is said, he afterwards confessed), he would not listen to the French general's advice; who therefore, as soon as he had received the answer of Constance, retired immediately to Bankok, with a view to preserve his troops. What followed, says Des Farges (F), has clearly evinced, that I could not have acted otherwise, without engaging myself in a party, no less unjust than weak, and causing the ruin of all the French who were in Siam. For it appeared for certain, from the information of two Mandarins whom he had in his hands, that, at the very time when Constance sent for them to Louvo, Pitrachas was already in possession of the palace; and had at his devotion more than thirty thousand men at Louvo and on the roads: without reckoning the forces of the two princes, which were at that time joined with those of Pitrachas against the party of Pra-pye, in which, as Farges supposes, Constance wanted to engage him, although he durst not declare his intentions to him.

As soon as Pitrachas understood that the French were returned to Bankok, and that it would not be easy to master them, as they were not divided; he had recourse to all the artifices imaginable to oblige the two princes and the princess to repair to Louvo: because it was of the last importance to him to prevent their joining with the French; and he could not advance his affairs so long as either the one or the other remained masters of the capital city and of Bankok, by the assistance they were able to afford each other on the least suspicion of his designs. He therefore repeated his invitations to them, under pretence that the king, who was at the point of death, wanted to see them, in order to place the crown on the head of one of them: adding, that they ought not to delay one moment, to come and receive the oath of allegiance from all the court, in order to prevent Pra-pye from gaining ground to their prejudice; and that as a faithful subject, zealous for their service, he had disposed all things in such a manner that they had nothing to fear^a.

THE princes hesitated much to comply with these pressing solicitations; not that they had for then the least suspicion of Pitrachas, but because they saw themselves masters of Siam, and were not so sure of being well received at Louvo, where both Pra-pye and Constance then were; a circumstance which seemed to forebode some unlucky accident. However, at length the younger prince ventured to go thither with the princess, who either was then, or was to be, his wife. They made their public entry, escorted by a great number of troops, sent for that purpose by Pitrachas, who received them with the utmost submission, and did them homage; in which he was followed by all the Mandarins. Pra-pye and Constance were, it is said, the only two who did not pay their attendance: however, some time after, the latter came, but the prince would not admit him.

Monpi.*

It is likely that Pitrachas, having now in his hands those who might aspire to the crown, would, before he made use of arms, have waited the king's death, which was not far off: but, being informed that Pra-pye had caused some troops to advance, in order to try his fortune, which could not but prove fatal to him under the dominion of the king's brothers, his declared enemies; that crafty lord prevailed on the princes and great Mandarins to secure his person. This important task he undertook to execute himself; and although Pra-pye was then in the king's apartment, from whence he had never stirred from the time his majesty fell sick; yet Pitrachas laid his scheme so well, that having drawn him by artifice to the door of the chamber, he forced him out by violence, and had him slain upon the spot, without regarding the king, who intreated him to spare the life of his favourite and adopted son.

THIS first act of the tragedy being over, Pitrachas judged it time to seize Mr. Constance also; sending for him, in the king's name, to come to the palace. The minister, who knew nothing of Pra-pye's death, yet was under some uneasiness, took with him three French officers, among whom was one of general Farges's sons (A). As soon as he was entered the

(F) This relation of Des Farges has for its title, Relation des revolutions arrivées à Siam, en 1688. Amst. 1691.—It was the first which appeared from the French; but the editor does not tell us how the manuscript fell into his hands. In all likelihood, it was brought to Holland by either the Maligne or the Coche, which were taken in 1689 by the Dutch, as mentioned in a former note.

(A) According to the full and true account, he was accompanied by a train of his friends, among whom were these officers of note; Mess. De Beauchamp, De Fretteville, Vaudrille, De Laiffe, and the chevalier De Fourbin. A mistake for Farges; Fourbin having left the country the year before.

a palace, Pitrachas, at the head of a great body of armed men, took him by the arm; and, with a fierce and disdainful tone, said, That he arrested him as a prisoner, for having conspired with Pra-pye against the state, and dissipated the public treasure. The officers offered to lend him their assistance (B); but he thanked them, and desired they would give up their swords without opposition. Pitrachas, concealing his evil intentions against the French for the present, ordered that they should be conveyed to Thi Pousson, under pretence of securing them against the rage of the populace.

As for Constance, he was led, as in triumph, upon the walls of the palace, followed by a number of painted arms, who are the guards, and, at the same time, executioners, of the king of Siam. He was afterwards carried into the palace, and there strictly guarded, loaded with five heavy chains, and debarred from seeing any body. He was tortured several times in different manners; and according to the common report, confirmed by the depositions of the two Mandarins before-mentioned, he confessed, in his torments, that he had held a correspondence with Pra-pye, and also dissipated, or sent out of the kingdom, great sums of money. They, after this, drew from him all the light they could, with respect to the affairs of the foreigners, and then cut him in pieces. His house was pillaged; and his wife, with most of her family, put to the rack, in order to come to the knowledge of all his effects. There remained besides three Mandarins of that party, who were put in fetters the night after Mr. Constance had been seized; all which was done without making the least noise ^b.

c THIS is the account of matters as given by general Des Farges, to which it may not be amiss to add certain particulars, which we have from other quarters.

P. D'ORLEANS tells us, that the conspiracy was formed between Pitrachas and Monpi (or D'Orleans, Pra-pye), who was drawn into it in hopes to marry the princess, and ascend the throne: that Pitrachas resolved first to get rid of Constance, as the greatest obstacle to his designs: but that Constance, apprised of it, resolved to be beforehand with him; and, as his chief dependance was on the French, sent for Farges: that Farges advanced with eighty soldiers; but, when he drew near the city of Siam, being misled by reports of troubles at court, returned to Bankok, and never after could be prevailed on to march to his assistance; that Constance, thus left to himself, endeavoured to persuade the king to appoint one of his brothers to succeed him; but, not caring for them, he declared his daughter queen, with liberty d to marry one of her uncles: that this not pleasing the grandees, the factions continued; and Pitrachas, falling out with Monpi about the disposal of a place, the latter discovered the plot to the king, who thereupon chid Constance: that, Constance having pacified the king, it was agreed that Pitrachas should be seized the first time he appeared in his majesty's apartment; but that lord, being apprised of the design, assembled his friends, and next morning, the 18th of May, became master of the palace without resistance: that Constance, zealous to serve his master, against the advice of his friends, went to the palace with a small guard, some French, two Portugueses, and sixteen English; but being inclosed with soldiers, all fled from him but the French, who would have defended him, but he would not suffer it; and thus he was seized by them. This account of P. D'Orleans, being collected from letters sent e from Siam, cannot be supposed to be so exact as the accounts of those who were chief actors in the affair.

SOME say, that when Mr. Constance was sent for by Pitrachas, he was advised by many of his friends not to obey the order, but, instead thereof, to raise the forces of the city; assuring him that many officers of the army would come over to his party, which was much superior to the general's, as being at least 50,000 strong: that besides, he had all the fleet at his devotion, and had made himself exceeding popular by his courteous deportment to people of all ranks and degrees; but that, being infatuated, he was deaf to all advice ^c. Yet, according to Kempfer, he would have avoided obeying the summons, if he could have told how; and that, dreading some ill event, he took leave of his family in a very melancholy manner ^d.

f HOWEVER that be, we are told, that the next day Okpra Pitrachas sent for Lord Faulkon; and ordered him to acquaint the French officers, "That there was no design of keeping them prisoners; but that, as a most dangerous plot against the king's life had been discovered, and all the parties concerned were not yet fully known, there was a necessity of securing all persons of note, till such time as matters should be brought more to light. And as for you, Lord Faulkon, (said he, with an air of authority) I charge you to say this, and no more, to the French officers;" letting him know, at the same time, that he should be narrowly watched. This visit to the French was only an artifice of Pitrachas to moderate

(B) According to Pere D'Orleans, as soon as Constance heard Pitrachas had made himself master of the palace, he ran thither in great zeal to serve the king, with a guard of only some French, two Portugueses, and sixteen English; with whom he would have forced his passage, had his followers been as resolute as himself: but he was scarce entered into one of the courts, when he found himself surrounded by the Siamese soldiers, and at the same time deserted by all but the French, who were taken with him, and put in irons.

their resentment, and divert them from taking measures for their common security. Among the several troops of guards which were about the king's person, one was made up wholly of Europeans of different nations, especially French; and the Siamese troop itself, consisting of 150 men, was commanded by French officers. These were sent to Thalapfen (or Tbli Poussen), a house of pleasure which the king had at some distance from Louvo; whether Ckpra Pitrachas had before hand ordered a great body of forces to encamp, and be in readiness, as occasion should require. Two days after this, the French officers, who had been taken into custody at Louvo with Lord Faulkon, were sent thither also, under a strong guard.

put to death.

MATTERS having proceeded thus far, Pitrachas had Lord Faulkon again brought before him: it was then that he opened to him the cause of all these motions. He reproached him in a very severe manner; and, having charged him with treason against the king and government, caused him to be put to the ordinary and extraordinary torture, to force him to discover his accomplices in the intrigue for making the king a christian, and subjecting the kingdom to the French power. When he had continued this unhappy lord for several hours under those grievous tortures, he ordered the king's adopted son to be brought to the place, and his head to be cut-off immediately (C); then, causing a string to be run through it, had it hanged about Lord Faulkon's neck, after the manner of an European cravat. This tragedy was acted on the 2th of May (D). The two following days he was again applied to the torture, in the cruellest manner that could be devised; the young prince's head continually hanging at his breast both night and day. Thus they continued to torment him till the 4th of June; when, being unable to hold out any longer, he died under the violence of the torture^e.

executed.

THIS was the unhappy end of Lord Constance, or Faulkon; who, after rising by his merit to the highest pitch of grandeur, fell a sacrifice to the ambition of another. He was sober, ingenious, and industrious^f. He had an agreeable aspect, was gifted with a great understanding, and very eloquent, although not bred to learning^g. His modesty, skill, and diligence in dispatching affairs (E); and his disinterestedness in refusing both the appointments of his office, and all presents from private people, daily increased the king's confidence in him, and made him deserving of a better fate. He was very civil to the English, and did them all the friendly offices which lay in his power. He was also very desirous of settling a trade between this nation and the Siameses (F): but his good intentions were obstructed^h; and who knows, but it was their slighting his kind offers which made him turn his thoughts to the French. In the year 1688 he sent a very considerable present to King James II. of all the rarities and valuable things which the East Indies produce, estimated to be worth about 6000 poundsⁱ.

HOWEVER we must here add, that, besides what is said of his ingratitude to his benefactor in the notes, his treatment of Count Fourbin, if fact, shews him to have been a bad man. At first he caressed him, and promoted his advancement at court, where he was made high-admiral, general of the king of Siam's forces, and governor of Bankok: but when he found that the count was become a favourite with Chaw Naraya, he did all he could to destroy him; first, by poison, and then by sending him upon the most dangerous enterprizes, which obliged him at last to desire leave to depart the country. But after he had obtained it, a Portuguese officer was sent, by way of honour, to bring him to court. On this occasion the bishop of Metellopolis said, "Take care you do not put yourself into the hands of those Portugueses. I know Mr. Constance well; you need not doubt but these men have orders to murder you on the road.—Be advised by me, and draw yourself out of the hands of so artful and wicked an enemy while you may." The French ambassador was suspicious of him, and at last looked on him in the same light.

FARGES says, he had great qualities, but that it required time to know him. That he had no sincerity, and a boundless ambition; was easily offended, and never forgave; which made him hated by the Siameses, and most foreigners. To proceed,

(C) We think it better to adhere to the account of the general Farges (confirmed by that of others), who makes the tragedy to commence with the murder of Monpi.

(D) Kæmpfer says, Pitrachas threw the head at Lord Faulkon's feet, with this reproach, See, there is your king. At the request of the king, who was exceedingly grieved at this event, his body was decently buried. Monpi's father was seized by stratagem between Judia and Livo (or Louvo), and all their adherents dispersed.

(E) Our author adds, his fidelity in managing the public revenue. And although he is charged with squandering it, to carry on his project of bringing in a foreign power; yet, in other cases, he might have acquitted his trust with great integrity.

(F) Yet there seems to have been no good understanding between the officers of the English East India company and him. For we are told by, Count Fourbin, that in 1688, being at Masulipatan, the director of the English factory there, who was a sworn enemy to Mr. Constance, invited him to dinner, where that minister was not spared; and that, among other things, the director said, If he could lay hold of him, he would have him hanged up.

- a KÆMPFER relates, that after he had been tortured and starved for many days, so that his body was almost reduced to a skeleton, he was carried in a chair to his own house, which he found rifled. To add to his affliction, his lady, who lay a prisoner in the stable, was so far from taking leave of him, that she spit in his face, and would not so much as suffer him to kiss his only son of four years old; another, who had died a little before, being still unburied. From thence he was carried out of town; and, after his head was struck off, his body was divided in two parts, and covered with a little earth, which the dogs scratched away in the night time, and then devoured the corpse to the bones. Before he died, he took his seal, two silver crosses, a relick set in gold, which he always wore on his breast, being a present from the pope, with the order of St. Michael, sent him by the king of France, and delivered them to an officer of the court, desiring him to give them to his little son^k.

As soon as this execution was done on Lord Fau'kon, all his effects were seized, and his family carried to prison. His lady, after undergoing a very strict examination, was at last put to the torture; which she endured for several days together, without confessing what they expected or desired. She was then thrown into prison, where she continued for some months, with chains on her hands and fetters on her feet. At the expiration of this term they made her and her family slaves; in which disgraceful quality they took off her irons, opened the prison doors, and turned her out^l.

- PITRACHAS having destroyed this party, applied all his thoughts to ruin the French, whom he considered as the chief obstacle to his designs. He was not able to draw to court the elder of the two princes, brothers of the king, who seemed to conceive some suspicion on the repeated instances which were made to him on that account; and at which the younger, as well as the princess herself, expressed their surprize. The usurper therefore, to take away all distrust, thought proper to let the elder remain at the capital, and to take a solemn oath, before the second and the Mandarins, by which he acknowledged the princes for his true lords, and promised to do nothing but what was for their service. This engagement, performed with all the ceremony necessary to render it sacred among the Siameses, banished all distrust against that artful minister, and gave him more authority than ever. However, although the lives of the young prince and princess were in his power; he was sensible that the elder, who was in the city of Siam, might, in conjunction with the French, give him so much exercise, that he durst not venture to destroy them. For this reason he employed all his art to inspire, as well those of the royal blood as the rest of the nation, with hatred against the French, in order to join in their destruction; and he had so far gained his point, that the princess herself, as our author had been assured, was the first to give into that design^m.

- HOWEVER Pitrachas, before he proceeded to open force, had recourse to all sorts of stratagems to surprize the French. He wrote several letters to the bishop of Metellopolis, the Abbé Lionne, and the chief of the French lodge at the capital, to assure them, that he intended no manner of harm to either them or their religion; yet the Abbé, on going to Louvo, to his great astonishment, found, that all the French in that city had been arrested, and the other Christians imprisoned and ill-treated (G). But the Mandarin, who had been first ambassador in France, protested to him that the French had been used in that manner, merely to secure them from insults; and that, as to the other christians, he would go forthwith and set them at liberty; which he did in a little time after.

- THE Abbé Lionne, who went to the palace, was received very courteously by Pitrachas, in the midst of a magnificent court; but, after many compliments, he declared to him, “ That it was the king’s intention that general Farges should repair to Louvo: that it was true, his majesty did not blame him for returning to Bankok, on account of the evil reports which then were current; and that he knew the general could not march since then, for the disorder which had seized him; to cure which, the king, as a mark of his esteem, had sent his physicians: but that, being now informed that he was perfectly recovered, it was necessary that he should no longer defer to obey his majesty’s orders: That, for this end, he had sent the two Mandarins, late ambassadors in France, with design

(G) According to the full and true account, Pitrachas, the better to facilitate his design of driving the Christians out of the kingdom, commanded that all the Portugueses should come together, and retire into a little island near the capital city; threatening to put to death all those who should attempt to make their escape out of it. The English had the misfortune also to feel the effects of his indignation; for they were first plundered of all their effects, and then thrown into prison. As for the French who were at Siam and Louvo, they were not treated with the same violence at the beginning, because their numbers were too considerable, and it might have been hazardous to provoke them; besides Pitrachas was willing rather to surprize those who were posted at Bankok and Mergbi, than attack them by open force. According to Kæmpfer, p. 22. the Dutch were assured of Pitrachas’s protection, and orders sent to Bankok to let their ships pass during these troubles.

“ to do him (Farges) the more honour, and give him a new proof of his friendship ; to “ which Pitrachas added, that if the general did not repair to Louvo, his refusal might “ receive a bad construction, and occasion mischievous consequences : that he hoped he would “ make no more difficulty in the matter ; and that, in the interim, he would keep his son, “ the chevalier, near him, at court.”

up to court.

THE ambassadors were ordered to declare farther, “ That the king, having caused “ Mr. Constance to be arrested as a prisoner of state, had a design to give his place to the “ general’s son (H) : that, for this reason, it was necessary he should stay at Louvo for some “ time, to instruct him in the business of his post ; a particular which made one of the chief “ motives for sending for him.”

The general’s perplexity.

FOR all their artifices to conceal the state of affairs, Des Farges could easily perceive that things were in a very bad situation, so that he was not a little perplexed what course to resolve upon. He could have been glad that the Mandarins would have been satisfied with the refusal which he made, to accept for his son the employments which they presented him ; but they absolutely insisted that he should go up with them : to which he was likewise pressed by the Abbé De Lionne (whom they had brought with them), in consideration of the state in which affairs then were. On the one side he perceived the danger he ran by putting himself into their hands ; but, on the other, he saw he could not refuse going without causing an open rupture, at a time when he was in no condition to sustain a siege ; having neither provisions, nor carriages for cannon in the place, which moreover was open on all sides.”

He resolves to go.

AT length, after many reflections, he was of opinion, that both honour and duty required him to expose himself, with his two sons, to all sorts of perils ; to try, if by such marks of confidence, he could remove the suspicions of the Siamese, and preserve his troops : a thing which seemed impossible to be effected any other way than by obeying the order. He considered likewise, that by this means he should avoid bringing on the French the imputation of want of fidelity, and gain time for putting Bankok in a better state of defence. He then gave the necessary orders to Mr. Verdesale, who commanded under him ; adding, in presence of his other officers, “ that he was sensible of the risk he ran in going to court ; but that the “ danger arising from his non-compliance would be more general and certain : that he (Ver- “ desale) should do his duty in his absence, and sooner see him and his sons hung up in his “ fight, than surrender the place intrusted to his care.”

Brought before Pitrachas.

PITRACHAS, being informed of the French general’s resolution, sent him a handsome paleki, with other voitures for those who accompanied him. On his arrival at the gates of Louvo, he was complimented by a Mandarin, who invited him, as from the king, to go directly to the palace (I.) This message he judged foreboded no good, and made him believe that he should be arrested. He passed through several courts full of armed men ; and was at first very well received by Pitrachas, who had assumed the title of Great Mandarin.
 After many compliments on his merit, and the affection which the Siameses had for his person, he asked, by way of conversation, “ Whether he had the absolute command of the “ officers and soldiers left behind at Bankok ; and if any of them dared to disobey his “ orders ? ” Des Farges answered, without considering Pitrachas’s drift, “ That discipline “ was very exactly observed in the armies of his master ; and that all must obey at the first “ word of a commander.” “ Ha ! I am very glad to hear that (replied the Great Man“ darin) ; the king sent you an order to come up with your troops. How comes it then “ that you have brought nobody with you but your son ? ”

Ordered to bring his troops,

THIS question, though unexpected, did not surprise the general so much, as the assurance of the first ambassador (K) ; who affirmed to his face, that he had importuned him to bring his garrison along with him. Des Farges perceived by this that it was a concerted affair, and began to despair of getting out of the scrape. Very well, replied Pitrachas, “ I see it “ is a misunderstanding : you have only to write immediately to your officers and soldiers to

ⁿ DES FARGES, ubi supra.

(H) According to the full and true account, this interview is represented to have been with Pitrachas himself, who, in the king’s name, offered Des Farges the place of Barkalong, which Constance enjoyed.

(I) We are told by others, that he set forward by water on the 7th of June. But he had not advanced two leagues on his way upon the river, when, perceiving himself surrounded with armed barges and galleys, he began to think that some extraordinary business must be in agitation. That his surprise was increased, when, on his arrival at Siam, he saw himself put into a palanki, or close litter, and carried to Louvo, guarded by several troops of armed men, in a manner he had never been escorted before : that, as soon as he got to Louvo, he was conducted to the king’s palace, without being allowed to go first to the Jesuits house, as he desired, under design of reposing himself a little ; though his true pretence was, to learn the present posture of affairs, which seemed to him to be much altered (1).

(K) This was Manpay, who, the year before, had

- a "repair to you, since, you assure me, that none of them will venture to disobey your commands." The general, without regarding the danger in which he was, answered, "That, if he was on the spot, what he had told him would be the case; but that, according to the customs of France, a governor out of his garrison has no authority there: and that, before he left his, he had desired the first ambassador to let him know, whether the king had sent any other order, that he might execute it at once; since it was most certain, that Mr. Verdesale would not obey him in his absence. The Abbé De Lionne, perceiving the danger in which they were involved, represented to the first ambassador, "That all was lost if the general was detained; and that Mr. Verdesale was a person who would hearken to nothing, but would push things to the last extremity."
- b THIS discourse seemed to make an impression on the Siameses; who judged it better to send Des Farges back, and keep his two sons as pledges for performing his promise. Afterwards, they pretended to send him on an expedition against fictitious enemies (L), in which he was to have the whole command; and therefore, to secure the victory, proposed to him to write to Mr. Bruan at Mergbi, to join him with his troops. It was to no purpose to desire leave to depart the kingdom, in case they distrusted the French; the king's will must first be obeyed. They then sent him a draught of the letter in Siamese, which, translated, formed a jargon, proper to give Mr. Bruan to understand, that the general was arrested, and their affairs in a very bad way. Pitrachas however was well pleased with the copy; imagining that what was a good style in Siamese, was the same in French°.
- c To add to his affliction, he was informed of an unhappy affair which befel the French who had been detained at Louvo (M). These, after the departure of the Abbé Lionne, with the two Mandarins from thence, being in fear that Des Farges would not quit Bankok to obey the summons, determined at all hazards to escape thither. With this view they took horses at that place, and made all the haste they could to get into the neighbourhood of the city of Siam, where they found more than 400 men (N) assembled, with a design to stop them. Presently after, certain Mandarins advancing, gave them their parole, that nothing ill should happen to them, provided they freely surrendered themselves. This promise prevented them from standing on their defence, which besides they saw would be to no purpose. The Siameses, however, regardless of their word, treated them in the most cruel and ignominious manner in the world. They stripped them almost naked, and conducted them back with ropes about their necks, which they tied to the tails of their horses; making them sometimes trot, not regarding the chevalier Des Farges, the general's son, who was one of the number: nor did they spare to beat them with sticks and lances, to oblige those to rise who fell down with such evil treatment, insomuch that one of them died on the road (O). They were afterwards exposed at Louvo for three hours to the mercy of the populace (P), who struck them in the face, and committed all the outrages imaginable^p.
- d As this history confirmed Des Farges still more in his opinion of the extreme hatred which the Siameses bore to the French, he made haste to return to Bankok; constrained to sacrifice his two sons (Q), whom they demanded in hostage, in order to get quickly to the place where he believed his presence was most necessary. He met with, on the road, the bishop of Metellopolis (R), whom the Great Mandarin had obliged to repair to Louvo, under pretence that the king wanted to discourse him on affairs of consequence: but, in reality, to make sure of his person, and send him to Bankok, some time after the general, to serve his design, a by exposing him to danger : for he declared plainly to him in the very first audience, “ That he verily believed the general would march up with his troops ; but that he would “ send him, the bishop, to Bankok, to let him know, that if he did not come, he would

(L) The Kochinchinians and Laos; who were said to have threatened the kingdom with an invasion. Full and true account, p. 13.(M) And at Thalasson, or Thli Pousson. The most considerable persons among the French, we are told from another quarter, were the chevalier Des Carges (a mistake for Des Farges) and De Fritteville, with Mess. De Vaudrille, De Lariffe, and two engineers, one named Bresley. Their intent was to get to the quarters of the French company in that city, and there, seizing on some vessel, sail to join general Farges at Bankok, and inform him of what had passed: for these transactions had been hitherto carried on with such incredible diligence and secrecy, that not the least tidings of them had as yet reached either that garrison or Mergbi (1).(N) According to the full and true account, a body of 6 or 7000 was sent after them: so that early next morning, when within two leagues of the capital, they were surprised to see so great a detachment of the army both before them and behind them, to hinder their getting into the city.(O) This person, as we learn from the full and true account, was Bresley the engineer, mentioned in the lastnote but one; and seems to be the same, who, as Kæmpfer relates, seeing a halter put about the neck of each of them, according to the Siamese custom on such occasions, died of the fright. But he errs in saying they were general Farges's hostages, who made their escape from Louvo; for Farges had not been there yet.(P) They were chained two and two together by the neck, and imprisoned. Their domestics were treated in the same manner; and so were all the other French who staid in that city. See the full and true account, ubi supra.(Q) Kæmpfer says, Des Farges was indeed well received; but, before he was permitted to return to Bankok, was obliged to deliver up that place, and leave his two sons, with twelve more of his countrymen, as hostages at Louvo.(R) He had lived long among them, and was apostolic vicar in the greater part of India. Full and true account, p. 14. Kæmpfer calls him Mr. Louis. Capt. Hamilton speaks of a French bishop named Ciffec, who in 1720 was eighty years of age, and had been there at least since 1708.(1) Full and true account, p. 3, & seq.

In spite of all the dangers which threatened, it was unanimously resolved, as soon as Des Farges reached the fortress, to perish rather than yield themselves up to the mercy of the Siameses, who had given them so many proofs of their ill-will. Mean time hostilities commenced, by attacking a ship belonging to the king of Siam, whose crew had refused to sell the French provisions, in very injurious terms. After this, the general withdrew the troops which were in the old fort on the west side of the river, because it was not possible to keep b it ; at the same time ordering the parapets to be demolished, and such cannon, as could not burst, to be nailed up. Nor were the Siameses backward to annoy them in their work ; and no sooner were the French retired, than they set about repairing the fort and unnailing the guns. To prevent their lodgment, three officers, at the head of thirty men, were sent in two shallops against them ; but finding a multitude, which they did not expect, they were forced to retire, after the loss of three or four men. The French then made a great fire, to hinder the enemy from mounting a cannon, which would have uncovered the fortress. Their works were several times destroyed, yet they had the obstinacy to repair them, although it cost them abundance of men. Mean time they did not cease firing for three or four days : and few nights passed in which they did not make false attacks ; which, joined to the inconveniencies within the fortress, gave the French inexpressible fatigues ^a. c

Brawny of St. Crik.

As there was no possibility of receiving succours from without, nor hopes of obtaining composition from their enemies ; they resolved to send a small bark, belonging to the company, out of the river, in quest of two Siamese vessels, manned with Frenchmen, which had been sent a cruising two months before. This was a dangerous enterprise, but their situation required it. A lieutenant, named St. Crik, with nine soldiers, sailed down the river, after escaping the fire of the fort ; but scarce was the bark out of sight, when it was attacked with such fury that the French could not prevent boarding. However St. Crik cleared the deck of the multitude, by setting fire to part of his powder and all his grenados, which he had disposed for the purpose. The bark having afterwards run aground, the Siameses, who d imagined all the powder was consumed, entered her again without any apprehension ; and were tossed into the air in greater numbers than before. Then St. Crik, setting fire to some barrels which he had reserved, blew up the bark, and all the Siameses who were in it ; most of whom perished with him, to the great admiration of those who were on shore ^e.

PITRACHAS, on the first advice which he received, that Des Farges refused to advance with his troops, did not fail to send to him the bishop of Metellopolis, as he had promised. This prelate arriving at a time when the enemy's fort was battered with most violence, the Siameses took all his men prisoners ; stripped him, and, putting a robe about his neck, threatened to expose him to the cannon of the fortress (S). The Grand Mandarin yet tried another expedient : which was to make the general's sons write, to acquaint their father, “ That there was e
“ no more life for them, unless he came to Louvo ; and that it was even a favour done them, “ that they were suffered to let him know the dangerous condition in which they were.” Des Farges wrote for answer, “ That he would willingly part with his own life to save theirs ; but “ when the honour of the king, and the preservation of his troops were concerned, he had “ no interests but what he thought himself obliged to sacrifice : that they ought to rest satisfied “ with the consolation, that they had committed no crimes wherewith to reproach them“ selves ; and that the king would in time revenge the outrages which should be done “ them ^f.”

The two princes murdered.

MEAN time the Grand Mandarin, from the advice which he received of what passed at Bankok, conceived little hopes of succeeding in his design against it, any more by force than f stratagem ; and began to think that he ought not to defer prosecuting his ambitious views any longer on that score, but clear his way to the throne by making away with the two princes, brothers of the king, who only stood in his passage : one of them was already in his hands, and he had taken his measures to secure himself of the other. He therefore assembles the principal Mandarins in the place, and complained in strong terms against the princes, who, he said, had sworn his destruction ; and desired to know what they thought was proper to be done with them. As his power was now too great for any person to oppose him, and he had

(S) According to the full and true relation, he actually was, with a halter about his neck, fastened to a gibbet, set up in a place most exposed to the fire of the cannon. Kæmpfer says, the bishops, and seven or eight jesuits, were imprisoned in the court of the king's magazines, where our author saw them living cheerfully. Three other jesuits, who settled at Louvo, on pretence to learn the Palli (or Balli) language, disappeared of a sudden.

a besides gained over most of those great men by fair promises; they unanimously gave it as their opinion, that the princes were ungrateful persons, and deserved to be punished.

IMMEDIATELY orders were sent to seize the prince, who was at Siam, and bring him up to Louvo. Not many days after, both he and his brother were sent to Tbli Poufon (T); where, being put into scarlet sacks, they were beaten to death with clubs of sandal wood. This is the account which general Farges gives of the princes, and their fate: but, according to the full and true account, they never reached that place; for they were murdered in the way by a party of men, who were appointed to do that execution (U). After this, they fell upon all the considerable persons (who were the friends or acquaintance of the three princes, and the minister, already dispatched out of the way) and caused them either to be put to death after b the same manner, or else closely confined in prison.

THE old king was still alive when his two brothers were put to death; but he died the day following*. According to Kämpfer, this happened on the 11th of July, in the fifty-fifth year of his age(X), and thirty-second of his reign.

THE character of Chaw Naraya, as given by the French travellers, is very advantageous; His character they will even have him to be the greatest prince who ever reigned in Siam. He was for stature somewhat of the middle size, but strait and well-shaped. He had besides an engaging air, a sweet and obliging carriage, especially to strangers. He was brisk and active, an enemy to idleness and sloth; for he was always either in the woods a hunting, or in his palace minding the affairs of his kingdom. He was no lover of war, because it ruined his people, whom
c he tenderly loved; but no king in all the east appeared more fond of glory, or impatient to revenge an affront when offered to him by any of the neighbouring princes. His love for learning prompted him to send to Europe for persons who might teach his subjects the sciences. He was desirous of knowing every thing; and having had a piercing genius, easily became master of what he had a mind to learn(Y). He was magnificent (Z), generous, and a sincere friend as could be desired. These were the illustrious qualities which acquired him the respect of his neighbours, the fear of his enemies, and the love, as well as esteem of his subjects, which fell little short of adoration. He was never addicted to those vices, particularly the immoderate use of women, so commonly found among the eastern princes; and often punished the most considerable officers of state, for being too much given to their pleasures. He had
d too much understanding to believe the senseless doctrine of an annihilated God, or rather a Being who, weary of governing, plunges himself in repose, and for ever after forgets what passes in the world. On the contrary he believed the Deity to be eternal, and that he governed the universe by his providence: to the same immortal being he prayed twice a day, for two hours time, in the morning when he was up, and at night before he went to rest.

CHAW NARAYA left behind him only one daughter. According to Loubiere, she was called His family. Nang fa, that is, young heaven^b. Chaumont says she was styled the princess queen^c; and all agree that she had the rank and honour of a queen. In 1685 she was twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age. She had her lands, revenues, soldiers, and officers, distinct from the king's. She daily gave audience, morning and evening, to all the wives of the great officers at court, e who durst not fail to make their attendance: and while the princess queen received them sitting on her throne, they lay prostrate, with their heads to the ground, in the same manner as their husbands appeared before the king. She was severe even to cruelty in her chastisements of her female attendants, as hath been already mentioned. She went to see his majesty twice every day, and dined with him. Lord Faulkon had often been admitted, on affairs of importance,

(U) According to Kämpfer, they were beaten to death with sandal clubs, in a temple near Livo, or Louvo.

(X) The full and true account says he was about fifty-nine years old. Kämpfer places this event in the year 1689, or that of the Sonkard, the Siamese epocha 2232; but, according to Loubiere, p. 8, it ought to be 2234. Besides it was not in the year of Christ 1689, but 1688. as appears from the foregoing account of the French, which seems, for the general, to be most authentic. Capt. Hamilton relates this revolution with somewhat different circumstances; and says, he had the account from Mr. Besepool, Lord Faulkon's secretary, who lay in prison three years after his master's death, with his neck in the portable pillory, and was often whipt, to make him accuse those whose estates the usurper attempted to seize.

(Y) This is the character generally given of him by the missionaries. But Count De Fourbin, who was often about his person, says quite the reverse of him. He used to entertain the king with little stories, which pleased him, but never took any pains to dress them; for he observes, that his Siamese majesty was a prince of no genius, and very ignorant; whereas Tachard cries him up as a prodigy of wit and judgment.

(Z) Fourbin observes, that although the kingdom of Siam is poor, and one sees no footsteps of magnificence in it, yet when the prince went a hunting, or shewed himself in public, he appeared with all the pomp suitable to a great monarch; and the superb figure which he made when he went abroad, was scarce to be excelled by any other prince. As for the manner in which he was served in his palace, it was known to no person; his most intimate favourites not being admitted nearer than a window, from which he talked to them.

when they were at dinner, but could never see her face, for a little screen which was placed a before her. It was by means of Lady Faulkon that Choisy got his information concerning her.

CHAW NARAYA left a sister likewise, and several aunts, at his death, who were all old women^d.

Reign of Pitracha, or, Picheracha.

The usurper's policy.

His family,

The kingdom pacified.

THE usurper managed his affairs so politically, that this great revolution was brought about without causing the least tumult or insurrection throughout the whole kingdom. Opra Pecherachas, or Pitrachas (A), was distinguished from among the other grandees by his majestic air and by his illustrious birth; for he was said to be descended from the true royal race, from which the father of the late king had usurped the crown. He was foster-brother to Chaw Naraya, and much about the same age. His affected zeal for religion had gained him the esteem of all the *Talapoy*s, as well as veneration of the people; who besides observed in him a heart truly Siamese, full of esteem for his own nation, and contempt for others: but being at the same time a great politician, he knew so well how to dissemble and conceal his mind, that he constantly refused the most considerable dignities both for himself and his son, seeming to aspire to no other happiness than that of a private life. The distance at which he kept himself from public affairs, removing all suspicions of his designs, he was constantly one of the first in the counsels of the king. Mr. Constance, who was thought to have the whole power, and omitted nothing to make the French think so, had not near so much credit nor access as Pitrachas; although he was in great favour with his master, who thought none but he capable of treating with foreigners, on account of the thorough knowledge which he had of their customs, and of all the courts of Europe^a.

To this account of general Farges we may add the report of other authors. Pitrachas, as hath been observed before, was one of the most powerful lords of the court, as having had the command of all the king's elephants and horses, which are esteemed that monarch's principal forces. His family had not only been long in the highest offices in the state, but was frequently allied to the crown; and it was even publicly reported, when Loubiere was at Siam, that either he, or his son Sourakak, who was an Ok-louang, might pretend to it, if they should happen to survive Chaw Naraya, who was nursed by Pitrachas's mother. The people loved him because he appeared moderate; and was by them supposed to be invulnerable, because he had come off unhurt in a battle against the king of Pegu, wherein he exposed himself much. His courage had likewise gained him the favour of Chaw Naraya^b. Kämpfer tells us, that his mother was the king's sister, and that his own sisters and daughters were the king's wives. On these accounts that monarch always looked on him as his most intimate friend; and he was the more grieved at the severity which Pitrachas exercised against his brothers and adopted son, as he never expected any thing of the kind from his hand; the rather too because he always expressed an abhorrence for the burthen of a crown^c: the common artifice however, in all times, of those who coveted it most. This lord having brought all things to bear according to his mind, set out from Louvo the last day of July, and arrived at the capital, where he was crowned with great ceremony and without opposition^d.

PITRACHAS (B) being now master of the kingdom, forthwith disposed of the great offices of the state in favour of those who had served him. He promoted all the Mandarins whom he

(A) Others write Petracha, or Pitracha, which perhaps is more correct; as Racha, which makes two of the three syllables of his name, seems to be the same with, or at least an imitation of, Rajah; a name of dignity equal to that of king, in the higher peninsula of the Indies.

(B) This account is from the French officer, who was made prisoner at Meghi after Bras's retreat, and was carried to the capital at the time when this transaction happened. See his letter in the full and true relat. p. 21. also, p. 17.

a had any reason yet to fear, and even set at liberty those whom he had caused to be arrested, in order to gain both parties over to his interest. He eased the people of their servitudes; and commanded public alms to be distributed, which effectually procured him the affections of the whole nation. With regard to the princess, he still preserved his respect for her, whom he proposed to make his consort (C). However, it was reported, that she expressed extreme grief at the death of the young prince, who either was, or was to have been, her husband (D); and that, in the excess of her rage, she had loaded with injurious language the author of his death: but time, in no long space, wore out her grief, and she chose rather to live a queen, than die unhappy. But to return to the affair of the French:

b PITRACHAS had no sooner resolved to make away with the princes, than he began to think of accommodating matters with the French, and obliging them to depart the kingdom in peace. In order to this, he sent for the sons of general Des Farges, and told them, "That he found himself moved with compassion for them; that besides, he knew the integrity of their father's heart, and that he was not capable of breaking his word: adding, that he was convinced they were the troops, who, possessed with panic fears, could not be persuaded to obey him: that he granted them their lives; and farther, out of consideration for the general, as well as friendship for them, would send them to him." Their return to Bankok, which happened on the 24th of June (E), gave extreme joy to all the garrison, as well as their father, who at first could not conceive what lucky motive to impute it to: but when afterwards he was informed of the death of the two princes, he concluded that the Great Mandarin was willing, by this action of generosity, to open the way to a peace with the French; and the two Mandarins, whom they consulted on that occasion, confirmed him in that opinion^e.

FROM the time the general's sons arrived at Bankok, the fire diminished on both sides, and several proposals were made towards an accommodation; but the distrust of the garrison was so great that they could rely on nothing. Toward the end of these long and fatiguing negotiations (F), during which Des Farges found means to procure provisions, the two Siamese vessels, manned with Frenchmen, mentioned before, arrived at the fortrefs: they returned them also the officers, who had been detained at Louvo; and some other French of that place, as well as the capital, having found means to join them: they then were informed of all the ill-treatment they had received from the Siameses, as well as the persecution which the Siamese, Peguan, and Portuguese christians still suffered in a cruel slavery: that the seminary of the bishop of Metellopolis had been pillaged, and many young christian girls seized to make concubines of. They learned also from a missionary, who had been put in the kanghe, with all the christians of the province of Porfeluk, at the farther end of the kingdom, that ever since the month of January, they had not ceased to threaten them with the evils which afterwards befel them. This shews that Pitrachas had concerted his measures a good while before, for executing the design which he had in view.

THEY were also informed by a Frenchman, who had been made prisoner at Mergui, that Mr. De Bruan, and the French of his garrison, had been attacked; but that water failing in the place, which besides was commanded by a Siamese battery, they had forced their way through the enemy, and seized a vessel belonging to the king of Siam, by means of which they had gotten safe out of the country^f. But of this more particularly hereafter.

(C) Neither Kämpfer nor Hamilton tell us what became of this princess, or indeed so much as mention her: the first letters likewise which came from India after the revolution, were silent in this particular; but others, which followed them, brought an account, that, by order of Pitrachas, she was put into a velvet sack, and had her brains beaten out with clubs of sweet wood; after which her body was thrown into the river (1).

(D) Reports or suggestions were various on this occasion. Some say she was, or was to have been, married to Monpi, as before observed; and the French say, that she had taken a fancy to the chevalier Des Farges, and actually promised to marry him: but this is more than the general Des Farges says himself.

(E) This was after the death of the princes and the king, who, according to Kämpfer, died the 11th of July. There is great disagreement in the dates of different authors: the French officer made prisoner at Mergui says, he died in July, but could not learn the day. He mentions nothing of Des Farges's sons being sent to Bankok, but says, on the 9th of August, he, with five more officers, were sent thither, as mentioned hereafter; and if his dates be right, the general's sons could not have been returned to him before August.

(F) Authors give no particulars of this long negotiation; only the writer of the full and true relation informs us, that, on the 25th of July, the bishop of Metellopolis, being released from the dreadful situation in which he had been posted before Bankok, was sent into the place to obtain a commission from general Des Farges, to negotiate a peace with such persons as Pitrachas should appoint for that purpose. The commission was immediately granted him; and next day he returned to Siam in order to execute it: from that time the Okpra began to desist from his cruel treatment of the French, and other Europeans who were in his power (2). But as it appears from the account of Des Farges that he desisted earlier, perhaps June should be put in the place of July.

(1) Full and true account, pref. p. 2.

(2) P. 17, & seq.

THE officer above-mentioned was made prisoner the 25th of June, as he relates himself (the day after Bruan had retreated), and sent up to the capital, where he arrived the 17th of July. The day after Okpra Pitrachas was crowned (which must have been the 1st or 2d of August), he ordered all the French and English, who were in that city and Louvo, to be set at liberty. On the 9th he, with four other officers, De Fretteville, De Vandrille, Des Carges (G), and De Laisse, were all sent by the new king's orders to Bankok; not to their own general, as they hoped, but to his general, who commanded the Malayans, by whom they were kept prisoners almost a month. All the French left at the capital, were delivered into the custody of the Jesuits, and (Viret) the chief factor of the French company, who were to be responsible for them. However, the king being resolved to have a peace (H) at any rate, sent them at last to Mr. Des Farges, who would hearken to no treaty unless they were comprehended in it^g.

The Oriflame arrives.

SHORTLY after, advice came to Bankok, that the Oriflame man of war, commanded by Mr. L'Estrille, was arrived in the road, where he had continued for some time in no small pain, to hear neither from the garrison nor from some officers of his ship, who had first landed; for it seems the Siamese had artfully conducted them to the capital, without passing by the fortresses, or mentioning any thing of what had happened: so that if the affairs of the French had not been already in terms of accommodation, those officers must have run great hazard; nor could the ship have given the garrison any assistance, or even had the least correspondence with them. This shews, says Des Farges, how ill-situated Bankok is, and that sooner or later we must have abandoned it.

Lady Constance escapes.

IN the interim another accident happened, which had like to have broken off all their negotiations. The lady of Mr. Constance, after having been cruelly tortured to make her declare all her late husband's effects, and suffered many other outrages, as well from the painted-arms, who guarded her, as from the son of Pitrachas, who was passionately in love with her, at length found means to escape, and take refuge at Bankok^h.

P. D'ORLEANS relates the circumstances of Madam Constance's escape in the following manner: a French officer, named St. Mari, being arrived at the city of Siam, to look for materials to equip the ships which were to transport the garrison of Bankok to Pondicherry, having had an opportunity of seeing that lady, made a tender to her of his services, with his purse. This civility encouraged her to propose the design of making her escape with him; which motion, being a man of gallantry, he embraced. The third of October in the evening, the time fixed for their departure, St. Mari repaired to her door well armed, as he was resolved to run all risks to bring her off. Things succeeded beyond expectation; the lady, with her son and one chamber-maid, following the officer, got safely on board the balon which waited for them, and next day they arrived at *Bankok*ⁱ. To return to the general's relation:

THE new king, fearing that if she got out of the kingdom, she would be mistress of the riches which her husband had conveyed abroad, sent the French word, that unless they delivered her up, he would not come to any accommodation with them. This proved a most unlucky event; for the sails, cables, anchors, and other things, without which they could not depart, were still in the hands of the Siameses; and the general saw he should have all the difficulty in the world to get them restored. Although he was extremely uneasy upon this new affair, which happened without his knowledge, yet he was of opinion, that he ought not to surrender her, without the least providing for her safety. He tried to obtain leave for her to go out of the country: but the king would not hear of it, and hostilities began to break out with more fury than ever. They had already at the city of Siam the Sieur Viret, chief of the French factory, whom the general had sent to finish their affairs, with all the missionaries, and one Jesuit, who still remained there. In short, they threatened the relations of the widow-lady with the most cruel punishments; so that her mother wrote to Des Farges, intreating him to accommodate the affair. This he did by a treaty, in which the king of Siam himself promised to allow the lady Constance liberty of conscience, with that of marrying whom she pleased; and that he would not permit any violence to be done either to her or any of her family: on which conditions he sent her back^k.

(G) Sure this cannot be a mistake for Des Farges, one of the general's sons. If it was he, methinks the author of the letter would have mentioned that circumstance.

(H) Kempfer gives an account of the conclusion of this affair very different from all the French writers: he says, That the general, being enraged at his disappointment, on his return to Bankok, fired on the Siameses and their ships: he likewise hung up on the ramparts two of his garrison, who were natives, for appearing not quite so ready to act as he would have had them, and committed all sorts of hostilities. That this conduct had like to have provoked the Siameses to act a bloody tragedy with him and his sons; for which purpose they had begun to raise forts on the river, to cut off his retreat by sea; but on his abating his firing, and laying all the blame on his people, who would not obey his orders, the Dutch resident persuaded the court to flight his bravados: so that soon after he obtained leave to depart with his people. The French pique themselves much on the triumph of Des Farges: must we believe them, or the Dutch?

- a P. D'ORLEANS relates, that all the French officers of the garrison of Bankok were extremely ^{to the usurper,} pleased at the arrival of Lady Constance, and were determined to protect her; but the general, to their great surprize, did not approve of it. A council of war was twice called upon the occasion by his orders, to deliberate on the affair; in which he endeavoured to prove, that it was for the interest both of religion (I) and the nation itself, that she should be sent back: but, says our author, he could not bring any into his opinion excepting his two sons. However, he was inflexible; yet, that things might be done with the less violence, he endeavoured to induce the unfortunate lady herself to submit to his reasons. As this attempt proved in vain, on the 15th of October sixteen days after her arrival, she was confined in the prison. She submitted to this force, after protesting against the violence which was offered her under the protection of the king of France; and thanking the officers for the good-will which they had testified in her behalf. She was from thence delivered into the hands of an old Mandarin, one of the ambaf- ^{Her future} sadors who had been in France, and was conducted by water to Siam; where her last lot was ^{condition.} to be sent down to serve in the kitchens of the palace^k. Kæmpfer informs us, that in the year 1690, Lady Faulkon and her young son went begging about the streets, none daring to intercede for them^l. But afterwards she recovered somewhat of her former condition; for in 1719 she was honoured with the superintendency of the king's confectionary. She was born in Siam of honourable parents; and at that time respected both in court and city, for her prudence and humanity both to natives and strangers, whom she was ready to relieve when they fell into difficulties, or under the oppression of the men in power^m. To return to the French at Bankok.
- c At length their negotiations, which had been so often interrupted and renewed, were termi- ^{The French} nated by a capitulation; whereby the Siameses engaged themselves to give the French three ^{depart Siam.} vessels, with provisions and all other necessaries, besides two great Mandarins in hostage, to conduct them out of the kingdom (K). It was farther stipulated on the part of the French, that they should leave the works of the fortress entire, and that they should march out with their arms and baggage; which they did on the first (L) of *November*ⁿ.

As they always apprehended some treachery on the part of the Siameses, they were continually on their guard. However, those people discovered no signs of intending to attempt any thing against them: but, on their arrival at the road, they refused to deliver them some tackle and pieces of cannon, which had been left on the shoals near their forts. By way of reprisal, the French thought fit to detain their Mandarins, who were responsible for their baggage.

- d It is almost incredible how many works the Siameses were obliged to make during the siege. ^{Siamese} Besides the cavalier, which, in spite of the fire from the French artillery, they had raised ^{works} against them in the western forts, of which they were masters, they had surrounded the fortress at a small cannon-shot distance with palisades, and afterwards with nine forts, from whence they battered it on all sides. From Bankok to the mouth of the Menam, the banks were defended by several other little forts, built with design to hinder succours coming to the French from without. On these forts were mounted more than 140 pieces of battering cannon, which had been brought from the capital by an arm of the river opened for the purpose, to avoid passing in sight of the French. They had likewise, by immense labour, secured the entrance ^{to block up the} of the bar with five or six ranges of thick trees, fixed extremely firm in the ground at low ^{French.} water, leaving only a narrow passage; which might easily be shut with an iron chain, and was guarded by several armed gallies. The French could not have believed the Siamers capable of so many contrivances (M); but their fury at the beginning was so great and general, that the very women, making it as it were a point of devotion, repaired in crowds with victuals for the soldiers who worked at their forts. They were besides assisted by most of the foreigners who were in the country: they had English and Portugueses to command their ships at the entrance of the river, and Dutch to play off their bombs; while the French were blocked up not only

ⁿ DES FARGES, ubi supra.

(I) According to the Full and true relation, Mr. Des Farges, before he left Bankok, was prevailed on by the Jesuits to deliver her up to Pitrachas, upon this suggestion, that, being a christian, and extremely beloved by the usurper's son, she might marry him, and contribute her endeavours to make a convert of her husband (2).

(K) According to the Full and true relation, the peace was concluded and signed on both sides on the 30th of September, on the following conditions:

1. That the French should surrender the fort of Bankok.

2. That all the French should have leave to depart the kingdom.

3. That they should have two frigates belonging to the French company; a ship of the French king's, called the Oriflame; and a fourth of seventy four guns, on which the king of Siam was to embark them, and transport them out of his dominions.

(L) According to P. D'Orleans, they set sail the 29th of November, and arrived at Pondicherry the beginning of February 1689.

(M) This shews how little Europeans know of foreign nations, or are curious to enquire into the state of arts and sciences with them; which are far from being so contemptible, as, by superficial travellers, to conceal their own ignorance, or want of curiosity, they are represented to be.

by an army of the Siameses, but also by the Peguers, Malayans, Chinese, Mohammedans, and a others, who had their respective forts, where they were intrenched °.

It had indeed been easy for the French to have hindered the building of these forts if they had been sufficiently furnished with powder: but their general Des Farges chose rather to husband it, and gain time, than put it out of his power in seven or eight days to repulse the enemy, in case they should make an attack: and the event, says our author, has made it appear, that no other course could have been taken, considering the circumstances they were in. On one hand, it was very uncertain whether the proposals of the Siameses were sincere; but, on the other hand, it was most certain, that all had been lost if he had not hearkened to them. This made him often say to most of his officers, who breathed nothing but fire and flame, that they should always have an opportunity to make the push of despair; but that time might produce that lucky turn, which they durst not hope for from all their too precipitate efforts.

Des Farges gave the enemy sufficiently to understand by letters, that if they did not act sincerely, and grant him his demands, he would first blow up their fortresses, burst all their cannon which were at his disposal, and then would fall upon them with his whole garrison; only desiring of them, in such case, the favour not to give any quarter to a Frenchman, as he was resolved to deal the same way with every Siamese who fell into his hands. The event convinced him, that one need never despair of getting out of a scrape with time, which may produce alterations. That which happened on the death of the princes, began to put the affairs of the French in a better situation than they were before. The resolution, which they made the Siameses sensible they had all put on, and of which St. Crik had given them proofs, served also not a little to intimidate them: but, after all, Des Farges, like a true Frenchman, was ready to acknowledge, that the fear of vengeance from his grand monarch, contributed more than every thing else to the advantageous conditions, which the Siameses had been constrained to grant the French; after they had been exposed for five months to the most rigorous treatment P.

THIS is the account of the revolution of Siam in 1688, and the conduct of the French on that occasion, as given by general Des Farges, who must certainly have had opportunities of knowing whatever past of moment; and, in all appearance, has been sincere, though not particular enough, in his relation of facts, notwithstanding the reflections passed on him by some of his own countrymen as well as others; of which, however, it will be proper to inform our readers.

others

It has been already intimated, that the French, according to P. D'Orleans, loaded Des Farges with reproaches on several accounts: 1. For not advancing to Louvo to support Mr. Constance. 2. For delivering up Lady Constance, who had fled to the banners of France for protection. 3. For surrendering up Bankok, which, they say, he might easily have defended against all the forces of the king of Siam; and therefore go so far as to tax him with cowardice, and even with crimes of a blacker die, breach of trust and robbery.

offences.

WE are told that Mr. Constance entrusted the general Des Farges with immense riches; and that it was the desire of converting them to his own use, which was the true cause of the revolution which happened in Siam. To this our author imputes the loss of Siam, and the death of the king, as well as of Mr. Constance, and others; with the delivering up of Lady Constance, and her only son, to Pitrachas; lest, if they should pass over to France, the vulturs would be obliged to quit their prey. To the same cause he ascribes the persecution which the Christians underwent; and, in short, suggests, that, but for the father's avarice, the son would have been king of Siam: for he affirms that the princess, heiress to the crown, had given her hand to marry the young Marquis Des Farges, who was forced to abandon her. But for this our author seems to have had no other authority than that of the general's sons, who boasted at Martinico, that their father had deprived the Marquis of the throne of Siam, and the Chevalier of the post of generalissimo Q.

HAVING thus given an account in what manner the French forces, which were at Bankok, quitted that fortress and the kingdom of Siam; let us next see what became of those which were posted at Merghi, under the command of lieutenant-general Bruan (N). This officer signalized himself on several extraordinary occasions. He took possession of the place in March 1688, with all the satisfaction which he could wish. The Siameses furnished him with plenty of victuals, tools, and workmen, for building a fort. He had already pretty much advanced the fabric, when he found the workmen gradually to desert him; and the Mandarins of the province had not the same regard for him as before. He had a dispute with the governor of Tenasserim, (N) So Des Farges names him; P. D'Orleans calls him Bruant; and his name is spelled Bruhan, in a letter of one of his officers, inserted at the end of the Full and true relation, so often cited in this history of the revolution.

- a which increased his diffidence. The Siameses had raised a little fort at Margui, commanded by an eminence, which was also fortified; and as the guard of both posts was too much for a garrison of 120 men (O), the court ordered the lower fort to be demolished as soon as the upper was in a condition of defence. When Mr. Bruan went to execute that commission, the Mandarin opposed it; and the courier, whom he sent with a complaint to the minister (Mr. Constance), was arrested on the road. At the same time, having received advice from other quarters, that bad designs were forming against the French, he caused a small English vessel, with a frigate (P) belonging to the king of Siam, to be rigged, and brought under shelter of the fort. In this interval he received the letter which Pitrachas obliged Des Farges to write to him, with orders to evacuate the place: but the extraordinary style of that letter, which, besides, was not signed, was sufficient to hinder this able officer from obeying them.

b THIS refusal was the signal for war, which immediately began by the siege of that place: Hospitalities The enemy, having been often repulsed, gave over their approaches to raise a battery upon a commence temple near the fort, which from thence they battered at first with pretty good success: but the French, having built another against it, that of the besiegers was soon dismounted. They likewise killed their chief gunner, who was a Portuguese, and threw them into such disorder, that they had no hopes of becoming masters of it but by famine, which proved their friend. However, they would not so soon have had their wishes gratified, if the well of the fortress had The French not of a sudden gone dry; so that, water failing, the garrison thought fit to retire (Q). This retreat they did in such good order, on the 24th of June, that the Siameses, believing they were going to attack them, fled as fast as they could, and left the French a free passage to the sea. They might have embarked without any misfortune, had not some soldiers, who marched last, slipped, through the steepness and slipperiness of the glacis, and stumbled on those who were before them; which struck them with such a panic, that it made them break their ranks, and run in disorder towards the vessels.

c THE Siameses, perceiving the French in this confusion, came pouring upon them in great Pursued by the numbers, and slew some soldiers; others were drowned; and, among them, one captain Siameses. Hilton, with part of his company. Du Bruan, and his officers, who had bravely sustained the efforts of the enemy, while their men were embarking, entered last into the vessels; and after receiving some shot of cannon from the fort which they abandoned, set sail in spite of the d Siamese galleys which came out of the port to follow, but durst not approach them; and thus they escaped the hands of the Siamers (R).

e NEXT day, the 25th of June, a French officer, who commanded a company of fifty Siamese French officer soldiers, being upon duty in the little fort of Mergui (S), he was seized by his own men; and seized for four days fastened to a stake, with chains about his body as well as hands and feet. On the 29th he was carried to view the French who were killed during De Bruan's vigorous defence and retreat. There were about thirteen dead bodies on the place; and when he had made his report to the Mandarins who commanded the besiegers, they ordered him to be tortured, to force him to declare, "That De Bruan was sent to Mergui, unknown to the king of Siam, solely by Mr. Constance's order, to make himself master of the country; and that De Bruan expected several ships from France, with men, arms, and ammunition, to enable him to carry that design more effectually into execution." He suffered the torture for four hours together.

THE 17th of July they sent him for Siam, in company with one Picquard (T), a soldier. Sent up to who was made prisoner on the day of De Bruan's retreat; and although both were chained, Siam: yet above three-score soldiers were ordered to escort them. The 17th he arrived at the capital of Siam, and two days after he was conducted to Louvo. He was led, without stopping, to the

(O) According to the Full and true relation, he had with him only fifty-two soldiers, three captains, three lieutenants, and as many ensigns, in all, to guard a large fortress, open on all sides. The forces seem to have been divided between the greater and the lesser fort, from what is mentioned hereafter.

(P) It carried twenty-six guns according to the Full and true relation.

(R) But they had not such good luck at sea: for, besides meeting with violent storms, on the coast of Martaban, Espagnac the Jesuit, and Mr. Beauregard (who was governor of Bankok after Fourbin), going ashore for provisions, were made slaves of. They were afterwards driven on a desert island, and reduced to the utmost extremity at the end of September, when a French ship put in there and took them in. Bad weather forced them into the river of Arrakan, where one Le Du was prime minister, and relieved them; but in Balassor road, meeting with fourteen English ships, they were seized as ships of Siam, with whom the English said they were at war. From thence they were carried to Madras, and got to Pondicherry the 15th of January 1089.

(S) It is called Morgen in the original; which is a letter containing the journal of the French officer himself, mentioned in a former note (N), we find the several particulars of moment; and by it the dates of several facts are supplied as well as rectified.

thence to Ban-
kok: NEXT morning a missionary, discovering the place where he was confined, told him, that the bishop of Metellopolis was gone to Bankok, by order of Okpra Pitrachas, to negotiate a peace with general Des Farges (X); and that they were in daily expectation of hearing it was concluded. This news gave him the first hopes he had of life since he fell into their hands. The 25th of July the bishop returned to Louvo, with full power from Mr. Des Farges to treat of peace; and from that time Okpra Pitrachas began to desist from his cruel treatment of the French, and other Europeans then in his power.

THE new king, the day after his coronation (which was the 1st or 2d of August), ordered all the French and English who were in Louvo and the capital, to be set at liberty. The 3d of August our author came from Louvo to Siam, with four other officers, as before-mentioned, who on the 9th were all sent to Bankok to the Malay general; but preparatory to the peace, which was concluded on the 30th of September, were put into the hands of Mr. Des Farges. ^b

Merghi. Two days after the peace, the general sent our author from Bankok to Merghi, to see what was become of Mr. De Bruan, and acquaint him with the same (Y). He was accompanied by a Mandarin, who, by the king's order, was to provide him with all kinds of necessities during the journey. The 12th of October he arrived at Merghi, and not finding De Bruan there, on the 1st of Novem'ber he embarked on a small frigate of the king of Siam, and went upon the rivers Tavay, Martavan, and Sorian (or Sirian), belonging to Pegu, in quest of him. As he could not hear of him in any of these places, he was obliged to pass by the islands of Rey, and go on shore at Seroide; where by some pieces of the French soldiers cloaths, and other marks, which seemed to be left on purpose, he perceived they had touched there. On the 12th of November he returned to Merghi, where finding the ship Le Coque, belonging to the French India company, he embarked two days after for Pondicherry, where Mr. Des Farges had ordered him to wait his coming ^c.

The French
cherri. THAT general arrived the beginning of the year 1689 (Z), with all the French, as well secular and military, as ecclesiastics, on board the four ships, with which he set out from Siam. On the way he put into the port of Balaffor, and there, by advice, as it is said, of the Jesuits, set the two Mandarins on shore. This is one of the things for which he is censured by his countrymen; who thought Merghi a much more proper port, not only as it belonged to Siam, whither those officers were to return, but as they expected he would in revenge have plundered the Siamese temples, and stripped the images of their golden cases (A). ^d

THE French being now all met at Pondicherry, sent two ships to Europe to inform the king of the state of their affairs: and then, full of resentment for the miseries received from the Siameses, resolved to subdue the island of Jonsalam, on the coast to the south of Merghi. But in this also Des Farges disappointed them; for he departed for Europe not long after, without making any attempt on that island before he went. He set sail in the Oriflame with his two sons and four Jesuits, carrying with him the immense riches which Mr. Constance had trusted in his hands; and which, according to our author, were to be divided between him and those ecclesiastics. ^e dies at sea.

MR. Des Farges died in the voyage, a little on this side the Cape of Good Hope; from whence the Oriflame steered her course for Martinico in the West Indies, whither she arrived about two months after. The general's two sons no sooner landed than they made acquaintance. They were both in the flower of their age, well-shaped, full of vivacity, and profuse in their expences. During the two months which they staid there, they spent no less than 50,000 crowns each in balls, feasts, and other gallantries. About the end of March 1690, they left the island in the Oriflame, which, in quitting the Antilles, met with an English ship. The vessels attacked each other, and in boarding both sunk to the bottom, in sight of the Caribbees. In the Oriflame perished, besides the Marquis and the Chevalier Des Farges (who, we are told, were as brave as their father was otherwise), the four Jesuits, with their riches and their writings. Thus ended the long and expensive expeditions of the French to Siam, with all their sanguine hopes of either getting footing in the kingdom, or converting the king and the natives. In these expectations they were the dupes of Lord Faulkon or Constance; who, being a foreigner himself, seems to have had nothing more in view than to provide for his own ^f

(U) By the Barkalon probably must be meant Pitrachas.

(X) It is much Des Farges mentions nothing of this.

(Y) This we are told was necessary; as Pitrachas had published a declaration forbidding any French to stay in the kingdom, or Europeans to harbour to them, on pain of death. Full and true relation, p. 17, & 21.

(Z) P. D'Orleans says the 5th of January 1689.

(A) They would not have liked that their own should have been served so, though they no less deserve it as idols, and objects of idolatry. But what with them would be sacrilege in one case, would be virtue in the other: so much often does the reason of man differ from reason itself, or the reason of things.

a security, by the assistance of foreigners against the Siameses, whom he knew to be his enemies^a.

HOWEVER, while these things were transacting in the Indies, P. Tachard was very busy in P. Tachard France, soliciting new troops to be sent to Siam, in consequence of the secret treaty con-^{solicits troops.} cluded with Mr. Constance. But it may be presumed, that the account given by his two ambassadors and Count Fourbin, made Louis XIV. perceive that he had suffered himself to be imposed on too much already by the intrigues of that Jesuit, to give ear any more to his remonstrances. The news brought afterwards by the two ships sent from Pondicherry (B), no doubt completed the ruin of his project with the king. Notwithstanding Tachard did not change his resolution; but in March 1690 embarked with three Siamese Mandarins, who had received baptism in France, on board a squadron of six ships, all equipped half for war and half for merchandize, on account of the East India company, under the command of Mr. De Quesne.

P. D'ORLEANS, from whom we have this intelligence, seems to speak as if Tachard had Meets with a succeeded in his suit, and had actually set out with more ships and soldiers for Siam. But repulse nothing like this was the case. That Jesuit arrived with the fleet at Pondicherry, at which place terminated all his grand projects, which the revolution in Siam had brought to nothing: for he saw he had no business to proceed to that kingdom, where he should never be acknowledged as ambassador from the king of Siam by the enemy of Mr. Constance, who then sat upon the throne. As to the court of France, it was in vain for him to look on that side, after being the means of drawing the nation into a vast expence, by two fruitless expeditions, undertaken c almost solely on the credit of his report. In short, we are told, that when he solicited Louis XIV. to send ships once more to re-establish by force the mission of Siam, the king, from the king. who received him not at all favourably, with an air which shewed a dislike to his proposal, said, "You have made voyages for a long time, and laboured much; you would do well to rest yourself." Our author adds, that his superior had notice from the king to send him at a distance; and, in effect, the report ran, that he was banished as it were to *Pondicherry*².

WE have been the more particular in relating the circumstances of this remarkable revolu-^{The author's} tion, both to give our readers a sketch of Siamese politics, and enable them to form a judgment ^{apology.} of the conduct of the French in the part they acted therein, as it is differently represented by authors even of their own nation. Two things at least may be observed from the premises: d one, how ready the French are to catch at every occasion of extending their power or commerce; the other, that they are as easily to be made dupes of as other nations, whom they laugh at for being made dupes of by themselves. It only remains, before we proceed to other particulars, to give some account of the state of the Romish mission and the missionaries, both before and after the said revolution.

COUNT Fourbin, on his return to France, being introduced to the king, who was inquisitive King of Siam's to know how matters stood in Siam; his majesty asked, if the king of that country had really conversion any thoughts of embracing christianity? Fourbin answered, that he never had such a thought; and that no mortal would be bold enough to make such a proposal to him. It is true, continued the count, that Mr. Chaumont in his first audience spoke much about religion; but Mr. e Constance, who served as interpreter, dexterously omitted that article. The apostolic vicar, who was present, and understood the Siamese language perfectly well, took great notice of this, although he durst not say any thing of it, for fear of incurring the resentment of that minister, who would never have forgiven him, had he once opened his mouth: that in the private audiences which the ambassador had during his stay, he never failed to introduce the affair of religion; but Mr. Constance, always the interpreter, acted two parts on the occasion, telling all a farce. the king of Siam that which pleased him, and returning as an answer to Mr. Chaumont what he thought convenient; so that in effect both were imposed on by the artful minister, and nothing concluded on. Our author added, that he had the above account from the bishop of Metello- polis, who always assisted at those private conferences, and told it him as a great secret. f Louis XIV. surprised at his discourse, which he listened to with much attention, said to Count Fourbin, laughing, princes are very unhappy in being obliged to have recourse to interpreters, who are often insincere^b.

THE king enquired afterwards if the missionaries reaped the fruits of their labours, and had already converted abundance of Siameses. Not a single soul, replied Count Fourbin; but as No converts the far greater part of the people is made up of different nations, and there are among the made

(B) These were La Maligne and Le Coche; they were taken by the Dutch at the Cape of Good Hope. There were unluckily aboard them four Jesuits, who, wanting to make some astronomical observations, by intreaties and threats prevailed on the two commanders to put in there. These were rich prizes: M. D'Armagnan, going to blow up the Coche, of which he was captain, was killed by the gunner; and the gunner, delivered up by the Dutch, was hanged by the French for saving their lives. These particulars De Challes had from the armourer of the Coche. And P. D'Orleans informs us, that those ships being carried to Zealand, he composed his relation from the letters and accounts brought by the prisoners.

Siameses a considerable number of Portugueses, Kochinchineses, and Japanois, who are christians, the missionaries took care of, and administered the sacraments to them : that they went from one village to another, and got admittance into houses by practising physic and distributing little remedies ; but that, after all, their industry hitherto had been quite thrown away : that their chief success consisted in baptizing infants, whom the Siameses, who are very poor, make no scruple to expose in the open fields ; and that to this single article was to be ascribed all the fruit which the missions had produced in that country.

by the Jesuits. IN discourse with P. La Chaise, the king's confessor, who spoke of the king of Siam's being desirous to retain the Jesuits in his dominions, by building them a college and an observatory ; Count Fourbin said thereupon, that Mr. Constance, standing in need of the protection of France, had promised more than he could perform : that the college and observatory would perhaps be built during the life of the king of Siam, and the Jesuits for so long maintained there ; but that, in case the king died, France must be obliged to provide funds for the subsistence of those fathers, there being but little probability that a new king would apply any of his revenues to that purpose.

Anecdote about Tachard. P. LA CHAISE observing to him, that he did not agree with P. Tachard, the Count answered, that he neither knew what P. Tachard had said, nor the motives which induced him to speak ; but that his friendship for Mr. Constance, who had his reasons to seduce him, might well have blinded him, and afterwards rendered him suspected : that during the short stay which he made in Siam with Mr. Chaumont, he had wholly engrossed the confidence of the minister, to whom, on certain occasions, he served as French secretary ; and that he had seen briefs, written by that same Jesuit, and signed, By my Lord ; and lower down, Tachard. At this word La Chaise, for all his accustomed gravity, could not forbear laughing.

THIS unfavourable account given of the mission of Siam before the revolution, receives no melioration from the account we meet with after it. Des Challes, clerk to one of the ships which in 1690 went to Pondicherry, where he learned all the circumstances of the late revolution, informs us (C), that the Christians were always persecuted there ; and the missionaries, in particular, every day exposed to the most cruel torments. He adds, that the only persons who were spared were the Jesuits, who had played their cards with so much policy, that, far far from meeting with any vexation, money was given to them by the new king to leave the country.

Jesuits inhumanity. GENERAL Martin, governor of Pondicherry, in a discourse which he had with our author, censured their conduct very severely. He observed, that if it was true that they suffered no cruel treatment like other Christians, and received rich presents from the usurper, it was also as true, that neither the French officers nor soldiers, though reduced to the last extremity, received the least succour from them ; who chose rather to let them die for want, as most of them did, rather than relieve them.

Their converts relapse. THAT all their converts, not excepting one, renounced their religion as soon as ever the persecution commenced ; which shewed how ill they had been instructed : that Mr. Des Farges, his sons, and all the officers, had affirmed those things at his table ; and that none of the Siameses had stood firm but the proselytes of the missionaries (D), who secretly retained christianity : that what the Jesuits understood best was the science of the world and of commerce, whereof they had extracted the quintessence as it were by the alembic, and knew how to turn it to profit.

Dishonour France. THE general laid to their charge the setting ashore the two Mandarins at Ballasor ^d ; they ought, said he, to have brought them to Pondicherry ; but they rather chose that the Dutch (who with the English transport their merchandizes to Europe) should be thought more their friends, as well as more capable to serve and protect them, than the French. That thus they would complete the ruin of the French reputation, to which the desertion of Madam Constance and her son ; the infamous and cowardly rendition of Bankok (E) ; the being forced out of Mergbi and the kingdom of Siam, after the tragic death of the king, and that of Mr. Constance, whom only the French could have saved (F), have already given a terrible shock : that the missionaries, with Pere Tachard (G), and other Jesuits, remained at Pondicherry ; but he knew

(C) In his account of the voyage, under the title of, Journal d'un voyage fait aux Indes Orientales, &c. without the author's name, in three volumes 12mo. Rouen 1721.

(D) A distinction is made between the Jesuits and the missionaries ; by which last term are denoted the regulars of other orders.

(E) Mr. Des Challes is of the same sentiments. He says general Des Farges was in a condition to have defended Bankok against all the forces of Pitracas. But to assert things is not to prove them ; nor has any body undertaken to refute those which Des Farges has advanced.

(F) This censure is too severe ; since it does not appear that it was in the power of the French to have saved any of them.

(G) P. Thomas, superior of the Capuchin missionaries, says expressly, in his Lettre Apologetique, that the Jesuits contributed not a little to the ruin of the mission of Siam. It is true, the Capuchins are their enemies.

a not any business they had there : that they behaved with so much complaisance one to another, that any one would take them for the best friends in the world, if he did not know them ; but that possibly at the same time they were contriving how to give one another pain in Europe, where he heartily wished they had staid ^c.

THIS character, given by general Martin, of the hatred which reigns between the Jesuits State of the and other orders in the Romish church, is too well known to be doubted : but whether there mission. be that difference which he mentions between the converts of one party and the other, or those of the Capuchins be better instructed and more stanch than the converts of the Ignatians, we will not pretend to determine ; as the authors who since then have given an account of the Siam mission, do not make any distinction on the occasion. According to Captain Hamilton, it was
b in a very low state in 1720. He observes, that the French had a bishop then with a church, and a seminary for the education of converts, which stood a little above the city of Siam, on the opposite side of the river ; but that they made very few proselytes except when corn was dear, at which time some of the poorer sort admitted baptism, which intitles them to a maintenance from the church ; but when plenty comes they throw away their beads and brazen saint, and bid adieu to christianity. In the above-mentioned year, the Christians in and about Siam did not exceed seventy, and they the most dissolute, lazy, thievish rascals, says our author, to be found in the whole country ^f. A great credit to the popish mission !

WE have now finished our account of this remarkable revolution, with its causes and its con- Remarks on sequences : which, besides its use as a very curious piece of history, helps to fill up the reign of Siam.
c the prince who brought it about. And as we are possessed of very few other materials relating to it, we shall subjoin some farther remarks on the kingdom of Siam, made by Count Fourbin, who was not only more sincere than the generality of those who have published relations of Siam, but had much better opportunities of coming to the knowledge of the matter he treats of ; qualifications fit to render every thing acceptable which proceeds from the pen of such a person.

IN discourse one day with Mr. Ceberet the French ambassador, who had travelled by land The country a from Louvo to the port of Mergbi, where he went on board the same ship (H), Mr. Fourbin told desert. him, that what he had seen was yet the most beautiful part of it : that the whole kingdom, though very large, was scarce any thing but a vast desert : that in advancing into the country,
d one meets with nothing but forests and wild beasts : that all the inhabitants dwell on the sides of the river, because the lands, which it overflows for six months of the year, produce, almost without culture, great plenty of rice, in which the whole riches of the kingdom consist ; so that in ascending the river from the bar to Louvo, you see every thing which deserves attention in the whole kingdom, with respect to either the people, their cities, or the products of the earth.

IN answer to the question proposed to him by Louis XIV. Whether Siam was a rich king- The people dom ? He made answer, that it neither produced nor consumed any thing. To explain this miserably poor. paradox, he added, that no person has any property in lands, the greater part of the country lies waste ; and the people are so very abstemious, as well as so very poor, that he who can e earn fifteen or twenty franks a year, has more than is necessary for him to live upon : that the only food of the inhabitants is rice and fruits, which they have in abundance ; for they dare not touch any thing which ever had life, for fear of eating their relations.

THAT there was among them neither nobility nor condition, being all born slaves to the Abject slavery. king ; for whom they are obliged to work one part of the year, unless he dispenses with it by raising them to the dignity of Mandarins : that this dignity, which raises them from the dust, does not screen them from the displeasure of the prince, which they incur with a great deal of ease, and is always attended with rigorous punishments. That the Barkalon himself, though prime minister, was as much exposed to it as the rest, and did not support himself in f that dangerous post but by crawling before his master like the basest of his people ; that if he happens to fall into disgrace, the mildest treatment he can expect is, to be sent to drive the plough, after being severely chastised : that in short, when a Mandarin has by his addresses gotten a little sum of money, he must conceal it very carefully, otherwise the king will be sure to take it from him ^e.

As a proof of the difference there was between France and Siam, he relates, that the Man- A Mandarin's darin who had been ambassador in France, and was among those who attended Mr. Ceberet to remark. Mergbi, ran up to him as soon as he saw him, and told him, that he had great reason to desire to return into his own country : then, having made a pompous eulogy on the court, added, in a bad French, France is a great good ; Siam a small good.

King's retirement.

THE French ambassador Ceberet being desirous to know how the king of Siam governed in his palace ; Mr. Fourbin told him, he could not satisfy him on that head : for that they who are without, however eminent in station, never enter that part of it where the king is lodged ; and that those who once enter never go out any more. Every thing passes there in profound secrecy : every person has his fixed employment, and his separate apartment, from whence he is never permitted to remove. Those who serve in one chamber are ignorant of what passes in the rest. Thus all the apartments have their particular officers even to that of the king ; who passes almost his whole life shut up, making part of his grandeur to consist in being rarely seen. When he would speak to his ministers most in favour, he shews himself at a window about six feet from the ground, from whence he hears them speak ; and disappears after he has made known his will to them in a few words.

WITH regard to the interest of the king of France and that of commerce, he observes, that the principal revenue of the king of Siam consists in the trade, which is carried on almost solely by himself throughout the kingdom ; where nothing is to be found excepting rice, areka, a little tin, some elephants which are sold, and certain skins of fallow beasts, of which the country is full : that they have no sort of manufactures excepting some muslins ; of which the Mandarins only have the privilege of making a kind of waistcoat, which they wear on days of ceremony.

THAT the kingdom of Siam, which forms almost a peninsula, might indeed be made a very commodious staple to facilitate the commerce with China, Japan, and other countries of the Indies, being washed by two seas, which open a communication with many countries, as well to the east as west ; whose merchandizes were imported every year to Siam, as to a kind of market, where the Siameses gained some profit by selling their provisions : but that, as it produced nothing of value, it could serve only to the use above-mentioned ; and consequently the new establishment made by sending troops thither was absolutely unnecessary, that which the French company already had in the country being more than sufficient for the purpose.

The French duped.

LASTLY, as to the fortress of Bankok, he said it might remain in the power of the French during the life of the king of Siam, and of Mr. Constance ; but that, when one of the two came to die, the Siameses, prompted by their natural interests, and the enemies of France, would not fail to drive its troops from a place which rendered them masters of the kingdom^d. The event had already verified these predictions when Count Fourbin arrived in France ; whither, soon after his return, tidings came of the strange revolution which happened at Siam in the course of the same year, in the manner as hath been already related. It is now time to return to Pitrachas :

A pretender starts up.
A. D. 1689.

THIS usurper was scarce seated on the throne, when he was in danger of being thrown out again by a priest of Pegu. This Talapoy had been formerly taken into custody at the capital for some misdemeanor, and during his confinement became so well acquainted with the affairs of the court, that he gave himself out to be the elder of the late king's brothers, who had been put to death by Pitrachas, as before related. This impostor gained so much credit in all parts of the country among the common people, that in a short time he drew together about ten thousand men ; when being informed that the king's son (Sourakak), intended to be on a day appointed at a certain place, in order to divert himself with his whole court, he went thither with his followers, and hid himself in a neighbouring wood ; purposing, as soon as the prince and his retinue were arrived, to put them all to the sword, then to surprize the city, and treat the king and his adherents in the same manner. The prince, who knew nothing of this plot, when the day came, set forwards towards the place ; but perceiving such a multitude of people as he drew near, suspected some ill design, and fled back to the capital, leaving part of his treasure behind him. Pitrachas, on this alarm, with great speed assembled an army of 12,000 men, and sent them to meet the pretender, who was marching with his forces towards the city. This unexpected opposition threw the undisciplined rabble into such a consternation, that they immediately dispersed ; flying with so much precipitation, that, for all they were diligently pursued by the king's forces, not above 100 of them were killed, and 300 taken, the soles of whose feet were burned, to prevent their escape. A few days after, the priest himself was found in the wood, sleeping under a tree, with only a boy along with him, and was carried to Siyuthia. There he was exposed to public view for several days, chained about the neck and breast to a post ; after which his belly was ripped open, and his bowels being taken out while yet alive, were thrown to dogs to be devoured before his face^f.

- a We are strangers to the subsequent transactions of this king's reign, and even to the time of his death. But according to the account we have of his two immediate successors, he did not long enjoy the fruits of his usurpation. We are told he was succeeded by his son, by whom we understand Sourakak before-mentioned; and that he married his father's widow, though against her will: that he died in 1708, and left the throne to his son Chaw, who would have married the same lady, but that she absolutely refused to comply with his inclinations; and the better to avoid his importunities, retired into a convent, where she died in 1715*. We meet with nothing in the authors before us, relating either to this prince or his successors, excepting that in 1717 the king of Siam invaded Kamboja, with an army of 50,000 men by land, and 20,000 by sea; but was obliged to retire, after losing half his forces, for want of provisions¹.

S E C T. I.

Description of the country.

- c K AMBOJA is a country very little known to Europeans; for although both the Dutch and English have had opportunities of viewing it from one end to the other, by means of the river, which they have ascended, and along whose banks the lands principally inhabited lie, yet very few have regarded the improvement of geography, or the curiosity of their countrymen, sufficiently to give any tolerable account of it. The chief, or indeed the only authors, who may be said to have treated of it in any degree expressly, are Gaspar da Cruz, a Portuguese Dominican friar, who went thither on the mission about the year 1559; Angensola, in his history of the Phillippine islands, which he wrote about 1592; Henry Hagenaar, who went to India in 1631, and was sent from Batavia, as ambassador to the king of Kamboja, in 1637: the embassy of Gerard van Wusthof in 1641, from the city of Kamboja to Winkjan, then capital of the Laos, up the river Mekon; lastly, Captain Alexander Hamilton, who was at Kamboja in 1720, and gives some account of it in his New Account of the East Indies, published in 1744. These are the principal funds from whence the following history of that country is compiled, interspersed however with remarks from other authors.

- d THE name of Kamboja, like that of other countries, has its variations, being found differently written (A) in different authors. But this is not owing so much to the difficulty which Europeans find to adjust their orthography to the Siamese pronunciation, as some have imagined, as to the difference arising from the different force given to the letters of the alphabet by the several nations of Europe, and to the want of the j consonant in most of them; for which some use y, others di and dj, while the j, in Camboje of the French, has the sound of zh (B).

e This country, situated between the ninth degree, and the sixteenth degree thirtieth minute of latitude; and between the 109° 30' and 126° of eastern longitude, reckoning from the meridian of Paris, is bounded on the west by Siam; on the north by the kingdom of Lan-jang and the Laos, with part of Kochinchina; on the east by Kochinchina and Champa; and on the south by the bays of Kamboja and Siam; or more distinctly by the former on the south-east, and by the latter on the south-west, on which side its greatest extent of coast lies. As it stretches seven degrees thirty minutes from south to north, its greatest length that way is about 520 English miles; and its greatest breadth from west to east, including six degrees thirty minutes of longitude, about 398 miles.

- f The land of Kamboja, as to its superficial form, may be compared to a great valley with a spacious river running through the midst, lying between two chains of mountains which extend from north-west to south-east; separating it on one side from the kingdom of Siam, and on the other from those of Kochinchina and Champa: so that in a good measure it resembles a Egypt, with this difference, that the valley or space between the mountains is not so long as that of Egypt, but is much more extended as to breadth.

(A) As Cambrie, Camboge, Camboya, Cambodia, or Cambodia, and the like.(B) As je, I myself, which is founded not like the English je, in jennet, jenny; but like zhe, or as if those words were written zhennet, zhenny. This sound is hardly tobe expressed in any European language beside the French, except the English; which shews the copiousness of its alphabet; while the French can neither pronounce our j consonant, nor express it by their letters, especially before a or u.

Air and soil. THE air must needs be very hot, in consequence of its being situated so near the line; and as it is inhabited almost solely near the great river and its branches, it is attended with the inconvenience to which countries overgrown with woods and uncultivated are subject; that is, of being much pestered with muskittos, which are extremely troublesome to the navigation of the river ^m.

THE soil however in fertility is equal to most Indian regionsⁿ; it produces corn, rice, pease, butter, oil, and other provisions in such plenty, that Spaniards, Persians, Arabs, and Armenians, resort thither to bring them away. It abounds with fruits of various kinds and ^b drugs, such as bangué, sanders, and opium. The sugar is very good; and indigo is prepared here after an excellent manner.

Commodities. KALAMBA, aloes, and other odoriferous woods (C), are found in Kamboja; with variety of precious stones, such as amethysts, garnets, hyacinths, cornelians, chrysolites, and acates, cats-eyes; not to mention milk-stones and blood-stones, besides a sort of crystal found in the mountains, which is exceedingly transparent ^o.

RAW silk and elephants teeth may be had in this country at reasonable rates; the first at 120 dollars per pekul (D); and the largest teeth for fifty or fifty-five dollars each. Gold likewise is among the productions of Kamboja, of twenty-one carats fine. Provisions of flesh and fish are exceeding cheap, and may be bought without a permit from the king: our author ^c has purchased a bullock of between 4 and 500 weight for a Spanish dollar; rice at eight pence per pekul: but poultry are scarce, because the country being for the most part covered with trees, when the chickens grow big, they repair to the woods and shift for themselves. The woods also give shelter to great numbers of elephants and tigers, besides wild cattle, buffaloes, and deer (E): all which animals are free for every body to catch or kill ^p.

Its ports. THE coast of Kamboja is known by several sorts of marks; among the rest, that of numerous trees, and even entire woods, which appear in view. But although it extends about 140 leagues along the sea, yet there are not in that space above five or six ports fit to receive ships; at least Europeans have not discovered more. Of these the first is Kupang-soap, on the south-west coast towards Siam: where may be had elephants teeth, sticklack, and the ^d gum named from the country Kamboja, or Kambodia: but then no free commerce is allowed there without a licence from the court of Kamboja.

Ponteamas. THE next place is Ponteamas, or Pontiamo, which drove a considerable trade for many years; having the conveniency of a pretty deep, though narrow river, which, in the rainy seasons of the south-west monsons, hath communication with Bansak or Kamboja river. This conveniency drew to it the foreign commerce from the capital city; which lying near 100 leagues up the river, and a continual stream running downwards for most part of the way, made the navigation thither so long and troublesome that few ships cared to go up to it. For these reasons they chose rather to resort to Ponteamas, which thence increased and flourished till the year 1717, when it was destroyed by the Siam fleet ^q, as mentioned hereafter. ^e

Islands on the coast. ALTHOUGH there may be other ports on the coast of Kamboja, yet these two are all which we are acquainted with (F). On the south-west side it is crouded with little islands, especially towards Siam; but those which are largest, and of most note in navigation, lie at a considerable distance from the shore. Yet none of them are inhabited, because the Saliters, or pirates, who infest that coast, rob the inhabitants of what they get by pains and industry. There is one called Quadrol, about three leagues west of Ponteamas, which has the proper requisites for a settlement. It is about three leagues long and one broad, has plenty of wood and water. The land is moderately elevated; the soil black and fat, excepting on the east side facing Ponteamas; where yet it has several fine sandy bays, which make good harbours ^f in the seasons of rain and wind.

Pulo Panjang and Ubi. ABOUT seven leagues south-by-west of Ponteamas river, and eighteen west of the nearest coast, is Pulo Panjang, consisting of a cluster of eight islands, which form a pretty good harbour. Thence south-east about twenty-two leagues, and almost eight due south of the point of Kamboja, is Pulo Ubi; which lies in the way of all ships bound from either the gulf of Siam, or the south, to the river of Kamboja. It is about seven or eight leagues in compass, the land pretty high and very woody, affording good masts for shipping^r. It hath water on the north side, where vessels may ride; but the best anchoring place is on the east side, against a small bay.

THE last island of note on the Kamboja coast is Pulo Kondôr, about forty leagues to the eastward of Pulo Ubi, and twenty south of the Bansak river (G). It belongs to a great parcel of little islands, and is the only one inhabited. There is good anchorage on the north side; and at the south end lies another island, stretched from north-west to south-east, about three miles long and one broad, in such a manner as to form a harbour between. The entrance is from the north-west, where the two islands are about one mile asunder; but towards the south end of the harbour they almost meet, there being only a small passage for boats^s.

THIS island stretches with a great bend from north-east to south-west, forming a great hollow or bay on the south-east side. It is not above three leagues long and one and a half broad (H). It has two good ports (I), one parallel to the other; and both lying from north-west to south-east. The inhabitants call it Konon, and some French the island of Orleans. It may in fair weather be seen sixteen leagues off.

THE sea abounds with fish, particularly large turtles of a delicate taste; with whose shells and oil the inhabitants drive a profitable trade on the continent. Of a fish like anchovies the make a brine or pickle, which the Kochinchineses mix with their rice. There are very few birds here: the most remarkable are spar-hawks, who are at continual war with the fishes: and a bird as large as a wood-hen, which is of a beautiful green, with a stripe of white at the end of the tail; the flesh is greyish, and very delicious: but fowl are plenty.

APES are here in prodigious numbers. Of lizards there are five kinds: one sort like those in France; the rest are of the size of common serpents. Some of them have wings, and are of the bigness as well as colour of lizards: under the chin they have a purse, white, and shaped like a heart, which swells and falls in breathing. Other lizards are covered with scales, and of a frightful aspect; what is worse, their bite is mortal. They get into the hollows of trees in the evening, and set up a cry so loud that one would think it came from some great bird. It is called koka, from that word which it seems to utter at those times. The lizards of the fifth kind, which are likewise scaly, have hands and feet, armed with claws, as large as those of a boy of fifteen; the tail is triangular: they are seven or eight feet long, and, it is said, are good to eat (K).

ONE sees in Pulo Kondôr flying squirrels; rats which have ears like the human; dormice as large as fowl; butterflies with trunks. Serpents and insects of all kinds are numerous, and very troublesome. In the island to the south-west of the port, there are several sorts of wild beasts^r.

THIS island, as well as the lesser surrounding it, are covered with trees ever-green, for the general very thick, tall, strait, and the wood hard. The areka, mango, ebony of all sorts, and milk-trees, are very common; also bambû, rattan, and wild muscadine. There is a little shrub which bears wild grapes, or rather a kind of gooseberry. Many of the trees are odoriferous, and some yield gums; whereof one sort much resembles benjamin. The tree, which affords an oil, called goudron by Dampier, is here very common. It is of the kind whose body is tall and wood hard; the leaves and bark much like those of the chestnut-tree. The oil is drawn in this manner; three or four feet from the ground they make a hole in the tree a foot high, one and a half wide, and half a foot deep. Here they put fire, and in a little time the oil begins to drop: at first it is brown, then it grows whitish, and at last reddish; it has then the consistence of butter, and a very sweet smell. The best times for gathering this oil are in September, January, and February; but it may be had all the year round. The inhabitants make torches, by steeping in this oil the bark of a tree, which afford a very clear light. This tree, as well as many other sorts, is very proper for masts, yards, plank, and other ship timber (L); the rest afford wood for all kinds of works.

(I) Captain Hamilton says, that there were two harbours or anchoring places at Pulo Kondôr, but neither of them good. One at the north-east end, for the south-west monsoons; the other on the west side, for shelter against the north-east winds: but the bottom of this last being rocky, is bad for anchors and cables.

(K) These may be the guanos Dampier speaks of, p. 392.

(L) Dampier observes, that there are trees bearing a kind of wild or bastard nutmegs, but insipid; also wild mangos, which are delicate. The grape tree is strait; and the fruit grows in clusters about the body of it, like the durion and kakao.

Fruit trees.

FRUIT trees are very numerous, but for the most part wild; as almond and mellar trees, a kind of services, and other fruits; fair to the sight, but insipid, and perhaps dangerous. Here are found however kernels in a large red pod, which when roasted taste like chestnuts.

OF cotton, papaya, citron, and tamarind trees, there are but few in the island. All the palm trees and aloes are wild: so are the latan and banana trees. One meets also with the squolante, the capillaire, and ananas; besides many beautiful plants and flowers, worth the observation of botanists^a. This account of the natural productions of Pulo Kondôr, may in some measure serve for the natural history of Kamboja, with regard to which our authors afford very few materials: for although this island at present is subject to Kochinchina, yet it ought properly to be considered as part of the country to whose coast it lies opposite.

THERE is but one village in the whole island; and that only is the place which is inhabited. It stands at the bottom of the great bay before-mentioned, among several little rivers, in a plain. The habitations are no better than cabins. In one part of the village you see several oratories, called Tlan, ranged in a semicircle, with a great tree in the midst, on which they erect a flag on festival days. In this place, which is called Tour, that is Lord, they render honour to the souls of their heroes, princes, and Literati; the same they do to their ancestors, in the private oratories which every body has in his hut. To the north-east there is a temple where a priest resides. Toward the south-east part of the village between two rivulets there is a magazine, a bake-house, and the foundations of a fort (L), built by the English^b.

THE port between the great island and the smaller, before described, is little, but exceeding good. Vessels are sheltered from the winds by the hills which inclose it on the sides; but in the rainy season the place is frightful. The French, who began a sort of settlement on the east side of this port in 1721, suffered much there. The plain in which the village stands forms a kind of semicircle, whose semidiameter is about three quarters of a mile: it is very marshy, and the soil sandy, yet if cultivated might produce nourishment for men and other animals; but the inhabitants have neither fowl, cattle, rice, pulse, nor plants. Excepting this plain, all the rest of the isle is nothing but rocks, precipices, and steep mountains; covered indeed with beautiful trees, but cut with a thousand rapid torrents, and full of insects and serpents, without any fruits, flowers, or other useful vegetables; all which, especially in the rainy season, that is for near two thirds of the year, make Pulo Kondôr one of the worst places in the world. There is good water in some of the rivulets; but those of the village grow dry in March and April, when the people are forced to drink well-water, which is none of the best.

THE inhabitants are only poor fishermen, who have properly no fixed habitation, but go and come as their business obliges. They are sometimes two, three, or four hundred; at other times the island is quite deserted. Hence it is that scarce any of the necessities of life are to be met with in Pulo Kondôr; which sometimes serves for a place of banishment to the Christians in Kochinchina, whose language, religion, and manners, the people of this island have received. They have all long black hair, believe the migration of souls, and understand the Chinese characters, although they speak a different language. The reason is, that those characters express or convey to the mind the images of things themselves, and not sounds of the voice, as ours do. The English were formerly possessed of this island till extirpated by the Malays and the inhabitants^c, which happened in the manner following:

English factory.

IN 1702, when the factory of Cbusan (Chewshan) on the coast of China was broken up, Mr. Allan Ketchpole, who was then director for the affairs of the English East India company, made choice of Pulo Kondôr for a colony; although, says our author, it produces nothing but wood, water, and fish. He hired some Makassars to serve for soldiers; contracting however to discharge them at the end of three years, in case they required it. When the time was expired, Mr. Ketchpole still detained them contrary to articles; yet still intrusted them with the guard both of his own person and the garrison. These eastern desperadoes (who are very faithful where covenants are observed with them, but, in case of failure, revengeful and cruel) took an opportunity in the night, when the English, who lodged in the fort, were in their beds, and murdered them all.

THE noise made by some who were awake, giving the alarm to those who lodged without the fort, they ran to the sea-side; and were scarce put from shore in a boat, which they

tain Hamilton must err in suggesting, if not expressly saying, vol. ii. p. 206, that the English fort was built on the side of this port.

a luckily found ready fitted with oars and sails, before the Makassars (M) came in quest of them. After sailing and rowing above 100 leagues, in which space they suffered much by hunger and thirst as well as fatigue, they reached some place in the king of Johôr's dominions, where they were kindly treated (N). "Since a factory was thought necessary to be settled " on that coast, I wonder, says our author, why these islands were chosen rather than that
 " of Quadrole before-mentioned."

FROM Pulo Kondôr let us pass to the river of Kamboja; the west branch of which, as River Mekon, hath been observed, lies fifteen or twenty leagues almost due north of it. The name of this river, according to some authors, is Menon or Menan, but more properly Mekon (O); tho' it usually goes under the appellation of the river of Kamboja, and of the Laos. It is by many b reckoned the largest in all the Indies; carrying so much water in summer that it overflows the adjacent country, like the Nile in Egypt."

This river is so little known to Europeans, and they have given such different names to the Branches little known of it, that it is not easy to describe it. In its course through Kamboja, from north-west to south-east, it seems to divide or send out streams in several places. The most remarkable is that, which separating from it about thirty-six miles below the capital city Loweck (or Loeck), and 250 miles from the sea, runs parallel to it at a few miles distance; this is called by some Matfiam and Oubequame, by others the west chanel. About fifteen miles from the mouth it divides in two or three streams, the most western of which is named Bassak or Bansak. The main stream, which below the first division is called the river of Japan, about seven c miles from its mouth divides also into two branches; the two main chanel communicate with each other by several cross streams, and fall into the sea by different mouths about thirty miles asunder.

LET us hear what those relate of this river who have ascended it as high as the capital The passage up city. Da Cruz speaks as if he had sailed much farther up. This author says, from the report of the Laos, that it rises in China; and passing through their country from north to south enters Kamboja at a place called Chudurmuck (P), it receives a large river also which comes from a great lake (Q) in the utmost borders of Kamboja towards Siam; and passing by Loeck (or Loweck), the capital of the country, thirty-six miles lower meets the Mekon at the place above-mentioned. There it discharges most of its waters into the Mekon; and the d rest pass by another chanel to the sea (R), especially in the time of the winter floods, caused by the rains in other northern countries, for it does not rain then in Kamboja. At this place the river of Laos is called Siflor, and rushes with such fury into that of Loeck, as to force it back with a strong current, which runs upwards from July to September. All this while the country is overflowed, and the inhabitants go from place to place in boats. It is on account of these inundations that they build their houses on piles, raised many feet above the ground^b.

IN effect, in August the river sometimes is seen to swell in a few days eight, nine, and even twelve feet, and inundate the lands on each side; so that they may be sailed up in June, but not so easily in July, nor is it possible to ascend them in August^c. That we may give our readers as good an account as can be had of this river, we shall insert what is said of it in e the journal of Hagenaar, who in 1637 made the navigation up it as high as the capital of Kamboja.

He entered the branch of Bassak, which he calls a little river, with his four ships, and in Hagenaar's three or four days (S) passed into the river Matfiam, whose mouth is narrow, and banks passage adorned with trees. The same day, May 16, both wind and tide favouring them, they coasted some little isles, and saw the entrance of the river Simmeding, where one of the ships had been the year before. Here, while they lay at an anchor, waiting for the wind and tide, the ships were covered with such a multitude of muskittos, that the candle scarce gave any light. Next day they struck on a bank, and could hardly get off, having no more than four or five

(M) Captain Hamilton says, the bloody willains: not considering the provocation given them, and that what they did was to free themselves from the slavery which the perfidy of Ketchpole had reduced them to. A circumstance which renders their action not only excusable, but also lawful.

(N) The reverend and ingenious Dr. Pound and Mr. Selesmon Lloyd (an old acquaintance of our author's), were among those who escaped.

(O) Or Menam-kon, as in some maps.

(P) We cannot absolutely determine whether the ch in this word is pronounced like the English or the Latin. Argensola calls it Chordemuc, which should incline us to be of the later opinion. It cannot be on the borders of Kamboja, as it is south of the capital.

(Q) Our author says, it is so large that no land can be seen from the middle of it. Hagenaar observes, that from a great lake or inland sea there proceed abundance of rivers and streams; which afford more waters than the river of Kamboja, and its branches, are able to contain.

(R) So we apprehend the English translation, which is very bad, is to be understood. This is by some called Oubequama, and the Western Chanel, of which Bassak is a branch.

(S) Thus we compute; for the journal is extremely defective.

fathom water. The 18th they towed along the east side of the river, which is best for navigation. At noon they came to the narrowest part of it, where they moved their yards, that they might not be embarrassed with the trees. Here a strong gale, accompanied with rain, springing up, they first were towed by the shallops, and then hauled along by means of a bambû cane, till the ebb. The 20th they continued to proceed the same way; were twice entangled with the trees, and twice run aground at low water, but were freed by the tide^c. The breadth of the river in those places was not over twice or thrice the length of a ship; and the muskittos plagued them all the way. The 23d they found the river somewhat broader, and in that place it begins to be called the river of Japan. They saw many vessels which sailed along the bank (where herds of buffalos were at pasture), but none would come near them.

Japan.

THE 28th, the wind turning to the west, they set sail and made a great deal of way. At noon there came a Mandarin and an interpreter to welcome them from the king. They brought a present of ten great varnished cups with covers, filled with fruits and other things, according to the custom of the country: likewise koko nuts, ananas, sugar canes, and two pots of arrack. These refreshments were very acceptable; and after entertaining the person who brought them, and his companion, they presented him with a piece of ordinary silk. The 4th of June they arrived at the point of the Japanese quarter. The 7th two Nipras came to visit Hagenaar with a present from the king. All this while they advanced so slowly, that the factors at the Dutch lodge were uneasy at the delay, which yet could not be avoided^d.

River of Lau.

THE 10th they were towed along with extreme difficulty as far as the point of the river of Japan. Next day they towed to weather the point where the river of Lau, which is very rapid, divides into three arms; and sent to examine if they could pass along the bank in the river Natfiam to the north-west, beyond the shoals. Mean time a south-west wind rising, they hoisted all their sails; and having stemmed the currents, passed the banks and mouth of the Matfium, ascending as far as the town of Buomping, where there is a fair gilded tower. As the currents were then favourable, they advanced to the third elbow, where the wind being against them, they cast anchor. They proceeded again by moon-light, and at day-break arrived opposite to the company's lodge, at the capital of Kamboja, in five fathom water. From thence he passed along the quarters of the Japaneses, Portugueses, Chineses, Kochinchinois, and merchants of Kamboja: having thus sailed a league and a half, he landed in order to go to the king's palace^e. With regard to the river in general it is remarked, that the bottom of its chanel is a firm sand; that its stream is three fathom deep, but that the tide rises and falls two fathom^f.

hof's passage

FOUR years after, the Dutch sent an ambassador, named Van Wusthof, from thence to the court of Laos, which furnisheth an account of this river so much higher: but the journal we meet with of this voyage is neither very particular nor exact (T). They embarked in little pirogues, or shallops, and spent eleven weeks in the navigation. In some places they found the stream very broad, in others very narrow and full of rocks (as in the former voyage); so that they were often obliged to unload their boats, and carry the goods for a time by land.

Laos.

THEY from time to time passed by towns and villages on the banks, pretty well built after that country fashion. The most remarkable places were Loim, Gokkelok, Looim, Simpore, Sombok, Sombabour, Baatsiong, a small city twenty-two days journey beyond the city of Kamboja, which formerly had a king of its own. Namnoy, where much gold is found, some days journey from the frontiers of Laos: Bassak, Okmum, Næwein, Samfanc, Beenmonk, Saymoun, Tapanom, and Loshan, another little city belonging to the king of Kamboja, who keeps a viceroy there (U); Huysoun, a town famous for the beauty of its silk manufactures; Meunkok, a city of pretty considerable commerce, whither the Laos carry all their merchandizes.

THE Dutch passed by several other places of less note; they met also with very high mountains, and some isles (X) formed by the river. At length they arrived at Winkjan (Y), capital of Laos, 250 miles from whence they set out^g. But here it must be observed, that no distinction is made with regard to the rivers which they navigated in this journey: for the

(T) It is in the Hague edition of the Histoire Generale des Voyages, tom. xii. p. 287. and was taken from Valentine's collection of voyages and travels in Dutch, consisting of three folio volumes.

(U) It does not appear from this journal where the kingdoms of Kamboja and Laos join; nor which is the last town of the one, or the first of the other.

(X) They named them Saxenham.

(Y) The capital of Laos is by other authors named Lonjan or Lanchang. But whether they are the same, or different cities, is uncertain.

a capital of Kamboja is not situated on the great river which passes through Laos, but on a branch of it, said before to have its source, with many other rivers or streams, in a great lake; which branch therefore must have a communication with that river.

In the year 1687, the king of Siam sent Captain Howell and Captain Williams, English-Chinese ^{men}, who commanded two frigates in his service, against some Chinese pirates, who nested ^{themselves} in an island up the river of Kamboja. These were some of those who, when the Tartars conquered China, fled in their own ships; and, turning freebooters, took many of the Siamese ships trading in those seas. They found this river very large, especially at its mouth; and to be navigable for very great vessels for the sixty or seventy leagues which they ascended; whence they concluded that its depth and wideness extended much farther upwards.

b The course of the river is generally from north to south, and the land low on each side, with many large creeks and branches; likewise considerable islands in some places. They steered ^{up that branch which seemed most capacious}; having the tide of flood with them, and the river commonly so wide as to give them room to turn and make angles, where the bending of the chanel was such as to receive a contrary east or south-east sea wind. But these reaches or bendings of the river east and west were very rare, at least so as to make their course to be against the sea wind, which commonly blew in their stern, and so fresh that with it they could stem the tide of ebb. In the night, when the land winds came, they anchored and lay-by till ten or eleven a clock next day, when the sea breezes usually sprang up again and enabled them to continue their course ^h.

c As soon as they came to the island they fired upon the pirates, and landing their men routed ^{Dislodged by the English} them, burnt their houses, ruined their fortifications, and took many prisoners. These people, on their flight from China, finding the river of Kamboja open before them, made bold to enter it, and settle on the island before mentioned. There they built a town, and fenced it round with a wall of trees, laid along four in a breast, and about as many in height. As the land was exceeding good, and they were provided with all sorts of instruments fit for planting, they might have lived happily enough had they made use of them instead of arms, to get wherewithal to subsist. The English captains having done their business, they returned out of the river; but the south-west monsoon being already set in, so that they could not proceed to Siam, they went to Ma-kau in China. There, to ingratiate themselves with the Tartars, they delivered up their prisoners to the governor, who entertained them handsomely; and were afterwards received at Siam with great applause ⁱ.

We learn from the report of a late navigator, that the west entrance (Z) of Kamboja river is very deep; the shallowest part of the chanel going in being four fathoms, and that within it deepens to twenty in some places: that the north entrance, ten leagues distant, is broader, but much shallower, and little frequented: that the river in some places is three leagues wide; and that the navigation above the capital city is performed in small rowing vessels, of which great numbers are employed ^k.

ALL the towns in Kamboja which are known to Europeans have been already mentioned ^{The capital described} and described, excepting the principal city. This commonly is denominated from the country itself; but it has its proper name, which yet is variously written. Da Cruz calls it Loech (A); the author of Van Wusthof's voyage, Eauwek; perhaps this last is misprinted for Lauwek (B). It stands on a branch of the great river (C), thirty-six miles above Chudurmuk, where it falls into it ^l. It is fifty or sixty leagues from Ponteamas, a hundred from the bar of the great river (D), and forty from the borders of Laos ^m. Its situation is most agreeable, all the houses are contiguous and ranged along a bank (E). The king resides in a palace, whose fabric is very simple, and appears like a cloister, being inclosed with a palisade six feet high. However it is defended by a great number of cannon brought from China; and twenty-four ^{King's palace} pieces of artillery which were saved out of the wreck of two Dutch vessels on the coast of that kingdom. They are planted round the inclosure, with all the necessary implements in great order. Within the same are the stables of the elephants, ascended by two or three steps: in 1637 there were fifteen or sixteen large ones, each of which had his own stable.

(Z) He says it is commonly called Bocca de Carangra. A name given doubtless by the Portugueses to the mouth of the Bassak chanel.

(A) From what follows, we judge that the cb in this word stands for kh, or simply k.

(B) In the maps of Mess. De L'Isle and D'Anville, it is written Lauwek, which is not very conformable to either of the names mentioned in the text.

(C) The relation of Wusthof's embassy placeth it on the Me-kou itself. But all the accounts are so defective, one scarce knows how to determine any thing relative either to the city or river.

(D) In the relation of Hagenaar's embassy, p. 360, it is said to be sixty Dutch leagues from the sea.

(E) According to the plan of it inserted in Wusthof's embassy, it is inclosed with double rows of trees, and walks between, instead of walls or fortifications; and must afford a beautiful prospect when viewed from some of the neighbouring eminences.

The inside of the palace, though built with wood, glitters with gold and silver; the whole finished with charming propriety. The second ornament of the city is a temple of a peculiar structure, the art and beauty of which was extremely admired by the Dutch. It is raised upon pillars of wood varnished (F), with foliage and reliefs gilded. The pavement itself is precious, and preserved with magnificent mats and carpets. In it there was a tomb built with brick in form of a pyramid, all gilded likewise; as were five great images and five small ones, which were on the south side of the temple^a. This possibly was the tomb of one of their principal priests; for when any of them dies, they build such a monument, which is square at the base, but goes rounding and terminates in a point, twenty or twenty-five feet in height: these are gilded and polished, but in a coarse manner^b.

Nations settled there. THE city is inhabited by Japaneſes, Portugueſes, Kochinchinſis, and Ma'ayans. Some of these different nations are settled there, others not; but repair thither in one monsoon, and return in the other, staying so long as is necessary to carry on their commerce^c. There are of Japaneſes seventy or eighty families^d, and of Topaſſes, or Indian Portugueſes, about 200, with their wives of the country: some of them have pretty good posts in the government, and live great after the fashion of the place. But they are without priests, nor will any venture to go amongst them: for in 1710 a poor capuchin went thither to officiate; and finding that one of his principal parishioners, who had two wives, disregarded his admonition to put one of them away, proceeded to excommunication, for which the other knocked out his brains. Since that time they wrote both to Siam and Ma-kau in China for pastors, but none it seems would go amongst them.

Subtle poison. ALL the Portugueſe have pensions from the king of Kamboja; but as they are too small to maintain them, they repair to the woods, and shoot wild elephants for their teeth, which they sell to strangers. Their way of killing them is very singular. They form a piece of iron like a slug, and making one end sharp, drive it into the bark of a certain tree, which is of a violent poisonous quality. A little time after they draw the slug, and coming near the animal fire it into his body: the elephant being thus wounded flies, but before he has gotten out of sight, drops down dead. They kill cattle and buffaloes, for their tongues, after the same manner. What is no less strange, this poisonous juice has the property to preserve as well as destroy life; for if, while in the woods, either hunger or thirst seizes them, they squeeze a few drops of it on the leaf of a tree, and find immediate relief by licking the leaf; but if the skin should be broken, and the juice enter the flesh, it proves mortal without remedy^e.

Natives of Kamboja. THE kingdom of Kamboja, though very fertile, is but thinly peopled^f. The natives are of a light brown complexion, and very well shaped, their hair long and beards thin. The women very handsome, but not very modest (although our author gives no reasons or instances to support his censure). The men wear a vestment like our night-gowns, but nothing on either their head or feet. The womens dress is a petticoat reaching below the ankle, and a frock made tight to their bodies and arms: both sexes dress their hair.

Commerce and manufactures. THE Kambojans do not trade much themselves by sea; but foreigners resort to them for sake of the commodities which their country affords, and especially provisions, which are very plentiful and cheap, as hath been already remarked. Their chief native commodities are gold, raw silk, ivory, odoriferous woods, and drugs especially. Kochinckina likewise abounds with the same; which are brought to Kamboja, to be disposed of there^g. This country hath some manufactures: the people make divers sorts of cotton cloths, calicoes, muslins, buckrams, white and painted dimities, and the like, exceeding the finest made in Holland, when our author wrote. They have carpets also (though not like those which come from Persia), and a sort called Bancales, resembling Scotch plaids. They both weave and work with the needle rich silk hangings, and coverings for chairs, palekis, and other furniture^h.

Of what importance. WHEN Hagenaar was at Kamboja in 1637, the Portugueſes from Malakka brought thither cloth, and carried back with them benjamin, gum-lak, wax, rice, copper batons, and iron stoves made in China. He was of opinion, that if the Dutch could oblige the Portugueſes to quit the country, the company might carry on an advantageous trade; particularly in black lack, much in request, and in the skins of deer, buffaloes, and oxen, very proper for Japan; also in benjamin, part of which would yield a good price in Persia. In exchange for these they were to carry thither India cloths of several sorts, and cotton yarn, by which he computed they would be gainers from forty to seventy per cent. However the Dutch met with great opposition from the Portugueſes, and other obstacles to their settling there. Among a the rest, as they were obliged to have their lodge at the end of the Japanese quarter, neither the natives, nor the Malayans, much less the crafty Chineses, durst repair thither by day to buy any thing, for fear of these people. For this reason the ambassador desired leave to build a lodge on the other side of the river : but the king did not grant it ; because the Dutch general at Batavia had not mentioned any such thing in his letters.

In effect the Dutch had a factory in the capital city of Kamboja at different times : but the treacherous designs of those people, to which they saw themselves exposed, made them at length abandon the country. And the rather, as most of the merchandizes which come from Kamboja and Laos, are to be found in the neighbouring dominions, where they had factories already, especially in Siam ; to which the first of these kingdoms is at present (as it then was) tributary^x. But it should seem, that the cause of their quitting Kamboja was owing to some fault of their own, rather than of the natives, in case what a late author reports be fact ; viz. that they will not suffer the Dutch to settle factories in their country, at the same time that they are very desirous of having a trade with the English^y.

WHEN Captain Hamilton was at Ponteamás, an officer who could speak a little Portuguese came on board, and advised him to notify his arrival to the king, and desire permission to trade with his subjects. The captain did so ; and in twelve days received an answer, with liberty to trade : but was desired to send up some person with musters of his goods, that the king and his merchants might see them. Two Portugueses likewise were sent for interpreters ; one to remain on board his ship during his stay, and the other to accompany his second supercargo, whom he dispatched to court with the goods, accompanied by twenty-five men well-armed. When they arrived at the city they were well supplied with provisions, and visited by many persons of distinction. After some delay, the supercargo returned with a letter of compliment to the captain, in the Portuguese language, and another to the governor of Bombay, inviting the English to settle in his country ; with liberty to build factories or forts in any part of his dominions for the protection of trade. He would not enter into any correspondence with the English, without the knowledge and consent of his guardian the king of Kochinchina, who at last consented to allow them commerce both in Kamboja and his own dominions. This was all the advantage which Captain Hamilton reaped by sending to court : for the country had been laid so waste by the Siamers where-ever they marched, that the natives had nothing ready then to barter with his cargo ; but in a year or two they said they would be provided^z. From this account of things the trade of Kamboja seems to be precarious enough, and not very considerable.

ACCORDING to Da Cruz the Kambojans worship several different gods. One they call Probar Missur, who they say made the earth and heavens. This power he received from another god named Pra Lokussar, with the permission of a third called Pra Iffur. The frier tells us, that having convinced the priests that Probar Missur, far from having created the world, was a very wicked man, they promised to worship him no longer, having till then adored him in conjunction with Pra Put Pra sur Metri^a. Da Cruz says no more concerning this last god ; and indeed the whole lame account seems to be brought in chiefly for sake of relating this passage, and how much ill-will he got of the king, as well as the priests, for speaking disrespectfully of their gods. However, Pra Put is probably the Puti Sat of the Siameses ; and this seems confirmed by Captain Hamilton^b, who observes that the Kambojans worship the same gods who are worshipped in Siam. They adore the Supreme God under the name of Tipedab, giving him Praw Prumb and Praw Pout (G), for his sons^c. It may be presumed from hence, that, as Argensola observes, they hold the transmigration of souls. Temples and pyramids are very numerous throughout the country ; some are built with wood, others with stone, and all well gilded within, as their idols are on the outside^d.

THEY believe there are twenty-seven heavens or mansions one above the other, for the reception of souls after this life. Some of them are furnished with sensual pleasures, such as delicious food, with liquors of various kinds, and beautiful women. Hither all living creatures but priests do go, not excepting the flea, and smallest insects ; for they say, as they have souls, they must live in the other world. The next worlds above these are reserved for their holy priests who dwell in the deserts, whose felicity is to consist in sitting, and being refreshed with cooling winds. In the heavens beyond those again, the gods have bodies round like bowls ; and they who ascend thither have the privilege of assuming bodies shaped like those of the gods who reside there. As there are so many heavens, it is but fit that there should be several hells, which they limit to thirteen : these likewise are situated one above another ; and the wicked are doomed to the higher or the lower, according as the sins which they have committed are greater or lesser.

Their clergy THE clergy have among them a kind of hierarchy, consisting of five orders. The first or highest order are named Maffankraches ; these are as supreme over all others, and sit above the king. Those of the next order are called Nassendeckes, who are like our bishops, and sit equal with the king. The third order is that of the Mitires, or priests, who sit below the king. Besides these there are two orders still lower, named Chaynizes and Sazes.

very numerous. THE clergy, priests, and religious, were so numerous, that Da Cruz judged them to be one third of the people in the kingdom of Kamboja. This frier says, they are exceedingly proud and vain : nor is it to be wondered at, if, as he pretends, they are worshipped for gods by the laity ; and that the inferior priests worship their superiors in the same manner^a.

Their power and offices. ACCORDING to Hagenaar, they hold the first rank in the state, and sit before the Oknias, or lords of the court, very near the king, with whom they discourse very familiarly^b. Yet we are told by a late navigator into this country, that the priests are not much respected, as being generally chosen from the lower sort of the people, and are maintained by free-will offerings^c. However they have much the advantage of the other classes of natives, who are all slaves except themselves^d. They shave their beard, head, and eye-brows, like the Talepays of Siam, but are not permitted to marry like those of the Laos. Their power extends even to civil affairs. They have a particular head or chief priest, who bears the title of Rajah Pourson, or king of the priests. This chief resides at Sombrapour, on the frontiers of the Laos, and has under him a Tivinia, with some inferior officers, in conjunction with whom he decides all the affairs of his district. The boats which in their passage arrive at this place, are obliged to give him an account of whatever they carry, which is always accompanied with some present^e.

People's mission. DA CRUZ, who calls the priests of Kamboja Brammans, says, in his time, the king was a Bramman, that is a priest ; and it was to this connection between the king and them that he imputes the bad success of his mission. He observes, that their influence over the people was so great, that if, whilst he was preaching to them, any of the priests passing by only stopped, and said, This doctrine is good, but ours is better ; they would all disperse at once. For this reason, and because the king shewed no inclination to favour his religion, after a whole year spent in the country, he neither found any fruit of his labour, nor the least encouragement for missionaries to repair thither. It must however be noted, that he places the disorderly behaviour of the Portugueses among the obstacles which rendered his attempt unsuccessful^f.

Government and nobles. THERE are two ranks of state officers, who may be called the nobles or great lords of the kingdom. The first have the appellation of Oknias, or Okinas ; and on them, as principal officers of the crown, is conferred the government of provinces, cities, and towns. Of these Oknias likewise the council of the king is composed ; and all causes or suits of whatever kind are tried by them. Hereof they make report to the king, and his judgment or sentence is decisive ; nor dare either party offer to complain of it^g. The Oknias are known by a gold box for containing their betel ; in which there are two or three lesser boxes of the same metal, filled with cardamum and other perfumes, wherewith they rub their lips ; and another full of lime, with scissars to prepare their pinang or betel. This box they either hold in their hand, or order to be carried before them. The officers of the second rank named Tonimas or Tonimnes, are allowed only to have silver boxes for their pinang or betel. They are placed behind the Oknias or privy counsellors ; who, on all occasions which require ceremony, sit in a semicircle about the king, and persons of lesser rank behind them. The principal Oknia lays the affairs before his Kambojan majesty, but takes great care not to say any thing which may displease him^h. There is a third sort of nobles called Nampra, but this is purely a title of honourⁱ ; although the lords of this rank are often sent to meet ambassadors, and on other special messages or matters of ceremony, in which alone they seem to be employed.

about the king. WHEN the king has a mind to confer an honour upon any of his minions, which however he never does without some considerable present, he delivers to such person two swords, which are always to be carried before him in public : one is the sword of state, the other of justice. Our author, who seems to speak of the Oknias, adds, that all people, as he passeth with these ensigns of grandeur, must give way, and salute him in a settled form of words : but in case he happens to meet with another vested with the same dignity, they must compare patents, and he who first received the marks of honour must be first saluted. In all places where-ever they go, they hold courts of justice both civil and criminal. They have a the power also to lay fines on people, which are paid into the king's treasury; but in capital cases their sentence is law, and execution immediately follows sentence^o. The laws or sentences of these judges must be very severe, since we meet with an instance of a man being condemned to die for only breaking of a glass (H); and would have been executed but for the Dutch, who begged him off^p.

THE king of Kamboja is so despotic, that not only the lands but the effects of his subjects, King despotic. or rather slaves, fall to him upon their deaths; so that the wife and children have nothing to trust to, but what they can conceal or convey away by stealth. Nor is it very easy to do this, considering, that as the meanest person may have access to the king, every body is busy to pick up news, that he may get an opportunity of speaking to him; and by this means b scarce any thing is done but what comes to his knowledge^q.

THE country not being very populous, the king's forces cannot be supposed to be very His forces. great: according to Hagenaar, they amount to no more than 20 or 30,000 men^r. If so, his power must have greatly declined since the time of Da Cruz, who says, that the king was able to send 100,000 into the field^s. It is likely that their strength had been much exhausted by civil wars, and the invasions of their neighbours; especially the king of Siam, by whom Kamboja had often been reduced to a state of dependency.

NOTWITHSTANDING this, his Kambojan majesty takes some state upon him, and is not a His state. little jealous of his honour. When Hagenaar went ambassador to Kamboja in 1637, the king took offence that the letters to him and his son, whom he had associated in the throne, from c the Dutch general of Batavia, were directed wrong; the letter which was for each being directed for the other: he was likewise disgusted because they were not written on gilt paper. But there was a third matter which gave most cause of discontent, and that was a demand which he made, of four pieces of cannon, not being immediately complied with by the Dutch. Their hesitation upon this article occasioned much delay and slight towards their ambassador; of whom, at one audience, the king took no notice when he went away. However they found themselves obliged to do at last, what in prudence they should have done at first, and then things went on very well^t.

WHEN Hagenaar drew near the capital with his barks, the king sent Nampras two or Hagenaar's three times with presents to salute him. The 16th of June the same year he landed, with embassy. d a train of twenty musketeers and two trumpets. He found at the water-side a very big elephant, but without teeth, and three or four chariots. The letters for the two kings were received by a Nampra; and being carried under an umbrella, were placed upon the back of the elephant. The ambassador went into the first chariot, which was gilded a little; the chief factor in the second; and the Tonimne, who came to accompany Hagenaar, in the third; the captain of the vessel, with the presents, was carried in the fourth. Each chariot was drawn by two oxen, and the rest of his people followed on foot.

As soon as he alighted at the palace, he was conducted towards the hall of audience, where a great chair was placed for him to rest himself a while, as being much indisposed. The hall was full of people; and having first passed between two ranks of Tonimnes, with their e silver boxes in their hands; he then entered between two rows of Okinas or Oknias, holding their gold boxes great and small before them. When he came to the middle of these last, he bowed and made his reverence to the king, who appeared in one corner of the hall, supported by a wooden rail twenty or twenty-five paces from him, under which there were two horses fed with grass. On the floor were spread two red carpets, whereon the presents were placed; which consisted of two arquebusses with rests, ten fuses of Spain, two pistols, two sword-blades, and the remainder were in packets^u.

THE general's letter was presented in a piece of gold stuff on a gold cup, placed in a varnished baton. It contained many wishes for the prosperity of the king; which having first been repeated by the interpreter, was afterward read aloud in Malayan, and then translated f into the language of Kamboja. As the king observed the ambassador to be much fatigued, he advised him to retire into the antichamber; where they brought him a quilted bed, with two cushions, after that country manner, for him to lie down upon. Mean time the people being withdrawn, the king sat and discoursed familiarly with the chief factor, the captain of the vessel, and one or two more who remained in the hall. Towards evening the musketeers were ordered to put out their matches, and the trumpets to give over sounding: after which several sorts of fruits, sweetmeats, and other delicacies, with arrack, were served up; of which the company eat, and then took leave. At this audience the king demanded the king.

AFTER this he had an audience of the young king, sitting on a carpet between two curtains, as if it was a window. He was received very graciously, and presented with arrack and betel, which is one of the greatest honours done to any person. Hagenaar was desirous of having an audience of the old queen: but the Shah Bander brought word she was drunk; and that to make her presents would be throwing them away^x. To finish this account of Kambojan audiences, we shall only observe further, that in 1717, when Captain Hamilton's supercargo (sent to court as mentioned before), had audience of the king, his majesty, after ten days delay, received him in great state, sitting on a throne like a pulpit, with his face b veiled below his eyes^y.

Kamboja.

THE reader is not to expect much relative to the history of a country so little known, and seldom visited by Europeans: all which is to be met with on that subject will be comprised in the few particulars following. The first account we find of it is about the year 1559, about which time we are told it was subject to Siam^z. Thus it continued for some time; how long we know not: for in 1592 Laudara, a Mohammedan, the then king of Kamboja, sent two ambassadors, one a Portuguese, the other a Spaniard, with a rich present, to Gomez Perez, the Spanish governor of the Philippine islands; to desire assistance against the king of Siam, who had marched with a numerous army to invade his dominions; offering in return to become subject to Spain, and embrace the Romish religion. This was the purport of the embassy; c which was closed with a compliment, wherein the king said, that he concluded so brave a man as Perez would not be diverted by any other affair, from performing an action which would so much redound to the glory both of god and his prince. But Perez, being then very busy to recover Ternata, and the rest of the Molukko islands which had revolted, excused himself, for not having it in his power at that juncture to send the king the desired aid: however promised that, as soon as his expedition against Ternata was over, he would employ his forces to the relief of Kamboja.

faith punished.

THE governor set out immediately on the first expedition, but never lived to get to that island. For having by fair promises prevailed on a great number of Chineses to go along with him; as soon as he got out to sea he treated them in a most audacious manner, obliging d them to row in the galleys, and inflicted stripes to make them work beyond their power. He even threatened to put them in irons, and cut off their hair. This last to a Chinese is an affront which deserves death, and which he never forgives. To prevent the infamy, they agreed to rise in the night, and destroy all the Spaniards. Pursuant to this resolution they mixed themselves with their task-masters when they went to sleep; and during the last watch, at the sound of a whistle, all rose, put on white frocks, that they might know one another, and lighted wax-candles: then, drawing their katanas, a kind of crooked swords, slew every man with so great expedition and little noise, that the very watch knew nothing of what had been done. The governor, awakening at the clamour which they made for that purpose, they called to him to come and pacify a quarrel among the Spaniards. Perez got up; but e as soon as he appeared with his breast above deck, they ran him through with their pikes. Thus arrogance and perfidy were deservedly punished^z.

The Spaniards applied to.
A. D. 1594.

LOUIS DAS MARINAS, the son of Perez, succeeding him in the government of the Philippine islands. In the year 1594 Langara (I), king of Kamboja, sent to put him in mind of the promise made by his father, and to require the succours. This demand Louis thought fit to comply with; zealous to bring those nations into the bosom of his church; as well as their riches and kings under subjection to the crown of Spain. With this view he fitted out three ships, manned with 120 Spaniards and some natives of the Philippine islands, under the command of John Xuarez Gallinato, born in Teneriffe, one of the Canary islands. Gallinato, f by stress of weather, was driven to the city of Malakka; but the other two ships reached Kamboja. In their way up the river they were informed, that the king had been defeated by the Siamese army, and was fled with the poor remains of his forces into the kingdom of the Laos. The advice added, that, while he was begging aid of those inhuman neighbours, the king of Siam had set upon the throne Prâ Neär, nick-named, Wrymouth the traitor.

THIS accident did not hinder the Spaniards from proceeding forward: however, as the state of things was changed, their commanders James Velloso and Blaze Ruyz gave out, that they came as ambassadors to the new king. Being arrived at Chordumulo (K), fourscore leagues from the bar, they left forty Spaniards in the ships; and with forty others set out for the country where that prince then was. When they got thither, they demanded an immediate audience: but were told, that they could not have one till the third day after; and in the mean time had good quarters assigned them. The Spanish commanders looking on this delay as suspicious, either that they were before acquainted with the nature of the court, or that they perceived some motions which gave distrust, they went to visit a beautiful lady of the royal family. By her they were informed, that the king being fond of her, she was admitted into his secrets; and that she knew he intended to have them all slain: she added, that the reason for putting off their audience for three days, under pretence of resting after their journey, was only to gain time to put his design in execution ^b.

(I) Before called Laudara, if it be not a mistake of the press. Argensola says this king was a Mohammedan, and his subjects Banians and Guzerats; which we know

THE Spaniards, without being dismayed at the danger, returned the lady thanks for her Kill the intelligence, promising her a considerable reward; and came to a resolution to attack the usurper. king's palace the same night, notwithstanding he had his army about him. The better to succeed in their enterprize, they set fire to the house where the powder was kept, and during the confusion into which this accident had thrown the people, entered the palace. As they were acquainted with the royal apartments, they passed through them; and, after they had put the guards to the sword, forced open the chamber of the king, whom they ran through the body. The prince defended himself, and cried out for help; but before any could come to his assistance he bled to death. On the news of this action, the whole city, containing ^c more than 30,000 inhabitants, ran to their arms: presently 14,000 of them, with many elephants, came upon the Spaniards: but their two commanders, drawing up their little body, retired in good order, fighting and killing great numbers of their enemies in the retreat. The battle continued all the night; and next day they got to their ships, leaving the country involved in new divisions ^c.

Two days after this strange event, Gallinato came up with his ship. He had been informed Gallinato already of what had happened; and hastened forward, as thinking it his duty to succour the Spaniards. When he arrived, he found every thing in motion; while he heard the guard- ^{offered the} drums beating, and the bells ringing, he saw the streets and the port full of trading people all in arms. These were the militia of Kamboja (without which necessary and natural defence ^{crown;} no country can possibly be secure). Perceiving things in this threatening posture, he gave strict orders to those who accompanied him in the expedition, to behave with the greatest modesty; and neither offend the people by their words, nor by their looks shew any signs of fear. He was visited in a very peaceable manner by the principal men of Kamboja, whom he entertained with much courtesy. He might have performed some great exploit if his forces had been more considerable; but as his strength was too small, and affairs had taken another course, he thought it best to return. From this however those great men endeavoured to dissuade him, promising to confer the crown on him; as being well affected to the Spaniards and a foreign government. Hence came the report that Gallinato became king of Kamboja, ^{but prudently} which was by many believed in Spain, and acted on the stage with applause. But that report ^{refuses it.} had no other foundation than what hath been related: however, it was the opinion of persons well acquainted with those eastern countries, that if Gallinato had laid hold of the offer made him, he might have possessed himself of Kamboja, and united it to the crown of Spain ^d.

OUR author had seen letters from Velofo and Blase Ruyz to the council at Manilla, wherein The king re- they speak to the same purpose; and complain that Gallinato should blame them for what they ^{stored.} had done. These two commanders sailed from Kamboja to Kochinchina; where landing, they went alone to the kingdom of the Laos, which lies to the west of it, in order to seek out the deposed king Langara, and restore him to his throne. They found he was dead, but had a son living; who, as soon as he was informed that these Spaniards had killed the usurper, set forward with them for his kingdom, accompanied with 10,000 men, lent him by the king of ^f the Laos, contrary to all expectation. With these forces he attacked Kamboja, assisted by Ruyz and Velofo, who continued with him after the war was over. This prince sent an embassy to the Philippine islands, requiring supplies to quell the troubles which were then on foot; promising not only to become a convert to the Romish faith, with all his subjects, but also to yield a considerable part of his dominions to the Spaniards for their subsistence ^e.

DON LOUIS DE LAS MARINHAS, who was then out of the government of the Philippines, ^{The Spaniards} undertook the enterprize at his own cost. He set out from Manilla with Don James For- ^{destroyed} dano, an Italian, Don Pedro de Figueroa, Pedro Villestil, and Ferdinand de los Rios Coronel, Spanish commanders. The last of them had been in the first war of Kamboja, and was at this time a priest. But they had not been long at sea before they were surpris'd with a furious storm which continued three days, and drove them toward the coast of China. There two ^a

Of the soldiers and seamen, on board the vice-admiral, only five got on shore by swimming; some soldiers likewise were saved out of the admiral, which foundered, and among the rest the military priest. The other ship, after many dangers ran, got to Kamboja, almost shattered to pieces. She found in the river eight junks of Malayans; and the Spaniards, perceiving that they designed to carry away certain slaves belonging to the prince whom they came to assist, inconsiderately boarded them: but the Malayans, by means of their fire-works, with which they were well provided, soon burnt their ship, and most of the Spaniards perished in the flames. Not long after Blase Ruys and Velofo, who still continued about the king, were betet in the house where they dwelt, and murdered by the natives. The few Spaniards who escaped got into the kingdom of Siam, ^b and from thence to Manilla ^c.

Kamboja
conquered:
 A. D. 1600.

Involved in civil wars:

THE Kambojans being thus deprived of all further succour from the Spaniards, struggled with their war for some time; but at length, about the year 1600, were subdued by Rajah Api, king of Siam ^a. But during the troubles which arose on the death of his brother the white king in 1610, Kamboja and Lanjang, or the lower Laos, revolted. In 1637, when Hagenaar was there, we find it in rebellion against Siam; having, it may be presumed, newly thrown off the yoke ^b. Besides the misfortune of being so often subdued by its neighbours, the restless spirit or ambition of the princes of the blood frequently involved the country in civil wars, which rendered it a more easy prey to invaders. We are told that it was in this distracted state from the year 1628, or thereabouts, till 1630; when, on the death of Nak ^c
Shin the king, new troubles arose by one prince assassinating another. The murderer applied to the king of Kochinchina for his consent to reign; but that prince divided the dominions between him and the adopted son of the late king. The usurper, dissatisfied with this partition, put himself under the protection of the king of Siam; the other applied for succours to him of Kochinchina: but having been defeated by the usurper's son, who succeeded his father, fled thither for shelter. Three years after, he returned with forces and drove the former out. In 1685, this latter, being powerfully assisted both by sea and land from Siam, made another attempt to recover the kingdom, but did not prove successful ^d.

Tributary to
 A. D. 1717.

HOWEVER, the war continued between the princes of the two contending branches, supported by their neighbours, who at first espoused their quarrel. But we know little of what ^d occurred till the year 1717, when we are informed that the king of Siam invaded Kamboja with an army of 50,000 men by land, and 20,000 by sea. He gave the command to his Barkalong (or first minister), a Chinese, who, being altogether unacquainted with war, could willingly have declined the charge: but the king would needs oblige him to undertake it. Yet the ill success of this expedition made it appear, that he was a better judge of his own abilities than his master ^e. On the news of this great power coming against his country, the king of Kamboja, knowing himself unable to withstand it, first ordered his subjects who lived on the frontiers to withdraw with their effects towards the capital city, and to destroy whatever they could not bring away; by which means the country for fifty leagues tog ther was turned into a desert. He next applied for succours to the king of Kochinchina, who, on condition that he should become tributary, agreed to protect him. He accordingly sent an army of 15,000 men to his assistance by land, and 3000 more in nimble gallies, well-equipped, to defend the coasts.

ill success:

THE army of Siam, though three times more numerous than that of Kamboja, finding all the country desolate before them, soon began to be in distress for want of provisions. This obliged them to kill their carriage beasts, elephants, and horses, for which they could get no sustenance; and the soldiers being obliged to eat their flesh, a diet which they had never been used to, an epidemic flux, as well as fever, seized the whole camp; so that in two months time the army was diminished above one half, and they who remained were obliged to retreat back to their own country as fast as they could, with the Kambojan troops continually at their heels. ^f

By sea and land.

NOR had the Siamese navy better success, although more than four times the number of the Kambojan fleet. As soon as they arrived at the port of Ponteamâs, they sent their small gallies to plunder and burn the town. This indeed they did effectually; and of elephants teeth only they consumed more than 200 tons: but the Kochinchineses, laying hold of this opportunity, attacked the large junks and ships of burden, which lay in the road above four miles from the town, whilst the gallies of the enemy were in a very narrow river, and could not come to their assistance for want of high water to bring them out. The Kochinchineses, who did not care to engage such a superior force, having done what they came about, retired; and the Siamese, fearing a famine in their fleet, steered their course homewards with disgrace ^g.

Kingdom of Champa.

^a THE country of Champa (L) is so small, and perhaps inconsiderable in the way of com-^{Extent and}merce, that it is scarce minded by navigators. It is commonly supposed to begin at^{situation.} the mouth of Kamboja river, and to end at Kochinchina, although that coast is frequently ascribed to Kamboja; in effect they are often confounded together. Mr. De L'Isle gives Champa but a small extent of coast bending north-east from Kamboja: but makes it run northward at the back of Kochinchina, between it and the said riverⁿ. Mr. D'anville commences it in $10^{\circ} 30'$ north, and terminates it in $12^{\circ} 13'$, where it joins Kochinchina on the north-west, bounding both countries on that side by the same chain of mountains; so that their breadth from south-east to north-west is equal, about seventy English miles, or sixty minutes of latitude; and the length of Champa from south-west to north-east, either along the

OFF this coast there are several islands and shoals: the most remarkable are Pulo Sefir do Islands and Terra and Pulo Sefir do Mar. The first lies near the shore at the north point of Sefir bay; ^{banks.} and the other far out at sea, about sixteen leagues to the south-by-east. There is a third called Tiger island, towards the south point of Sefir bay. The shoals are, the bank of Brito, at the entrance of Sandy Bay; the Garden of Holland, five leagues to the east of the former; with the Rabo de Lakra, or the Scorpion's Tail, which begins about the same distance more to the east, and runs in a ridge twenty leagues north-east. To these may be added the shoals adjoining to the Sefirs, besides those of Pulo Sapata, Middleburgh, Pedro de Andrada, and Basse Isle, at a great distance from shore, yet to be avoided by navigators.

^c CHAMPA seems to be furnished with several good bays and harbours, into which fall many ^{Bays and} ^{harbours.} rivers: but these last are neither large, nor of any great length, as descending from the mountains which bound it on the north-west. The bays are the Sandy Bay, with those of the Tiger, Sefir, Padaran, and Buil, which has an island of the same name within it. The isle of Vache, or Bache, is inclosed within the bank of Brito, and lies at the point dividing Sandy from Tiger Bay; at the east point of which lies the island called Tiger isle. In the cod or bottom of the bay falls the river Baria, by some named Peri°.

^d THE state of Champa within land is very little known to Europeans. It seems to contain ^{Towns and} few considerable places; nor are they acquainted with the names of any except the capital ^{villages.} or chief town, named Feneri. The most that we can learn about it is, that there are villages on the sides of the rivers near the coasts; some larger than others, which may pass for towns: and the kings or princes of the country seem to have no better places of residence. Feneri is the principal town of Champa (M), where the king keeps his court. His palace (N) Feneri ^{tho} hath nothing in its prospect which may be termed sumptuous; nor ^{capital.} doth magnificence appear about the prince himself.

^e THE natives of Champa are called Loys, and a very different people from the Kochinchineses, ^{Kochinchi-} who are at present their masters. These latter came from China, at the time when the Tartars ^{neses of} ^{Champa.} conquered it; and resemble the Chineses in their features, beard, and dress, excepting that they do not cut their hair. They wear on ceremonious occasions a large black gown, like the officers of justice in France. They value themselves much above other nations, and think themselves more learned and skillful, although they have but very narrow capacities, since they are entirely ignorant of commerce, or even agriculture.

THESE Kochinchineses are very poor. Their forces consist in some gallies, each having on board forty or fifty men, and mounting two small guns. Their arms are muskets, pikes, sabres, and sagays, which they handle with skill. Their officers wear a gown of black silk open on the sides, and on their head a hair bonnet of conic shape, with a tail hanging behind. The soldiers have the sleeve somewhat less; and the bonnet of buffalo's hair, like a collegian's cap, which is said to be sabre proof.

(L) The Portugueses write, as the English do, Champa; the Italians, Ciampa. Hence possibly the French, and others, have made Isampa and Isompa, as wanting the ch in their alphabets.

(M) Feneri seems to lie to the west or south-west of the village from whence they set out, and not far from the coast: for in the way to it they were sometimes led back a-while, and brought to the coast under pretence of sending orders on board the ship.

(N) This seems to be spoken of his palace, or place of residence in Feneri: but the palace where he usually resided stood about three quarters of a mile from the city; which the king invited the French officers to go to see; but they declined it, as will appear afterwards.

The Loys tributary.

THE Loys, or natives of Champa, after a long war carried on against them by the Kochin-chineses; at length became their tributaries, by a treaty of peace, made in the beginning of the present century. The conditions were, that the king of Champa should remain in peaceable possession of his territories, but that he should render homage to him of Kochinchina; and that a Mandarin of this last kingdom should have the second place in the royal council of Champa, where nothing can be determined without his consent^a.

THE Loys are large brawny people, and better made than the Kochinchineses. Their complexion is ruddy (O), the nose a little flat; they have long black hair, small whiskers, and little beards. Their dress is a shirt and close breeches of calico. Their outer garment is a white paigne (P), in form of a petticoat, with a gold or silk fringe, according to the quality of the person. The king's guards and the Mandarins are clothed differently from the Kochinchineses; having, instead of a gown, a white vest with the turbân: the officers wear it somewhat longer than the common soldiers. b

Tribe of Moys.

THE people differ much also in character from their masters: they are more humane and affable to strangers, more laborious and rich; but not so strong by land as the Kochinchineses, as these latter are more numerous. However the Loys are superior at sea; their galleys are better built; and their boats, in form of tartans, serve them for catching fish, which they have in great plenty on their coast.

THERE is among them a tribe named Moys (Q), who inhabit the mountains, and are employed by them in all work of drudgery as slaves. A piece of cloth to cover their nakedness is all their dress.

Laws severe.

THE two nations (Loys and Kochinchineses) have nearly the same laws. There is great subordination among them, from the king, the Mandarins, and the placemen, to the commonalty. But if policy and justice reign in Champa, it may be said that equity and uprightness are excluded from it. A person is punished for the smallest fault whatever. The lower class of people are not allowed to keep silver in their houses: he who is discovered to have any will be condemned by the Mandarin of the place either to pay a mulct, or receive a severe bastinado. Their money, called kasb (*), is of copper, the size of a liard (or French farthing), 100 go for an amarad, which is worth thirty French sols.

Employments sold.

POSTS are sold here as in other parts of the world. That of Mandarin is granted to him who bids the king most for it; and the greater dues he pays, the higher he is raised in dignity. But the Loys have one advantage above the Kochinchineses, which is, that when they are not rich enough to pay those dues, they have the privilege of borrowing money, at a high interest, of the king's women, who make the most they can of this usury; and indeed it is all their revenue. Hence it happens that these principal men draw all the money they can from their respective districts, which the subjects are never the better for^c.

ALL religions are tolerated and freely exercised in Champa; but those most prevailing are the Mohammedan and doctrine of Konfusius. Nor is idolatry without its votaries also. Some adore animals; others the sun, the moon, and the stars, or the heavens. One thing extraordinary found here is, that the Mohammedans of this country eat swines flesh, and offer their wives to strangers, excepting their legal one; whom they cannot divorce without convicting her of incontinence. Their marriages are made without any ceremonies, and at small expence: the consent of the parties is sufficient, after which they chew betel, and all is over. Indeed for the general their diet is nothing but rice and dried fish, sometimes half-rotten; but to make themselves amends, they drink much arrack, and often get drunk. e

THE south part of this kingdom produces a little cotton, some indigo, and bad silk: so that the inhabitants have no trade but what is carried on at home among themselves; and that of fish is the most considerable.

SHIPS come from China every year laden with tea, ordinary silk, china-ware, and provisions: they in exchange take gold, which is finer than that of China; and a certain sweet-scented wood (R) which grows on this coast, in order to burn on the tombs of their parents, and in honour of their images (S). This commerce was interrupted for about twenty-five years by the bad treatment which these people gave to the Chineses; some of whose vessels f

THIS account of the inhabitants of Champa we have from the French; who, putting in Some French there ſome years ago, were detained, and obliged to ranſom themſelves. A ſuccinct rela-ſurprised tion (T) of this affair will give our readers a farther inſight into the nature and diſpoſition of b the people.

IN 1720 the Galathée frigate belonging to the East India company, commanded by M. Léon ſcore.
Gac, put into the river Baria in Tiger Bay, to ſeek reſreſhments. The inhabitants appeared in great numbers, on ſeeing the boat approach the ſhore with two officers, ſent to require liberty to take in water. Here they found many pirogues or boats, and little gallies. They landed at the motion of the inhabitants; who carried them to a village on the river ſide, conſiſting of ſeveral huts or houſes of the country. There they were diſarmed and ſtripped. Next day the natives attempted, with two armed pirogues, to ſurpriſe the boat which brought the officers; but the perſon left in charge with it made his eſcape.

Two days after arrived a miſſionary named Gouge, who went to India with Mr. Chaumont, The aggreſſor:
c and had been in Champa ever ſince 1685. He was ſent by the king to know the occaſion of puniſhed.
the ſhip's arrival. Next day the king's ſon came to the village. They complained to the prince of the ill uſage received; and he promiſed redreſs as ſoon as he ſhould ſee the captain or his ſecond. Accordingly M. Gravé de la Belliere, ſecond captain, going aſhore, was honourably received, and carried to a Mandarin's, where he had a dinner, followed with a comedy. From thence they were brought to the prince's lodging, to be witneſs of the punishment inflicted on thoſe who had injured them. They were produced with the ſep (U) about their necks, and their backs towards him, as unworthy to look on him. After a ſevere reprimand for their breach of faith, he condemned them to pay 50,000 kaſh (X), and receive fifty baſtinados each on their backs.

d AFTER this Gravé was permitted to take water and return, on promiſe to come again The French have proviſions. Gravé thought it beſt to comply; and returning next day, was invited with thoſe officers by the prince to dinner. The comedy, which ſucceeded, was interrupted by a Madoy, or courier, with a letter from the king to the prince, ſignifying his pleaſure that the ſhip ſhould repair to a great river in a better port, eight or nine leagues from thence; and that the officers ſhould be conducted to Fenere. They had leave to give notice of this to the captain of the ſhip; to whom the prince ſent two buffalos, ſome hogs, and other

His guards and train.

His Champa majesty's guard consisted of twelve men clad in red silk, with turbans of the same colour; and armed with sabres, whose handles were garnished with gold. On his left were four Loys Mandarins, dressed in the same manner as the king, excepting the buskins. They had their guards also. On his right hand was a Mandarin of Kochinchina; then followed several other Mandarins, placed according to their respective ranks, and about 200 officers disposed in a proper manner. The strangers and missionary were posted at the entrance of the hall. The king, after surveying them for a while, ordered betel to be presented them; and expressed his joy to see the subjects of a prince whose fame had reached the Indies. Having in their answer acknowledged his favours; he testified his satisfaction by an inclination b of his head, and withdrew with his train'.

Entertains the French.

Soon after they were conducted into the hall to dinner, where the king and his court were already seated at another table laid for them. There were served up the four quarters of a hog, two roasted and two boiled, with some fowls, and other meats after the fashion of the country. After this first course came another, consisting of the white flesh of pullets hashed with some confections. The king ordered them some of his own drink, which was agreeable; and the entertainment was concluded with a comedy.

WHEN the play was over, one of the principal Mandarins sent to demand of Mr. Gravé 30 nekúns, which make 420 Spanish piasters. He alleged that this sum was for supplying the ship with refreshments; and that it was the custom among them to pay it before-hand. As c that sum was represented exorbitant, he reduced it to one-fifth, or 70 piasters, and an officer was permitted to return on board to get the money. Mean time the king sent to ask, if he had a mind to see his palace, which was but three-quarters of a mile from thence? Gravé thanked him for the honour intended, and retired with the rest.

Design on the ship.

WHILE these pretended courtesies were going on, the Mandarins resolved to send to Kamboja for an officer experienced in war, and give him the command of several galleys to take the French ship. For this purpose they caused troops to march towards the place where they were to embark; of which certain converts gave notice to Gouge, who, being sent along with the officer for the 70 piasters, informed the captain. Le Gac was at a loss how to act. If he d staid, he ran a great risk; if he went away, he exposed both his officers and the missionary to popular fury. On the return of Gouge, Gravé and his companions made new efforts to obtain their liberty from the king; to whom they represented the injustice of their detention. That prince received them with much freedom, made them eat and drink with him, and carried his gallantry so far as to offer them women: to whom, it seems, they could have had no stomach, if they had been ever so much at ease'.

Answer demand.

THE same evening Gouge was ordered by the prime Mandarin to go aboard the vessel and fetch the 30 nekúns, or 420 piasters which he had at first demanded; and to urge the captain to bring his ship to a place a league above the mouth of the river Baria. The French captives, despairing of liberty, desired that Le Gac might depart as soon as he thought fit. The captain intreated Gouge, to propose the release of the prisoners for the sum demanded; and to tell e the Mandarin he would wait his answer four days only. On this the Mandarin repaired to the village where the ship lay, to consult the other Mandarins. Gouge, and the French officers, being also ordered thither; the latter were in hopes it was to send them on board: but some converts said, the Mandarins design was to attack the ship, and, on the least resistance, to sacrifice both the missionary and the officers. Alarmed at this, they implored the protection of the king's son, who promised to assist in council, and espouse their cause. Gravé made him a present of his sword, which he seemed to desire, but the prince bid him not speak of it to the Mandarins, because he had measures to observe with them.

The Frenchransomed.

NEXT morning early, a gun being fired from the ship, the council sent to Gravé to know the meaning of it. As soon as they heard it was the signal to set sail, the Mandarins f entered into composition; and at last it was agreed, that Gouge should accompany the three officers on board to receive the 420 piasters. Their boat was followed by another with ten or twelve armed men, under pretence of an escort; and thus the French were released after thirty days detention. Next morning the missionary returned from the Mandarins, desiring that the shallop might be sent ashore for buffalos, hogs, fowls, and other refreshments which they made an offer of. Le Gac said he was willing to receive them if the Mandarins would send a boat of the country: but that, for his part, he would not trust either his boats or his men in their hands a second time; and forthwith set sail'.

C H A P. XV.

The history of the kingdom of Kochinchina.

a IT was called by that name, which signifies Western China, by the Portuguese, to distinguish Kochinchina from the kingdom of Cochin, on the Malabar coast. This kingdom was once subject described; to that of Tong-king, tho' at present independent of it. By what means it shook off that yoke, whence is cal- and came to be governed by its own kings, will be related in the next chapter. Nevertheless, led. they have still continued as much tributary to the Chinese as they were before, when under the Tong-kingese.

COCHINCHINA is situate under the Torrid Zone, and extends, according to some authors ^b, Its boundaries from the 12th to the 18th, but according to others, from the 8th to the 17th degree of north latitude^c, or about 500 miles in length; but is much less extensive in its breadth from east to west. It is bounded by Tong-king, on the north; on the south, by the small kingdom of Champa, or Cbiampa; on the east, by the Chinese ocean; upon whose coasts it hath a good number of sea-ports, both safe and easy of access; and the bays so deep, even near to the shore, as to contain between 50 and 80 fathom water; besides several islands, of which we shall speak in the sequel; and on the west, by the kingdoms of Laos and Camboja; both which are tributary to it, as well as that of Champa, and some others; of which we shall speak in a more proper place.

THE whole country is divided into six provinces; the most considerable of which is that Division which is called Sinuva, or Shanoa, and borders upon Tong-king; the other five are Quam-bin, on the north, Cham, Kangtia, and Kinbin, along the coasts, and Rau-van, on the inland^d. They are all very well peopled, as well as the country, and have some large towns, tho' Populousness none of them considerable for any thing else, except that of Kebue, which is the residence of the Chova, or king, and is situate in the province of Shanoa, lately mentioned^e. And even this is nothing so remarkable for the beauty and elegance of its edifices, which are mostly of wood, and supported by painted pillars, to raise them above the land-floods, as for the numerousness and splendid appearance of its court, and the vast crouds of people which inhabit or resort to it^f.

THESE inundations, which happen regularly every year, as we have seen them in Siam, and Fertility from other neighbouring kingdoms^g, towards the middle of autumn, and continue two whole its yearly inundations months, render the country exceeding fertile, especially in rice, by the great quantity of mud they leave behind. But we shall say the less on the fruitfulness and product of this kingdom, d it being much the same in most respects with those of Pegu, Siam, and others already described; the warmth of whose climate, and richness of the soil, occasioned by the mud with which the land-floods cover the low-grounds, naturally occasion a great plenty and variety of esculents; whilst their warmer sun gives them, especially the fruits, the most exquisite taste and flavour.

AMONG the fruit-trees which our author affirms to be peculiar to this country (A), there is A peculiar tree and fruit one which he tells us resembles a sackful of chesnuts, one single one being a sufficient load for a man; the weight of which, the branches not being strong enough to bear, the divine providence ordained to grow close to the root, in large bunches. The rind of it is very thick, and when opened, is found to contain some 500 chesnuts; and larger than those we have from Spain: but what the natives value most in them, is a white well-tasted skin, which covers them, e and which they peel off before they roast them^h. Another, no less extraordinary for the The incorruptible tree excellent use of its wood, is that which they style the incorruptible tree, it not being liable to rot or corrupt under earth or water; and is of so tough and solid a nature, that they make anchors of it for their shipping. This tree grows chiefly, and in great plenty, on the mountains; is exceeding tall; and so thick, that two men can hardly fathom it; they have it of two colours, one black, the other red; the former much like that which the Siamese and Chinese call the iron-tree, and put to much the same useⁱ.

THE same mountains produce the aquiline or eagle-wood, aloes, calambac, and others of Mountains the same rare and odoriferous nature: they abound with quarries of several sorts of marble, gold, Quarries and iron mines. The natives have learned the art of fusing and working the latter into feve- Mines. f ral branches, from the Chinese; but are still ignorant in the art of casting it, especially into

(A) This we would not, however, warrant upon his authority, it being likely he may be as much mistaken as he is when he affirms the same thing of the bird's nest so famed all over India for its exquisite taste; but which, by the concurring testimony of writers, is found in many other countries besides this.

cannon, bombs, mortars, and other artillery. Those mountains abound likewise with vast quantities of wild beasts, particularly the rhinoceros and the elephant; the latter of which, if we may credit Father Borri, exceeds all the rest in India in bigness; the feet of the male being full half a yard in diameter, and their teeth between four and five yards in length^k.

THE most remarkable of all their mountains, is a long ridge of them, which extends itself along the western frontiers from north to south, and is inhabited by a wild lawless sort of people, called Kemoy, who pay neither tribute, nor subjection, to any government; being exempted from it by the inaccessibility of their rocky habitations; which afford no less safe an asylum to the runaway Chinese, Tonquinese, and other nations, that flee thither for refuge; and being once incorporated with the mountaineers, learn to live like them, by hunting, or making of inroads into the low-lands^l.

THE rest of the country being mostly low and flat, and, as was lately hinted, yielding plenty of all necessaries for life, is extraordinarily well peopled. Their open towns, they having no walled cities, are in great numbers, and very large. Borri mentions some of them four or five miles long; and most of them are said to swarm with inhabitants. The villages seem almost contiguous to one another. Their fairs are frequent, and well crowded both with men and wares for all uses. But the most considerable are those which are kept during the time of the inundation, when the whole country lies under water, and looks like a sea covered with variety of boats, barges, and other vessels, going from one province to another, with great ease and expedition, and all carrying on some useful branch of inland commerce. But what the natives esteem the most profitable manufacture, is that of silk, which they weave into great variety of stuffs; which, tho' not of so fine anature as those of China, and other parts of India; yet their silk is produced in such plenty, that the sails, cordage of their ships, fishermen's nets, and other such mean implements, are made of it; not but they have some of a much finer sort, which they manufacture amongst them in different ways, and which greatly exceed those which are wrought in the kingdom of Tong-king; but these are few in comparison of the rest. Pepper, sugar, honey, wax, and an oil which they make in great plenty from their numerous land-tortoises, are other branches of their commerce; great quantities of each of them being conveyed from their sea-ports into various countries of India, in foreign bottoms.

THE author of the New Atlas tells us, on what authority we know not, that the kings of this country formerly gave the Chinese and Japanese leave to build a city on a bay, not far distant from the town of Faifo, or Farfo, which he seems to intimate was his capital, and where the most considerable fairs were kept. The bay, which he places in 16 gr. lat. and 108 $\frac{1}{2}$ E. long. is very safe and commodious for all sorts of ships, and much frequented by the two nations above-mentioned, and other foreigners, who import wrought plate, silks, and other rich merchandizes, during the four months which the fair lasts; the duties and customs of which make a considerable branch of the king's revenue, and of the people's commerce. Borri adds, that the bay the town stands upon hath two inlets from the sea, about three or four leagues from each other; the one called Pullo Campelo, and the other Turan, or Tauran; but approaching nearer to each other, join at last into one stream, so that vessels inward-bound, after five or six leagues sailing, meet again at one point (B). The Chinese and Japanese, which inhabit the city, are each governed by their own laws, and chuse their own magistracy from among themselves; and are the chief factors and managers for all merchandises imported and exported between the natives and other Indian nations who trade thither. Their exports, however, are not considerable, consisting only of their silks above-mentioned, cottons, aloes, cassia, wax, sugar, and betel-root, all which are chiefly bought by the Chinese. They have no current coin, but that brass or copper sort which comes from China, and will be described in its proper place.

(B) Our author adds, that the Dutch having made some attempts to obtain the like liberty of commerce as the Portuguese had, these immediately sent an embassy from Macao to the king, to beg that he would not grant them any admittance into his dominions, as being professed enemies to their nation. But before his majesty could come to a resolution, the Dutch had found means to land, and convey such valuable presents as easily determined him in their favour; of which the ambassador was no sooner apprised, than he halted to court, and, in a haughty, insolent manner, accompanied with some indecent gestures, charged his majesty with breach of promise and friendship; the consequence of which was, that the Dutch were immediately ordered to come and land their goods, to be ready against the ensuing fair. They put them accordingly on board their long-boats; but whilst they were sailing up the river, the king's gallies destroyed the greatest part of them, under pretence that the Dutch were notorious pirates; and presently after, an express order was sent from court, for them to depart, and never more to come into his dominions.

Our author adds, that as a farther mark of his friendship to the Portuguese, the king granted them a large convenient spot whereon to build a city for the security of their fleet, in their way to and from China, and for the annoying those of the Dutch in theirs to and from Japan (1). These facts, if fairly told, plainly show what an extraordinary ascendant the Portuguese had gained over that monarch, and what advantage they could make of it, in prejudice of other European traders.

a THE Kochinckinese are a stout, robust, and industrious nation, and differ not much from the Chinese in nature and complexion, except that the coasters are of a deep olive colour. Character of the people. Father De Rhodes, who lived amongst them, doth highly extol their affability, justice, good-nature, and hospitality: but the Dutch, who have been worse treated by them, as we shewed in the last note, represent them as proud, treacherous, faithless, thievish, lying, ungrateful extortioners, &c. Both characters are very probably exaggerated, the one thro' favour, the other thro' resentment; but in the main, they are generally allowed to be a sober, courteous people, temperate in their diet, dress, and way of living; of a calm and patient temper, not easily ruffled into an indecent or passionate behaviour.

THEIR chief food is rice and pulse, variously dressed, and seasoned, and fish, of which they Their food, likewise have such plenty and variety, that a man may make a good meal of two or three rich dishes for the value of three half pence or two pence. They observe great neatness in dressing and serving up their meats, each person sitting at his own little round table, with his victuals ready carved into little mouthfuls, and taking it up with their ivory sticks, as is done in China. But here they venture not to dress any thing within their houses, which being built of dried and painted wood, would be liable to be set on fire; but have their kitchens and stoves without-doors. Their common drink is a sort of tea, which they cultivate among them, but which hath neither the fine taste or flavour of the Chinese; in lieu of which, we are told, that it hath such a special fattening quality, that the king forbids his soldiers the use of it, lest they should become too corpulent. They have scarcely any vines, and consequently no wine; Drink. instead of which, they make themselves some strong liquors of rice, either brewed or distilled; but are generally very abstemious of the latter, unless on their weddings, and other festivities. The better sort mix with their common drink a water distilled from their calambac, which gives it a fine flavour and taste, and is, besides, an excellent stomachic and carminative. They all chew their betel, and present it to their friends, like all other neighbouring kingdoms, as a compliment and token of friendship.

THEY all affect to wear their hair at full length, in token of liberty; though, like the Ton-Long hair. quinese, they are tributary to a foreign power, and in reality no better, like them, than subjects to a couple of despotic usurpers, who hardly allow them either liberty or property. In other respects, both sexes dress much after the Chinese manner. Their grandees and courtiers do not come behind them, either in the richness or brilliancy of their attire; only we are told, that they are much sonder of pearls than of diamonds. The women appear always veiled abroad, Dress but uncover their faces when they receive or return a salute. The garment which is next their body is always long enough to trail about a span behind them; the others are each half of the women, a span shorter than the other.

THEIR Literati affect to wear high caps, in the shape of a mitre: they never cut their nails and learned. or beards, nor slash their gowns so low as the rest. Their upper garment is commonly of black damask, with a stole about their necks, hanging down to their knees, and a blue handkerchief twisted a little above their wrist^m.

THEIR houses are neat and convenient; the pillars on which they stand, and other orna- Houses neat and plain. ments about them, are nicely painted and carved, and some of them gilt; but their furniture within is rather plain than sumptuous; yet the meanest of them have three sorts of seats, with Threefold which they accommodate their visitors; the one a mat, or cushion, laid on the floor, for those seats. of the lower rank; the second, a square or round tabour, about six or eight inches high, and more or less rich, according to their degree or circumstance, and designed for those of a middle rank; the last kind of chair, about 12 or 15 inches high, without back or arms, for those of the highest quality. Their treats to their visitors are usually the betel, a dish of tea, and some tobacco; to which those of the better rank add some perfume, and a good deal of formal ceremony at meeting and parting; tho' the visit, unless upon some extraordinary occasion, Visiting. seldom lasts above half an hour from first to lastⁿ.

THEIR marriages, burials, festivals for the Customs re- ceived from the Chinese. dead and living, arts, sciences, particularly physic and surgery (C), learning, language, writing, arithmetic, and other such subjects, being much the same with those which are used in China, as the greatest part was brought hither from thence, we shall not trouble our readers with an

(C) With regard to those two points, if we may believe Father Borri, who conversed so long among them, the practitioners, tho' equally boasting of their great skill in pulses, and other branches of their art, with the Chinese quacks and mountebanks, are, however, so far honest, that they will not undertake a patient, if, after mature enquiry, they think his distemper likely to elude the power of their medicines. If they take it in hand, it is always with the usual caution of no cure no pay;

and of naming the precise time it will take them in performing it. He adds, that tho' there are several European physicians of eminence in that kingdom, yet their own cure many stubborn distempers with their drugs and simples, which these cannot remove with their more elaborate medicines. Their way of bleeding is not unlike ours, except that instead of a lancet, they make use of a sharp piece of broken china, fastened into a goose's quill (1).

anticipation of them here. Nor must we suppose the sciences to have met with the same encouragement, or to have made as great a progress here as they have there, where every town of note hath its academies and professors, richly endowed, public exercises, examinations for bestowing of degrees, which are the only way to preferment, are yearly performed with a kind of impartial accuracy. Here are indeed some few schools and halls for that purpose, some maintained by the king and presumptive heir; but what is chiefly taught in them is astronomy, or rather astrology; and this merely for the sake of prying into future events.

Their progress small. Astronomy very little known. SOME of their head professors have so much of the former, as to be able to foretell eclipses, that is, to foresee that there will be some such defection in one or other of the luminaries, whenever the lunations happen to be near what we call the moon's nodes, which is no difficult matter to do; but as to calculating exact time, quantity, duration, and other such nice particulars, they are still so much in the dark, for want of proper tables, and such other helps, as the jesuits introduced in China, that they often mistake in one or other of those particulars, if not in all; though, in such case, they are sure to have their lands or appenage resumed by the king, in whose presence, as well as before numerous crowds of grandees, who are timely summoned to attend, the scrutiny is carefully made, how far the phenomenon doth or doth not answer to the astronomer's calculation, either in point of time, length, digits, &c.

Calculation of eclipses imperfect. IN these and the like phenomena, they not only follow, but outdo, the other Indians, in superstition; and as they have been taught to look upon them as portending some great and threatening event, so their superstitious fear makes them accumulate every extravagant expedient used not only by the Chinese, but by their other neighbours, to avert the omen.

Astrology in great vogue. THEIR religion is almost the same with that of the Chinese, and was doubtless introduced amongst them, whilst they were under their dominion. The chova, or king, and his court, the Mandarins, and generality of the grandees, and Literati, follow the sect and doctrine of Religion, three sects; Sect of Confucius, Confucius, whilst the rest of the people follow those of Fo and Lao-kiun, and are wholly given up to the most profound ignorance, and the most stupid idolatries and superstitions. The former have neither temples, priests, nor settled worship, but as in China^p; so here they address the great Tyen in various ways, as their reason, education, or the example of their betters, direct them. The latter, or idolaters, have their temples, and Bonzas, or priests, which, if we may believe Father Borri, are divided into various classes, or ranks, answering to our primates, bishops, abbots, and common priests. The latter, likewise, are divided into secular and of Fo, &c. regular; the former of whom have either lands or fish-ponds for their maintenance; the other live wholly upon the alms of the superstitious people, and live in communities, under a superior, like the monks in the Romish church. They have some temples that excel the rest in beauty, largeness, and ornamental finery; but those are very few, in comparison of the rest, which are mostly built of wood and mud, thatched with straw, and many of them left to go to ruin; the idols, altars, and other idolatrous implements, displaying either the extreme poverty, or neglect of their priests and votaries^q.

Bonzas. Temples many and decayed. THIS may be probably owing to the success which the missionaries met with in this kingdom (D); where, according to their accounts, they had made some myriads of converts in the several provinces of it. Nothing, indeed, could be more easy to these good fathers, than the discovery of the many juggling tricks and knaveries of these idolatrous priests, and to convince their deluded votaries of the superior excellency of the religion they preached among them, and so dexterously accommodate it, as far as they dared, to their old notions and prejudices, especially whilst they were tolerated and encouraged by the men in power; who being of the sect of Confucius, might be pleased enough to see the whole tribe of juggling Bonzas, and their extravagant superstitions, fall into contempt among the people. So that tho' the government hath since thought fit, after the example of the Chinese and Tonquinese, to persecute and banish those missionaries, and to proscribe their religion; yet the laity, once convinced of the stupidity of their former superstitions, and the crafty artifices and impostures of their Bonzas, might not be easily induced to become their dupes again. This general decay of their temples shews at least how much of its pristine grandeur this idolatrous sect hath lost since the time

Probably owing to the missionaries.

(D) Besides this Father Borri, often quoted, two other Italian jesuits entered this kingdom about Anno 1615, and met with such success, that they sent for a fresh supply from the society. Five others, and among them Father Alexander de Rhodes, came accordingly to their assistance, about nine years after, and greatly augmented the number of converts, as did likewise their successors.

We shall not repeat here the various accounts they sent from thence into Europe, of their surprising progress (1), which may be liable to be exaggerated, and only add, that some Hollanders, who were since cast upon these coasts by a storm, about Anno 1714, had the same confirmed by several other missionaries, both French and Portuguese, one of them a bishop, from whom they met with an hospitable reception, and by whom they were told, that in one single province of that kingdom, which they called Hoe, they had no less than 40 churches, and above 10,000 converts (2).

a of Father Borri, one of the first Christian preachers among them ; who tells us, that, at his first coming thither, their temples, idols, and priests, appeared in the greatest splendor ; and that the latter, especially the dignitaries among them, never officiated or went abroad, without some kind of insignia of their rank either about, or carried before them^r.

THEY believe the immortality of the soul, and its transmigration from one body to another : Teach the immortality and transmigration of the soul. and though they are, on that account, very averse to killing or hurting any living creatures, like the generality of the Indians, they make no scruple to offer great quantities of hogs in sacrifice to their gods, and to the manes of their ancestors and near relations, as we shall find it also practised in Tonking^s ; that creature being, by what we can find, the only one that is used upon such occasions. They have likewise a notion, that some of the souls of men, not Apparitions and evil spirits. being permitted to pass into other bodies, become maleficent ghosts, and, in time, degenerate into evil spirits, or devils. Their juggling priests generally fill the common people with superstitious notions of these, and other such evil demons, as incubusses, succubusses, and other frightful apparitions ; by all which they never fail of drawing some considerable gain from their credulous votaries.

THE government here is altogether despotic, the king having an absolute power over the Arbitrary government. lives and fortunes of his subjects, to make or abrogate the laws, to make peace or war, and to dispose of all dignities and offices, both civil and military, in the kingdom, without consulting any of his ministers. He governs his provinces by his Mandarins, appoints the several members of their respective tribunals ; and if any of them be found guilty of mal-administration, c he immediately condemns them to some capital punishment, at his pleasure. The misfortune is, that the complaints of his subjects find always so very difficult a passage to the throne, that they seldom or never are able to reach it ; though he is often pleased to give public audience to them at the gates of his palace, the place where he commonly sits for the administration of justice.

THERE he always appears, mounted on a stately elephant, and seated in a kind of tower, The king's manner of giving audience, sumptuously adorned ; but which none, not even those who are admitted to prefer their suits or complaints, must approach nearer than at the distance of 80 paces, and convey their petitions to him by the hands of his eunuchs, either in writing, or by word of mouth. Whenever he appears in public, upon any other occasion, which happens but seldom, every one is d obliged to fall flat with their faces on the ground. Whatever sentence he passes from his tribunal of justice, is immediately executed, whether it be death, amputation of a limb, imprisonment, slavery, or other punishment. High-treason and rebellion are not only punished with the most severe death, but often affects all the condemned person's relations with loss of life, as well as fortunes, though perhaps they may come off with a less severe death, or with banishment, or perpetual imprisonment.

THESE monarchs in general are very severe in the execution of their laws, whenever the Severe punishments. delinquent's cause comes before them ; but in the more remote provinces, where presents operate as efficaciously, a capital punishment is as often committed for a lighter^t.

FALSE witness is punished according to the nature of it ; and if the accusation be capital, False witness. e the accuser is capitally punished. Adultery is also capital ; the woman is here condemned, as Adultery. in Tongking, to be trodden to death by an elephant, and her paramour to some more gentle death^u. Theft is punished with the loss of a finger, for the first and second fact ; of an ear, for the third ; and of the head, for the fourth. If a criminal flies to Tongking for shelter, he Fugitives how treated. is not only protected, but caressed ; but if a Tonquinese come hither, on the same errand, he is condemned to perpetual slavery, unless he can obtain a pardon from the king of the former, and pay his ransom to the latter^v.

THE kings of Kochinchina are very rich and opulent, having several princes tributary to them, though they, like him, assume the royal title. That of Tbiem pays him a certain number of elephants, and a certain quantity of calambac, wax, ivory, and other products. Those King's opulence and revenue. f of Camboja and Chiampa pay him a certain tribute for his protection (E) ; and even the wild people, called Ka-moy, are forced to send him some wax, betel, and other produce of their high mountains. He hath a vast quantity of odoriferous wood, of various kinds, of gold-dust, and all the elephants teeth ; all which he sells to foreign traders. He claims one-third part of all the rice of his kingdom ; and the governors of his provinces are allowed a ninth part of all the rest. Some provinces, which, by reason of their high situation, and dryness, do not abound with that grain, are indeed exempted from this tribute ; but are obliged, in lieu of it,

OVER and above these yearly tributes, every man, from the age of 18 to 60, is obliged to pay him six crowns per year, and to work for him eight months in the year; the other four, which they call the harvest months, being all they can claim for themselves. The sale of the mandarinats, governments of sea-ports, and other places, are, in some measure, sold by him to the highest bidder; and the price of them commonly runs very high; besides which, he receives considerable presents from them at certain times of the year, as well as upon other occasions, especially when they have cause to fear his displeasure; all which amount to vast sums yearly; and being added to the imposts which he lays on the Chinese, Japanese, and b other foreign traders, bring him in an immense yearly revenue. Over and above which, he is heir to all the princes and nobles of the kingdom; and at their deaths takes possession of all their land; leaving only their effects to be distributed among their children^r.

THIS kingdom having, as we shall have frequent occasion to hint in the sequel, been establish- ed at first by force of arms, the successors to it have not failed to maintain themselves in it by the same method: and to this it is chiefly owing, that their troops, though not quite so numerous, are so much better disciplined than those of any of their neighbours. Their standing land- forces, of which we shall speak under the next head, amount commonly to above 30,000. As to their naval, they have no men of war, but only galleys, of which the presumptive heir hath always the chief command. His whole naval force consisted in the year 1679 of 131 sail. c
Each galley hath 30 oars on each side, three officers, six gunners, two steersmen, and two drummers. The soldiers are placed at each oar, and the officers at the head and stern. Each vessel is finely varnished on the outside with black, and the inside with red, and the oars are commonly gilt. The men row standing, and without speaking, their eyes being fixed on the commander, who sits at the head, and receiving the signal from him by the motion of his wand, as if he was beating time to a band of musicians, which is as exactly kept by them. Every rower hath his arms by him, which are a musket, a dagger, a bow and arrows, and know when and how to make use of them by the motion of the wand; so that every thing is executed with the utmost silence, order, and harmony; and though these galleys are not d usually exercised above three or four times a year, yet each captain has always one of them at his gate, where his company comes every day to be exercised by him. And this is the more carefully observed, because, if any of them should be found defective at the general review, either in the command, or execution, they are sure to be cashiered, or reduced to the rank of a common soldier^r.

THESE galleys are easily and speedily manned, every family in the kingdom being bound to furnish one man; and these are always ready and eager to be called to the service, because they are well used whilst they are on board, and their family maintained in their absence.

EACH galley hath a cannon fixed at its courses, and two small pieces on each side. There are a good number of expert gunners belonging to the navy, and the soldiery are said to be no less so at their fire-arms, though they have not as yet learned the art of casting the one, or e fabricating the other, like the Tonquinese^a. Their mariners all wear the same garb, and of the same colour; viz. white silk trousers, and hair caps. But when they are going to engage, they put on a gilt head-piece, and a waistcoat, so contrived that their right arm, shoulder, and side are always bare. Besides these royal galleys, which are commonly built very long and narrow, and seldom amount to less than 100 or 150, all beautifully varnished and gilt, and otherwise embellished with sails and masts, after the Indian manner, they make use of a large sort of them, to which our English have given the name of millepedes, from the vast number of their oars: these are chiefly employed in transporting of forces, heavy artillery, and other military stores: to all which we may likewise add a number of others, belonging to the govern- f ors of the maritime provinces; of which that of Sinuva, or Sbanoa, which borders upon Tongking, hath 30; that of the province Kham hath 17; and that of the province of Niavouel 15. This is all that we meet with concerning his naval force; to which we can only add, that, in cases of necessity, he can order all subjects to appear in arms, that are fit for service; and at such times, all the galleys belonging to his governors, and other subjects, are obliged to join themselves to the royal navy^b, as if they belonged to it.

HIS court, which usually resides at his capital or Kebue, is commonly very brilliant; and the officers and ministers belonging to it affect to make the finest figure they can, both in their apparel and retinue, but without the gaudy addition of silver or gold; which are so scarce there, that a man who should be found to have of either to the amount of 4 or 500 piasters,

^a would be liable to be called to an account for it. And so little esteem do they shew for that and not worn. kind of finery, that if an embroidered suit, or a gold or silver tissue, should fall by chance into their hands, they immediately throw it into the fire, without regard for the workmanship, or any thing, but the metal. But whether this is owing to any royal prohibition, or to their natural indifferency for that kind of luxury, we are not told ^c. All the officers and ministers, Ministers all eunuchs. both civil and military, or at least the far greater part of them, are eunuchs, as they are at most Indian courts; and upon the same politic account ^d, namely, that they having no children, the king may inherit their effects, as well as their lands.

THE palace is a large, square pile of building, surrounded with a double wall, the first of Palace described. timber and earth, and the other of stone. It hath, besides, several distinct courts within its ^b cincture: so that one must pass through six or seven gates before one can come to the royal apartments; each gate being kept by a strong guard, and the outermost of all defended by three middling pieces of cannon, each covered over with a piece of yellow silk, richly embroidered. The structure is flanked on the right and left with sundry bulwarks, bordered with 400 pieces Artillery. of artillery of different sizes, some of brass, and others of iron, four of them cast at Amsterdam, Anno 1656, and the rest brought thither from Portugal. The king hath another palace or House of pleasure. pleasure-house, not far from this, to which he frequently retires. This last is surrounded only sure, oddly built. with a palisade, and the edifice is built in the form of a large Chinese ship, but with very spacious apartments, all commodious, and elegantly furnished after the Indian manner. All the lodgings and apartments are built of wood, but exquisitely painted, carved, and gilt, and supported ^c by stately columns, no less beautifully wrought ^e.

THE royal household, including the guards, is said to consist of 9000 men, that of his eldest King's household. son, of 5000; that of the next to him, of 3000; and a third, of 2000; we have already ^b hinted, that the land-forces amount to 30,000, of which the second son hath the command, Army, by whom commanded. as the eldest hath of the naval; but as they both reside most of their time at court, with the king, the chief management of each is committed to two favourite eunuchs, or lieutenants, who have nevertheless the title of generals.

NEXT them are the Tyametoos, which are the marshals of the kingdom, and commonly Officers of it. but three in number; and to these is committed the government of the chief provinces, under that of viceroys, when there; and under that of general when with the army. The Kayvats ^d answer to our brigadiers, the Kaydoi to our colonels, and the Kay-cins to our captains. These last never are absent from their companies, but are obliged to exercise them twice a day, like the naval forces. The king is not only present at their general musters and exercises, but gives audience to all the officers, both of the army and navy, twice a day, that is, early in the morning, and about five at night. So that every captain is obliged to be early with his colonel, this with his brigadier, he with the generals, and they with the two young princes, whence they march in a body to pay their duty to the king; after which each of them march off, at the head of their respective troops, before his majesty, according to their ranks: those of the soldiery, that behave well, are promoted to be his life-guards; whilst others, of a different character, are sent to the public works at all spare hours; and both officers and soldiers are ^e kept in full employ, to prevent revolts and rebellions from the one, and mutinies and disorders from the other.

BOTH army and navy are not only kept under a strict discipline, but are more severely Dreadful punishment for high treason. punished than other subjects for every misdemeanor; and if any of them are found guilty of revolting, or any other treasonable crime, they are condemned to be tied naked to a post, at the head of all the forces, and every soldier is obliged to come and cut off a piece of his flesh, as long as he hath any left ^f. And this is such a deterrent to them, that there are hardly any more loyal and obedient subjects any-where in India than they are ^g.

THEIR common pay is about 6 s. in money, a bushel of rice, a certain quantity of fish, per Their pay. month, which, together with their cloathing and accoutrements, is paid to them regularly by the king. Their chief weapons are the musket and sword; and the country furnishes them not Weapons. with powder and ball, but with the materials to make them, which they must afterwards fabri- Dress, &c. cate for themselves. They had no cavalry in their wars, till within these 50 or 60 years, when No cavalry till of late. one of their kings took it into his head to raise two companies of them, of 50 men each, by way of trial, and afterwards raised them into a regiment; since which, we hear that he gave orders to look out far and near for proper horses for that service; and hath men hired on purpose to break and fit them for it. As for the foot, their dress makes one of the gallantest appear- The splendid appearance of the foot. ances on their reviews; and against an engagement, every common soldier is clothed in red, yellow, or green sattin, according to the colour of his regiment. The guards belonging to the king, and princes of the blood, appear in velvet, of divers colours, with their arms glistening ^g with silver and gold; and the generals, and other officers, are at such times allowed to have their clothes embroidered with the same, more or less richly, according to their rank. The king takes likewise care to have the soldiers male children well brought up ; and according as they prove, either tractable, stubborn, or lazy, the officers to whom they belong order them to be cloathed in silk, or coarse linen ; and those who come home to their parents in this last garb, are sure to be well threshed by their parents ; and, if they do not mend their manners, are turned out to beg their bread for some time, in order to shame and spur them up to greater diligence and application ^a.

Manner of fighting very imperfect.

BUT the reader must not suppose, from all that we have hitherto said of their martial discipline, and sumptuous appearance, that they are such adepts in the art of war, or engage their enemies, whether in a siege or battle, with that conduct and regularity that our European forces do. Their fighting is little else than sudden occasional incursions, accompanied by some fierce, but hasty, skirmishes between opposite parties, whenever chance, more than design, brings them together ; in which the Kochinchinese have only this advantage, that being better trained up, and used to them, they are not so easily disconcerted, or put to the rout, as their enemies ; who commonly betake themselves to flight after the first onset, unless they see their antagonists flee before them : but as for any set or decisive battles, they are seldom or never heard of among them, notwithstanding their having been so many centuries at war with the Tonquinese ^b. This defect, however, is so common among the forces of all the neighbouring princes, that instead of affecting those of Kochinchina, or rendering them inferior to any, it hath gained them a great advantage over the rest ; inasmuch, that they have not only some considerable ones who pay homage and tribute to them ; but bear such sway among all the rest, that even their bare interposition hath often been sufficient to suppress any attempt or occasion they might take of encroaching upon one another. And if they have not hitherto aimed at enlarging their own dominions, by new conquests, it is no small credit and honour to them that they have never wanted either power or valour to preserve them entire, and to convey them unmaimed to their descendants until this day. ^c

Origin of their new monarchy from their own records.

WE shall in the sequel give an account how these monarchs came to shake of their subjection to those of Tong-king, at the same time that these rebelled against their lawful sovereigns ; and have ever since kept them in a state of inactive obscurity, and without any other mark than the bare shadow and name of royalty, according as we find this twofold revolution recorded in the Tonquinese annals ^d. But as those of the Kochinchinese relate that remarkable transaction somewhat differently, we shall, in justice to them, subjoin here the account which they themselves give of it, and of the foundation of their new monarchy.

The cause of their revolt from the Tonquinese.

IT happened, according to them, about four centuries ago, when one of the Tonquinese monarchs dying without issue, divided the kingdom between a brother and a sister, both highly in his favour for their excellent qualities ; ordering his brother to reside in Kochinchina, as the most remote from court, and to take care of that government, whilst the sister did the same at Tong-king ; enjoining them at the same time to have a meeting once a year to compare notes, and consult on the properest means for the good and preservation of both states. They had not gone long in this harmonious way, before the princess, who was young, and had perhaps taken some umbrage at her brother, thought fit to marry an ambitious nobleman, who quickly inspired her with a desire of engrossing both governments into her hands ; and whilst he outwardly shewed the greatest regard to the brother, he privately used all the art he was master of to persuade her, that she having the greater title to both crowns, it was her interest, as well as her safest way, to rid herself of him ; engaging himself to get him cut off without their being suspected of having a hand in it. ^e

Entrayed by his wife.

THE queens's brother was then, as usual, at the court of Tong-king, not dreaming of any such deep-laid treason against him. But, happily for him, his sister, young as she was, had prudence enough to conceal her abhorrence of it, under the outward show of acquiescing with and approving of it : but immediately apprised her brother of his danger, and easily persuaded him, under pretence of going a hunting for a few days, to hasten with all possible speed to Kochinchina : where he was no sooner safely arrived, than he assembled the states of that kingdom, and laid before them the treacherous designs which his unworthy brother-in-law had laid both against his life and their liberty. There needed no more to inspire the Kochinchinese with the utmost abhorrence against the ambition and treachery of the Tonquinese usurper and tyrant : they all took up arms in defence of their prince and his government ; and swore never more to submit to the Tonquinese yoke, and to acknowledge the worthy brother and successor of the late king, as their lawful and only sovereign. A bloody war immediately ensued between the two competitors, in which each brought an army of between 40 and 50,000 men, towards the banks of the river Kam bin, which is the frontier between the two kingdoms. What the success of it was we are not told ; only it appears not to have been of consequence enough to have given any great advantage to one side above the other, seeing both have since ^f a kept their own dominions to themselves ; though there scarcely passes a year in which they do not make some incursion into each other's territory, accompanied with fierce skirmishes whenever they meet, yet it doth not appear that one side hath gained a single province over the other. The mutual hatred of the monarchs quickly spread itself among all their subjects, who since that rupture have broke off all friendship and commerce with each other, and affect to display a singular contempt for each other ; and if the Tonquinese use the fugitives of Kochinchina with more seeming kindness than these do theirs, it is rather done out of resentment against their king, than out of any regard to their subjects ^f. Mutual hatred of both nations.

BEFORE we leave this kingdom, we must not omit to give a short account of some of the most considerable islands belonging to it : the natives give them the name of Pullos, and there are a good number of them along the coast. As 1. Pullo Sicca, which is barren and uninhabited, and looks like a group of parched rocks, without trees or one blade of grass. 2. Pullo Secca de Mare, a chain of other barren and rocky islands, stretching themselves from the dangerous shallows called Paracel. 3. Pullo Cambir, fifteen leagues off the shore, but near the shallows above-mentioned, and which, though large, is also uninhabited. 4. Pullo Canton, lying near the shore, and at a small distance from that of Campello, from both which the currents, which run to the southwards in the northern monsoons, oblige the pilots to keep off as far as they can, and to sail close to the coasts. These we mention on account of their dangerous nature. The isles along these coasts dangerous to the mariners.

PULLO KONDOR, or Condore, is another close group, situate under the eighth degree of north latitude ; the most considerable of which is about five leagues in length from east to west, and about one in breadth where widest. The next to it is about two leagues long, and half of one broad ; and is so advantageously situated, that it forms a kind of haven in conjunction with the other, but which, as one advances more southward, grows so narrow that none but small vessels can sail through it. These two islands are reckoned very conveniently situate for those who sail to and from China, Japan, Manilla, Tong-king, and Kochinchina ; and are chiefly inhabited by original natives of the last of those kingdoms, though since somewhat dwindled in their size, and are still subject to it. They are very poor, their chief employment being drawing of pitch or turpentine from the trees called damar, and selling it to the strangers that come, or carrying it to Kochinchina, in baskets made for that purpose ; others get their living by catching of tortoises, and other shell-fish, of which there are a great quantity and variety. All these islanders, Dampier tells us, are so civil to strangers, that they bring their wives on board their ships, and prostitute them to any of them for a small trifle ^g. Those of Pullo Kondor described. Their inhabitants ; Civility to strangers.

ABOUT the latter end of the last century, our East India company attempted to make a settlement upon these islands, and built a fort of earth upon one of them ; which they surrounded with a palisade, and planted a small battery upon it. But some Macassar soldiers, whom they had taken into their pay, took an opportunity some years after to massacre the English that were in it, and to set fire to the fort, in the dead of the night, which put an end to that settlement ^h. An English factory destroyed. A. D. 1705.

To conclude this article, these islands are surrounded with such a number of shallows, rocks, and shelves, and shipwrecks happen so frequently within their neighbourhood, that the king of Kochinchina sends thither, at certain seasons of the year, a number of his gallies, together with some of the expertest divers in his kingdom, to go in search of them, and to save what merchandizes, and other things of value they can out of the water ⁱ. Wrecks dived for by the king's ships.

C H A P. XVI.

The history of the kingdom of Tong-king.

f THIS is the last country in the farther peninsula of India, which remains to be treated of : Tong-king ; it is tributary to the Chinese monarchs, like that of Kochinchina, and is commonly called Tunkin, and Tunquin, by the Europeans. It is bounded on the north and east by the Chinese boundaries, provinces of Quang-si and Yun-nan ; on the west by the two small kingdoms of Law-chiva, which divide it from that of Siam on the south ; and south-east by Kochinchina, and the gulph of its name, called also the gulph of Kochinchina, because it runs between them both. The length

- Extent. length of the Tonquinese dominions is variously computed, because it hath often varied; insomuch that some pretend it once extended 1500 leagues into the inland: that is, from the confines of the province of Quang-ton north-westward to the kingdom of Chiampa. Tavernier affirms it to be almost as big as France; whilst Baron will have it to be longer than Portugal; but adds, that it contains four times the number of inhabitants. According to the latest accounts, it is supposed to stretch about 370 miles in length, and about 240 where broadest.^a Gulph described. The vast bay on which it is situate extends from the point of Chiampa, in north latitude 12° 14', to the province of Tenan in 27° ½'. Its breadth, where widest, that is from the continent to the island of Ho-nan, is reckoned twenty leagues by Dampier, and thirty by Marini.
It hath between forty and fifty fathoms water in the middle, and affords every-where a commodious and safe anchorage. Two large rivers, viz. the Rockbo and Domea; the last so Two bays. called from a town situate upon it six leagues above its mouth; flow into the gulph; the one two leagues farther north-east than the other, and open an entrance into the kingdom; but the latter is that which is most frequented by the Europeans, its mouth being much the larger and deeper of the two. But in approaching it, great care must be had to avoid the many dangerous shoals that lie between the mouths of these two rivers, and stretch themselves in some places several leagues into the gulph. It hath likewise a bar, near two miles broad, across the mouth of it; and the chanel, which is about half a mile over, hath sands also on each side.
Bar. The mark by which one must enter it is a high ridge of mountains, called the Elephant, and which must be brought to bear north-west and by north. Here the sailors make towards the shore till they come to six fathom water, about two or three miles from the foot of the bar; and when Pear Island bears north-west from them, they cast anchor and fire a gun, which soon after brings a pilot to steer them in at spring tide.^b Islands. THE farther end of the gulph hath likewise a number of small islands; the most considerable of which is situate in 20° 18' north latitude, and is called by the natives Twonbene, but by the Dutch, the isle of Robbers, where the Tonquinese have settled a custom-house, which brings in about a million of rix-dollars. Near the island, which is about two leagues long, and half a league wide, are two small bays; the farthest of which hath a pearl fishery belonging to the king.
Domea the first town. THE town of Domea above-mentioned is situate on the right shore of the river of its name, and is the first that offers itself to the sight. The Dutch chuse to anchor before it, but our English ships sail up a little higher, where the current is more gentle. No sooner do the Domeans, and villages about them, perceive an European ship coming up the river, than they set all hands to work in building of booths, and filling them with all sorts of provisions and conveniencies for their accommodation; not excepting, if we may believe our coun-ryman Dampier, a sufficient number of females, to attend their pleasure during their stay. The Tonquinese, it seems, observing so little decency in that case, that they will even suffer their own wives to hire themselves to them for a certain sum, for the space of two or three months; and are so desirous to have some of the English breed amongst them, that those of the better sort, even their nobles, will think it no disgrace to marry their daughters to an English or Dutch sailor, and will make them handsome presents at their departure, especially those whose wives are found pregnant.
Accommodations to strangers. e
Climate. THE climate of this kingdom, although it be just under the tropic, is yet reckoned so mild and temperate, that the whole year appears like a continual spring, without any other material change than that of rain and sun-shine, wet and dry season. They have likewise only two winds that blow for a continuance; viz. the north and the south, which commonly blow six whole months alternately; the former from June or July to January, and the latter from January to July: but the most agreeable season in the whole year begins about September, and ends in March; during which the north wind blows almost without intermission, and renders the climate healthy and temperate, yet without producing either ice or snow. The rainy season seldom begins before the month of April, and lasts only till August. This is indeed the most unhealthy part of the whole year, not only on account of the south wind, and the violent rains that fall in great plenty, but likewise of the thick mists and fogs; which the sun, then in its zenith, draws up, and which oftentimes cause intolerable heats and acute diseases. Yet all that while the country appears in its most elegant dress; the trees are covered with fruit and verdure, and the plains, if not with vines and corn fields, which this climate doth not yield, yet with plenty of rice, and variety of other products more natural to it.
Notice nor snow. f
Weather; temperature. THE misfortune is, that the country, mostly low and flat, is frequently overflowed by the violent rains, to such a degree as to destroy in some measure a whole harvest; and at some times not coming down in sufficient plenty to nourish the rice, which can only grow in water, a famine often ensues, that grain being the chief support of all these eastern coun- g a tries. So that whenever such years of scarcity happen, the parents among the poorer sort are forced to sell their very children for subsistence; although this is not so often the case in this kingdom as in other parts of India, particularly the coasts of Malabar and Choromandel.

THE country on the Chinese side is defended by an impenetrable ridge of mountains, which extends from the sea side above 150 leagues into the inland, along the frontiers of Quang si and Quey-chew. These mountains are covered with vast forests of variety of trees, and filled with elephants, deer, tigers, and other wild creatures; whilst the rest of the country is beautifully variegated with fertile hills and vallies, and intersected with a great number of rivers; among which Father Tissanier, a Jesuit missionary, reckons twenty-eight principal ones which empty themselves into the sea. From these, and other inferior rivers which fall into them, the inhabitants cut a vast number of canals, not so much for the sake of commerce, as they do in China, as to irrigate and fertilize their numerous plains and pasture grounds.

THE country is divided into eight provinces or chief cantons. The first of which, called the Eastern, is bounded on the south by the Tonquinese gulph, on which are a number of islands under its jurisdiction. The ground is mostly flat and fertile, and abounds with rice; but the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the fishery. The chief town of this province is called Heaw, but is very inconsiderable, though the largest of the whole canton, and the residence of its governor^d.

2. THE second, styled the Western, is mostly flat, and abounds with rich pasture grounds and fields of rice, but is thinly furnished with fruit and other trees.

c 3. THE third, called the Southern, is formed into a kind of triangular island, partly by the sea, and partly by the two great branches of the Song-koy, or large river (A). It is very fruitful in rice, by reason of its flat and low situation, but is likewise subject to frequent inundations.

4. THE fourth, styled the Northern, is by far the largest of all, and comprehends the greatest part of the kingdom on that side, reaching quite to the Chinese frontiers on the east. It is partly flat and partly mountainous; the flat yields plenty of rice, and the other abounds with woods, forests, and wild beasts; and, among other trees, produces that of which they make their fine varnish, or japan.

d 5. THE fifth, called Tenan, is but small in comparison of the rest, and its chief product is rice.

6. THE sixth, called Ten-hoa, or Ten-hie, is bounded on the east by an arm of the Song-koy, and on the south by the gulph of Tong-king; its inhabitants are chiefly employed in the fishery, and drive a considerable commerce with their salt fish.

7. THE seventh, which is called No-ghean, borders on Kochinchina on the west; it extends a vast way northwards, and breeds vast numbers of cattle on its fat pasture grounds, as well as great plenty of rice. Its bordering upon Kochinchina makes it necessary for the government to entertain a good number of troops, which lie cantoned along the frontiers.

e 8. THE eighth, called Cachao, Chaco, and Checo, is situated in the heart of the kingdom, and is surrounded by the other seven^e. Its soil is fertile, and in some parts mountainous, and abounding with variety of trees, and particularly that of the varnish. Most of these provinces carry on some branch of the silk manufacture more or less, but this last most of all. It takes its name from its capital, which is also the metropolis of the whole kingdom; though in other respects hardly comparable to a Chinese one of the third rank.

f CACHAO is situate under the 20th degree of north latitude, at about eighty leagues distance from the sea. Some authors make no scruple to rank it amongst the most considerable cities of Asia, both on account of its extent and the vast number of its inhabitants; but it will be found, on stricter enquiry, that the vast crouds of people which swarm in it are rather neighbouring villagers, that flock thither at times, but more especially on market-days, with their various commodities, and who so croud the streets that they are hardly passable. Upon which account several of the most considerable villages about it have been allowed to have their halls in particular parts of the city, where they bring and dispose of their wares. The magistracy likewise takes care to preserve such good order among all the goers and comers, as to prevent as much as possible all confusion and stoppage among them.

(A) This is by far the most considerable river in this kingdom. It is said to have its rise among some of the Chinese mountains lately mentioned, and, after a long and winding course, to discharge itself by eight or nine branches into the gulph of Hay-nan (1). Dampier indeed, in the supplement to his voyages (2), mentions no more than the two branches of the Rokbo and Domea; it is possible however that it may have a greater number, which he did not know of, seeing he says nothing of the place where it falls into the sea.

Streets, &c.

As for the town itself, if we except the palace royal and the arsenal, it hath little else worth a notice; the streets are neither regular nor handsome; the houses are low and mean, mostly built of wood and clay, and not above one story high. The magazines and warehouses belonging to foreigners are the only edifices which are built of brick; and which, though plain, yet, by reason of their height and more elegant fabricature, make a considerable show among those rows of wooden huts.

Royal palaces.

THE chief palace of the Chowa, or king, is more a vast than a superb structure. It is situate in the center of the city, and surrounded with a stout wall, within whose cincture are seen a great number of apartments two stories high, whose fronts and portals have something of the grand taste; those of the Chowa and his wives are embellished with variety of carving and gilding after the Indian manner, and all finely varnished. In the outward or foremost court are a vast number of sumptuous stables for the king's elephants and horses; the inner courts can only be supposed to be answerable to that, for the avenues are forbid not only to all strangers but even to his subjects, except those of the privy council and the chief ministers of state: yet we are told, that there are stair-cases by which the people may mount up to the top of the walls, which are about eighteen or twenty feet high, and walk about them, from which they may have a distant view of the royal apartments, and of the fine parterres and fish-ponds which are between the cincture and them. The front wall hath a large gate well ornamented, which is never opened but when the king goes in and out; but at some distance from it on each side there are two posterns, at which the courtiers and servants may go in and out. This cincture, which is of a vast circumference, is faced with brick within and without, and the whole structure is terminated by wide spacious gardens; which, though stored with variety of proper ornaments, yet are destitute of that grandeur and elegance which we behold in the palaces of our European princes.

Wall.

The ruins of an old palace.

BESIDES that vast spacious palace, one sees in this metropolis the stately ruins of a more splendid and magnificent one, said to have been formerly built by one of their monarchs, named Li-bat-via, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel, and to have been since destroyed during their civil wars. Its circumference is said to have been between six and seven miles; some arches, porticoes, and other ornaments, are still remaining; from which, and some of its courts paved with marble, one may conclude it to have been as magnificent a structure as any of the eastern parts can shew.

Arsenal.

THE arsenal is likewise a large and noble building, and well-stored with warlike ammunition and artillery. It stands on the banks of the river Song-koy lately mentioned, and on that branch which Dampier calls Domea, which he says is much the deeper and wider of the two, and is that by which the European vessels come up to the town of its name: though, as we hinted a little higher, not without the assistance of a pilot of that country to steer them through its sandy and dangerous meanders, who always chuses calm weather and the benefit of the tide for that purpose^f.

AND here it will not be amiss to mention some curious observations, communicated to our Royal Society, concerning some considerable variations between the tides of these seas and those of Europe, viz. that on the Tonquinese coasts ebbs and flows but once in twenty-four hours; that is, that the tide is rising during the space of twelve hours, and can be easily perceived during two of the moon's quarters, but can hardly be observed during the other two quarters. In the spring-tides, which last 14 days, the waters begin to rise at the rising of the moon; whereas in the low tides, which continue the same number of days, the tide begins not till that planet is got below the horizon. Whilst it is passing thro' the six northern signs, the tides are observed to vary very greatly, and to rise sometimes very high, and sometimes to be very low; but when it is got once into the southern part of the zodiac, they are found to be more even and regular^g.

No walls or fortifications.

Streets properly paved.

To return to the metropolis of this kingdom, all that we need observe further concerning it is, that it hath neither walls nor fortifications, tho' it be the constant residence of the Tonquinese monarchs, who have two other palaces, such as they are, in it, besides that already spoken of. The principal streets are airy and wide, but the rest narrow, all of them paved, tho' few of them otherwise than with small stones, clumsily put together; which makes it very unpleasant to walk thro' them, especially in wet weather, when they are extremely dirty, for want of a proper current for the water. Even in dry weather there are here and there some ditches of stagnated water and stinking mud, which are very offensive to strangers; yet upon the whole, its open situation, and serene air, renders it healthy, and to the natives pleasant enough; so that it is seldom, if ever, visited with such pestilential diseases, as are common in large cities of these eastern climes.

Subject to fire.

ONE sad disaster it is liable to, from the combustibility of its edifices, and the thatching of their houses, that it frequently suffers dreadful conflagrations; which spread themselves far a and wide, with such surprising velocity, that some thousands of houses are laid in ashes before the fire can be extinguished. To prevent the sad consequences of which, every house hath, Precaution against them, either in its yard, or even in its center, some low building of brick, in form of an oven, in which the inhabitants, on the least intimation of a fire, convey their most valuable effects. Besides this precaution, which every family takes to secure their goods, the government obliges them to keep a cistern, or some other capacious vessel, always full of water, on the top of their house, to be ready on all occasions of this nature; as likewise a long pole and bucket, to throw water from the kennel upon the houses. If these two expedients fail of suppressing the flames, they immediately cut the straps which fasten the thatch to the walls, and let it fall in, and waste itself on the ground (B). By this means also the neighbouring houses are b soon uncovered, and the flames prevented from catching at them; or if they do, they may be the more easily quenched by the water kept in reserve, and by the supply which they get by their poles and buckets from the kennels; for so strict are they to oblige every house to be provided with those two expedients, that if any are found without them, they are very severely punished for their neglect: notwithstanding all which cautions, this city is frequently damaged by such conflagrations^a.

THE house belonging to the English is situate on the north side of the city, fronting the English river. It is a handsome, low-built house, with a spacious dining-room in the center, and factory house on each side are the apartments of the merchants, factors, and servants. At each end of the building are smaller houses, for other uses, as store-houses, kitchen, &c. which form two c wings, with the square in the middle, and parallel with the river, near the bank of which stands a long flag-staff, on which they commonly display the English colours on Sundays, and all other remarkable days. Adjoining to it, on the south side, is the Danish factory, which is neither so large nor so handsome; tho' the Danes were settled in it long before the English, who were but lately removed thither from Heau, in our author's time. On the same side of the river runs a long stout dike, whose timber and stone are so strongly fastened together, A stout dike on the river. that no part of it can be stirred, without moving the whole. This work was raised on those banks, to prevent the river, in the time of their vast rains, from overflowing the city, and carrying all before it; and has hitherto answered its end; for tho' the town stands high enough to be in no danger from the land-floods, it might yet have been otherwise frequently d damaged, if not totally laid under water by the overflowing of that river^b.

CACHAW is the only city, if it may be dignified with that title, in the whole kingdom. No cities in the kingdom. That of Domea, formerly mentioned, tho' the next in rank, is hardly worth notice, being a large scattered town, or rather village; and so we may say of all the rest, even of those which are styled the metropolis of a province, and residence of a governor. The town of Heau Heau town. above-mentioned hath nothing remarkable but a palace belonging to a popish bishop, who is Popish bishop's palace. a Frenchman, in which are also lodged some missionaries, of the same nation. It is a low, but handsome building, encompassed with a high and spacious wall, and hath a large gate to enter in at, which is open all the day, and shut up at night; near it is a neat, but small apartment, separate from the rest of the building, which is designed for the entertainment of e strangers. The bishop, who is interdicted from settling at, or even coming to, the city of Cachao, commonly resides in this town, which lies in the road to that metropolis, and hath several wherries constantly going up to it with the tide, and containing some 10, some 20, passengers, besides the rowers, and other lading^c.

WE have already hinted, that the greatest part of this country is well watered by rivers, and canals cut from them; and the warmth of the climate is no less assisting to the fecundity of their ground. It were indeed needless to enumerate the various products of this kingdom, Variety of trees. they being much the same that we have mentioned in our history of China, and other parts of India. And we shall only add, that the greatest part of their fruit-trees are affirmed to exceed all the rest of Asia in the flavour, beauty, and excellency of their fruit, but especially the f palm and orange-tree, of the large kind. But those of the small kind, as well as their citrons, are reckoned very unwholesome; especially the latter, the juice of which, in some cases, is used instead of aqua fortis, for dying of calicoes. They are likewise careful to furnish Garden stuff. their gardens with plenty of potatoes, yams, onions, &c. and their orchards with plantans, bananas, mangos, limes, coco-nuts, pine-apples, and other such esculent fruits. Their woods

(B) This is the more easily done, as the thatching is not fastened to the rafters in small parcels, as it is in other parts of the East and West Indies, but in large pans, about seven or eight feet square; so that five or six of them will cover one side of a house of a moderate bigness. These pans may the more speedily be loosed from the rafters, or ratans, by cutting their bands; upon which they immediately fall on the ground; and in case they should alight too near the oven where the goods are secured, may be the more easily removed farther (1.).

do likewise abound with timber-trees, for building of either ships or houses, and with stately a pines, to make masts of ^d.

in vogue.*

THE betel, in such vogue all over India, in the leaf of which a slice of areck-nut being wrapped up, is chewed with so much delight, is here found in great plenty, and offered as a great compliment, even to strangers. Every man carries his box full of those leaves, ready for use; and it would be looked upon as a high affront to refuse it when offered, as it would be likewise to take it with the left, instead of the right hand. They commonly send it as a proper present, when they dispatch their servants on any complimenting errand; for which the person sent to seldom fails of making some gratification to the messenger. They esteem it as a pleasant opiate; but value it still more, as a preserver and cleaner of the teeth, and adding to the redness of the gums and lips.

THESE woods abound with the same variety of wild beasts, as other parts of India and China; and their elephants are reckoned the largest and nimblest in all Asia. They have plenty, and great variety, of fowl, both wild and tame, which are their usual food (C) at all their feasting, tho' at other times they eat sparingly of any flesh, and content themselves with their boiled rice, herbs, roots, dried fish, and pickled eggs.

of mice.*

THEY have here a strange kind of mice, the hunting of which yields them a pleasant diversion, and their flesh a dainty dish. They are about the bigness of a pullet, and have wings about a foot and an half long, and commonly make their nests on filbert, pistachio, and other nut-trees, whose fruit is their chief fare, and gives their flesh a fine relish. It is not the cats that here make war against them, but a particular breed of small dogs, which hunt and drive them up to the next tree they meet with, which they climb with great swiftness; and fastening their claws on the branches, hang all the day long upon them, with their heads downwards: they have, moreover, seven claws on each wing, by which they cling so fast, that when shot dead, they continue still fixed to the bough. These creatures are preferred to any fowl, even by the Portuguese ^e.

Liquors.

THEIR common drink is a peculiar kind of tea, which they call Chia-bang, or Chaw-bang; the leaves of which, boiled in water, yield a liquor of a reddish-brown, not unlike the ordinary Chinese bohea. There is hardly any village in which one doth not see, especially on market-days, women with an earthen pipkin before them, set over some coals, with this kind of tea, which they sell to passengers. This sort is not only strong and coarse, but very d distasteful to strangers, because they drink it without sugar: but in their merry meetings they commonly mix a quantity of arrak with it, more or less; and when they design to make a fuddling bout of it, they drink the arrak by itself, and frequently burn it over the fire, as they do in China, especially before they go to sleep ^f. They have another sort of tea much pleasanter than the former, which is made not of the leaf, but the flower of the plant; which being dried and torrified, hath a very grateful flavour and taste, when infused or boiled in water; and this they call Chaw way. They make several sorts of wines, and other liquors, of rice, and other ingredients, like those used in China; on which we need not expatiate ^g.

(C) On solemn occasions, whether they be festivals, weddings, burials, or anniversaries, they commonly indulge themselves, as far as their circumstances will allow, in great variety of flesh and fowl; among which buffaloes, horses, goats, dogs, rabbits, rats, locusts, geese, ducks, wild and tame, frogs, tortoises, crabs, and other fish, small and great, make up the most considerable part of the feast; and fruit in great plenty and variety, the conclusion of it. They are likewise fond of pork cut into slices, and roasted all together; but oftener choose to eat it raw, only minced and seasoned, much after the same manner as our sausages are.

They singe their oxen as we do our hogs; and esteem a raw beef stake, soaked three or four hours in vinegar, a dainty morsel. If an elephant die a natural death, the flesh of it is commonly given to the poor; but the snout, or proboscis, is esteemed a piece fit to be presented to some great person.

Among a variety of sauces, which they use with their meat, one of the most common and admired is their ballachawn, which is made of small fish, shrimps, prawns, &c. soaked in salt water till reduced to a pulp. The liquor, which is afterwards drawn from it, is called newchmum, and both these are used as a sauce as well by natives as Europeans; and even the poor people will mix the ballachawn with their boiled rice, to give it a hautgout, rank and disagreeable enough to those who are not accustomed to it, but which becomes pleasant by use (3).

Whatever is brought to their table is dressed and served with the greatest niceness; even their tables and vessels, as well as victuals, are perfumed. They use neither knives, forks, nor table linen, but eat after the Chinese manner, each person at a separate table, and handle their sticks with the same dexterity (4); but observe, especially among the better sort, a great decorum, and deep silence, all the time; tho', if we may believe their countryman Baron, this last is rather owing to their voracious attention to their victuals, which doth not permit them to lose so much time as even to answer a civil question; insomuch, that it is looked upon as an affront, or at the best a breach of good manners, to speak a word till the repast is over (5). Their custom is to eat four times a day, as every-where else in India.

- a THE Tonquinese are generally of a tawny colour, yet not so deep as other Indians. Their Inhabitants faces are oval, and mostly flattish, yet graceful. Their hair is black, long and lank. They described. affect, both men and women, to have their teeth as black as art can make them, and are Black teeth. four or five days a dying of them, but seldom go about it till they are 13 or 14 years old. Whilst the operation lasteth, they take no other nourishment than some chaw, or other such liquid, and that but sparingly, lest some of the dye, which is of a poisonous nature, should mix with their food, and endanger their health; but this abstinence they all readily comply with, to avoid resembling the elephants and dogs in the whiteness of their teeth, which they look upon as the most odious disfigurement. They are naturally healthy and robust, nimble Manufactures. and active, dexterous and ingenious in their several manufactures, such as those of silk, cotton, lacquering; great quantities of all which are yearly exported. Notwithstanding which, their Populosity country is so populous, that vast numbers of its inhabitants labour under the extremest and poverty. poverty, for want of employment; the handicraftsmen being unable, for want of money, to set them to work, except when foreign ships, especially English and Dutch, arrive, and give a new life to business, by advancing money to them, to at least one-third part of the goods they bespeak; and this frequently obliges the merchants to stay there five or six months before Use of it of they can get them finished. But what causes the greatest obstruction to labour and industry, gaming. and contributes most to their indigence, is the universal itch of gaming which reigns among them all, rich and poor, masters and servants, whilst they have any thing left to hazard; and when once money, goods, and their very cloaths, are lost, they will stake even their
- c wives and children; after which, they will not leave one trick untried, whether honest or bale, to retrieve their families and fortunes; tho' it most frequently ends in their total ruin^h.

It is not improbable that the Tonquinese have received this infection of gaming from the Chinese, who are very numerous among them; and amongst whom that vice reigns, as we shall see in the sequelⁱ, if possible, in a higher degree. They have likewise contracted, like them, such a shameful habit of indolence and idleness, that they will spend part of the morning in visiting one another, and the evenings and nights either in gaming, or smoking, drinking, singing, and other such idle pastime; and leave the care of their manufactures and trades to their women and slaves; insomuch, that it is a doubt whether there is any, even among the richest sort of dealers, take his whole stock together, that hath the value of 2000

d crowns in all his warehouses. To all this we may add, the heavy taxes which the government Heavily taxed. imposes upon them; and which, tho' rated according to the circumstances of every individual, commonly run as high as they can possibly pay, and sometimes higher, thro' the artifice and knavery of the king's officers.

THEIR dress is not much different from the Chinese, and consists of a long robe, reaching The men's down to the heels, and tied about the middle with a girdle or sash, commonly embroidered, dress. among those of the better sort, with gold and silver; but the habit of the soldiers, and common people, reaches no lower than the knees, as the breeches and drawers do to the mid-leg, and are commonly of cotton. But the nobility, and persons of rank, affect to go in rich silks, or fine English broad-cloths, mostly either red or green, and reaching to their heels;

e neither dare they appear at court, especially before the king, but in such a stately garb. Their heads are covered with a long cap, of the same stuff with their gowns; but those of the lower rank go commonly bare-headed, except the fishermen and labourers, whose business obliges them to wear broad-brim'd hats made of rushes, straw, or palmetto leaves, starched as stiff as a deal-board, and tied by a string under their chin.

THEIR antient laws obliged all but the king to go bare-foot, which, as Father Marini Go barefoot. observes^k, might the more easily be complied with, as their land is mostly of the soft and sandy kind, and little of it hard and stony; tho' one would be rather apt to wonder how they could bear the excessive heat of the ground. But we shall see in the sequel in many kingdoms under a hotter sun, and in more rocky countries, as in the empire of Abissinia, f Lower Ethiopia, and other parts of Afric, the very same custom is observed, without the least inconvenience to the natives; tho' very painful to strangers uninured to it. However, the Literati, and since them the grandees, claim a privilege of wearing sandals; but the greatest ornament of both, is that of their long nails^l.

THE dress of the women differs little from that of the men, saving that it is rather more That of the grave than theirs, excepting only on grand festivals, when they strive to adorn themselves women. with the richest habits and ornaments. On other occasions, if we except that they do not cover their hands and faces, as the Chinese women do^m, they affect a degree of gravity in their dress, actions, and gait, even superior to theirs. Their long robes come quite close about their necks, and hang down to their heels. They wear large hats, like those of the fishermen lately described, but made of some richer stuff, and more curiously embroidered, which they also tie under their chin, and use as a kind of umbrella. Whilst this kingdom was under the dominion of the Chinese monarchs, and governed by their viceroys, both men and women were obliged to tuck up their hair in some form or other, in token of subjection. But after they had recovered their liberty, and began to have their own kings, both sexes agreed to wear it hanging about their shoulders, in token of their freedom. Their Bonzas, or priests, who have their heads shaved all over, make a kind of jest of their long hair, pretending that it is of no other use than to help their deities to draw men, or little or no merit for their good deeds, up to heaven; but which, for that reason, they had no occasion for, seeing their own virtue and good actions are sufficient to carry them thither; and therefore take care to shave it off as fast as it grows^a. This doth not hinder the Tonquinese from keeping up to their old custom of wearing their hair hanging down, tho' very troublesome to the working part; which they chiefly do, to distinguish themselves from the Chinese. For the same reason, their noblemen, and persons of distinction, affect to wrap up their long gowns differently from them, that is, by fastening the left lappet over the right; whereas the Chinese wrap the right lappet over the left, and fasten it on their left hip by a ribbon to their girdle.

the Bonzas,

end of their curves.

THE dress of the male Bonzas differs only from that of the gentlemen in the fineness of the stuff, and its hanging more full and loose about them. They wear on their head a round cap, about three inches high; behind which hangs a piece of the same cloth, and colour, which comes down over their shoulders. The colours they affect most are the purple, chesnut, the carnation, or flesh-colour, and the glossy black; tho' others will prefer the yellow, and dark-red. Some of them wear a kind of doublet, striped or flowered, with glass beads of various colours, artfully strung and sown upon it. The female Bonzas appear much in the same kind of dress; except that, instead of a round cap, they adorn their heads with a kind of tiara, bespangled with variety of beads of various colours, and of the bigness of a musket-ball^c.

guage, &c. writing, arts,
&c.

THE Tonquinese appear, by the court records of the Chinese, and their own, to have been a quite different people from them, and to have received their principal arts, sciences, and politeness, from them. Writing was wholly unknown to them, till they brought it amongst them; and even their language, if we may believe Dampier^d, hath a very great affinity with the vulgar Chinese, or Fokyan dialect, consisting, like that, of a vast multitude of monosyllables, whose significations are distinguished by the variety of tones and accents with which they are pronounced^e, only the Tonquinese, we are told, abounds more with gutturals, and hath as great a number of those called dentals, which the Europeans find no less difficulty to pronounce. The courtiers, nobles, and Literati, however, affect the more polite Chinese, which is less rough and uncouth: but as to their making use of the Malayan, as Tavernier affirms, it is not likely that they even understand it; tho' the mercantile people may use it in their commerce with other nations. For tho' the remarkable smoothness of that language may appear more suitable for a polite court, the Tonquinese do not seem curious enough to adopt it, in preference of their own, merely upon that account.

characters.

THEY have the same way of writing that is used in China, and in all probability did at first learn it from them. The characters to all appearance seem to be the same, and are written in the same way by columns, and with the same instruments. Their paper is of the same make, either of silk or the bark of trees, all of their own manufacture; and their writing and printing appear in all respects as neat and beautiful as that of the Chinese. They have schools in every village, where children are taught to read and write, but no superior colleges for the arts and sciences. They are not indeed so expert in the mathematics as the Chinese, nor do they seem to have the same genius and liking to them, but have a particular fondness for music and poetry. But their most admired Literati are those who are best versed in morality, and in their laws: these apply themselves mostly to the writings of Confucius and other Chinese philosophers; for we do not find that they have any eminent writers of their own in that way, though many distinguished professors and proficient, and these are held in the highest esteem, who, for want of public established schools, do teach their students in houses of their own, or at their own homes, as their parents and they agree. The same method is followed by the teachers of rhetoric, poetry, and music; and it is by those professors that the youth are examined and advanced from one degree or class to a higher^f.

1. Syn-de.

THERE are three of these classes, through which these students must pass before they can be qualified for any great posts in the government. The first is called Syn-de; the second, Dow-cum; and the third, Tan-si. To become a graduate of the first, they must have learned rhetoric, in order to be fit for the offices of notaries, proctors, advocates. If they go well through their examination, they are immediately registered and presented to the a king, who gives them leave to assume the title of Syn-de; but, if found defective, are dismissed as unfit for it.

To acquire that of Dow-cum, they must study five years, till they have learned music, 2. Dow-cum, poetry, and mathematics; which last chiefly consists in some skill in astronomy and astrology; and these last are obliged to make their own instruments; and, when they have gone thro' their examen with approbation, are dubbed Dow-cum.

FROM the Dow-cum they may rise in your years more to the third or uppermost degree, 3. Tan-si, called Tan-si, by bestowing that time on the study of the laws, politics, and customs of the Chinese (D); at the end of which they are examined in the presence of the king, by a great number of nobles and gentlemen of that class, who come thither on purpose, and a certain number of Mandarins and counsellors, to whom the names of the candidates are signified before-hand. Their examination is commonly more strict than any of the two former; and, if discharged with their approbation, they are immediately conveyed to a scaffold erected for the purpose, and cloathed with a rich vest of purple satin, given to them by the king; and their names are written in large characters on tablets, which are hung up at his palace-gate. After which they are inrolled in the rest of the Tan-sies, and have a certain appenage assigned to them according to their quality, merit, or the king's favour, till they are raised to the mandrinate, or some other post in the government. It is also out of this last class that he chuses his counsellors, ministers, and ambassadors, especially those who are sent on an embassy to the imperial court of China with the usual homage and tribute, or upon any other occasion. Whilst those who have miscarried in their examination are disgraced, and registered, as incapable of ever rising to that dignity^a.

PHYSIC will hardly be expected to be in any tolerable degree of perfection, if our readers recollect in what a low state it is still in most parts of India, and even in China (of which we shall speak in a subsequent chapter), notwithstanding the many useful improvements they might have made both in the theory and the practice, by their converse with Europeans^b. The whole of both doth indeed chiefly consist in the knowledge of the virtues of a good number of herbs, roots, gums, and other medicinal vegetables, the use and preparation of which is copiously treated in some of their books; but is more commonly attained by experience and specific receipts, which the practitioners, who are at once doctors, apothecaries, and surgeons, pretend to be masters of, together with a more than ordinary skill in pulses. Fevers, especially of the purple kind, dysenteries, cholics, jaundice, and the small-pox, are the chief and most dangerous distempers the Tonquinese are liable to; as to gout, stone, and gravel, they are scarcely amongst them; and the others they commonly cure by diet-drinks joined to good regimen: when these prove ineffectual, they have recourse to topical applications, as cupping, cauterizing, either with Indian moxa, or even with hot irons (E); and sometimes, though rarely, bleeding as near as can to the part affected, either with a sharp bone, not unlike our farriers fleams, struck into the vein by a flap of the finger, or

(D) This high regard of the Tonquinese for the Chinese learning, and particularly for that branch of it, will appear less strange to our readers, if they consider what we shall have frequent occasion to hint in a subsequent chapter, that not only they, but all the other neighbouring kingdoms, looked upon the Chinese as the most, if not the only, learned and polite nation in the world, held in the highest esteem all their philosophic and other writings; and look upon their system of politics as the most complete that human reason could excogitate; insomuch that not only the writings, but the persons of Confucius, Mencius, and others of their great men, are held in as high veneration among them as they are in China (1). Even the Japanners, who hardly come behind them in any of those excellencies, as we shall shew in the next chapter, make no difficulty to own the great advantages they have received from these valuable Chinese volumes, which are still taught in their schools, and as highly valued as ever amongst them, notwithstanding their prejudice to their whole nation in general, of which we shall give an account in the sequel (2).

(E) This last is chiefly used in epilepsies, as in China (3). But they have another distemper of much the same nature, with which they are often seized on a sudden, viz. a total deprivation of speech, which, if not quickly remedied, seldom fails of ending in the patient's death. This distemper is said to be occasioned by damps or blasts in some of their unwholesome seasons; and the first remedy they try against it is, to make the patient drink a large quantity of arrack, aqua vitæ, or other distilled liquor, made as hot as he can swallow it, and with the addition of some powdered ginger.

If that doth not bring him to his speech, they chafe his whole body with a cloth dipped in the same hot spirituous liquors; if all these fail, they proceed to burning, and that sometimes to the very bone; but they frequently defer this last expedient so long, that the patient is either quite dead, or past all sensation, or possibility of recovery. It sometimes happens also, that the circulation of the stagnated blood, forced by the violent friction above-mentioned, as well as by the quantity of the hot spirituous liquor administered to the patient, is attended with violent and excruciating pains in the limbs; in which case they lay him down on a bedstead, whose girts stand at some distance from one another, and having covered him up with warm cloaths, sweat him night and morning from underneath, by the help of a chafing-dish filled with coals, and a large quantity of frankincense, or other like gums, till the pain is assuaged (4).

dise by a puncture with a kind of fine needle^c; a topical operation likewise, said to have been invented by the Japanese, and of which we shall give a further account in the history of that nation in a subsequent chapter^d. The Tonquinese frequently cure the purple or spotted fever by raising a small blister on some of the spots with a lighted match or rush, until they break and go off with a whiff; which they look upon as a sure sign that the malignity of the distemper is thereby evaporated. This operation is usually performed by candle-light, because the pustules appear more plainly than by day-light. It is however looked upon as so hazardous to the performers, that they commonly undertake it with no small reluctance and great precaution; because, as it is pretended, if they should catch any of the effluvia at the nose or mouth, it would infallibly infect them with the distemper; and, what is still worse, without any possibility of a cure. But whether this last circumstance be true, or only pretended, in order to extort a greater reward from the patient, we will not pretend to determine.

Doctors very ignorant and great boasters, and astrologers.

UPON the whole, we shall only add, that the people are timorous and superstitious to a high degree, and the physicians very ignorant, and very great boasters and cheats. Astrology is always consulted, not only in sickness, but in all other the most trivial emergencies; and they will suffer their patients to run the hazard of their lives, rather than administer any thing to them on an unlucky day, or under what they deem an inauspicious aspect of the planet.

improved,

THE Tonquinese are indeed more ready and expert in manual arts, which they have much improved by the help of the Chinese families, who refuged themselves amongst them during the former troubles and civil wars of that kingdom, and having settled themselves ever since, and introduced some of their principal trades and curious handicrafts amongst them. We have already hinted something concerning their silk and cotton manufactures, and that of their japan-work, or lacquer-varnish, in all which they are little inferior to their masters; to which they may add that of their porcelane, and other earthen work, in which they would be no less successful, had they the same encouragement and flourishing trade for them that the Chinese have. But it is too much the interest of that politic nation to cramp, rather than promote, the commerce of their vassals, or suffer any of their tributaries to vie with them in any useful branches of trade; and this, together with the heavy taxes with which they are laden, their scarcity of money, diffidence of strangers, apprehension of distant or perhaps imaginary losses, all these, we say, contribute to dispirit and discourage them from improving those advantages, which, from their excellent situation for commerce, and genius for mechanic arts, might otherwise render them a flourishing and opulent people. So that they now content themselves with spending a great part of their time, the men especially, either in sloth, indolence, and poverty; or, if their circumstances will permit it, their morning is spent in idle visits, the middle of the day in eating and sleeping, and the remainder of it in drinking, smoking, gaming, singing, dancing, and other diversions.

How they

by them.

THEY have acquired some skill in metals, and can even cast guns and other artillery, can fabricate fire and other arms, with variety of other ingenious tools and utensils in metals; and have an excellent way of preparing and mixing the earth in which they cast their metals, and even cannon of an extraordinary size. Dampier tells us of a large brass one which was cast by them, supposed to be eight or nine thousand pounds weight. Its bore is of a taper form, a foot diameter at the mouth, but narrower at the breech, and in other respects ill-shaped; though much esteemed, because cast by them about twelve or thirteen years before, and the largest that ever they made. But they were forced to have recourse to the English to mount it upon its carriage, and now only keep it for shew^e. All this shews that the small advantage they make of their genius and dexterity, is rather owing to the want of encouragement and industry.

WE cannot forbear mentioning another abuse which contributes to keep the industrious working part still poorer, and turns no less to the advantage of the foreigners, who carry it on under-hand. This is done by contracting an intimacy with some notable female, either by a love intrigue, or by an extemporaneous marriage, and appointing her one's factress at parting, who will be sure to take the advantage of the deadness of trade, during the foreign merchants absence, to employ people at the lowest wages, and to buy silks and other commodities at the lowest prices, against their return; by which means some Dutchmen, who are said to deal most in this clandestine way, have gained immense riches; and their factresses, by their shares of the profit, have raised such fortunes, as to become matches for some indigent grandees, after their Dutch husbands have left off trading^f.

and exported
on foreign bottoms.

To all these disadvantages we may still add another, that the Tonquinese do not trade for themselves, nor export any of their merchandizes on their own bottoms; nor have they indeed a any vessels fit for these rough seas, theirs being chiefly fisher-boats or long galleys, so that most of their wares are imported and exported by strangers. Those imported are saltpetre, sulphur, broad-cloths, and other woollen stuffs, spices, lead, guns, and cash: we do not find that they have any coin of their own, but make use of that which is brought thither by strangers, together with the small copper coin which they have from China^c, and which they exchange with them at a great disadvantage for foreign silver^f. The Tonquinese women are said to be such dexterous money-changers, that they can raise and fall the value of their cash as dexterously and effectually as our stockjobbers do their stocks.

THEIR inland commerce is mostly carried on by water, and by the help of their numerous rivers and canals, and of the many markets and fairs which are stated by the government; the most considerable of which are those which are held every new and full moon at their metropolis of Ca chao, or, as father Marini writes, Ke-cio; which word he tells us signifies a fair or market: he adds, that these fairs are kept in seventy-two quarters of the town, every one as big as a little town, and filled with merchants, traders, and artificers, whole several wares and merchandizes are indicated in a sign hung over the entrance of their warehouses or shops. These fairs are the more crowded with strangers, as the king permits none of their ships to anchor at any port but this^g; to which we may add another inducement besides this vast concourse of people, viz. the beautiful prospect which its river yields, all the way up to it, of fertile plains and verdant pastures, and of a great number of villages large and populous on each side, elegantly shaded and adorned with high trees planted on each side of a large moat or canal, which surrounds each of them, and defends them from inundations, whilst the plains about them display only a spacious flat land covered with fields of rice or meadow grounds. Other towns have likewise their fairs and markets, and the villages likewise; but with this difference, that six of these are joined together in one charter, and hold their own each in their turn^h.

THE Tonquinese have adopted the two chief religions which reign in China; viz. that of their great philosopher Confucius, [whom they call Ong-cogne] which is that of the Literati, and of those of superior rank, and that of Fo, which was brought from India into China; a full account of both which will be more properly seen in the Chinese historyⁱ, to prevent needless repetitions. Only thus much may be said here concerning the former, or philosophic sect and doctrine, that the Tonquinese doctors value themselves not a little for having purged it, as they say, from a great number of superfluous niceties, with which the Literati of China had clogged the reading and interpretation of that great philosopher's writings, as well as from a great variety of superstitious customs and observances, which they had introduced from them, and which continue still in full force among the learned of that empire. So that the whole of their religion, so far as respects this famed sect, consists in a deep inward veneration of the god or king of heaven, in paying some private honours to their ancestors, and in the practice of all moral virtues.

THEY have neither temples nor priests, nor any settled form of outward worship, but every one pays his adoration to the supreme being in the manner he thinketh best. They also believe a lower rank of subaltern spirits, to whom they pay an inferior kind of worship, such as they think is most acceptable to them, and most likely to procure their favour. Most of this philosophic sect hold the world to be eternal, and all the souls of men to be immortal; but some of them believe that immortality, and the bliss attending it in another life, to belong only to those of the just, whilst those of the wicked perish with the body. This we may properly style the religion of the court and of the learned, of which their monarchs, whilst they were absolute and independent, were the chiefs or heads, and claimed alone the privilege of sacrificing to the great Tyen, as the Chinese emperors do in their own dominions, whether on certain state festivals, or in times of public calamities. At present the Tonquinese Chovas, or kings, though tributary to those emperors, still retain that privilege, and perform that office in their own palaces, where they offer up their victims upon particular occasions, but especially in calamitous times^k.

THE other, or the sect of Fo, which hath spread itself through the greatest part of India, as far as Siam, China, and Japan, is chiefly professed here by the common people, and is subdivided into a variety of branches, the principal of which is that of Lanzo, or Lan-thu (F);

Here, on the contrary, they are low and mean, and destitute of every ornament except their statues; which, instead of being placed on a sumptuous altar, are either set upon some bench, or hang down from some of the cross-beams to which they are fastened. These are commonly of an oblong form, open on all the four sides, and their floors, mostly of plain boards, are raised some feet above the ground; not so much for grandeur, as to keep them above water during the time of their land-floods, and are ascended by a flight of steps which run around on the outside.

THEY are served by two sorts of priests, called Bonzas and Says, each a set of lazy drones and horrid cheats, who live chiefly on the ignorance and superstition of the populace. Their houses, or rather huts, are built in the neighbourhood of their pagodes, where they ply the laity, who resort thither to their idols, and offer their petitions to them; which is done by making long prostrations and burning some incense before them; and for this their votaries pay them with two or three handfuls of rice, some a small quantity of betel, and other such inconsiderable trifles, which is in some measure all that those idle drones have to subsist on; and it sometimes happens that the Tonquinese kings are under a kind of necessity to thin the number of them, by sending part of them to the wars. What seems to contribute most to their extreme poverty, is the contempt which the quality and richer sort of people have for them; and who, rather than encourage them in that idle way, by resorting to their pagodes to offer up their petitions, will cause that ceremony to be performed in some of the open courts about their own houses, and by one of their own domestics; who lying prostrate before the idol, reads his master's petition, and afterwards flings it into the fire on which the incense is burning, together with three or four pieces more of gilt paper, to be consumed with it. This ceremony, when thus performed at home, is commonly followed with a plentiful feast, in which the officiating servant, and the rest of his fellow domestics, are nobly regaled^m.

To these two sects, we may add that called Tay-bou-to-ni, which is rather a sort of pretended conjurers, who set up to cure distempers by charms, and other magical tricks, and are in great vogue among the Tonquinese, they being, according to their countryman Baron, the only persons who are consulted upon such occasions; and persuade the people that the distemper is inflicted by some earthly or watery demon, and cannot be cured but by proper charms, of which they alone pretend to have the true secret. And as they are seldom sent for till the last extremity, the supposed conjurer, disguised in an odd fantastic dress, begins his pretended charms with the sound of some sort of trumpets, kettle-drums, basons, brass pans, and other rough music, to prevent the words, which he speaks on the occasion, from being heard by the by-standers, ringing himself a hand-bell, to add still more to the horrid din; he continues dancing, leaping, turning and winding to the same tune, till he perceives some prognostics in his patient, either of life or death; and if the latter, he is never destitute of some plausible cloak for his pretended disappointment; either he was not sent for soon enough, or the spirit or demon which inflicted the disease was too exasperated against the patient to be intreated or appeased by any charm: and this last doth more readily pass for current, as the prevailing notion amongst them is, that the souls of the deceased are turned either into beneficent or maleficent demons; the latter of which are the more outrageously so in proportion to the torments they are doomed to, if they are not timely relieved from them by the living, in some way suitable to their condition; and of this these jugglers, who pretend to be the only judges, are commonly made the chief directorsⁿ.

BESIDES the class above-mentioned, there is another called Taydelis, whose province is to direct the living to the choice of the properest and most favourable places for depositing the bodies of their deceased friends. The funeral obsequies are reckoned amongst them so essential a part of their religion, that however one sect may differ from another in other points, this of making a proper choice of a burying-place is looked upon by them all as an indis-

ed converse with subaltern spirits, from whom he had gained, as he pretended, a most extensive insight into futurity; and whenever he was consulted by any great personages about any momentous matters, he used to exhort them to some popular and charitable deeds, such as building of hospitals for the sick, lame, and needy; by which means he not only ingratiated himself into their esteem, but became the idol of the common people to such a degree, that his sect quickly eclipsed all the others of the Indian F² (1).

a penfible duty ; and next to that, the vifiting of thofe places at proper feafons, and furnifhing them with variety of eatables, and other conveniences, which their fouls may ftand in need of. This cuftom was probably introduced hither by the Chinefe, who, as we fhew hereafter, are fo fcrupulous in the performance of this duty, that their very emperors are not exempt from it^c. The only difference is, that the Chinefe, efpecially thofe of any rank above the vulgar, have their fixed burying-grounds, where every family depofite their dead relations without any farther enquiry. Whereas the Tonquinefe are fo fuperftitiously fcrupulous in this refpect, that any material circumftances which happen at a parent's or near relation's death, makes them look upon this confultation about the choice of a grave as fuch an indifpenfible duty, that the neglect of it would be attended with fome great difafter to the furvivors. In fomuch that in fome cafes, as when a perfon dies on the fame day or hour in which his father, or fome other near relation did, they will keep the deceased in his coffin above ground fome months, or even years ; that is, till thofe Taydelis, or pretended diviners, have agreed upon a proper fpot to depofit it in : though this cannot be done without great expence and trouble, in proportion to the time the corpf remains unburied ; becaufe, in fuch a cafe, the neareft relations are obliged to depofit feveral forts of eatables upon the deceased's coffin three times a day, to keep candles or flambeaux continually burning, together with a constant fire on which to burn incenfe and other perfumes, as well as a variety of papers cut out in the fhape of horfes, elephants, and other creatures, which they foolifhly imagine his foul may ftand in need of. Besides all thefe, they are obliged to repair feveral times in the day to that place, to prostrate themfelves, with their foreheads to the ground, before the coffin, and make the ufual lamentations, with all the geftures and tokens of the deepeft forrow, whilft the corpf continued in the houfe. But it will be hardly neceffary to acquaint our readers, that this fingular fcrupuloufnefs about the choice of a burying place, extends no farther than among the rich and wealthy, who can pay thofe jugglers well for their pretended confultations, and whose intereft it is to procrastinate their agreement about it. But when the fame difficulties happen among thofe of the poorer fort, they feldom make them wait long for their determination ; and in a week or fortnight, at the moft, direct them to the defired fpot.

Cloathing of the deceased.

When the diviners are once come to an agreement about the important point, the funeral pomp immediately follows : and much in the fame mournful manner as it is commonly practifed in thofe parts ; and more efpecially, as we fhall fee more fully in the fequel in the empire of China, from which they had it. The mourners appear in coarfe habits, and tattered fhoes, or even barefoot. They follow the corpf in a kind of reclined or ftooping pofture, and leaning upon a ftaff, as if weakened with exceffive grief, and unable to fupport themfelves without fome fuch prop. The women have their heads and faces covered with a veil of the fame coarfe ftuff, and join in the doleful chorus with the men, in loud and bitter lamentations. The neareft of kin to the deceased often prostrate themfelves before the bier during the march, and fuffer even the bearers to ftep on and tread over them : at other times they will attempt to push or pull the coffin back with their heads and hands, as if to ftop its progrefs towards the burying-place, or as if they wanted to recall the dead to life.

The reft of the funeral ceremony being much the fame with thofe of the Chinefe, we fhall forbear foreftalling it, and only add, that they are, like them, extremely follicitous to procure to themfelves, whether poor or rich, the beft coffins that their circumftances will allow ; and will, at any rate, make fure of them ten, twenty, or more years before-hand, and preferve them in their houfes as the moft valuable part of their furniture. Thefe are commonly made of the beft and moft durable wood, very thick and ftrong, nicely pointed, and glued with the ftrongeft cement, but without nails, which would be looked upon as an indignity offered to the deceased. Their countryman Baron tells us that the cement or glue above-mentioned is made of feveral valuable gums, but doth not tell us what they are^a.

As to the corpf of the deceased, it is commonly attired with the beft garments they wore when alive ; thofe of the men have feven, and thofe of the women nine fuits of them one upon the other. They put befides fome fmall pieces of gold or filver, or even fome fmall pearls, or pearl-feed, in the mouths of the rich ; and, in thofe of the poorer fort, fome bits of copper, brafs, bugles, or other trinkets, which they think will be of fervice to them in the other world, and prevent them from troubling the living with their complaints. It is likewife with the fame view that they have ftated times to vifit their graves, and offer variety of victuals, perfumes, pieces of gilt paper, and other fuch presents, of which the fouls, they think, come and take as much as they want ; after which the reft is given to the poor.

festivals.

The festivity of it.

General licen-
tiousness.

THE Tonquinese have a singular fondness for festivals, though their religion hath little or no share in the greater part of those which are observed amongst them. The two principal ones, and which are observed with the greatest solemnity, are that of the entrance of the new year, and at the beginning of the sixth moon, which commonly happens soon after the gathering-in of their harvest. The first usually falls some days before or after the first day of January, and lasts twelve days, according to some, but a whole month, according to other writers, particularly their countryman Baron *. The first day of it is spent in a kind of gloomy retirement, the houses and windows are kept closely shut, not a soul stirs in or out, and the people within scarcely dare to speak to or see one another; all this not out of any devotion, but out of a superstitious fear lest they should see or meet some person, or other creature or object, of ill omen, which might bring some ill luck on them, and trouble all the joy and alacrity of the whole festival, or prove the forerunner of some great misfortune in that year. The day being once happily over, all the rest of the festival is spent in visitings and entertainments, and in public and private diversions; the streets are adorned with sundry decorations, particularly stages, at proper distances, on which are acted some plays, or other representations are exhibited to the people, by male and female actors, brought up to that kind of licentious life. These usually appear well dressed, and are very expert, some at dancing, others at singing, leaping, swinging, and other kind of diverting exercises. Citizens and country people crowd the streets all in their best apparel; the air is filled with the sounds of various instruments, and vocal music, and with the applauses of the spectators. The women are allowed to appear abroad adorned with all their jewels, and other finery; some in chaises, others in sedans, or other carriages according to their rank, and always attended with some kind of escorte to keep them from insult; these times being mostly remarkable for a general licentiousness which is suffered to reign every-where.

DURING the whole festival, there is a total stop put not only to all labour and commerce, but to all public affairs; the great seals of the kingdom are kept locked up in a strong box, the tribunals and inferior courts of justice are shut up, no debts can be demanded, nor wrongs or violence be rectified or punished, till the conclusion of the festivity permits every thing to resume its usual course.

OTHER kinds of diversions, such as gaming, drinking, smoaking, riding, going on the water, and others still of a worse nature, are no less in vogue, and countenanced; so that those who have but wherewithal to purchase, need not be at a loss, amidst such a variety of pleasures, how to spend the whole festival in all the mirth and jollity that their hearts can wish. Not only their metropolis, but every town and village, enjoy the same or some equivalent diversions; amongst which, that of treating not only their friends alternately, but also strangers, is not one of the least; and one cannot oblige them more than in accepting of their invitations, and appearing satisfied with their entertainment †.

moon.

New and full moons.

Two others.
Public ones, where and how kept.

THE second festival, which begins with the sixth moon, and usually falls some days before or after the first of June, is kept with the same general gaiety, though not with equal sumptuousness, and hath nothing particular worth our notice. Besides those two, they observe the new and full moons, that is, the first and fifteenth day of every moon, as days of feasting and mirth; for we read of nothing like any religious rites being peculiarly adapted to any of them. The most magnificent of all are those which the kings and grandes observe at the respective anniversaries of their nativity, inauguration, marriages, &c. These are always accompanied with the most splendid entertainments of music, plays, dancing, and other the like diversions. To these their countryman, often quoted, adds two others not mentioned by any other author; the one named Kan-ja, and the other Tek-kida. On the first the Bova, or king, appears abroad, attended with his whole court, and great multitudes of soldiers and people, and blesses the fruits of the earth; and, after the example of the Chinese monarchs, from whom this laudable custom probably came ‡, repairs to a particular spot of ground, where, for the greater encouragement of agriculture, which is nothing so well cultivated as in China, he puts his hand to a plough ready prepared for that purpose, and drives it over a furrow or two; after which he gives his courtiers a kind of rural treat. This solemnity, which is commonly closed with general rejoicing, is likewise preceded with general fasting and prayers, by way of preparation.

Two other great festivals

THE other, called Tek-kida is kept with the same, or even greater, solemnity and course; and is a kind of exorcism, by which they pretend to drive away all the malevolent spirits out of the kingdom. The whole militia, or forces of it, hath a right to assist at the ceremony: but for that very reason the Bova, or natural prince, is not suffered, by his Chova, or usurper of his crown, to be present at it, lest he should take the opportunity of so vast a a number of his military subjects appearing in arms to suppress his tyrannic power, and recover his liberty and regal prerogative^u.

The last kind of festivals worth notice, are those which are observed at the tombs of their ancestors, on the anniversary of their decease; in which they are no less punctual and costly than the Chinese, and seem to outvie them in the profusion of meat, which they bring on those occasions to their sepulchres. We shall subjoin the description of one of them from Dampier^v, which was like to have cost him dear, for want of knowing the design and nature of it. He saw, at some distance from him, a kind of square tower, about eight feet broad, and twenty-six in height, surrounded with a great multitude of people, mostly men and boys. The structure was slight, and covered with thin boards, closely joined together, and painted all over of a dark reddish colour, and had no door on any side to enter into it. Upon his approaching it, and pressing through the crowd, he perceived a great number of stalls reared around the tower, with sheds over them, and separate from each other. Some of them were covered with fruit, particularly fine oranges, nicely packed up in baskets; others with meat, especially pork, cut only into fitches, or into quarters; from all which he concluded it to be a market-place. Being at that time very hungry and faint, and observing the joints to be too large for his use (for he reckoned, that the whole might amount to the quantity of 50 or 60 hogs) he came near one of the stalls, and, not understanding their tongue, made signs to one of the persons belonging to it to cut him off a piece of two or three pounds. Upon which he saw himself surrounded by a croud of people, who assaulted and beat him at an unmerciful rate; and it was with great difficulty that his guide, who was a native, got him off, by apprising them of his mistake; after which he was informed, that it was a funeral feast, the tower was the burying-place, and the apparatus of flesh and fruit designed for the entertainment of the dead and living, which he did not stay to partake of, nor to see how it was disposed of.

THEIR other private or domestic festivals, as birth or wedding-days, &c. are accompanied with other diversions, besides those of eating, drinking, dancing, and music; and are commonly concluded, like those of the new and full moons, with some plays, or theatrical representations of sea or land fights, but have seldom above four or five performers of either sex. Their action is just, and their dress splendid. The actresses appear with a kind of mitre, or diadem on their heads, from which flow two large ribbons down to their waist. The dancing and music are regulated by one of the guests, who is complimented with that office, and is not a little proud of it. He beats the time to the actors upon a drum, or brass bason, and is seated on one corner of the stage; and on the opposite side stands an empty arm-chair, or throne, for the king. On all kinds of public festivals the nobles are very fond of cock-fightings; a diversion much in vogue at court, and in which they commonly bett very high; and great sums are won and lost. They usually conclude with a royal battle, in which the Chova's cocks always come off victorious; or perhaps, rather, the victorious cocks gain the title of Chova's, or royal cocks^x.

THE weddings are not celebrated, among the people of rank, without some of those theatrical diversions; nor among the meaner sort, without something of that nature, though of the inferior kind. Youth of either sex cannot marry without the consent of their parents; nor of the female sort before the age of 16 or 17. The courtship here, as in China, is to the parents, and not to the damsels, who never see their spouse till they are led to his house, and delivered up to him; which is not done without great pomp and ceremony, she being accompanied thither by her relations; and those of her husband being likewise invited to partake of the festivity, the men with the men, and the women with the women, in distinct apartments: but we do not find that the priests have any hand in the ceremony, or share in the marriage feasting, as Tavernier affirms.

A MAN may have several wives, but one only is governess over the rest. He hath like-wise power to divorce them upon any dislike; but they cannot be divorced from him without his consent. The divorced wife is intitled to carry off all she brought with her, and all that her husband had given her at her marriage; but if she hath had any children by him, she leaves them with him: and this privilege, in favour of the wife, is one main cause why divorces are less frequent here than in other parts of India. The divorcial ceremony is performed by breaking one of the two sticks which he and she did use at table, and sewing the pieces up into two several bags, the one of which he keeps, and gives her the other. He gives her moreover a kind of bill of divorce, in which the particulars of what she is intitled to carry off with her, are mentioned.

ADULTERY is severely punished on the wives, though we do not find it so on the husband. The woman, who is fairly convicted of it, is immediately condemned to the elephants; that is, one of those creatures, bred up to that exercise, gives her a toss with his snout, which a lays her breathless on the ground; after which he tramples her to death with his feet. Her paramour is likewise capitally punished, though not with so severe a death. As for the inher-ritance of children, the eldest son commonly carries off the largest share, as being now the master of the family, and endowed with a fatherly authority. The rest he distributes at his pleasure among his brothers and sisters, who are not married, or provided for; and is obliged to maintain and breed them up at home till they are; and commonly the daughters come off with the scantiest share. And thus much may suffice for their religious customs.

Christianity introduced into the kingdom.

HITHERTO we have said nothing of christianity, which was planted here ever since the year 1626, by the Jesuit Baldinoty, and met with such swift success, that the government thought fit to banish him and his colleagues four years after, and to have them conducted b to Ma-kau. This did not deter the society there from sending three new ones on the very next year, who made such progress amongst those idolaters, that they had made above 80,000 converts among them by the year 1639. A prodigious number, if we may credit their own accounts, considering the small one of the preachers. But this encouraged fresh supplies to come yearly to their assistance, by whose means their converts increased to such a prodigious degree, that they had already built above 200 churches at their own charge, in the several provinces of the kingdom.

Proscribed, persecuted, and abolished
out of it.

THIS surprising success proved, at length, their ruin; and after several dreadful persecutions raised against them, by the government, wherein the intrepidity of their preachers and Neophytes amidst the grievous sufferings, still alarmed it the more; an edict was at length c issued out from the king and council anno 1721, by which the christian religion was utterly proscribed; the missionaries, and their catechists, and the most considerable of their converts, were imprisoned and put to sundry tortures and death; others condemned to attend the elephants; a slavery worse than that of the galleys; their churches were all demolished, or turned to profane uses; the profession of christianity was forbidden under the severest penaltities; and all the frontiers and avenues ordered to be diligently guarded by the soldiery, to prevent any more European preachers ever entering into the Tonquinese dominions. All which was so punctually executed, and such care hath been since taken to examine all strangers, and to seize on all suspicious persons, and to convey them, under a strong guard, to the Mandarins of the provinces, and thence to the court, that no jesuit, or other missionary, can d attempt, under any disguise or pretence, to get admittance into that kingdom, without the utmost hazard of his life.

NOR but some of that zealous society, in spite of all these difficulties and dangers, have since ventured, by the assistance of some of their old staunch proselytes, or some other indirect means, to slide into some distant provinces unperceived. We shall have occasion, in the sequel, to give an instance of no less than six of them, who found means, soon after the above-mentioned edict, to penetrate into some of the frontiers in disguise; four of whom were apprehended, and put to death; and the other two have not been heard of since.

Their govern-

THE Tonquinese, after many revolutions and changes in their government, of which we shall speak more fully in its proper place, regained their ancient form, under that of their e own native natural princes, who were become likewise kings of Kochinchina, as well as of this kingdom. They were absolute and independent in both, and committed the administration of both to two prime ministers or generals, with an almost as unlimited authority as their own. A dangerous snare this proved to them, and ended, at length, in an open revolt against their common sovereign. The Kochinchinese general, as being at a greater distance from his court, first ventured to lead the way, and his colleague of Tong-king soon after followed his example; and having made himself master of the royal revenue, as he was already of the forces, seized on his prince's person, and confined him prisoner in his own palace; and, without making any farther attempt upon his life, assumed the whole royal authority into his own hands. From that time the Bovas, or rightful sovereigns, have f had little else than the name and shadow of royalty; whilst his general, or prime-minister, hath engrossed all the power and wealth of the kingdom, excepting only the royal title of Bova, which neither he, nor any of his successors have dared to assume, for fear of the people, who still retain an unalterable regard for their natural sovereigns. Upon which account they have thought it more expedient to content themselves with their old title of Chova, or generalissimo; though they are not displeased at being complimented with that of king, not only by neighbouring princes, but by the Europeans who trade there; though even these, for form sake, have thought fit to fix a kind of difference between them, and to style the real sovereign emperor, while they give that of king to his usurping subject.

The king stript of his power
by the Chova.

THIS is the true state now of that government; the Bovas, stript of all their authority, are g obliged to lead an indolent life within the cincture of their palace, surrounded continually with a great number of spies, set about them by the Chovas, and never stir out of it but once a year, on the grand festival of Can-ja, lately mentioned; when they go to bless the fruits

a of the earth, and plough some small piece of ground; an office which the Chovas have not yet dared to wrest out of their hands, as being held sacred, and the peculiar privilege of the natural monarchs. Another faint branch of the royal prerogative they are still permitted to exercise; viz. the ratifying and confirming all the decrees and ordinances of the Chova, and putting their seal to them; all which they are obliged to submit to, be they ever so irregular, or contrary to their inclination; seeing their non-compliance would only endanger the loss of that remaining shadow of royalty, if not of their own lives. This form of government hath now subsisted above 200 years, without any sensible alteration. The Bovas still retain the form of royalty, whilst the Chovas engross all the revenues, homage, and obedience, of the subjects. Kept prisoner in his palace.

b BOTH dignities are hereditary in each of the respective families; but with this difference, that that of the Chova descends in a direct line to his eldest son; whereas he can, upon the demise of the Bova, not only name which of his children he pleases to succeed him, but can appoint any collateral branch, as a brother, or a nephew, of the deceased monarch, or even a more distant branch, to be his successor, provided he be of the antient royal family of Li. The succession, how settled.

THE Bova's court seems a mere desert, in comparison of his Chova's. He is not allowed any guards, nor retinue, except that of a parcel of spies, which the latter appoints to be about his person; so that the chief diversion and amusement of his life is confined to the company of his wives and children. He is not suffered to be visited by any nobles, or officers of the kingdom, except on the new and full moons, when they are admitted to pay a kind of homage to him, to wish him a prosperous and long life, and a numerous male issue; the failing of which is still looked upon by his subjects as the greatest calamity that can befall them. The Chova often accompanies them on these public occasions; and, to all outward appearance, seems to join in the general good wishes, and pays him the most profound respect, pretending to take the administration of the public affairs of his dominion, merely to ease him of a heavy burden, unbecoming his royal dignity; all which is looked upon as mere grimace by the wiser part of the people; who, nevertheless, are extremely careful to conceal their sentiments, for fear of alarming the jealousy of the pretended minister against their real sovereign. His court deserted, except on festivals.

d ON the other hand, the Chova's palace is perpetually crowded, not only with his own creatures, but with variety of strangers, Indians as well as Europeans, who pay their court to him. He hath likewise a numerous guard about him, both of horse and foot, besides 300 elephants, always in readiness to attend him. To this we may add an army of 30,000 foot, which keep constant garrison in his metropolis; and another of between 70 or 80,000 more, which are dispersed in other parts of the kingdom; and whose chief officers are obliged to reside, by turns, some part of the year, at court. Besides these, he is attended by all the governors of the several provinces, the Mandarins, and other officers of the kingdom; for he alone hath the power of bestowing those great posts; so that, from the highest to the lowest, they are all his creatures, and wholly devoted to his service, and very assiduous in paying their court to him, as often as they are permitted to be absent from their respective posts. That of the Chova crowded. Guards. Vast power.

EVERY one of the six provinces hath a governor, who hath under him a Mandarin, who acts as chief judge over it, in all causes, civil and criminal; and takes care that the laws of the kingdom be strictly observed. He hath several tribunals under and depending upon him, but there is one superior to them all in every province, which is independent both of him and of the governor, and depends wholly on the council of the Chova. The governor judges in chief in all criminal causes, but cannot inflict a capital punishment, till the sentence hath been confirmed by the council above-mentioned. Governors and other officers

f THE far greater part of their laws are those which they formerly received from the Chinese, when they were conquered by them about the middle of the twelfth century. Some few of their ancient ones they retain; and in particular one laudable one, which forbids, under severe penalties, the exposing or drowning of their infants; an inhuman custom which has been with impunity practised in China from time immemorial. But upon the whole, we do not find the courts of judicature in Tong-king are less liable to corruption than those of their neighbours; and provided a man has but money enough to bribe his judge, he needs not fear going off unpunished let, his crime be what it will. Laws liable to be corrupted.

g THE Chova hath commonly a vast number of concubines, but is in no haste to marry a wife lest, he should have children by her, and for that reason defers his marriage till the latter end of his life: the reason of which strange policy is, that he is obliged to marry a princess of the royal blood, but is unwilling that the succession to his dignity should return to any Wife and concubines.

of that family, though by a female line, lest it should prove in time a means of excluding his own; and therefore is always succeeded by the first-born son of his concubines. However, for decency's sake, he sets that prince's above them all, and gives her the title of mother of the kingdom, and shews her the greatest regard as to his lawful wife. The concubine who brings him the first son, is the next in rank, and hath the title of Dua-ba, or excellency, and her son, as presumptive heir, hath that of Chu-wa, or young general; and the rest of his male children are stiled Du-kong, or excellent men, and the females Batuas, which answers to our title of prince's^a.

my.

His army seldom consists of less than 150,000 men, amongst which are 8 or 10,000 horse; but he can upon any occasion augment it to twice that number. The misfortune is, that they are generally but indifferent soldiers; they march indeed with surprising boldness and speed to the place of rendezvous, and encamp with an elegant regularity, but shew no less reluctance against sieges and engagements; and when obliged to either, betray as great an aversion to come out of their intrenchments, as they appeared curious and careful in drawing them, and performing their exercises within them. Any sinister omen, or slight sickness that gets in among them, is sufficient to make the rest abandon their camp and officers, with as much speed as if they had suffered a total defeat. All which is owing, partly to the effeminate character of their generals, who are mostly chosen from among the eunuchs of his court, and partly to the neglect of rewarding and promoting the most deserving, and encouraging military discipline. Bribery and favour commonly carry the highest posts, in prejudice of courage and experience; and it is seldom seen that a man is raised to a high post merely by his merit, than which nothing can be more discouraging and prejudicial to the soldiery; so that we need not wonder at their being degenerated into such arrant undisciplined cowards, that the Chovas, not daring to put any confidence either in their numbers, or in the conduct and valour of their officers, have been glad sometimes to beg the assistance of the Europeans, against an enemy inferior to them both in number and strength (G).

As to their naval force, it chiefly consists in a vast number of flat-bottom barks and vessels of various sizes; fit only to sail along these coasts, but altogether unfit to venture far on those boisterous seas, or on any long voyages. The largest of these vessels have no other artillery than a single four-pounder mounted on the fore-part: they have no masts, or at the best but one, which they are obliged to take down as often as the wind is against them, or proves a little more boisterous than usual, and have recourse to their oars, which are commonly from 16 to 24. The soldiers are they which row the vessels, and are quite naked, except a piece of black cloth which goes round their middle, and is brought up between their thighs. To be short, those vessels seem rather designed for state than service, except those which transport the soldiers from place to place. These are indeed commonly from 50 to 70 feet in length, and from 10 or 12 in breadth, and their head and stern about the same height, that is, some yards above water; whereas the middle is hardly above two feet and a half above it. They want for neither ornaments of lacquer, carving, or painting, and appear very graceful as they move on they water. The rowers work standing, and keep an exact time with each other; there being always one placed on the deck, who strikes upon a small gong or bell, or on a wooden instrument, before every stroke of the oar.

How laid up.

THE soldiers who are transported in these vessels, are usually armed with bows, swords, and lances; and when they go upon any considerable expedition, are divided into squadrons, each distinguished by their respective colours (H). When they have ended their expedition, the vessels are immediately dragged on shore, and put up in houses built for that purpose, where they are kept clean and dry. These houses stand about 50 or 60 paces from the river-side; and when the galleys are brought into them, they have a strong rope twisted round the stern

(G) As a pregnant proof of what we said, concerning the small confidence these Chova's place in their numerous soldiery, and other like martial advantages; we shall here insert part of a letter, which one of them wrote to the governor of the Dutch East-India company, Anno 1647, at which time he was at war with the inhabitants of Kuwinam, a nation not far distant from their kingdom. It was ushered in with this pompous preamble, I have under my command 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, 2000 elephants, 30,000 fire-locks, and 1000 pieces of ordnance. But, after all, this vain boasting concluded with begging of that illustrious company the assistance of 200 of their men, and three of their ships, to enable him to make head against his powerful enemy (13).

(H) Dampier describes one of these Tongquing fleets which he saw on the river Cackao, and consisted of sixty galleys, each carrying from 16 to 40 soldiers well armed. Their general, named Ungee Comei, was a Mandarin, appointed by a Chova protector of the English factory, and inspector of their traffick. He bore the character of a generous man, and had two other officers under him, each in a separate vessel. They had all their separate flags of distinction, the first yellow, the second blue, the third red or green. They were sent upon some notable expedition up the river, towards the mountains; which proving unsuccessful, occasioned the disgrace of that general (14).

a of the vessel, and both ends stretched along on each side. Three or four hundred soldiers stand ready with it in their hand; and no sooner hear the signal given by the gong, than they drag it with all their might, and quickly get it into his place; after which they return to their land service^b.

THE soldiery is dispersed, not only through all the sea-ports, but into inland towns and villages, where they keep a constant watch over all that passes in them, in order to keep all quiet under their inspection. The same they do on all the roads, so that no stranger can pass without strict examination, and being sent to the governor under a strong guard, unless they can give a very good account of themselves^c. This vigilance hath been more strictly observed, since the extirpation of the jesuits and their religion, throughout the Tonquinese dominions, about the year 1721. It had been at first planted in this kingdom near 100 years before, as we have lately shewn; and propagated, if we may credit these missionaries, with such surprising success, that the government became on many accounts jealous of its progress, and thought it expedient to banish them to Ma-kau, anno 1610; and to forbid them, and all others of that society, ever to return into the kingdom under pain of death. This severe edict did not deter that zealous fraternity from sending a fresh supply thither, under several disguises, who met with a joyful welcome from their converts, but a most severe one from the Chova, who caused a strict search to be made after them; and of those who were discovered, some of them were put to death, and others left to rot in loathsome goals, loaden with irons, and destitute of all help. At the same time orders were sent to have all the roads and avenues strictly guarded, and every stranger to be carefully examined; and, upon the least suspicious appearance of their being christian missionaries, to be immediately sent under a strong guard to the governor of the province, and by him to the king, if found guilty, in order to be there sentenced to death, and publicly executed. These orders were so exactly observed, accordingly, that of six of these missionaries, who ventured again into the kingdom, by several ways and in disguises, four of them were apprehended by the guards of the roads before they had penetrated far into the country, and after nine severe imprisonments, were all four beheaded on the same day and place, on the 12th of January, anno 1737^d. What befel the other two we do not learn, nor whether any fresh ones have been sent thither since that time; but it is likely that their ill success, through the extraordinary vigilance of the government, hath cooled their zeal for a while from any further attempt of that nature, unless some commotions or civil wars have happened during that interval, which, by occasioning a slackness in the guards, have given them a fresh invitation.

BUT to return to the soldiery, they are the chief watchmen in towns and villages, and more especially in the metropolis, and belong either to the governor or some magistrate; which makes them commonly insolent, and abusive to the people, under pretence of keeping the peace. Their night-weapons are long staves; which they handle with such dexterity, aiming still either at the thigh or leg of their opposers, that they break the bones at one stroke, if they attempt either to resist, or run away. Every street hath a thick rope fastened across, and about breast-high, and a pair of stocks, to which they fasten all refractory persons who walk through them at undue hours, and on the next morning carry them before a magistrate, who, right or wrong, will acquit the soldier, and condemn the prisoner to some small fine, or a bastonade if he cannot pay the fine, which commonly sinks into the judge's pocket. To complain of injustice would only bring on a severer punishment; so that patience in such cases, is the only safe remedy^e.

If any difference or quarrel happens to rise so high as to be brought before a magistrate, they have a singular way of terminating it, by condemning the offender to treat the injured person with a quantity of arrack and a fowl, or a small porker, that their feasting merrily together may drown all animosity in the good liquor, and make them good friends again. But if the dispute be about a debt, they often condemn the poor insolvent to a severer punishment, by delivering him up to the creditor's mercy, who detains him under the greatest hardships, of labour, hunger, beating, &c. till the debt is paid. In cases of misdemeanour, the offender is condemned either to wear a heavy clog chained to his leg, or the wooden kanghe^f, or collar about his neck, for a certain time, or undergo a bastonade according to the nature of the crime (I). The bastonade here is given on the bare buttocks, the offender lying flat upon his

(I) They have still another kind of kanghe, or as they call it gongo, besides that which we shall describe in our history of China (15); which is a kind of ladder made of bamboes about ten or twelve feet long,

his face on the ground, with his breeches drawn down over his hams. The number of strokes is more or less according to the nature of the offence, or the discretion of the magistrate, but the violence of it is often mitigated by a bribe timely applied, either to him or to the executioner. Theft is not deemed capital among them, but, according to the nature of it, is punished with the amputation of a joint, if a small one, or of a whole limb if considerable, or attended with any aggravation. The last corporal punishment worth mentioning, is that of those who are suspected to have set fire to houses, either wilfully or through negligence; and as it is very difficult for the master of the house where the fire happens, to clear himself of being guilty of it in one sense or the other; he is condemned to be exalted in a chair 12 or 14 feet high, reared up before the place where the burned house stood, with his head bare in the scorching sun three or more days, as the offence is thought to be owing to wilfulness or neglect^e.

WE have already observed, that sentence on a capital delinquent cannot be executed, till it hath been ratified by the Chova. Murder is punished with beheading; and as they have here no set places of execution, as soon as the criminal's condemnation is confirmed, he is led either to the place where the fact was committed, or else before his own house, and seated upon the ground with his face towards it, and his legs stretched out at full length. The executioner comes behind him with a naked scymetar, and with a back stroke severs his head at one blow from his body, with such dexterity that it falls plumb into his lap, whilst his body falls backwards on the ground. If there are more criminals than one, each hath his own executioner, who go first to the prison, and view the person whom they are to behead. When they are come to the place appointed, each of them stands behind his criminal, whilst the Chova's ratification is read to them; soon after which the signal being made by the presiding Mandarin, the strokes are given all at once; and the bodies are left exposed to the public view, till some charitable person thinks fit to bury them. This was at least the manner in which the four jesuits, lately mentioned, were beheaded before a numerous concourse of converts and others^b.

How adultery is punished among them we have already shewnⁱ; we do not find that they have any of those cruel punishments which are practised in some parts of India, and especially among the Chinese^k; and are so far from obliging criminals to dispatch themselves, that a good round bribe, properly applied, often procures the greatest offender either an indemnity, or a mitigation of punishment; so that few, except the poorer sort, are ever condemned to a capital one^l. The truth is, that all those civil officers, as well as those of the military kind, are chosen from among the eunuchs of the Chova's court, and are all so greedy of gain, that there is no extortion nor corruption they will not stoop to, for the sake of it. And there is hardly a governor, judge, or magistrate, but what must be of that class, to attain any post, either in the army or government. Insomuch that many an ambitious man hath been forced to submit to the loss of his virility, in order to raise himself in the one or the other, though they had wives and children of their own; and were so far advanced in years, as to make such an operation appear of the utmost hazard, both to their own lives, and the welfare of their family (K). From which one may reasonably infer, that nothing less than an unconquerable ambition or avarice would induce them to procure preferment at so dear a rate. So that we need not to marvel at the horrid extortions or injustice they exercise on the people, when they have once obtained it^m.

THERE is still a more crying abuse in vogue among the mandarin and magistracy, by which they screen themselves from being called to an account for their ill practices. It hath been an old custom in this kingdom to adopt children of either sex into rich families; and

These two kinds of collars are indeed but a slight punishment, if worn only some few hours, or a whole day; but becomes almost intolerable, when the offender is condemned to wear them a month or two, or even longer; especially if, instead of being permitted to go abroad where they will, as some are permitted to do, they are confined in a goal, kept to short allowance, and often cruelly bastonaded, as is frequently the case (16).

(K) But here we must observe to our readers by-the-by, that however dangerous and dreadful castration at such an advanced age may appear to us in this cold climate, it hath been so long in vogue amongst them, as being the only way to preferment, that the operators are become very dextrous in it, and can perform it on persons of all ages and constitutions, without such ill consequences to them. They are indeed extremely careful to conceal their method from the rest of the world, and especially from strangers; but one caution used by them our author hath discovered (17), which we may justly wonder was never introduced amongst us, in the practice of surgery, especially in cases of amputations, cutting for the stone, and such-like. Which is, that they never attempt to perform theirs, till they have laid their patient into a profound sleep by a proper dose of opium; which freeing him at once both from the dread and anguish which otherwise attends the operation, and allowing nature a good many hours repose after it, prevents those fevers, inflammations, and other ill consequences, which commonly follow those that are practised among us, and by that means procures him an easier and more speedy cure.

(17) Dampier, suppl. p. 81, & seq.

- a these, when once adopted, have a right to inherit equal to that of natural children. But this hath been so far abused in time, that these griping magistrates make it their first business, when raised to an office, to get themselves adopted at any rate, by some favourite grandee of the kingdom, by whom they are sure to be so well protected, that no one hardly dares to prefer any complaint against them, let their conduct give ever so much occasion for it. And this it is that enables them to live splendidly, as well as securely, on the plunder of the people. The only danger is lest their protector die, or should be disgraced at court, for then they commonly follow his fate; all their misconduct is brought to light, and their punishment is sure to fall the heavier upon them for having been so long suppressed^a. Baron tells us, that he obtained, by a considerable sum, the favour of being adopted by the eldest son of the Chova;
- b which however proved of no service to him, that young prince being soon after deprived of his reason by a malignant fever^b.

ONE mean motive why all the court preferments are chiefly bestowed on eunuchs, is because the king becomes heir of all their ill-gotten wealth after their death; there being but little money in the kingdom, but falls into the claws of those harpies; so that they are in some sense no better than sponges to him, by whose means he gets it all in time into his own coffers, leaving only such small part, as he thinks fit to be distributed among their relations^c. On this account it is, that they are suffered to bear such an extraordinary sway at court, that the palace gates are open at all hours to them. They are the persons who present all the requests and petitions from the inferior ministers to the Chova, and answer them in his name; after they have represented the case more or less favourably to him, according as they have been, or expected to be, well paid for their good offices. They are the persons who are usually sent upon public embassies, or employed in private negotiations; and in a word, who ingross the king's confidence, and all the means of amassing wealth by the oppression of the people, and are the most hated and dreaded by them^d. Yet in spite of this general depravity, their history furnishes us with instances of some of them, who have possessed the highest posts both civil and military; and in both have given the greatest marks of consummate bravery, wisdom, and integrity, and whose virtues are revered to this day. But these have been so few and scarce, in comparison to those of the opposite character, that their memory seems only to be preserved to render the vices and oppressions of these more hateful and detested; especially considering d with what heavy taxes the common people are already laden by their arbitrary prince, and how cruelly those are treated who have it not in their power to pay him.

EVERY subject above the age of 18, is obliged to pay the Chova a kind of land-tax, greater or less according to his circumstances, and the fertility of his lands; from which, however, all the princes of the royal blood, all the civil and military officers, and the Literati are exempt; so that the whole burden falls upon the labouring part. This tax is commonly paid in kind twice a year, or soon after the two harvests; and even where the land chances to be naturally barren, the unhappy inhabitants are not exempt from furnishing a certain quantity of grass or herbage for the nourishment of the king's elephants and horses, as well as those of his cavalry; all which his subjects are obliged to convey to the royal magazines at Chacaw, let their dwelling be at ever so great distance from that capital. Over and above this, they are bound to a yearly veckan or average, which consists in mending the highways, repairing the ramparts of towns and fortresses, the royal palaces, and other public structures; even the tradesmen and artificer are obliged to bear their share in these public works, which lasts six months in the year, either in person, or by hiring a substitute; and all this without any other salary than their bare maintenance, and sometimes even without that; it being wholly in the Chova's option either to grant or refuse it to them. Such is the excessive power of those usurpers, and such the miserable thralldom of their vassals; whilst their Bova's or natural princes are condemned to an obscure and inactive confinement, with the bare shadow of the royal dignity^e. Every governor of a province, and every Mandarin, magistrate, and officer of the kingdom, is obliged once a year to renew their oath of allegiance to the Chova, in a most public manner. This ceremony is performed by cutting the throat of a fowl, and receiving the blood in a basin that is filled with arrack. This done, every one in their turn having repeated aloud his profession of loyalty, drinks a small glass full of the arrack; and this, among them, is esteemed one of the most solemn and obligatory ceremonies, by which they can bind themselves; and is for that reason frequently used upon divers other occasions, either of a public or private nature; and even the females must submit to it, whenever their fidelity becomes suspected by their husbands: but whether with the same efficacy that the waters of jealousy had among the Jews, we will not affirm^f.

king.*

UPON the demise of the Chova, all the chief officers and ministers of state repair to the royal palace, where they array his successor in a Chinse habit, mount him upon an elephant richly caparisoned, and bring him into one of the public courts, where they have erected a throne under a stately pavilion, and having placed him upon it, fall prostrate upon their faces, and pay their first homage to him; which done, they stand up, and, with their uplifted hands and arms, promise to be faithful to him, till death. In return to which, the new king causes a certain number of wedges of gold and silver to be distributed to them, according to their respective ranks; upon which he is solemnly proclaimed by the fire of the artillery, the found of the drums, and other acclamations. Thirty thousand horse and foot are drawn up in the neighbouring plain, to which he is conveyed in a rich palanquin, carried by eight military Mandarins, and eight lords of the council; the grand chancellor riding before him in state, attended by the general and other officers richly mounted; and after having received the usual acclamations, is thence conducted to his predecessor's apartment. Here every one retires for a while, to make way for the princesses of the blood and other ladies, who come to congratulate him and kiss his hands. As soon as they are retired, the nobility returns, and the rest of the day is spent in banqueting, music, and dancing. On the next day the soldiery is drawn up as before in the same plain, to which the king is carried by the same noble officers, and with the same retinue; and as soon as he is arrived, he mounts one of his large elephants of war, and rides to the center of the army, where all the officers come to take the oaths to him, and are likewise presented with some ingots of gold and silver, and other largesses, according to their rank; the meanest soldiers having a month's pay given to them, and the subalterns in proportion. After the usual shouts and firing of the musquetry, the king retires to a wooden palace reared for the purpose, finely gilt and painted, where the rest of the day is spent in feasting, fire-works, and other diversions, himself beholding them from the balcony on the top. On the following day, the same retinue carry him, with the same state, to his throne in the center of the camp; soon after which the soldiers set fire to the wooden structure, whilst he is rewarding those who have assisted or borne a part in the rejoicings. Two commissioners appointed, the one by the merchants, and the other by the handicrafts of the kingdom, address him with a loyal congratulatory speech; who are also presented with 50 wedges of gold and 100 of silver. The rest of the festivity, which lasts in all about a week, is adjourned to his capital, to which he is re-conducted as before. Hither the deputies of the provinces repair in their turns, and with the usual homages; to whom, among other royal favours, he notifies a free remission of all taxes for one year; excepting only to such, as have been formerly guilty of rebelling against any of his predecessors, to whom he remits only one half year. He likewise engages to pay one half of his subjects debts, provided the creditors will compound with his president of the council for the other half; which is generally complied with^a.

*Rich attire.
Homages.*

WE omit, for the sake of brevity, several other superstitious customs, the hecatombs of various kinds of victims, and other delicious esculents, which are daily offered during the festivity; one half of which is given to the hungry priests, and the rest to the indigent laity; the juggling tricks and auguries by which they flatter him with a long and prosperous reign, and many more of the like heathenish nature, which are observed on these occasions by those new monarchs, to give our readers a brief account of the funeral honours they pay to the deceased one. And in this respect, one shall hardly find a nation in the world that equals them in profusion and magnificence. It would take up more pages, than in a work like this we can allow it lines, to describe one half of the length, variety, and grandeur which are observed, not only by the new king and his whole court, but by all his subjects without exception, in every part of the kingdom. We shall therefore content ourselves with mentioning some of the most remarkable, striking, and proper to give them a general idea of the rest; as the embalming the body with the most costly gums, arraying it in the most sumptuous attire, and exposing it to view in a rich room of state, during the space of 65 days, to receive the funeral homages of his whole court, officers of provinces both civil and military; and lastly of the rest of his subjects, to whom access is equally permitted during the space of 100 days more; and the serving him every day with variety of meats, in the same manner as when he was alive, during the whole time; which, when taken away, are given to the priests and the poor; and the suspending all rejoicings during the whole time, excepting only those of the new king's inauguration. These are some of the mournful ceremonies preceding his interment; all which are performed with the utmost decency and splendor; the generalissimo having from the first day after the king's demise settled the whole ceremonial, and prescribed to every Mandarin and officer their several mournings, and times of waiting and respective duties.

a THREE large bells, hung in one of the towers of the palace, keep tolling incessantly night and day; and all the regal insignia of the deepest mourning are every-where displayed. The king himself, and all his nobles, after his inauguration is over, appearing in a coarse cotton habit of a purple colour, and with straw bonnets on their heads, attended with the royal family of both sexes; the ladies in white silks, and the lords much in the same dress with the king, repair often in a day to the room of state to pay their mournful devours to the corps, by deep prostrations, burning of perfumes, and other tokens of respectful grief. All this while the roads and lines, through which the funeral procession is to pass, are preparing, from the palace to the dock where the royal galley rides, which is to receive his body, which is about two days journey, and are lined on both sides with purple calico, which, when the ceremony is over, is given to the Ponzas. Mourning.

b THE king, the princes, and princesses of the blood, and all the nobles, Mandarins, and officers civil and military, in the dress above-mentioned, attend the funeral procession on foot all the way, which lasts 17 days, in the following order. Two ushers of the bed-chamber proceed with their maces, and proclaim the king's titles all the way. Next follow 12 chief officers of the galley which is to receive the corpse. Then come the officers of the court, each according to their rank, preceded by the master of the horse. Next to them come twelve of the king's horses, their bridles, saddles, and other furniture, adorned with the richest embroidery of gold and silver, each led by two court pages. These are followed by twelve elephants, the four first carrying each a standard-bearer, with their colours displayed; the four next have towers on their backs; on each of them are placed a number of musketeers, armed with their fire-locks and accoutrements; the four last, which are those which the deceased king used to ride on when he went to war, carry each a different cage, such as he used to sit in, one with glass windows, another like a lattice, and all of them with different roofs exquisitely wrought. Then came the eight stags which draw the royal hearse, each led by an officer of the king's guards. The new king marches next with his brother, if he hath one, surrounded by a band of musicians; and followed by six princesses, carrying various meats and drinks for the deceased, and attended each by two ladies, and another band of music. Next follow the four governors of the provinces, with staves on their shoulders, to which hangs a bag of gold, and another with rich perfumes, which are the presents of these provinces to their deceased king, and are to serve him in the next world. Next come two large chariots drawn by eight horses, and led by eight men, in which are coffers full of gold and silver, and other valuables for the same end. The whole is closed up with the rest of the king's officers, and multitudes of his subjects. Procession.

c WE omit the many superstitions and other ceremonies, that are performed every day, and at every station of their march. When the procession is arrived at the dock, it is conveyed with a mournful pomp into the galley, attended by the twelve officers above-mentioned. Immediately after which the whole procession returns back, whilst the vessel is drawn up the river a considerable way, till it comes to a desert country, where the body is taken out, and conveyed into some place by only six faithful eunuchs, who have the care of interring it, and are sworn never to discover the place where it is deposited. We are told farther, that besides the gold and other supposed necessities above-mentioned, some nobles and courtiers of both sexes used to be interred with him, in order to attend him in the other world. Which inhuman custom, though still practised in other parts, hath been a long while set aside in this kingdom. Grave in a desert unknown.

d FATHER Marini, who hath given the public a long description of the funeral obsequies of king Ta-tha-ty-tuong, who died anno 1675, adds many other curious circumstances which attended his interment, besides those we have mentioned above^w; particularly some stately pageants which preceded the procession, a sketch of which the reader may see in the margin (M). He describes the royal galley as most sumptuously gilt, the sails and streamers of cloth Some farther account from Marini.

(M) The first thing, he says, that was seen coming out of the royal palace, was a square column 60 spans high, and six in diameter, seated on a pedestal, and drawn by men, upon wheels, so artfully disposed that the machine kept still upright, as if it had been fixed on the ground, never leaning either on the one side or other all the way it went. The body of the column was covered with a rich silk, on which were read, in gold and silver characters, the names, age, actions, &c. of the deceased.

This was followed by another machine or large car, upon which was carved in relieve a city, with all the walls, bulwarks, and other fortifications; the greatest part of it finely gilt.

The third was another car, equally sumptuous, on which stood a magnificent throne, the chief materials of which were of gold and ivory, and on it were reposed the regalia of the dead king. These were attended by bands of musicians, who played a mournful march upon a great variety of instruments, and instead of songs filled the air with cries and sighs: after whom followed the funeral procession above-mentioned. He adds, that only three of the chief eunuchs were intrusted with the place of his interment, and that they bound themselves by the most solemn oaths that no one besides should ever know it (20). But as it is almost incredible, that three, or even six of these noble eunuchs, should be able to transport the corpse, with all its other riches, cloth of gold; and adds, that when the corpse was conveyed into it, by the sound of all the musical instruments, and fire of the artillery and small arms which attended it, the new king and all the royal family stood with their feet in the river above their ankles, and did not retire till the galley was got out of sight; upon which account the rowers were ordered by the captain to row with all their might, till they had lost sight of them: after which they slackened their oars, and proceeded more leisurely up the river.

Attended with a magnificent instance of filial piety.

THESE obsequies, magnificent as they were, being little more than what was performed by his predecessors, appeared too inconsiderable to the new king to shew the filial respect he bore to his father, unless he erected some trophy to his memory, which should outdo all those that had gone before him. To this purpose he chose a small island on the river, about three miles long, and six or seven in compass, on which he caused the representation of a new city, and two stately palaces, to be reared upon the sand, adorned with variety of trophies, and four superb gates, pointing to the four points. An innumerable multitude of volunteers were employed in the work, till the end of December following, that is, near six months. The gates, walls, towers, trophies, statues, and other ornaments, were made of the richest materials, and adorned with the representation of the actions of the late king. The palaces, thrones, beds, and other furniture, were still more stately and superb. Other embellishments, which are too numerous to be particularly mentioned, though all of them answerable to the grand design (N), we willingly omit to come at the catastrophe of it, which was answerable to, and plainly shews, the reigning superstitious notion of these people concerning the state of the dead in the other world.

Ceremony of consecrating it for him in the other world.

On the 29th of the month, accordingly, when every thing was ready for the grand ceremony, and the new city every-where filled with a sufficient number of men, to perform their stated part within it, 30,000 armed men marched towards it in the dead of night, clad in mourning, and invested the place on the four sides; and on the next morning, the king, queen, and royal family, attended by a numerous court, appeared at the head of a guard of 4000 men, with silver hilted swords, and approached towards the principal tower, and knocked at the gates; upon which a youth began in a mournful tune to sing a song, as if directed to the master of the tower, supposed to be in it, and within the hearing of him, to the following purport. There is a report that a certain mighty monarch, who had lately left this world to go and enjoy the immortality of the other, was become a mere solitary and forlorn person in a strange country, without guards, soldiers, horses, or elephants to defend him, without a palace to live in, or equipage to support his royalty: that the renown of this magnificent edifice had brought them thither, and that if he would agree to part with it to him, they were ready to grant whatever he should ask.

THE song being ended, the supposed master within the tower made answer, that the city having been built for the great king he spoke of, he consented that it should be sold to him, provided the other three that dwelt with him in it, did agree to it. Upon which the king's three brothers went to the other three gates, and performed the same ceremony; which being ended, the town was delivered up to the king, who marched immediately to the royal palace, and was saluted by a discharge of the whole artillery, and attended thither by his whole court. Being arrived at the great hall of obsequies, he heard upon his bended knees the acts of his deceased father read to him, as did also his brothers, and others of the royal blood; 4000 Mandarins of his retinue remaining prostrate all the while upon their faces. The ceremony was closed by the sound of a great variety of instruments; during which the ambassadors of three of his tributaries, came to pay their compliments of condolence, and to offer the usual presents of gold, silver, perfumes, &c. to the deceased.

from the galley into the desert, in order to convey it thus privately into the ground; it is most likely that they take a sufficient number of slaves to perform that office, whom they quickly after cause to be put to death.

(N) To give our reader a notion of these structures, which on the inside were only supported by beams and rafters, but without were covered with variety of the richest silks and stuffs, and adorned with the most curious representations of armies, horses, elephants, battles, &c. of most exquisite workmanship, and gold, silver, and other rich materials, we shall only instance in one of the principal columns, which adorned this mock city, on the south side of it. It was of an extraordinary height and bigness, and stood upon a stately pedestal, of a proportionable size, covered with plated gold, finely wrought. On the top of the column were fixed three large globes of the same metal, placed one over the other, and curiously burnished and wrought: the column itself was covered all over with cloth of gold, adorned with great variety of figures, and other embellishments of massive gold and silver, and characters pierced through, which recorded the most glorious actions of the deceased. On the sides of it, stood the figures of two giants of a large size, each holding a bow and arrows in his hand. About the middle of the city were placed 21 towers, made much in the same manner as the columns, and of the same rich materials; one of which stood after the center of all the rest, and was the most beautiful and elegant, both for its height, and fine materials and workmanship. The reader may guess by this sketch at the magnificence of the rest: those who are desirous to know more of it, may see the whole described by the author above quoted (22).

- a THE king and court returned home to their own palace; and about eight of the clock at night, the hour on which the late king died, the whole city and all its edifices were set on fire; the soldiers guarding all the avenues, lest any thing should be saved from the flames; Set on fire for that end. it being a received notion, that nothing is re-paid to the dead in the other world, but what has been reduced to ashes in this. As for the gold, silver, and other things which remained unconsumed, the king ordered one part to be given to the soldiers, and the rest to his inferior courtiers and officers. Such was the end of that stupendous piece of machinery, which is computed to have cost that monarch about a million of gold *. Which immense expence the young king put himself to, to procure his deceased father a fine well-built city, with two or three stately palaces, all enriched with the costliest and noblest insignia of royalty; and
- b all this long and pompous ceremony was performed, in order to consecrate and secure all the benefits and advantages of it to him in the other world.

We come in the last place to give our readers the best account we can find of the origin, antiquity, and history of the Tonquinese; but herein we shall be obliged to be very concise, for want of proper records; they being wholly ignorant of the art of writing, till they learned it from the Chinese four or five centuries ago, at farthest: so that whatever they have ventured to commit to writing, since they have had the use of their characters, concerning the history of former ages, appears to be no other than a heap of old uncertain traditions, intermixed with fable, which rather cast an impenetrable obscurity on the origin and antiquity of their monarchy. There is, however, no room to doubt of the antiquity of both,

e though we have no authentic records, either of theirs, or any other nation, to prove it by.

If we may indeed believe those of the Chinese (for we have already shewn that they are a different people from them^y), the Tonquinese formed a kind of republic under their own ethnarchs, such as were those of the Philistines, and other Canaanitish nations, in those early times^z; until the year 1956 after the flood, when being oppressed with a grievous famine, occasioned by a three years continued drought, they sent an embassy to the Chinese monarch, who then was styled the son of heaven, and the father of the seasons, in hopes that he would open the windows of heaven, and send them the so much desired supply of rain, to restore to their lands their pristine fertility. They had accompanied their embassy with very sumptuous presents; which, however, that monarch's uncle and prime minister rejected, together with their petition, under pretence that a nation which was tributary to the Chinese empire, and had refused to pay the usual homage of its monarchs, did not deserve that they should interest themselves in its behalf, and send them away without any audience from the emperor. But this fact is contradicted, by the annals which the Tonquinese pretend to have ever since the year of the world 3612; but of what authority is easy to judge, if they had not the use of writing till near 2000 years after.

NEITHER would we confide too much in the account which the Chinese annals give of them, or any other neighbouring nations, whom they call by no better names than Manfos or barbarians^a; and sometimes Kao-ce^b, or distorted feet, from a blemish they observe in that part, in common with most Indian nations, whose great toe seems as distended at some distance from the rest (O); an eye-sore from which themselves are wholly free. On this account, as well as some other resemblance they bear in their shapes, complexion, and customs, they are supposed by the generality of writers to be of Indian extract; but of what tribe or family of them, is hard to guess. As for themselves, they call their country Ang-nam, which signifies Eastern rest, and Tong-king, or Eastern court. They likewise affect to call their kingdom Day-viet, which in their language is equivalent to that of Day-mynh, which signifies a kingdom of brightness, and is one of those which the Chinese give to their own, exclusive of all others^c. Upon which account, most likely, they give the Tonquinese the nick-name of Xic-qui or devils^d; they being, it seems, remarkable above all other Indians for the redness of their lips, occasioned by their constant chewing of betel. However it is not improbable, that the name of Tong-king was given to this kingdom by the Chinese monarchs, when they had reduced it into a province of their empire, and had extended their conquests as far as that of Siam, which was then their chief residence†: for in that sense only could it be styled by them their Tong-king, or Eastern court, for it then lay eastward of them; whereas since they

(O) This might probably enough be occasioned by the thick wooden sandals they are forced to wear in those hot climes, to save their feet from the burning sands, and which are fastened to the foot by a single button at the end, and which is high enough to come between the great toe and that which is next to it, abandoned their conquests, and retired to their old dominions, it lies south and south-west from them. a

Their first monarchy.

HOWEVER that be, it doth not appear to have taken the form of a monarchical government, till the son or nephew of Shin-nong, the second emperor of China (P), made himself master of that country, which we may suppose was not over peopled so soon after the flood, nor sufficiently civilized to make head against his superior force.

Impatient under the yoke.

HOWEVER, this was no other than a mere reducing them from their republican, or ethnarchical government, to the yoke of a foreign prince; and so ill did they brook their subjection, that it was with the greatest difficulty and condescension to their intractable temper, that he by degrees brought them to live contented under it. He complied as much as possible with their manners, that he might bring them over to his own: he changed his own and his wives Chinese names for Tonquinese ones, and added to his own the title of Wong, or king. By these means he at length brought them to acknowledge him for their sovereign, and left the crown to his son. b

Subdued afresh.

THE succession passed in his family through a number of generations; how many we are not told; till one of the Chinese monarchs resolved to subdue it, on some disgust, under his own dominion, under pretence that it had been formerly a province of it. The army he sent against them was numerous, and commanded by 12 of his bravest and most experienced generals, whose arrival was attended by a long and bloody opposition, in which the Tonquinese fought with no less zeal for their kings, than bravery against the invaders; but were at length obliged to yield to the superior force and skill of the enemy. The 12 captains had no sooner reduced them, than they agreed to divide the kingdom into 12 provinces, and to assume each the government of them, with the title of king. c

Divided into 12 kingdoms.

THIS new divided government had not long continued in that form, before a young man, a native of one of these 12 provinces, a person of no higher rank than that of a poor shepherd, found means to overturn it, and to restore his whole country to its pristine liberty; for which signal and heroic service he was raised to the throne, by the universal vote of his countrymen, and became the worthy head of a new monarchy. This young prince had scarcely held the scepter ten years, before the Chinese monarch then reigning caused him to be assassinated, and reduced that kingdom once more under his yoke. From that time their records speak of nothing but new and frequent revolutions, for the space of several centuries d successively; one while the Chinese tyrannising over them; another while the natives bravely shaking off the yoke, driving those invaders out of their dominions, restoring their ancient form of government, living under the protection of their own princes, whom they elected from amongst their own countrymen; and as frequently, from their natural inconstancy, deposing them, and electing new ones in their room^f. This is the best account which our author could meet with in the records of those remote times; which agree so far well enough with the Chinese annals, which represent their monarchy as in a most flourishing state, and in its largest extent, during the space of 400 or 500 years before Christ; not to mention what she shall have occasion to observe hereafter, concerning the vast advantages which this monarchy had over all other nations, with respect to power, wealth, arts, sciences, &c. e

BUT if their countryman Baron may be believed, he tells us, that the first king mentioned by the Tonquinese records, was named Ding, and reigned there about 200 years before Christ; he was, according to them, raised to the supreme power by a troop of banditti. The circumstances relating to this revolution are variously related by the Tonquinese writers; but all agree that he was massacred by his subjects, on account of his insupportable tyranny. His death was followed by a long and bloody series of wars, which, had they continued much longer, would have quite ruined and depopulated the kingdom; but ended at length

(P) The Tong-kingese, we are told (23), gave that emperor the name of Tlan-nong, which in their language signifies the inventor of the plough or agriculture; which invention is ascribed by the Chinese annals to Shin-nong, the immediate successor of Fohi (24). Hence our author supposes this conquest of Tong-king to have happened in his reign; but we have formerly shewn, that even China itself could not be so populous at that early time, as to be able to want such conquests, and enlarge their dominions, so far beyond the narrow limits of their infant empire. If there be therefore any dependence on those records, we would at least put off this conquest to the reign of Shun, the ninth emperor, whom Tan took partner, and appointed his successor, in the empire, on account of his singular skill in agriculture; and who accordingly made such vast improvements in, and gave such great encouragements to it, that a feast was instituted in honour of him, and hath been observed ever since by all the Chinese emperors (25); and even this is as early as we can suppose that conquest to have happened.

a in the election of a new king, named Le-day-ban; in whose reign, the Chinese, taking advantage of the dismal state the country was reduced to, entered it with a powerful army: and this, says our authorⁱ, is the first time, that any Chinese are mentioned in their annals to have invaded their dominions. Though, from what we have lately observed, it is more than probable that they had made several descents into it long before that time. However that be, they all agree that they over-ran the whole kingdom, in the reign of the above-mentioned Le-day-ban, who being a martial prince, repulsed them with great bravery and success, and gave them several overthrows, without being able to drive them out of sundry strong-holds and passes, which they had made themselves masters of.

But after his death, the Tonquinese elected a new one, named Ly-bal-vie, an old experienced general, a man famed for his conduct and intrepid bravery; who having defeated them in several fierce engagements, had at length the fortune and glory of driving the rest out of his dominions. The crown continued in his family during five or six generations; and descended at last, for want of male heirs, on an only daughter; who, the better to secure it to herself, married a young nobleman of a considerable family, and took him partner of her throne. But the preference she shewed him, quickly raised the envy of another grandee, named Ho, who fell into open rebellion against her; and having defeated her husband in a set battle, seized upon the crown, and caused the princess and her spouse to be put to death. This horrid deed was followed by so many others of the like bloody and tyrannic nature, that he became detested by the whole nation. They unanimously resolved to rid themselves of such a monster; but not being able to cope with him, unfortunately agreed to call in the Chinese to their assistance. These readily embraced the opportunity of re-entering into Tong-king, and came accordingly with a very formidable army; which had no sooner freed them from their old yoke, than they clapped a new and heavier one upon them; and, instead of deliverers, became their lords and masters. The usurper was indeed destroyed, but the Tonquinese only exchanged one slavery for another; and were again reduced to the necessity of receiving a viceroy from their new lords, who quickly overturned their old form of government, and forced them to submit to the laws and customs of the Chinese.

It was not long however, before their natural inconstancy, and impatience under a foreign power, roused them up to an open revolt, and, at all hazards, to make a brave attempt for the recovery of their liberty, and the total extirpation of their Chinese tyrants. They accordingly appeared in arms, under the conduct of an officer of known intrepidity, named Ly, or Li, whom they chose for their head. This noble enterprise succeeded to their wish under him. He caused all the Chinese forces to be put to the sword, not exempting even the Chinese viceroy from the common massacre; whilst the emperor, his master, by the Tonquinese records, named Humveon, was wholly taken up at home with quelling the civil wars, which reigned in several parts of the empire, and in no condition to assist, much less to revenge the indignity offered to his substitute. Ly, taking the advantage of the present favourable juncture, easily forced that monarch to a disadvantageous peace, and got himself crowned and acknowledged king of Tong-king, upon the easy terms of owning himself tributary, and paying every three years a small tribute and homage to him.

This treaty, which was concluded and signed, A. D. 1200, had been for the most part inviolably observed ever since by both sides. The Tonquinese kings have ever since carefully sent an embassy every three years to the Chinese court, with the usual homage and tribute (Q). And the Chinese on their part always receive them with great pomp and ceremony, though not so much out of regard to the Tonquinese ambassadors, as to set off the splendor of their own court, and inspire them with greater awe and respect for their monarchs. It is probable, however, that these emperors have assumed a greater power over the Tonquinese, since their Chovas have made themselves absolute, by stripping their natural princes of their power; and have obliged these upstart usurpers to submit to some farther articles of submission, than the lawful sovereigns were bound to, by the treaty above-mentioned. For the Chinese emperors have for a long number of years had their ambassadors at Tong-king, who assume a much greater state and prerogative there. They never vouchsafe to visit the Chova, but oblige him to wait upon them at their own palace, upon all emergencies, and to receive their instructions from them. Another instance of subjection they have been forced to submit to, is, that their new Chova must be confirmed by the Chinese monarch, before he can exert the regal authority, and must receive the seals from thence, which he is to make use of during his reign^k.

Chinese monarchs power in Tong-king.

THESE additional prerogatives (as we may justly suppose them, seeing it is altogether a unlikely, that the brave and warlike Ly, the first of this dynasty, would have ever agreed to them, or that the emperor would have insisted upon them, at a time when the bad condition of his affairs obliged him to procure a peace at any rate, from this victorious and successful prince) may be therefore justly deemed to be of much later date than that treaty; and where can we find a more proper opportunity for such new encroachments, than that which the usurpation of the Chovas afforded them; who, to maintain themselves in it, would in all likelihood have submitted to much harder terms, to ingratiate themselves with the Chinese monarchs, and prevent their molesting them in their new dignity. But this we do not find to have been the case of the Bovas, or descendants of Ly; who, on the contrary, filled the Tonquinese throne, during two whole centuries, with great glory, and with an absolute sway, b and without any other token of foreign submission than the triennial tribute and homage above-mentioned.

THIS is all, however, that we can learn from their records in general. As to any particulars of those reigns, during the two centuries above-mentioned, they either are wholly silent about them, or their account, if any mention is made of them, is not yet come to the knowledge of any European writer; so that we are insensibly brought to the most remarkable period of the Tonquinese history; namely, that in which the whole supreme authority was wrested from the Bovas, or the descendants of Ly, and ingrossed by a new set of usurpers, who, under the title of Chova, or general, have enjoyed it uncontrouled ever since ¹.

WE have already hinted something of this remarkable revolution, when we spoke of the Tonquinese government^m; and there observed, that it was chiefly owing to the indolence and effeminacy of their princes; who, to revel the more freely in their delights, committed the whole and sole government of these and their other dominions in Kochinchina to two favourite generals, and suffered them to tyrannize over both with too uncontrouled a sway; the consequence of which was the loss of both kingdoms, quickly one after the other. That of Kochinchina, according to some authors, revolted first, as we have seen in the last chapter; and his success soon encouraged his colleague to follow his example in that of Tong-king. This last kingdom had already suffered so much from the cruel extortions of their governors, that the subjects had been long since ripe for a revolt; and a great deal of blood has been shed in some of the provinces, when a simple fisherman, named Mak, like a second Maffaniello, d encouraged by the general murmurings, found means to be chosen head of the malecontents; and having gathered a numerous army under his banner, quickly defeated the Chova, and caused himself to be proclaimed king, about A. D. 1400. He had not however long enjoyed his new dignity, before he was, like his brother at Naples, stripped of it by a new competitor named Tring; who, to give the better colour to his enterprize, gave out, that he took up arms in defence of the royal family of Ly; and accordingly caused one of the young princes of it to be proclaimed Bova, and to be publicly invested with the regal dignity. This step was the more conformable to the minds and wishes of the whole nation, as they still retained the highest veneration for their princes of that race; and who accordingly expressed the highest satisfaction and joy at the prospect of seeing an effectual end put to their civil wars and bloodshed, by the restoration of one of that noble family to the throneⁿ. e

His design however, far from being so loyal and noble, was only to give him the mere title and shadow of Bova, and to engross the whole authority in his own hands: in attempting of which he expected nothing less than an universal opposition from the whole nation. But his chief dependence was on a brother-in-law of his, named Hoa-ving, and son to the governor of the province of Tingwa, a man in great power, and who had a numerous army under his command. This old Mandarin, whether out of a real liking to the loyal measures which the artful Tring pretended to pursue; or, which is at least as likely, from some more selfish views, had not only assisted him with all the forces under his command, and thereby enabled him to proceed thus far with success; but, to shew to the world the regard he had for, and the confidence he placed in him, had given him his daughter in marriage; and at his death made him sole guardian to his only son Hoa-ving above-mentioned. This young ambitious gentleman, whom his politic brother-in-law had all along fed with the hopes that the forces lent to him by his father, were only designed to settle him on the Tonquinese throne, quickly perceived himself to be over-reached; and that Tring made no other use of them, than to secure the regal authority in his own hands, and to raise himself to the supreme dignity, of which he meant to deprive the young Bova he had lately set upon the throne. This occasioned a grievous breach between them, which did not, however, hinder the Chova from pursuing his scheme, in spite of all opposition; wherein he succeeded so well in it, that in a very little time he got himself confirmed in his usurpation by all the grandees in the kingdom. f

C H A P. I.

Description of Eastern Tartary; and account of its inhabitants.

- c WE have already laid before our readers a description of Great Tartary in general; Eastern Tar² and of the Western in particular^a. We come now to present to their view a tary. description of Eastern Tartary, with some account of the inhabitants, their manners and customs, before we enter upon the history of them: in order, pursuant to our original plan, to bring them previously acquainted with the places which were the scenes of action; as well as with the people, who were the actors.

- EASTERN Tartary, according to the limits usually assigned it by historians and geographers, ^{Extent and} is bounded on the west by Western Tartary, or rather by that part of it possessed by the proper ^{division.} Mungls and Kalkás; on the north by Siberia; on the east by that part of the oriental ocean called the Tartarian Sea; and on the south by the same sea, the kingdom of Korea, and the ^d Yellow Sea, which separates it from China. It is situated between the 137th and 161st degrees of longitude, and between the 40th and 55th degrees of latitude; being about 900 miles long from south to north, and 884 broad, from west to east; yet but thinly peopled.

THIS large region is, at present, divided into three great governments, Shin-yang or Mugden, Kirin-vla, and Tsitfika.

1. Government of Shin-yang.

THE government of Shin-yang, called by the Manchews Mugden, contains all the ancient ^{Shin-yang} Lyau-tong, named also Quan-tong; and is about 270 miles long, and 125 broad. It is bounded ^{extent.} on the south by the great wall of China and the Yellow Sea; on the east, north, and west, it is inclosed by a wooden palisade, seven or eight feet high, fitter to mark its bounds, and keep out petty robbers, than to oppose an army. The gates are no better than the rest, and guarded only by a few soldiers. The Chinese geographers having given the name of wall to this palisade, has occasioned the province of Lyau-tong to be erroneously placed by most European authors (A) hitherto, within the great wall. As the subjects of Lyau-tong were permitted neither to go out of their own country, even into China, without leave of the Mandarins, this government was reckoned very profitable. It contained likewise, formerly, several fortified places; but at present they are almost in ruins, being become useless under the Manchew emperors.

city.

THE capital of this country is Shin-yang, or Mugden; a city which is looked on by the Manchews as the metropolis of their particular nation: for this reason, since they became masters of China, they have not only adorned it with several public edifices, and stored it with magazines; but have settled here the same public tribunals with those at Pe-king, excepting that called Li pi. None but the natives are employed in these tribunals; and all their acts are written in the Manchew language. Their jurisdiction extends over all the parts of Tartary immediately subject to the emperor. Mugden is likewise the residence of a Manchew general, who has here his lieutenants general, with a considerable body of forces of the same nation. This has brought a great resort of Chineses from the other provinces, who carry on almost all the trade of Tartary.

NOT far from the gates of this city are two magnificent burying-places of the first princes of the Manchew family, now on the throne of China, who took the title of emperor from the time they began to reign in Lyau-tong. They are built according to the Chinese architecture: but what is singular, are inclosed by a thick wall with battlements, which is somewhat lower than that of the city. Several Manchew Mandarins, of all ranks, are appointed to take care of them; and, at certain set times, to perform the same ceremonies of respect, as if the princes were still alive.

INDEN is more like a village than a city, although the Manchews began there to establish their empire over China. The great-grandfather of the late emperor Kang-hi lies interred in an ordinary burying-place at Inden. The other cities of this province are of little note, being thinly peopled, ill built, and without any defence, except a mud wall; although some of them, as Ichew and King-chew, are very well situated for trade; and have plenty of cotton.

Fong-whang-ching.

THE city of Fong-whang-ching is the best, as well as most populous; and carries on a very considerable commerce; being, as it were, the key to the kingdom of Korea, and its trade; on whose borders it lies. This has drawn thither a great concourse of Chinese merchants, who have handsome houses in the suburbs. The chief merchandize is paper made of cotton, of a very strong and durable substance; but neither white nor transparent. It is used at Pe-king for fashes in palaces, and houses of fashion. The city is governed by a Manchew, with the title of Hotongta; who has under him several other Mandarins, both civil and military, of his nation. It derives its name from Fong-whang-shang, the most noted mountain in all the country, where the famous fabulous bird, called Fong-whang, is supposed to breed.

river.

THE Chinese enlarge much in speaking of the rarities found within the government of Shin-yang or Lyau-tong; but the missionaries, who surveyed this country in 1711, found nothing remarkable either in the mountains or rivers. For instance, the point of Sin-cha-bo, so much taken notice of by Chinese authors, is no more than a concourse of three ordinary rivers, which unite in this place, and under that common name discharge themselves into the sea: but this is far from being a novelty.

Soil and produce.

THE lands of this province are, for the general, very good, producing abundance of wheat, millet, roots, and cotton. They also afford pasture to great numbers of sheep and oxen, which are rarely seen in any of the provinces of China. They have, indeed, but little rice; yet, to make amends, there is plenty of apples, pears, hazel-nuts, filberds, and chesnuts, even in the forests. The eastern part, which borders on the antient country of the Manchews, and kingdom of Korea, is full of deserts and bogs. This obliged one of the emperors of the Tang family to make a causey, for twenty great French leagues together, in order to march his army into Korea. For the earth, in these parts, is so loose, that when it rains, as it frequently does, the water sinks so deep into the ground, that the sides of the hills are almost as marshy and unpassable as the plains. There are still to be seen, in some parts of this country, the ruins of towns and villages, which were destroyed in the wars between the Chineses and the Koreans.

2. Government of Kirin-ula.

THE second great government is that of Kirin-ula-botun, bounded westward by the palisade of Lyau-tong; on the east by the eastern ocean; southward by the kingdom of Korea; and on the north by the great Saghalian-ula (whose mouth is a little on this side of the 53d degree).

(A) The jesuit Martini gave occasion to this mistake, in which he was followed by Saucon, De Fer, and all the European geographers in general, till De l'Isle.

- a So that it extends, in latitude, no fewer than 12 degrees, and almost 20 in longitude (being 750 miles in length, and in breadth 600).

THIS country is but thinly peopled, and contains only four cities, which are very ill built, Kirin-ula and encompassed with no better than mud walls. The principal of them is situated on ^{city.} the river Songari, there called Kirin-ula; from whence the place takes its name; for Kirin-ula-hotun (or Khotun) signifies, the city of the river Kirin (B). Here resides the Manchew general, who has all the privileges of a viceroy; and commands the Mandarins as well as the troops.

- b THE next city, called Pedne, or Petuna, stands on the same river, 45 leagues north-west ^{Pedne, or} from Kirin-ula-hotun. It is much inferior to the former, being inhabited mostly by Tartarian ^{Petuna.} soldiers, under a lieutenant-general, and by exiles.

THE third city, which the family now reigning in China considers as its antient patrimony, ^{Ningûta. or} is situated on the Hirkapira, which runs northward into the Songari-ula. It is commonly called ^{Ningûta.} Ningûta; although its true name be Ningûnta; compounded of two Tartarian words, which signify seven chiefs; to express the rise of the Manchew kingdom. which was first established by the seven brothers of the late emperor Kang-hi's great-grandfather's father. The city, at present, is the seat of a Manchew lieutenant-general, who has jurisdiction over all the territories, both of the old and new Manchews, called also Han-bala Ta-tse, and all the villages of the Tu-pe Ta-tse, with some other nations of less note, along the sea-coasts, towards the mouth of the Saghalian-ula.

- c THE last city is Putay-ula hotun, which, although the least of the four that are in this govern- ^{Putay ula-}ment, is by far the most agreeable, as standing in a more fertile and better cultivated plain. It ^{hotun.} seems to have been built by the antient Manchews, who reigned in the north of China (called Ki-tay), in the 12th century, under the name of Kin-chau ^b; although nothing remains at present, excepting an ordinary pyramid, and the ruins of its walls; without which are the Manchew houses. It lies about eight or nine leagues (northward) from Kirin-ula-hotun, on the Songari; which being there called Pûtay-ula, gives the town its name. Verbieft the Jesuit, who accompanied the emperor Kang-hi in 1672, says, it is the finest city in all the country; and formerly the seat of the Tatar empire ^c. But in this he seems to be mistaken.

- d THE trade of Ningûnta is the more considerable, as the precious plant Jin-seng grows only ^{Soil and pro-} in these vast countries; and the Tu-pi Tatars are obliged to pay a tribute of fables. These ^{duce.} advantages draw thither a great number of Chineses from the most distant provinces; whose houses, with those belonging to the soldiers, make the suburbs at least four times larger than the city. The emperor Kang-hi took care likewise to re-people the country, by sending thither the Tatar and Chinese criminals condemned to banishment: so that the missionaries, in their progress, found villages at a good distance from Ningûnta. They make a shift to live there; and have in particular abundance of millet; with a sort of grain unknown in Europe, called by the Chineses dwelling in the country, May-se-mi; as being of a middle kind between wheat and rice. It is wholesome; and much used in those cold regions.

- e OATS, which are scarce every-where else, are here in such plenty that they are given to ^{Kinds of grain.} horses, instead of black beans, common to all the northern provinces of the Chinese empire. For all this they have but little of either wheat or rice; whether it be owing to the fault of the soil, or humour of those new inhabitants. It is hard to assign reasons, why so many countries, which lie only in the 43d, 44th, and 45th degrees of latitude; should differ so much from those of Europe, in regard to the seasons and productions of nature, as not to equal even the most northern provinces of that quarter. However, it may be presumed, says our author Regis, that the quality of any soil depends rather on its abounding more or less with nitrous particles, than on its situation.

- f THE cold begins much sooner in these parts than at Paris, whose latitude is near 50 degrees. ^{Air very cold.} On the 8th of September the missionaries, being at Tondon (C), were obliged to put on cloaths lined with sheep-skin. They were afraid also that the Saghalian-ula, though so wide and deep, would be frozen over, as indeed it was every morning a considerable distance from its banks. The cold is kept up by the forests (D) in this country, which are very thick, and large, the nearer you advance to the eastern ocean; so that the missionaries were nine days passing through one of them.

AFTER they had passed those woods, they arrived, from time to time, in fine green vallies, ^{Flowers.} watered with excellent rivulets; whose banks were enamelled with variety of flowers, common in Europe, excepting the yellow lillies, which were of a most lovely colour. In height and shape they exactly resemble our white lillies; but, like the roses, are of a much weaker scent: a the finest grow seven or eight leagues beyond the palisade of Lyau-tong.

The Jin-feng. BUT the plant which is most esteemed, and draws a great number of herbalists into these deserts, is the Jin-feng, called by the Manchews, Orbota; that is, the chief, or queen of plants. It is highly valued for its virtues in curing several diseases, and all decays of strength proceeding from excessive labour of body or mind. For this reason it has always been the principal riches of Eastern Tartary; what is found in the north of Korea being consumed in that kingdom. It sells at Pe-king for seven times its weight in silver; by which its value heretofore may be judged of^d.

FORMERLY the Chinese used to get into the Jin-feng country, among the Mandarins and soldiers, continually passing: but in 1709 the emperor Kang-bi, that his Manchews might reap b this advantage, ordered 10,000 of his soldiers, encamped without the great wall, to go and gather it, on condition that each should give him two ounces of the best, and take an equal weight of fine silver for the remainder. By which means the emperor got in that year 20,000 Chinese pounds of it, for less than one-fourth of the price it bears at Pe-king.

THIS plant grows only on the declivity of woody mountains, on the banks of deep rivers, or about steep rocks. It can neither bear much cold or heat; for it grows not beyond the 47th degree of latitude: and if a forest takes fire, it appears no more there in three or four years. It is easily distinguished from all other plants about it; and frequently by a cluster of very round and red fruit, or a stalk that shoots above the branches: such was that which the missionaries saw at the village of Honchun (D), on the borders of Korea. This plant, which was c about a foot and a half in height, had but one knob, whence shot four branches, parting equally one from another, as if they did not spring from the same plant. Each plant had five leaves; and, 'tis said, there is always that number, unless diminished by accident. The root is the only part used medicinally. Its value is enhanced by its age; for the largest and firmest are best. Those who search for it must carry neither tent, bed, nor provision, excepting a bag of dried millet; and at night lodge on the ground, under a tree, or a covering made of boughs.

Hon-chun village.

HON-CHUN, before-mentioned, two leagues from Korea, is the principal village of the Quelka Tatars, who are at present confounded with the Manchews, both in language and habitation. It is also the farthest extent of their country, which is agreeable enough; and, what is very uncommon among Tatars, well cultivated. Whether it be owing to necessity, d on account of their distance from the Manchews (the nearest of whom are 40 leagues off), or the example of the Koreans, whose very hills are cut into stories, and cultivated to the top.

Prospect of Korea.

It was a new sight to the missionaries, after they had crossed so many forests, and coasted so many frightful mountains, to find themselves on the banks of the Tumen-ula, with nothing but woods and wild beasts on one side, while the other presented to their view walled cities, with all that art and labour could produce in the best cultivated countries.

The river Tumen.

THE Tumen-ula falls into the ocean ten leagues below Hon-chun. The Koreans had built a wall on that bank, opposite to the Tatars, from whom the river divides them, almost like that of China: but the part towards Hon-chun was quite ruined, when the Manchews ravaged Korea; which they made their first conquest. In parts more remote it continues almost e intire.

River Swifond.

BEYOND the Tumen-ula, in the antient country of the Manchews, is the Swifond-pira, the most considerable river in it, and very famous among those Tatars, although it scarcely deserves notice. Here the missionaries saw the ruins of a city, called Furdan Hotun, situated in an open plain fit for tillage. It had only a slight mud-wall, defended by a shallow ditch^e.

The Yu-pi Tatars.

THE river Usuri is incomparably the finest, both for clearness and length of course. It falls into the Saghalian, and belongs to the Yu-pi Tatars, who dwell in villages along its banks. A great many large, as well as small rivers, help to augment its stream; and its waters abound with fish, which serve the natives both for food and raiment. They have a way of dressing their skins, which they dye of three or four colours; and after shaping, sew them in so delicate f a manner, that at first you would imagine they made use of silk, till, on ripping a stitch or two, you perceive an exceeding fine thong, cut out of a very thin skin.

Their dress.

THESE Tatars dress like the Manchews, in the Chinese habit, with this difference chiefly, that the bottom of their long robes is commonly bound with a green or red border, on a white or grey ground. The women also hang small pieces of brass coin, or little bells, at the bottom of their mantles, which give notice of their approach. Their hair, which parts into several tresses, falls upon their shoulders; and is braided with bits of looking-glass, rings, and other baubles, which they prize as jewels.

(D) Or Houchon. Latitude-observed, 42° 45'.

a THE manner of life among these Yu-pi is no less extraordinary. All the summer they spend Way of living. in fishing. One part of what they catch is laid up to make oil for their lamps; another serves for their daily food; and the rest, which they dry in the sun, without salting, for they have no salt, is laid up for their winter's provisions, whereof both men and cattle eat, when the rivers are frozen. For all this, the missionaries observed a great deal of strength and vigour in most of these poor people: yet the animals used for food are very scarce in their country; and their flesh of such an intolerable taste, that the very servants they brought with them, though eager for flesh, after having lived long on fish, could not endure it. The dogs in this country draw their sledges (E), when the rivers are frozen, and are highly valued.

b THE lady of Ufuri, whose husband had been chief general of this nation, and enjoyed the Use dog-sledges. prerogative of a body guard, told the Jesuits that she had an hundred dogs for her sledges. One beaten to the road goes before, which those in harness follow, without straying, to the end of the stage, where they are relieved by others from the spare pack. She assured them, that she had often ran an hundred Chinese Li (or ten French leagues) without resting. Instead of treating them with tea, which is the custom among the Chinese and other Tatars, her attendants served up little bits of sturgeon, upon a neat ratan salver.

c THIS lady, who understood Chinese, had a quite different air and manner from these Yu-pi Their manners. Tatars; who, for the rest, are in general of a peaceable disposition, but heavy, unpolished, and without any tincture of learning, or the least public religious worship; the Chinese idols themselves, not having, as yet, found their way among them. Very likely, says the good Jesuit, because the Bonzas or priests cannot take up with such a poor wretched country, where they sow neither rice nor wheat, but only a little tobacco, in a few plats of ground near each village, on the banks of the river. All the rest of the land is covered with a thick and almost impenetrable wood; from whence they are annoyed with a cloud of gnats, and such-like insects, which they are obliged to drive away with smoke.

d THERE are found in Europe almost all the kinds of fish taken in the rivers of this country; Fish, and fish- but not that quantity of sturgeon, which is the principal fishery of the Yu-pi. They say it is ing. the king of fish, and that it has no equal. They eat certain parts of it quite raw, imagining by that means to partake of all the virtues which they ascribe to it. Next to the sturgeon, they highly prize a fish, which is unknown in Europe, but one of the most delicious that can be imagined. It about the length, and almost of the shape, of a small tunny, but of a finer colour. The flesh is intirely red, which distinguishes it from other fish; and so very scarce, that the Jesuits could never meet with it above once or twice. The natives commonly spear the larger fish, and take the lesser with nets. Their barks are small, and their boats made only of the bark of trees; but so well sewed as to keep out water.

e THE language of the Yu-pi seems to be a mixture of that of the Manchews, who are their Their lan- neighbours on the west and south, and the Ke-ching Tatars, bordering on the north and east; guage. for to the chiefs of the villages, both languages were intelligible. Thus much concerning the Yu-pi Tatars, to whose country some of our geographers have given the name of a kingdom.

f THAT of the Ke-ching Tatars has no better title to the honour, although it extends along Ke-ching the Saghalian-ula, from Tondon before-mentioned, to the ocean. For in all this space of near Tatars. 150 leagues, you meet with nothing but ordinary villages, which are for the generality seated on the banks of that great river. Their language differs from that of the Manchews, who call it Fiatta; and this Fiatta tongue is also apparently that of the Tatars, who inhabit from the mouth of the Saghalian-ula, to the 55th degree of latitude; which in this part is the northern bounds of the Chinese dominions in East Tartary. They do not shave their heads, according to the custom of the empire; but wear their hair tied with a sort of ribbon, or in a bag behind. They seemed more ingenious than the Yu-pi Tatars; answered distinctly to the questions asked them by the Jesuits, concerning the geography of their country; and took great notice of their operations^f.

GERBILLON, from the information of the viceroy of the province of Solon (the same with Gerbillon's Tsi Tsi-ikar), writes that beyond the Dog-drivers, along the same river Saghalian to the ocean, mistake. there dwell a nation called Fiattú, or Fiatta, who live on fish; and that from clothing themselves with their skins, the Chinese, name Yu-pi, that is, Fish-skin. According to this account, the Dog-drivers must be a different people from the Yu-pi, and the Yu-pi, or Fiatta, the same with

^f REGIS, ubi supr. p. 247.

(E) Hence Gerbillon says, they are called by their neighbours, the Manchews, by no other name than Dog-drivers. He makes them a different nation from the Yu-pi, whom he confounds with the Fiatta (or Ke-ching). He places them before Ninguta, and says, that although they extend along the Saghalian-ula, about two hundred leagues, they are not numerous, having only here and there small hamlets, situate at the fall of some little river into that great one. This Jesuit had his information from the viceroy of the province of Solon. Du Halde, vol. ii. p. 256.

the Ke-ching; but we ought to submit to the authority of Regis, who travelled the country. ^a The former author adds, that the language of the Fiatta (F) is quite different from that of the Dog-drivers; and that both differ from the Manchews: that they understand not agriculture, and live in huts without a king or sovereign; although every community elect a chief, whom they obey, much like the Iroquois, or savages of Canada in America, whom they resemble in manners. They have canoes made of the bark of trees, or the trunks hollowed; that those inhabiting near the sea are frequently visited by boats from the islands. These lie pretty thick at the entrance of the river; which is not there above three leagues wide, but very deep everywhere, and navigable when not frozen, for vessels of good burden, up to Nip-chu (or Nerchinskoy), about 500 leagues distant ^b.

Great island. FROM these Ke-ching, the missionaries learned, that opposite to the mouth of the Saghalian-ula, there was a great island inhabited by people like themselves, with whom they traded. After this, the emperor Kang-hi sent thither some Mandarins, who surveyed the east and north sides of it, and would have measured the whole for the use of the missionaries (G); but were obliged to return, for want of provisions. They informed them, that these islanders breed neither horses nor any beasts of burthen; but that in several parts they had seen a sort of tame stags (H), which drew their sledges, and by the description were like those used in Norway. The inhabitants of the continent gave this island various names, but that generally used is Saghalian-anga-bata, or the island of the mouth of the black river.

Land of Jesso. THE missionaries heard nothing of the land of Jesso (I), which they suppose not to extend beyond the 45th degree of latitude. But according to the discoveries of the Dutch, it reaches ^c above the 50th degree: so that the north part must lie in the same parallel with the south coast of the island, just now mentioned, and perhaps three or four degrees more to the east; as it is exhibited in Mr. Kyrillow's map of the Russian empire (K). This seems to be the country, called Ye-tse by the Chinese geographers, who make it part of Eastern Tartary, and a land of vast extent, placing it about Hon-chon before-mentioned, in the northernmost borders of Korea, inhabited by a warlike nation formidable to the Japaneses; having hairy bodies, whiskers hanging down to their breasts, and their swords tied by the point behind their heads. But this is all fiction, such a people being unknown to either the Yu-pi or Ke-ching Tatars. According to the accounts of the Jesuits from Japan, confirmed by those of Captain Saris and the Dutch, it is divided from the north-east part of that island, by a strait of the sea (L). ^d

Country beyond the river. BEYOND the Saghalian-ula, there is nothing but a few villages, inhabited by the Ke-ching Tatars; the rest of the country being a wild desert, frequented only by fable-hunters. It is crossed by a famous chain of mountains, called Hin-kan-alin. Here are also some pretty good rivers. The Tu-hu-ru-pira, which falls into the eastern ocean, springs from another chain of mountains, in the 55th degree of latitude, which marks the point whence the rivers flow different ways. Thus the Udi-pira runs towards the northern sea, and belongs to the Russians; whilst the Silinsi-pira passes southward into the country of the Ke-ching Tatars ^e.

The Orochon people. AMONG the rivers which augment the Saghalian-ula on the north-side, Gerbillon mentions the Chikiri, so called by the Manchews, and Zia by the Russians. It is about half a league in breadth, near its fall into the Saghalian (M); and although the ascent to its source is said to be a journey of two months, yet the current is so rapid that you may return in fifteen days. It rises in a chain of mountains; which serve for a boundary between the two empires of China and Russia. The Manchews call the people who dwell near this river, Orochon, from an animal named Oron; a small sort of deer, which they break to draw their sledges, or carry their baggage. The author has seen some in the emperor's park; also elks, which are common in this country, and that of Solon. The fine fables, grey ermines, and black foxes, are found among the Chikiri; of whose skins the Russians took abundance, whilst they held Taksa ^f.

Han-hala Tatars. THE Tatars called Han-hala, or the three Hala families, are true Manchews, who united together after the conquest of the rest of their nation, from whom they lay at a great distance, being mixed with the Yu-pi Tatars. The emperor Kang-hi gave them lands near Ninguta, ^f

(F) Perhaps Fiatta is the indigenous name of the Ke-ching Tatars, and thence their language called the Fiatta tongue, or language of the Fiatta; for Ke-ching, as well as Yu-pi, are names given these nations by the Chinese.

(G) The Jesuits in their map, make it about 280 miles long, and 60 broad.

those parts, before the academy's map, 1745. This country, there called Jedso, is represented as an island; but Strahlenberg makes it a part of Kamchatka in Siberia; which is contrary to the fact, as appears from the discoveries of Captain Beering in 1730.

(L) The discovery and map of Spangenberg in 1739, clash greatly with those of the Dutch. See also Kamper's Voy. Japan, ch. iv. p. 64.

(M) According to the maps of Eastern Tartary, made by the missionaries, it falls into the Saghalian-ula, about 15 miles to the north of Saghalian-ula-hotun.

a along the Hürba-pira and Songari-ula; on the banks of which rivers almost all their villages are situated. Their clothing is like the Tu-pi; but they have horses and oxen, as well as good harvests, which the others want ^k.

THESE seem to be the same Manchews, dwelling along the Songari, whom, according to Gerbillon, the Russians name Diúchari; in winter they go a sable-hunting in those great forests; besides which, and mountains, there is nothing to the east of that river, called by the Russians, Singula, or Shingala. In summer they return to spend their time at home about Ningúta ^l.

b AVRIL, who travelled for information towards these countries, learned from a person who had perused the records of the Russian treasury, that there is in Bogdoy (M), a particular province, named by the Russians Diúchari, and by the Mungls, Diurski: situated between the eastern ocean and the great rivers Shingale (or Songari) and Yamúr, (or Amúr, as the Russians call the Saghalian-ula). These people, he says, had formerly no prince of their own, and were little either feared or known, till they subdued the six northern provinces of China: that these Diúchari were at length driven out by the family of Jvn (or Ywen, that is Jenghiz Khán); who, in 1368, were themselves driven out by the Chinese, of the Tay-ming family. That after this the Diúchari re-entered China in 1644, and in time subdued the whole; Shun-chi being their first prince, of the reigning family, named Tay sing, by the Chinese ^m.

c WHAT is mentioned in the above paragraph, concerning the Diúchari, can be applicable ^{The Man-} only to the Manchews, who inhabit this part of Eastern Tartary, and are lords of all the other ^{chews} inhabitants thereof, and are called by the Russians, Bogdoy (N). They may pass for heathens, but what is offered to the emperor of heaven, as they express it. They pay, indeed, their ancestors a veneration mixed with superstition; and some of them, since their being in China, have embraced the idolatrous sects. But they are mostly wedded to their old religion (O), which they reverence as the basis of their empire, and the source of their prosperity ⁿ.

d IN all the province of Bogdoy (says Avril) you meet with none but houses of earth; the Shape and inhabitants drive a great trade in fables and black fox-skins, as well as the Jin-feng root; but ^{manners,} are not rich in cattle. Their horses too are very small, and never shod. The people exactly resemble the Krim Tatars in features, shape, and size; but are much more polite and civilized, by reason of the great correspondence they have with the Chinese. Fire-arms, though known to them, are not much in use ^o.

 ACCORDING to Bentink, the Eastern Tatars (or Manchews), whom he calls the Mungals of Their lan- the east, live mostly by husbandry, and resemble in all things the Mungals of the west, except- ^{guage.} ing that they are more civilized, and fairer; especially the female sex, among whom there are many to be found who might pass for fine women in any country ^p.

ALTHOUGH the Manchew language is as much used at the court of Pe-king, as the Chinese, and all public acts are drawn up in the one as well as the other; yet it began to decline, and would probably have been lost, had not the Tatars used all precautions to preserve it, by translating Chinese books, and compiling dictionaries, under the emperor's encouragement. Their language is so singular in this respect, that the verb differs as often as the substantive governed e by it: for instance they change the verb make, as often as the substantive which follows it changes; or, which is the same thing, to every different substantive they use a different verb for make; as when they would say, make a verse make a picture, make a statue. For though the repetition of the same verb in discourse might be excusable, it is with them unpardonable in writing, as making a monstrous grating to their ears. They fell a laughing, when they heard the missionaries read books, at the frequent returns of que, qu'ils, qu'eux, who, what, him, them, &c. which quick repetitions of the same sound disgusted them. And indeed the Manchews can well be without such helps; for the bare ranging of their words answers the same end, without obscurity or ambiguity; nor have they any insipid puns or quibblings on words.

(M) So they call both Eastern Tartary and the Manchew country: but Avril distinguishes the province of Dauri from that of Bogdoy, p. 147.

(N) And the emperor of China, who is a Manchew, Bogdoy Khán, and Amulon Bogdoy Khán. Avril says, p. 146, that the Bogdoy are by the Chinese, called Eastern Tatars, and by the Monguls (or Mungls) Niuchi or Nuchi; but Niuchi, or Nyu-che, is the Chinese term.

(O) Avril, p. 148, says, to speak properly, they are of no religion; although several of them are seen to wear crosses, which they call Lamas. Hence probably it is, that he took occasion to affirm, not only that they have a great inclination to the christian religion, but even that there are not a few who are already become catholics. He adds, that they have no kindness either for the Mohammedans or Nestorians, because they formerly helped the Western Tatars to expel their ancestors (the Kin).

ness.

ANOTHER singularity of their language, is the copiousness of it. For instance; besides a names for each species of animals, they have words to express their several ages and qualities. Judagon, is the general name for a dog; but Tayba, signifies a dog who has very long and thick hair, both on his ears and tail. Yolo, a dog with a long thick muzzle and tail, large ears, and hanging lips. The horse, as more serviceable to them, has twenty times more names than the dog; almost every motion of him giving occasion to a different name. Whence they could get that astonishing multitude of names and terms, is not easy to determine (P). On the west are the Mungls; but in the two languages there are scarcely eight words alike, and those uncertain as to their origin. They understand nothing of the language of a few savage nations on the east and north. As to the Koreans, their language and letters being Chinese, have no resemblance to the Manchew.

Characters and writing.

THEY have only one sort of character, but four different ways of writing, according to the occasion, as in other countries. They commonly write with a pencil, though some use a kind of Bambú pen: but the pencil holds ink better, and moving more freely on the paper, runs most nimbly without stopping, in the hand of one of their writers. The Manchews think their language the most elegant, as well as the most copious, in the world; and imagine there is no rendering the sense of it, much less the majesty of its style, in any of the barbarous languages, meaning the European, as well as others. Yet they cannot express all sounds, as they want the letters B and D, using P and T in their stead; nor can write words in which two consonants come together, without inserting a vowel between (Q). Their transitions likewise are so few, that they are much puzzled how to connect their written discourses; and on that account, after they have written some sentences, or periods, being often at a loss how to proceed, are forced to blot out what they have done, and begin again^a. In other respects it must be allowed to be a masterly language, well cultivated, and as full of terms, perhaps, as the Arabic itself.

Ruins of cities.

In these parts are to be seen the ruins of several cities, as those of Fenegha Hotun, on the Húrba, five or six leagues from Ningúnta, now no more than a small hamlet. Odoli Hotun, on the river Lefuchi, was strongly situated, being accessible only through the waters by a narrow causeway: in it are likewise found great stair-cases of stone, with some other remains of a palace, the like not to be met with any-where else, not even at Ningúnta. Hence it is probable, that all the monuments of antiquity in Eastern Tartary were not the work of the present Manchews, but of their ancestors the Kin, in the 12th century, as before-mentioned. These built towns and palaces in several parts of their ancient country; which might fall to decay, after their dynasty was ruined by the Mungls, under Jenghíz Khán and his successors.

River Songa-

THERE is nothing more celebrated in the Manchew history than the Songari-ula, and the mountain whence it springs, called by the natives Shanyen-alin, and by the Chinese, Cbang-pe-shan, that is the ever white mountain, from whence they derive their origin, which they mix with fable and the marvellous. The truth is, that the Manchews had no river in all their territories comparable to the Songari, which abounds with fish, and is large, deep, and navigable throughout; being but moderately rapid, even at its confluence with the Saghalian-ula.

Mountain
Shanyen.

As for the mountain Shanyen, it is the highest in all Eastern Tartary, and may be seen at a vast distance. One half being woody, the other sandy, it is that which makes it appear always white, and not the snow, as the Chinese imagine; for scarce any ever remains on it. On the top are five rocks, like so many broken pyramids, exceeding high, which are continually wet with fogs and vapours, peculiar to this country. Between them lies a very deep lake, from whence the Songari takes its rise with a fine stream^r. According to Verbieft, this mountain stands about 400 miles southward of Kirin-ula^s.

3 Government of Tsisfikar.

Government.

THE third government into which Eastern Tartary is divided, is that of Tsisfikar. Gerbillon calls this province Solon, after the inhabitants; and says, the Russians name it Dawra (R)-

^a PARENIN in Du Halde, ubi supra, p. 265.

(P) In this it is like the Arabic. Bentink says, the language of the Mungals of the east (by whom he means the Manchews) is a mixture of the Chinese and ancient Mogul, which has scarce any connexion with that of the Moguls of the west. See Abu'lghazi Khán, hist. of the Turks, p. 503. Avril will have it that the language spoken in Persia; and that their characters have a great resemblance, only they write from top to bottom of the paper, like the Chinese; and have above 60 letters in their alphabet. Avril's Travels, p. 148—It may be presumed that this was the language both of the Lyau and Kin (the ancestors of the Manchews), who reigned formerly in the empire of Kitay; at which time these people, being very numerous, as well as in power, took care to cultivate and improve their language; the delicacy and copiousness of which their successors endeavour to preserve.

(Q) And, properly speaking, a vowel does come between, tho' not written; being pronounced so quick, that it seems not to be expressed, like the Hebrew She-vah.

(R) Dauri, as Avril, and Daur, as Isbrandt Ides, p. 40; but p. 54, he says, it is, by the Tatars, called Dori, and the people Dauri, or Old Dauri.

a It begins, according to him, at the confluence of the river Ergona (or Argun), and the Saghalian-ula (S) : along which latter it extends above 150 leagues (T), towards Ningúta. The governor told our author, that there were not more than 10,000 families in the whole province. The people are great hunters, dextrous archers, and pay their tribute in sable skins; each family two, or three, or more, a year, according to the number of able persons.

THIS province is inhabited by three sorts of people; the Manchews, Solons and Tagûri, The Tagûri, who were the ancient possessors. This last nation, which is not very numerous, submitted to the Manchews, under the father of the emperor Kang-hi, whose protection they implored against the Russians: for these latter, passing in armed barks out of the Saghalian-ula into the Songari-ula, secured all the rivers communicating with them, and became terrible to the b Tatarian nations dwelling on their banks. The Tagûri, who are a large and robust people, were always accustomed to sow grain, and build houses, though surrounded with Tatars, who never did either^c.

ISBRANDT IDES (who calls these people Targazi or Targazins, perhaps by some mistake) Manners and says, they are a separate independent clan or tribe, paying tribute to the emperor of China; custom. and though governed by their own chief, yet obey those who are most potent in Tartary. That ambassador met with the first huts of them, made of thin canes, soon after he came to the river Yal, about half-way from Argunskoy (on the Argun or Ergona) to Tsitfiskar. They are heathens, and, according to him, worship the devil. They are of a middling stature, and broad-faced like the Mungls. Their summer dress is of blue China callico (or Kitayka)
c and tanned leather; but in winter they wear coats made of sheep-skins. Their language differs very little from that of the Tongúz or Tunguzians (inhabiting Siberia). They cultivate chiefly barley, oats, and millet; selling to the villages of Tsitfiskar what they do not consume themselves. Their cattle are principally horses, dromedaries, bulls, cows, and sheep. These last are very fine and large, their tails being above one span thick, and two long, are all fat, and so very heavy that they cannot go fast. The Tagûri make use of oxen much, to ride on, and are very expert archers: they likewise make abundance of bows, which being esteemed the best in all Tartary, bear a great price^d.

THE Solons are originally Eastern Tatars, descended, as they say, from those who escaped
d the general destruction of their nation (by the Mungls in 120). They are more robust, brave, and skilful, than the other inhabitants of these parts. Their women ride on horseback, draw the plough, hunt stags, and other game. A great number of Solons now reside at Niêrgbi, a pretty large town, not far from Tsitfiskar and Mergben. The missionaries saw them set out from thence, the first of October 1711, to hunt sables, whose skins are highly valued by the Tatars, because they wear well and are lasting. They were clad in short jackets of wolves-skins, with a cap of the same, and their bows at their backs. They had with them e some horses laden with millet; and their long cloaks, made of fox or tigers-skins, to defend them against cold, especially of the night. Their dogs are made for the game, clamber well, and are acquainted with the wiles of the sables. Neither the severity of the winter, nor the fierceness of the tigers, can restrain them from this dangerous exercise, because all their riches depend on it. The finest skins are reserved for the emperor, who pays a fixed price. The rest bear a great rate even in the country itself, as being pretty scarce; and are immediately bought up by the Mandarins in those quarters, and the merchants of Tsitfiskar. Sable-hunting.

THERE are, besides the country town or villages, three cities (U) in the province of Tsitfiskar; namely, Tsitfiskar Mergben, and Saghalian-ula-hotun. The capital, Tsitfiskar, a new city, was built by the late emperor Kang-hi, to secure his frontiers against the Russians. It is situated near the Nonniula, a considerable river, falling into the Songari; and inclosed with a strong palisade, not very high, but lined with a pretty good rampart. The garrison consists principally of Manchews: but the inhabitants are mostly Chineses, drawn thither by traffick, or banished for crimes. The houses of both people are without the wooden wall, f which incloses little besides the courts of justice, and palace of the Manchew general. They are built of earth^w, ranged into pretty wide streets, and closed with a mud wall. This city is called Tsitfiskar, from the province of which it is the metropolis; but its proper name seems to be Naun-koton, or Nonni-koton, that is, the city of the Naun, or Nonni, the river on which it is situated: at least it went by the appellation of Naun-koton in the time of Isbrandt Or Nonni Hotun.

(S) This is to be understood only of the part belonging to China; for according to Isbrandt Ides, p. 40. it begins at Vilinskoy, to the north of the city Selinga, above eight degrees to the west of the Ergona or Argun, which part belongs to the Russians.

(T) But, according to the maps of the Jesuits, it is 740 miles long, and 600 broad.

(U) Gerbillon says, there was only one city, viz. Mergben, in his time; which must be understood of the year 1689 (or thereabouts), when he made the journey to Nipchu, or Nerchinskoy, in its neighbourhood. For in 1692, Isbrandt Ides found Tsitfiskar, or Naun-koton, in being, although but newly built.

Ides, who speaks of Tsitfiskar (or Xixigar (W) as he writes it) only as a country town or a village, a little short of that city. Naun koton according to him, is encompassed with walls of earth, but well lined and covered on the outside with maffy timber; the houses very commodious and neat.

The inhabitants.

THE inhabitants of this city, and the six southern villages, are called Doari, or Old Dauri (X), and the country Dori, by the Tatars, who dwell along the Naun and Yal, as far as Albazin, or Yakfa. They have very rich manured lands, all sorts of garden-fruit, and several plantations of tobacco, which is their chief livelihood. They by their own account are all shammaus, or conjurers, who invoke the devil with frightful cries, which the ambassador heard every night. They give their dead two burials, first leaving a hole at top of the grave, where the relations daily brings victuals, which they convey to the mouth of the deceased with a spoon, and leave drink in small tin cups, standing round the grave. This ceremony holds for several weeks; after which they bury the body deeper in the ground.

Their houses.

THEY live in houses made of earth, covered with reeds or small bambûs, somewhat like thatched cabbins in Europe. The walls within are plaistered with lime. In the middle stands a pillar, with the entrails of beasts wound about it, and by them are hung a little bow and arrows, pikes and other arms; to all these, from time to time, they bow and prostrate themselves. Their houses are neither divided into chambers, nor furnished with upper rooms; near one half of it is taken up by a bench, which runs round the walls, about an ell high, and two broad, covered with red mats. Under this bench there passes a chimney, or funnel; so that the fire being made at one side of the door, the smoke enters the funnel, and passes out at the other side. This in winter serves instead of a stove; and altho' the house is not much warmed by it (Y), yet those who sit on the bench in the day, and lie on it at night (for it serves for a bed), find benefit from it.

Abject submission.

THE natives are generally well-shaped, but especially the women; and all wear the same dress as the Manchews in China. But they live in such submission to the Mandarins sent from thence, that the secretaries of those officers seize both their wives and daughters at pleasure; and our author has frequently seen them carry off the most beautiful creatures in waggons. Some men, being obliged to send their wives after these ravishers, boast of having such a lord for their brother-in-law; while others submit to the injury, for fear of punishment, or losing some advantage^x.

Merghen city.

THE governor of Tsitfiskar has jurisdiction over the other new cities, Merghen-hotun, and Saghalian-ula-hotun. Merghen (Z) (or Merghin) lies above 40 leagues north eastward of Tsitfiskar; but is much thinner of people, and inclosed with only a single wall.

Saghalian ula city.

SAGHALIAN-ULA-HOTUN, that is, the city of the black river, stands on the south side of the river Saghalian, and is built like Tsitfiskar; is equally populous, but richer in merchandize. The lands belonging to this town, and Merghen, are but indifferent, being a sandy soil; yet those of Saghalian-ula-hotun yield good crops of wheat; they consist of a plain, extending along the river Saghalian, and containing several Manchew villages. Those few villages which are on the river belong to the city; besides several large forests, where you meet with excellent hunting for fables. Thete the Russians from Albazin or Yakfa, (A), (built a few days journey higher up the river) would have become masters of, had not that city been demolished by the treaty of Nipchu in 1689. The Tatar hunters still keep a strong guard on the frontiers, and armed barks on the Saghalian-ula. As the garrison of that fortress disturbed the sable-hunters, it occasioned a war between the two empires; but at length the fort was razed, and the country yielded to the Chineses, by the said treaty. From thence to the mouth of the Saghalian-ula in the eastern sea, are full 400 leagues, by the viceroy's reckoning, who made the voyage; and 150 to Ningûnta^z.

A strong frontier.

Ruins of Aykom.

(W) His secretary Brandt writes Suttega and Sut-tegar, and places it five miles distant. Perhaps Zizikar is the English spelling.

(X) Regis says, this city is inhabited by the three sorts of people mentioned above; and as Isbrandt Ides described the Targuzi (or Taguri) before, the inhabitants here described, under the name of Dori (or Dauri), must be the Solon; for the third sort, or Manchews, could not be in such abject subjection to the Mandarins, as he mentions lower down.

(Y) In the northern provinces of China, they make hollow places with bricks, in the form of beds, through which, from a charcoal stove, heat is conveyed by pipes terminating in a funnel or chimney; which warms all the house, as well as the bed.

(Z) This city is mentioned occasionally, both by Isbrandt Ides, and his secretary Adam Brandt; but neither speaks of Saghalia-ula-hotun. The first writes Mergeen, the latter Merghen, to express Merghin.

(A) Gerbillon says, it was called by the Russians, Albazin; and by the Tatars, Yakfa, from a little river on which it stood, where it runs into the Saghalian ula. Isbrandt Ides mentions Albuzin, p. 54. and Brandt, p. 63, says it was a strong fortress.

(B) Ten make a French league.

(C) Regis says, several at Peking gives this name to Saghalian-ula hotun; perhaps to excuse Gerbillon, who seems to do the same; for he says, the principal cities of the Manchews in Eastern Tartary, are Ula, Aykom, and Ninguta. Lu Hsi's China, &c. vol. ii. p. 256.

ming, which preceded that of the Manchews. For the Mungls, after they were expelled China by Hong-wu, having been driven beyond the river Saghalian, Aykom was built under Yong-lo, to prevent their return. However, twenty years after they rallied and destroyed it, ravaging likewise, in revenge, the northern provinces of China.

INTO the Saghalian-ula (D) fall the San-pira, Kirfin-pira, and several other rivers considerable for pearl-fishing; which is performed without much art; the fishermen only jumping into these little rivers, and taking up the first oysters they can find. They say there are no pearls in the Saghalian itself; because, as their Mandarins informed the missionaries, they durst not venture in so deep a water. They fish for them likewise in several other little rivers, which fall into the Nonni-ula and Songari (E); as the Arom, and Nemer, in the road from Tsitfikar to Mergben; but affirmed they never found any in those west of Saghalian-ula-botun, towards the Russian territories. The pearls, though much cried up by the Tatars, would be little valued by Europeans, on account of their defects in shape and colour. The emperor Kang-hi had several chaplets or strings of these pearls, each containing one hundred or more, which were very large, and exactly matched; but then they were chosen out of thousands in his possession.

THE bounds of this government to the west, and on the side of Russian Tartary, are two rivers of a moderate size; the Ergona (F) and Aygha-kerbechi. The first rises to the south, a little below the 50th degree of latitude, and joins the Saghalian-ula in four degrees of longitude east of Pe-king. The Kerbechi descends, with a shorter course, from the north, and falls into the Saghalian, a little north-west of the Ergona's mouth: from whence it is reckoned 50 leagues to Nipchu or Nerchinskoy, the first city of the Russians, almost under the meridian of Pe-king, and in $50^{\circ} 45'$ of latitude^a.

(D) This river has several names in different parts, as Onon towards the source; afterwards Shilka; by the Chinese, He-long, Kyang, or Black dragon river, and by the Russians, Amur.

Yamur (Amur, or Saghalian); and Shingale (or Songari), afford store of rubies and pearls, which the natives are continually fishing for.

CHAP. II.

The empire of the Lyau or Kitan.

THE empire of China, as appears from these abstracts of its history, transmitted to us by the jesuit missionaries, particularly Martini and Couplet, had been from very early times threatened with invasions, and its northern provinces actually ravaged, by the nations bordering on the north and west, known to the Chinese by the names of Tata, Ta-tse, Tan-yu, and the like. These became so formidable, as well as troublesome, that at length, to prevent their incursions, the famous wall was built by the emperor Tsin-shi-whang-ti, 223 years before the christian æra. But no considerable part of China was ever conquered, or held for any space of time, by either them, or any other neighbouring people, till the tenth century (A): when the Kitan, or Lyau, empire; and having joined some of the northern provinces to their other dominions, founded a new monarchy, but still resided in Lyau-tong.

THESE Ki-tan were people of Eastern Tartary, who dwelt to the north and north-east of the province of Pe-che-li in China, particularly in Lyau-tong. They are called Sye-tan, or Lyau, Si-tan, by Couplet (B), and after him by Du Halde; but by Gaubil and Guigues, Ki-tan: which seems more exact, as being most conformable to the name of their empire. In the

(A) We may except, however, the Wey, whose emperors were formerly very powerful in Tartary, and the northern provinces of China. They were Tatars of the tribe of Topa (as were the kings of Hya). They came originally from the countries to the north-east of Pe-king, between the 43d and 45th degree of latitude. They established themselves first near Tay-tong-fu, in Shan-si. Their dynasty began in the year of Christ 386, and ended in 572. There is a Chinese history of these princes, Gaubil hist. de Gentch. p. 50. note (6). This seems to be the empire of the north of China, mentioned by Couplet, under the eighth dynasty called Song.

(B) We are told Sye-tan (rather Ki-tan) was their true name; but that after they had begun to lay the foundation of their empire, they changed it to that of Lyau. Du Halde's description of China, vol. i. p. 203.

(C) It was called Kitay by the Moguls, or Mungls, and perhaps by the Kitan themselves, after their own name; by others, particularly the people west of China, Katay.

century above-mentioned, they subdued all the countries between Korea and Kásghar, besides a several northern provinces of China.

Kitay, their empire.

THIS large dominion is the famous Katay, or rather Kitay (C), hitherto so little known to Europeans, who were quite at a loss where to place it. As it was divided into two parts, with respect to the different countries which composed it, and one was much inferior in all respects to the other; that part which belonged to Tartary was, by way of distinction, called Kára-kitay (D). For the situation hereof our authors have been no less to seek, than for that of Kitay itself; which, in strict sense, contains only the northern provinces of China, subject to the Kitan, or Lyau, and their successors the Kin.

Their history imperfect.

WE are informed by Gaubil, one of the Jesuit missionaries, that the Chinese have particular histories of these two nations: but as yet nothing of them has been transmitted to us, more than what we find occasionally mentioned in the reigns of the Chinese emperors, by Couplet, and that of Jenghíz Khán, by Gaubil himself. This latter gives only a brief account of the rise and fall of their dynasties; and the former only takes notice of the wars, or other affairs of importance, which any of their kings had with the Chinese, without giving so much as a regular list of their names. However these fragments relating to the Lyau and Kin, imperfect as they come to us, are valuable in their kind; and the rather, as they serve for a proper introduction to the history of the Moguls or Mungls.

Their dominion founded.

THE empire of the Kitan began in Lyau-tong, where they had two royal seats, Tong-king and Pe-king, that is, the eastern and northern courts. The first is the same with Lyau-yang, the second with Mugden, the present capital, called by the Chinese, Shin-yang^a. These people having been formerly augmented by many colonies from Korea, began to extend their territories, and gave trouble to China more than all the other inhabitants of Tartary. Their empire is reckoned to commence from the 13th year of the 61st (E) Chinese cycle, which answers to that of Christ 916 (F), and continued the space of 117 years, under nine princes; at what time those people changing their name from Kitan to that of Lyau, laid the foundation of their government. This happened in the 4th year of Mo ti Kyun-ti, second emperor of the 14th Chinese dynasty, or race of princes, called Hew-lyang.

Called into China.
A. D. 946.

SEVENTEEN after this, in the 30th year of the cycle, Ming-tsung, second emperor of the 15th dynasty, Hew-tang, being dead, She-king-tang, his son-in-law, rebelled against his son and successor, Ming-tsung; and with an army of 50,000 men, furnished by the Lyau, made himself master of the palace, and deprived Ming-tsung of his crown and life, in the first year of his reign, and 45th of his age. His son, Fi-ti, being unable to resist the usurper, fled to the city Ghey-chew; where shutting up himself and family, with every thing he had of value, in a palace there, he set it on fire, and perished in the flames. By his death, She-king-tang became emperor, and founded the 16th dynasty of Hew-tsin, under the name of Kau-tsu. But the general of the Lyau, who had so much contributed to the advancement of Kau-tsu, refused to acknowledge him for emperor, having an inclination to assume that title himself. Hereupon Kau-tsu, in the 33d year of the cycle, to avoid a new war, purchased a peace at the expence of the honour of his country; by giving up to the Tatarian chief, in recompence of his service, 16 cities in the province of Pe-che-li, which were nearest to Lyau-tong, besides a yearly present of 300,000 pieces of silk.

A. D. 949.

Cities yielded them.

THIS donation greatly increased the power and ambition of these restless people; and was the occasion of numberless wars, which ravaged China for more than 400 years. These wars began not long after: for, in the 43d year of the cycle, two years from Kau-tsu's death, the Lyau, breaking the treaty made with that prince, invaded the empire when least expected. Tsi-vang, his nephew and successor, opposed them with an army sufficient to have repulsed them: but Lyew-chi-ywen, the general, covering his ambition with the appearance of zeal, made short marches; and, by affected delays, gave the enemy (G) time to make the emperor prisoner. Being thus dethroned, he was contented to accept of a small sovereignty; while the traitor-general seized the crown, by the name of Kau-tsu, and founded the 17th dynasty of Hew-ban^b.

They revenge China.
A. D. 96c.

MEAN time the army of Lyau-tong, finding no resistance, ravaged all the northern provinces of China, and then marched into the southern. But they were stopped by considerable bodies of troops, which opposed their passage; and occasioned their general to say,

This army was commanded by Ko-ghey, who defeated the enemy in several battles, and thereby restored peace to the northern provinces. In the mean time In-ti being slain by those eunuchs, the empress placed his brother on the throne : but Ko-ghey, returning with triumph, proclaimed him emperor, and founded the 18th dynasty, called Hew-chew.

b HOWEVER this dynasty lasted but nine years ; after which the Ta-jin, or grandees of the empire, setting aside Kong-ti, the third in succession, on account of his nonage ; enthroned in his room the Ko-lau Chau-quang-yu, who was his guardian. This prince assuming the name of Kau-tsu, founded the 19th dynasty, of the Song or Tsong ; which continued 319 years, under 18 emperors, till destroyed by the Moguls or Mungls. Although the empire began to recover itself during the reign of this monarch, who had all the qualities which the Chineses require in their emperors ; yet the Lyau continued to invade and harass the northern provinces, when the Chineses opposed them with various success^c. Tay-tsong, second emperor of the Song, earnestly desired to recover the cities which had been yielded by his predecessors to the Lyau ; but his general, Chang-tsi-byen, wisely advised him to defer his design till the empire was well established, at what time they should have more leisure and less difficulty to reduce the enemy. Tay-tsong, however, in the second year of his reign, and the 14th of the 62d cycle, marched against them, sometimes gaining, at other times losing, the advantage. At length the Lyau having laid siege to a considerable city, the Chinese general made use of the following stratagem to raise it. He detached 300 soldiers in the night, each carrying a lighted torch, with orders to approach as near as possible to the camp of the enemy : who imagining, by the number of lights, that the whole Chinese army was coming upon them, immediately fled ; and falling into the ambuscades, which Chang-tsi-byen had placed in all the passages, very few of them escaped the sword. With various success, A. D. 978.

c TAY-TSONG dying in the 34th year of the cycle, was succeeded next year by his son Ching-tsong Ching-tsong ; who hearing that the Lyau had besieged a city in the province of Pe-che-li, he came on them so suddenly with his army, that in a terror they made a shameful flight. He was advised to take advantage of their consternation, and recover the country which had been yielded to them : but instead of pursuing his victory, as if he had been defeated himself, he bought peace, by submitting to pay yearly 100,000 tael (H) and 200,000 pieces of silk. The youth and pacific disposition of Jin-tsong his successor revived the courage of the Lyau ; who, in the 11th year of his reign, and 11th of the 63d cycle, would have renewed the war, if the emperor had not bought a peace, on as shameful terms as his father had agreed to. The Lyau, more encouraged than satisfied by these pusillanimous proceedings, two years after Hyen-tsong, seventh king of Lyau-tong, sent ambassadors to demand the restitution of ten cities in the province of Pe-che-li, which had been taken by Ko-ghey, founder of the 18th dynasty. Jin-tsong, who loved peace, in order to procure it, engaged to pay the Tatar prince yearly, 200,000 taels in silver, and 300,000 pieces of silk, in lieu of those cities : and what was most shameful of all, made use of the character Na in the treaty, which signifies a pension by way of tribute. beats them, A. D. 999.

d SHIN-TSONG, the sixth emperor of the Song, who ascended the throne in the 45th year of the same cycle, had a strong desire to deliver the northern provinces from the yoke of the enemy, but was diverted by the counsel given him by his mother at her death, to sacrifice every thing to preserve peace. Neither do we find any steps taken to drive them out, by his successor Che-tsong. But Whey-tsong, eighth emperor of the Song, impatient to suffer their ravages any longer, and not being able to prevent them himself, resolved on a remedy, which at length proved worse than the disease. This was to call in the Nu-che or Nyu-che, to destroy the kingdom of the Lyau. From this he was dissuaded by the king of Korea, and most of his ministers ; but, contrary to these prudent remonstrances, in the 16th of his reign, and 34th of the 64th cycle, he entered into a league with those Eastern Tatars ; and having joined their forces, several battles were fought, in which the army of Lyau-tong was always defeated, and reduced at last to such extremity, that they who remained were obliged to quit their country, and fly for safety to the mountains of the west. Thus ended the kingdom or empire of the Lyau, which had stood in Lyau-tong 209 years^d (I). However, their monarchy was in some Lyau empire destroyed, A. D. 1069.

Western Lyan,

MEAN time Ye-lü Tache (K), prince of the Lyan, finding his house destroyed by the Nu-che, or Kin, departed from Tay-tong-fü, a city of Shan si, with a few followers; and retired to the Pe-tata (or White Tata), who encamped to the south-east of mount Altay. From thence he removed to the neighbourhood of the city Ho-cheu (ten miles to the east of Turfán, in Little Bukharia), still called Pe-ting-tü-bü-fü. There, by means of 18 hords, he was supplied with 10,000 choice men, and prepared all sorts of arms. Pe-li-ko, king of the Whey-bü (who dwelt about Turfán), let him pass through his territories. Ta-che, having vanquished all who opposed him, arrived with an inestimable booty at Sun-se-kan (which our author takes to be Kojend, on the river Sir, in Great Bukharia); the Whey-bü princes, who dwelt in those parts, advancing to give him battle, were intirely defeated. He stayed at that city 90 days, and marching westward, went to Kirman (K); where his generals proclaimed him emperor. Then returning eastward, after 20 days march, he fixed his seat at Hu-se-wa-cul-tu (M). Thus was the dominion of the Western Lyan (or Kitan) founded in the year 1124, by Ye-lü Tache; the reigns of whose successors are inserted in the Chinese history, till it was destroyed in the year 1212, by Kuchluk, prince of the Naymins^c, after it had continued 88 years.

or Kâra-kitayan.

WE find, in this narrative of the second empire of the Lyan or Kitan, two reasons to account for the Persian, and other historians of the west of Asia, calling these people Kâra-kitayans, and their country Kâra-kitay; although we cannot fix its situation with any certainty from the extracts hitherto given from them. For it has been already observed, that all the country west of Lyan-tong, as far as Kâshgar, had been conquered by the Kitan; and that part of the Kitan empire called Kitay, which belonged to Tartary, had the name of Kâra-kitay given to it; probably by the Moguls, Turks, and other inhabitants of Tartary, from whom the southern nations received it.

Kür Khân.

THE historians among the Mohammedans, Tatars, and Persians, mention two kings of Kâra-kitay, under the title of Kür Khân, or Gürkan. With regard to the first of these, we are told by Mirkond, that the Khân of Balâsagûn (N), which the Moguls call Khâm-bâlig, that is, the good town, of the posterity of Afrasiab, to defend himself against the Turkish tribes of Karluk, Kipjâk, and Kânkli, submitted both himself and his city to Gürkhân, king of the Kâra-kitayans (O); who changing his name from Illuk Khân, gave him that of Illuk Turkmân. After this, in the year 536 of the Hejrab, he conquered Kâshgar, Khoten, Bishbâlig, Turkestan, and Mawarâ'nâbr (or Great Bukharia). Upon his death he was succeeded by Kujang, who also assumed the title of Gürkhân, and reigned 81 years. The successor of Kujang was Kuchluk Khân, who subdued Kâshgar and Khoten^f.

ABU'LGHAZI KHAN speaks of only one king of Kâra-kitay, but seems to have joined the two first together. He tells you, that the inhabitants of Kâra-kitay having revolted against the emperor of Kitay, a great part of them left their country, and retired towards the Kerghis; but these latter having pillaged instead of welcomed them, they went and dwelt in the country of Atil, and built a town there. They applied themselves to cultivating the lands; and as they throve by their industry, many neighbouring people went and joined them: so that at length they were able to make up 40,000 families. About the same time the Khân of Jürjüt (P), declared war against the inhabitants of Kâra-kitay; and having defeated them, made himself master of the country. This obliged the prince of Kâra-kitay, called Nusi Taygbir Ili (Q), a prince of great merit, to retire among the Kerghis, and from thence to a town of Kitay, called Imil. This happened about the year 573.

a destroyed all his cultivated lands, sent to Nusi Tayghir Ili to desire his assistance, offering, on that condition, to resign his city to him. The offer having been accepted of, Nusi Tayghir Ili went, and taking the government into his hands, changed the name of Ilik Khân into that of Ilik Turkân; and assumed himself the title of Kavar (or Kâr) Khân, that is, Great Lord. Grosvenor. After this he conquered the cities of Andijân, Tashkent, and Turkestan; but raised the siege ^{potentat} before Samarkant, because the inhabitants obliged themselves to pay him an annual tribute. Some time after he returned to his own dominions, he sent Avîs, one of his generals, towards Urgens, the capital of Karazm, with a numerous army; which having plundered all the adjacent country, Vighîs Khân (R) was obliged to submit to a yearly tribute of 20,000 gold dinârs. This he accordingly punctually paid to Kavar Khân; but his son Mohammed coming b to succeed him (S), refused any longer to perform the agreement. This caused a war between these two potentates; and although Soltân Mohammed, whose dominions extended as far as the country of Râm (or the Greeks), had gathered all his forces; yet he was defeated by Kavar Khân, and constrained to fly for shelter to the Kankli, till he had found means to make a new agreement with his enemy ⁸.

SOME time after this (T), Kuchluk, prince of the Naymâns, having, after several defeats, ^{Præcis} been closely pursued by Jenghîz Khân (prince of the Moguls or Mungls, who had already ^{Kuchluk} subdued most of the tribes in the east parts of Tartary), fled to Turkestan, where he was received with great marks of distinction and affection by Kavar Khân; who pitying the misfortunes of this young prince, gave him his daughter in marriage, and looked on him as c his own son. Those who knew Kuchluk did not approve of this match, for he had neither good-nature nor gratitude; and notwithstanding his obligations to his father-in-law, daily excited commotions among his subjects, and even held intelligence with Soltân Mohammed Karazm Shâh, his greatest enemy. At last in 611, under some pretence of discontent, he A. D. 1214; retired from court with such as he had seduced to his party; and being joined by the eastern tribes, who had refused to acknowledge Jenghîz Khân for their sovereign, he suddenly attacked Kavar Khân (or Kurkhân), and deprived him of the better half of his dominions eastward; whilst Soltân Mohammed invaded his dominions on the west ^h.

KAVAR KHAN, detesting the ingratitude of Kuchluk, resolved first to be revenged on him; who plots and though he was far advanced in years, put himself at the head of a considerable army. Then ^{against him.} d marching against him, had vigour enough to conquer him in the country of Quakaj. After A. D. 1115; this he turned his arms against Soltân Mohammed, who had already seized on all the provinces of Turkestan bordering on Great Bukhâria and Karazm; but had not the same success as against Kuchluk, for he narrowly escaped being taken prisoner. The weakness attending that prince's great age, gave opportunity to several lords of his kingdom to form plots against him; so that his dominions fell into strange disorders, of which he could not expect to see the end. To ^{And imprisons} e complete his misfortunes, his ungrateful son-in-law returning to give him a second battle, gained ^{him.} the victory, and took him prisoner. It is true he treated him in appearance with respect, but took possession of all his kingdom and treasures; which injurious requital for his many favours, so affected the aged Kurkhân, that within two years after he died with grief. Thus termi- ^{His death.} nated the life of this great prince, who in his prosperity had assumed the title of emperor ⁱ; and in him ended the dominion of the Western Lyau, or Kâra-kitayans, which this prince had extended over one half of Great Tartary, from mount Altay (which then bounded the conquest of Jenghîz Khân), to the Caspian sea, containing the space of 40 degrees in longitude.

THE reader must rest content with this imperfect account of the Western Lyau and their empire; till the detail of their history comes transmitted to us from China, if ever that shall happen. We shall only farther observe, that these princes, according to the Persian writers, reigned at Kâshgar, before their conquest of Turkestan: for they frequently speak of the Kâra-kitay Khâns residing there, and marching from thence in their expeditions westward.

Hi-tsong.

THE empire of the Eastern Lyau, or Kitan, having been destroyed by the powerful assistance of the Nyu-che Tatars (A), as hath been before set forth, their prince grew (B) so elated with this conquest, that he assumed the title of emperor, and gave the name of Kin (C) to his new dominion. Soon after, extending his views of aggrandizing himself, he broke his treaties with the emperor of the Song, who reigned in China; and invading the provinces of Pe-che-li and Shen-si, made himself master of them, more by treachery of some malecontents, than by force of arms. Whey-tsong, in danger of losing the greater part of his dominions, made several advantageous proposals to the Tatar; who seeming to hearken to them, invited the Chinese monarch to come in person and settle the limits of the two empires. This Whey-tsong complied with, and new articles of peace were agreed on between them: but on that prince's return to his capital city, his ministers made him change his mind, telling him the treaty could not subsist, and that the most cruel war was preferable to so shameful a peace. The Kin monarch, who was informed of all which passed, had immediately recourse to arms; and, taking several cities, entered the province of Shan-si in triumph; where he once more invited the Song emperor to come and settle their limits. This unhappy prince, who dreaded nothing so much as war, was weak enough, after this new breach, to go a second time to his enemy; who on his arrival seized his person, and having stripped him of all the marks of his dignity, kept him prisoner. A faithful minister, named Li-so-shin, who accompanied the emperor, enraged at this perfidy, in the height of his fury, cut off his own lips and tongue, and then killed himself.

WHEY-TSONG died in the desert of Sba-mo (D), where he was confined under a strong guard, in the 42d year of the 64th cycle, and 54th of his age; having first nominated Kin-tsong, his eldest son, to succeed him. This prince began his reign by executing the orders of his father, in putting to death six of his ministers, who had basely betrayed him to the Kin Tatars. Mean time these latter pursued their conquests, and invaded the province of Ho-nan, passing the Whang-ho, or yellow river, without opposition. This made them wonder at the negligence of the Chinese, who with a handful of men might have prevented it. The army, being gotten over, marched directly to the imperial city, which they took and plundered: then seizing the emperor (E) and his consort, carried them away prisoners: but the principal lords, and several of the ministers, preferring death before so ignominious a bondage, slew themselves. The Kin being informed by the empress Meng, that she had been divorced, and had no hand in the management of affairs, they left her behind: which was the means of preserving the empire. For by her wisdom and conduct she got the crown placed on the head of Kau-tsong, ninth son of Whey-tsong by his divorced empress, in the 44th year of the cycle.

KAU-TSONG fixed his court at Nan-king, capital of Kyang-nan; but soon after was obliged to remove it to Hang-chew (F) in Che-kyang. Although of a peaceful disposition, yet he gained some victories over both the Kin and his own rebellious subjects; who took advantage of the present troubles to plunder the provinces. Kong-ye, who commanded his forces, had several times repulsed the Kin, but could recover none of the conquered countries.

HI-TSONG (G), the Kin monarch, to gain the love of his new subjects, shewed his esteem for learning and learned men. He likewise visited the hall of Kong-fu-tse, or Konfusius; and, in imitation of the Chinese, paid him regal honours; saying to his courtiers, who thought

(A) Or Nu-che and Nyu-chin. They are likewise commonly called Eastern Tatars, although the Lyau had as much right to be so called as they.

(B) Gaubil informs us that his name was Ogota or Aguta; and says, the first year of his empire was that of Christ, 1115. Hist. de Gentch. p. 87. note (1).

(C) Kin signifies gold; whence the Moguls, translating the word into their own language, gave the emperor of this dynasty the name of Altun Khân; that is, the king of gold, or the golden king.

(D) A vast desert, which extends from south-west to north-east, through that part of Tartary which lies to the north of China. It is called by the Mungls the Great Kobi or desert. It is described in the next chapter.

(E) He died in Tartary, 30 years after.

(F) This is the famous city called by Marco Polo, Quinsay, capital of Manji; which name he gives to Southern China, or the empire of the Song.

(G) The names of the kings mentioned by Couplet, are not those used by their subjects, but Chinese; as appears from what we find in that respect relating to the last emperors of the Kin. All the Chinese names of those monarchs seem to have ended in Tsong, as did those of the contemporary Chinese emperors of the Song race. But for what reason the historians give them the same termination, we know not.

a a person of his mean parentage did not deserve so much homage, If he does not merit these honours by his birth, he merits them for the excellent doctrine which he hath taught. After this Takes Nan- he marched with his forces to Nan-king, from whence the emperor had retired, and took it: king. but receiving intelligence that Yo-si, general of the Song, was advancing by long marches to relieve that city, they set fire to the palace, and retreated northward. However Yo-si arrived time enough to fall upon their rear-guard, which suffered very much; and from that time the Kin never dared to cross the ^a Kyang (H).

A FEW years after the emperor made peace with the Kin monarch on very dishonourable conditions: for in signing the treaty he submitted to use the word Chin, that is, subject, and Kong, which signifies tributary. The Tatar, in consideration of these submissive terms, The Song trib- engaged to send the emperor the bodies of eight of his relations, who had died within so many butary. years; whose arrival he solemnized with a general pardon. In the 35th of his reign, and 18th of the 65th cycle; the Tatar king broke the peace, and invading the southern province with a formidable army, took Yang-chew (I). Afterwards approaching the Kyang, A. D. 1163. which is not far from that city, he commanded his troops to pass over near the mouth of the river, where it is most wide as well as rapid, threatening with his drawn sword to kill those who refused. Hereupon the whole army mutinied; and the king being killed in the beginning of the tumult, they immediately retired towards the north, where several disturbances and insurrections began to appear.

NEXT year Kau-tsung resigned the crown to his adopted son, Hyau-tsung; but lived 25 New inva- years longer, and died without children, at the age of eighty-four. Hyau-tsung enjoyed a sions. peaceful reign, and so did his successor Quang-tsung; because the Kin Tatar, Ske-tsung, very different from his predecessor, was of a mild and pacific temper. But in the reign of Ning-tsung, 13th emperor of the Tsong, the Kin again violating the peace, invaded the Chinese territories afresh.

MEAN time Jenghiz Khán, chief of the Western Tatars, or Mungls, who had begun to lay Jenghiz the foundation of his empire, having in the year 1204 attacked the kingdom of Hya (which Khán offended sprung up in the west parts of Kitay, during the dynasty of the Lyau), and obliged the king A. D. 1204. to pay him tribute, resolved to turn his arms against the Kin, in order to revenge the injuries which the Moguls, or Mungls, had received from them. Among the rest, Yong-tsi, a prince d of the blood, having been sent by Tay-ho, emperor of the Kin, to recover the tribute from the Moguls, he seemed to make no account of Temujin (afterwards called Jenghiz Khán), and proposed having him seized. Yong-tsi coming to the crown, on the death of the emperor with Yong-tsi, Wang-Yen-king, he next year sent to demand the tribute of Temujin, who refused to pay it; and immediately raising a formidable army, in 1210, ordered a body of troops to march towards the frontiers of Shan-si and Pe-che-li ^b. At the same time, the king of Hya, disgusted with the Kin emperor, for having refused to assist him with troops, when attacked by Jenghiz Khán, invaded his dominions on the west side ^c.

YONG-TSI, finding himself threatened by two formidable enemies at once, raised forces in Forces the order to defend himself. But on the news he received in 1211, that Jenghiz Khán was great war. marching southward with his whole army, he was seized with fear, and sent to make proposals of peace, which were rejected. After this the Mungls forced the Great Wall to the north of Shan-si, and made incursions as far as Yen-king (now Pe-king) the capital of the Kin empire ^d. At the same time great part of Lyau-tong, the bulwark of the Kin empire, was reduced by several Kitán lords, who had revolted to Jenghiz Khán. This prince, in 1212, took several strong places, and defeated an army of 300,000 Kin, with inferior forces; but being wounded at the siege of Tay-tong-fú in Shan-si, returned to Tartary; yet the next year re-entered Kitay, and gained two great battles ^e.

THE same year Yong-tsi was slain by his general Huja-kú; and Sun, a prince of the Yong-tsi slain, blood, advanced in his room. After which, the Mungls attacking the Kin with four different A. D. 1213. armies at once, laid waste Shan-si, Ho-nan, Pe-che-li, and Shan-tong. In 1214 Jenghiz Khán sat down before Yen-king, the capital of the Kin empire; but instead of assaulting the city where the emperor then was, offered him peace on certain conditions, which were accepted; and he withdrew into Tatary. After the Mungls were returned, the emperor Sun, leaving his son at Yen-king, removed his court to Pyen-lyang (called Nan-king, or the South Court) near Kay-fong-fú, the present capital of Hó-nan. Jenghiz Khán, offended hereat, immediately sent troops to besiege Yen-king. At the same time the emperor of the Song refused to pay the Kin

Mean time his chief general Mubuli (H), whom he had left to take care of his acquisitions in Kitay, made great advances there, both against the Kin and the king of Hya. He was assisted in his progress against the former by the motions of Ning-tsung, emperor of the Song, or southern China; who, incensed by their frequent perfidies, had already declared war against the Kin. Nor would they hearken to peace on any terms, though very advantageous proposals had been made him; publishing an edict, wherein he earnestly requested his subjects to use their utmost endeavours to drive the Tatars of Nyu-che out of the empire. When the Kin monarch was informed of Ning-tsung's inflexible temper, he is reported to have said, by way of reply to him, To-day the western Tatars will destroy my empire; to-morrow they will conquer yours.^b efforts.

FOR all this, the Kin exerting themselves, in 1220 raised two great armies, one in Shen-si, where they baffled the attempts both of the Song and the Hya, who were united against them. In Shang-tong they set on foot an army of 200,000 men; but they were intirely defeated by Mubuli. In 1221 that great officer marched westward, and passing the Whang-ho, struck terror through the dominions of Hya, which he entered; but bent his arms solely against the Kin, from whom, that year and the next, he subdued great part of Shen-si; then returning into Shen-si, died there, after he had mastered several cities.

The Hya

A. D. 1224.

IN 1224, the Kin emperor dying in the 9th month, his son Shew (I) succeeded him, and made peace with the king of Hya, promising to send his son for a hostage. Next year Jenghiz Khân arriving in his own dominions, from his expedition in the west, marched to chastise the king of Hya, who had given shelter to two of his keenest enemies; and over-ran the greater part of his dominions, to such a degree that the king died for grief, in the 7th month of the year 1226. He was succeeded by Li-byen, who being reduced to the last extremity in his capital Ning-hya, surrendered at discretion in the 6th month of 1227. And thus a period was put to the kingdom or empire of Hya (K).

Progress in Shen-si.

IN 1226, while Jenghiz Khân was subduing the kingdom of Hya, his son Oktay marched into Ho-nân, and besieged Kay-fong-fû, capital of the Kin empire; but was obliged to withdraw into Shen-si, where that prince took several cities. Mean time the Kin, fearing his return into Ho-nân, made new overtures of peace: but they were rejected by Jenghiz Khân, who having forces to besiege Ning-hya, sent another body to conquer the country of Koko-nor. This having done, they reduced Ho-chew and Si-ning in Shen-si, cut in pieces an army of 30,000 men, and then went to besiege Lin-tau-fû, a city belonging to the Kin, 14 or 15 leagues to the south-east of Ho-chew.^c

JENGHIZ KHAN, who had gone to pass the summer heats at the mountain Lu-pan, or Lyew-pan, fell sick and died there, in August; after having named his son Oktay for his successor, and given him instructions for the more speedy reduction of the Kin dominions.

Peace rejected.

A. D. 1228.

MEAN time the war went on vigorously between the two nations, with various success. In 1228, the Kin commanded by a prince of the blood, defeated the Mungls in battle, and slew 8000 men. Next year the Kin emperor, under pretence of complimenting the new Khân upon his advancement, made proposals of peace by his ambassadors: but Oktay refusing to enter into any negotiations on that subject, pushed the war in Shen-si, where several cities were taken; and at length, in 1230, the capital Si-gan-fû, then called Kin-tau. Presently after Oktay, and his brother Toley, or Tuli, at the head of a formidable army, entered Shen-si, resolving to make short work of it: but although above 60 important posts were taken, they could not force Tong-quan, which they had so often attempted, in order to penetrate effectually into Ho-nân. Hereupon the army separating, the emperor marched with one part into Shan-si, the other part remained in Shen-si, with Toley; who besieged Fong-tsyang-fû; and after defeating the Kin army, which came from Tong-quan to relieve the place, took it in

HERE one of the Kin officers told the prince, that he lost time, as well as his troops, in attacking the Kin by the way of Tong-quan, and the Whang-ho; but assured him he might enter Ho-nan in less than a month by the country of Han-chong-fû. This advice being approved on, in January 1235, Toley marched towards that city: but being denied passage

(H) Mukbuli, or Mokli.

(I) Or rather Shew-su, as it is written afterwards. This was his true name; but the Chineses called him Gay-ti, or as others spell it, Ngay-ti; as we find by Couplet, and are told by Gaubil, p. 87.

(K) A more particular account of the ruin of this monarchy will be given hereafter, in the history of the Sifan, or Tu-fan.

- a by the governor for the Song emperor, to whom it belonged, he took it by assault with great slaughter; while the Chineses flying on all sides to the mountains, more than 100,000 perished there. At length Toley, after surmounting infinite difficulties, entered Ho-nán, to the great consternation of the Kin, who did not expect an attack from them on that side. However, two generals, were sent with a great army to stop their progress: Toley feigning a flight, the Kin pursued. Mean time a detachment of Mungls seized the heavy baggage of the Kin, which obliged the generals to retire to Tong-chew; from whence, concealing their loss, they sent the emperor word that they had gained the battle. But a few days after, while the inhabitants of Kay-fong-fú were still rejoicing for the supposed victory, the van-guard of the Mungl troops, sent by Oktay Khán, appeared in the plain; and in January 1232, the Khán himself b passing the W'hang-bo from Shan-si, went and encamped in the district of Kay-fong-fú, then called Pyen-king, which he sent his general Súpútay to besiege. This city, which was then Pyen-king be. 120 Li (L) in circumference, having had only 40,000 soldiers to defend it, a recruit of 40,000 sieged. more from the neighbouring cities, and 20,000 peasants, were ordered into it; while the Kin emperor published a discourse on the occasion, which made every body weep, and at the same animated them to defend the place to death ^k.

- OKTAY* having heard with joy of Toley's entrance into Ho-nán, by the way of Shen-si, The succours ordered him to send succours to Súpútay. On the other hand, the two Kin generals advanced defeated. with 150,000 men to support that great city: but dividing their troops near Kun-chew, to avoid in part the great road which the Mungls had embarrassed with trees, Toley attacked c them with his forces; and after some small resistance, the Kin, weakened by want of provisions, were intirely routed, with the loss of both their generals, one killed, the other taken. In February the army at Tong-quan, and other fortified places, marched, by order of the Kin emperor, to assist Kay-fong-fú, to the number of 110,000 foot, and 15,000 horse; followed by infinite numbers of people for protection. But many of these troops having deserted to Great the enemy, and the rest being infeebled by the fatigues of the march, in roads made impass- slaughter. fable by the thaws of nightly frosts, they dispersed on the approach of their pursuers; who killed all whom they found in the highways, with the two generals. After this they took Tong-quan, and other considerable posts; but were obliged to raise the sieges of Quey-te-fú and Lo-yang, by the bravery of the governors, especially him of this last place, named d Kyang-shin, who so fatigued the Mungls by his activity, and the engines he invented for shooting stones and arrows, that after three months siege he obliged them to raise it; although he had but 400 brave fellows among his soldiers, against 30,000 of the enemy ^l.

- OKTAY KHAN* having resolved to return into Tartary, sent to offer the Kin emperor peace, Peace con- on condition that he became tributary, and delivered up to him 27 families, whose names he cluded. mentioned. These overtures were very acceptable to the emperor. But Súpútay taking no notice of the treaty, pressed the siege of Pyen-king more vigorously than ever; and by the help of the Chinese slaves in his army, soon filled the city-ditch with fascines, trees, and other materials. This threw the inhabitants into a great consternation, and induced the emperor Shew to send the prince, his heir, in hostage. Mean time Súpútay redoubled his attempts to e take the city, and the Kin seemed to assume new vigour. The Moguls at that time made use of artillery (M), but the bullets could make no impression on the walls, which were as impenetrable as iron. The Mungls likewise raised walls round those which they besieged, 150 Li in circuit, fortified with ditches, towers, and battlements. They proceeded also to sap the walls: but were mightily obstructed by the artillery of the besieged, and especially their bombs filled with powder; which sinking into their galleries, and bursting under ground, made great havock among the miners.

- For 16 days and 16 nights the attacks continued without ceasing; in which an incredible Prodigious number of men were destroyed on both sides: but at length Súpútay finding that he could mortality. not take the city, withdrew under pretence of the conferences being on foot. Soon after the f plague began in Kay-fong-fú, where, in 50 days, 900,000 biers were carried out, besides infinite poor, who could not afford any. When the contagion was over, the emperor Shew-su bestowed large rewards on the officers who had defended the city, retrenched the expence of his table considerably, reduced the number of his women, and striking out of his titles that of holy, wise, or perfect, ordered superior to be used instead of it ^m.

PEACE thus restored might have continued, but two unlucky accidents re-commenced the War renewed. war, which put an end to the dominion of the Kin. Gan-yong, a Mungl lord, having assumed the government of some cities taken by him from the Kin, in Kyang-nan, and killed the officer sent with troops by one of the Mungl generals to take possession of them, declared for the Kin. The emperor Shew-su, deceived by false hopes, took Gan-yong into his service, and gave him the title of prince. Hereupon Oktay Khán sent an envoy, attended by 30 other persons, to enquire into that affair. But the Kin officers slew them all, without being punished by the emperor. Súpútay having informed Oktay of these proceedings, the Khán ordered him to continue the war in Ho-nân. The Kin emperor, on his part, commanded his officers to unite their troops, and form an army to defend the capital: but the Mungls attacking them before they could join, defeated them one after the other. This obliged him to raise soldiers from among the peasants and common people, for whose subsistence the inhabitants were taxed three-tenths of the rice they were possessed of; which order was executed with great rigour.

A. D. 1233.

MEAN time provisions became extremely scarce in the city. Towards the end of the year the Mungls made a treaty with the Song emperor, who engaged to join his forces to theirs; on condition to have the province of Ho-nân delivered to him, as soon as the dynasty of the Kin should be destroyed. In the beginning of the year 1233, Súpútay preparing to besiege Pyen-king (or Kay-fong-fú) which was but in a bad posture of defence, the emperor resolved to take the field; and passing the Wbang-bo, sent part of his army to besiege Wey-chew (now Wey-wbey), south-west of Kay-fong-fú; but being attacked by the Mungls, it was cut to pieces. At the same time Súpútay sat down the second time before the capital city, where the empresses and princes remained. The emperor, on hearing these bad tidings, repassed the Yellow River, and retired to Quey-te-fú.

a traitor.

Tsulí, general of the troops which defended the western wall of Pyen-king, under pretence of saving the people, assumed the management of affairs himself; and having played the tyrant for a while, went in great pomp, and delivered up the city to the Mungl general, before he had formed the siege of it, with all the princes and princesses of the blood, the treasures and jewels. Súpútay put to death all those who were of the imperial race: but the inhabitants, amounting to 1,400,000 families, were saved by the Khán's order. He sent the empress-mother, empress-regent, the queens, and their attendants, to Ho-lín (or Karakorum), where Oktay kept his court.

WHILE Tsu-li was acting in this manner at Pyen-king, Pu-cha-quen, another general, behaved with no less insolence at Quey-te-fú. He put to death several great men at pleasure, and even confined the emperor to his chamber: but coming to confer with his majesty soon after, he was slain by three faithful officers, who had offered their service for that purpose.

besieged.

AFTER this the emperor Shew-su, leaving troops at Quey-te-fú, removed to Ju-ning-fú (N), with only 400 persons to accompany him; the inhabitants every-where lamenting his miserable state, and he deporting himself with great humility. The presence of the emperor brought crowds of people to the city; and the distance of the Mungls made him think of living at ease: but while he talked of building a palace, and taking a wife, the united armies of the Chinese and Mungls came in October, and invested Ju-ning-fú. The garrison, terrified at the works which were raised to inclose the city, would have surrendered it; but the emperor, seconded by his brave general Hu-fye-hú, encouraged them to hold out to the last. In November, for want of men, the women, dressed in the male habit, were employed to carry wood, stones, and other necessary materials, to the walls.

Kin emperor's
bravery.

THE chief fortifications of Ju-ning-fú consisted of a tower, surrounded with water, and a fort near the river Jú, which being taken, the enemy forced the south and west walls; but found within a second wall, defended with chevaux de frise, and a ditch, where the illustrious Hu-fye-hú fought three days and nights with success. On this occasion the Kin emperor said to the lords who were about him, That the princes under whom empires ended, were commonly brutal, and treated by their conquerors with dignity: but that they should not see the fall of the Kin dynasty dishonoured in him. Upon this he distributed all his costly effects among them, and put on an ordinary habit. Then inviting his best troops to follow him, sallied out of the eastern gate, and made extraordinary efforts, with a resolution either to die with his arms in his hand, or break through the enemy: but unable to compass either design, he was at length forced back into the city; where, for three months, the besieged had endured extreme famine, and were reduced to feed on human flesh, killing the old and feeble, as well as many prisoners, for that purpose.

The city taken.

THIS being known to the confederate generals, they made a general assault in January 1234, on the western side, which they continued from morning till evening, with great loss of men, but without success. The besieged likewise had all their best officers and soldiers a cut off in the action. Hereupon, that night, the emperor Shew, assembling the lords, resigned the throne to Cheng-lin, a prince of the blood. Next morning, while the ceremony of investing the new emperor was performing, the Chinese and Mungl troops mounted the south walls, defended only by 200 men; and the south gate being at the same time abandoned, the whole army broke in. However, the prince Hú-sye-bú, with 1000 soldiers, met them in a street, and fought with amazing intrepidity.

MEAN time the emperor Shew-su, seeing all irreparably lost, made haste, and lodged the seal of the empire in a house; then causing sheafs of straw to be set round it, ordered his people to set it on fire as soon as they found he was dead. After this order he hanged himself; and his commands were executed by his domestics. Hú-sye-bú, who was still fighting like a lion, being informed of the emperor's tragic end, bad adieu to his officers, protesting that he would die likewise: accordingly he ran that instant to the river Jú, and drowned himself. The officers who were with the prince, and 500 of the most resolute soldiers, followed, telling him they knew how to die as well as he; and threw themselves also into the same river ^P.

THE new emperor Chang-lin, at the head of a few Mandarins, performed the Chinese ceremonies for the death of Shew-su, and gave orders to bury his ashes by the river side. Mean time the emperor having seized on the palace, the two generals divided between them all that could be found of the royal ornaments, and the emperor's ashes. The same day Chang-lin was slain in a tumult: and thus ended the dynasty of the Kin, after it had continued 117 years, or, according to Gaubil, 119 years (O), under nine emperors ^Q.

THIS author furnishes us with the names of five of these emperors, besides Shang-lin; viz, Tay-bo, Wang-yen-king, Yong-tsi, Sun, and Chew-su; with the years when the three last began and ended their reigns. If these immediately succeeded one the other, then the sixth king whom he mentions elsewhere, by the name of Chang-tsung, must be Wang-yen-king, or Yong-tsi, supposing Chang-lin to be the last. This difficulty would have been avoided, had that author either numbered the five kings he speaks of, or given us both the Tatar and Chinese names, of which latter kind Chang-tsung doubtless is. Couplet mentions three of the preceding emperors, Hi-tsung, the Tatar king, not named by the other; and She-tsung: to whom if you add Aguta, said by Gaubil to be the founder of the Kin monarchy, we shall have a complete line of nine emperors. But in all probability Aguta is the same with Hi-tsung, although Couplet does not expressly say he was the first king; the former being his proper name, the latter, that given him by the *Chinese*s. So that the 9th should be looked for between him and the anonymous king, who was slain, in 1163, by his own soldiers; or between She-tsung and Tay-bo.

AGUTA, or Ogota, according to Gaubil, revolted against the emperor of the Lyan in 1114; and having obtained several victories over him, to the north of Lyau-tong, at length cleared his way to the throne in 1115; which was the first of his reign. The princes of this house were adopted by the lord of the tribe of Wan-yen; and Wan-yen was the name of the imperial family of the Kin. The tribe of Wan-yen was one of the principal among the Eastern Tatars, called Nu-che, or Nu-chin, who encamped to the north of Korea, and along the oriental ocean. There were likewise other Nu-che, who dwelt to the north of Lyau-tong.

THE empire formed by these people, under the name of Kin, was very extensive; for, besides those regions above-mentioned, which they inhabited originally, at the time when attacked by Jenghiz Khán, they possessed Lyau-tong, with the parts to the north and north-east, as well as to the west, bordering on the great wall; as far as to the north-west of Tay-tong-fú in Shan-si, and north of the country of Ortús. In short, both Tartaries (the eastern and western) to the 49th or 50th degree of latitude (P), and 19th or 20th of longitude, west of Pe-king, which were then full of petty princes, paid tribute to the emperor of the Kin. In China they had the provinces of Shan-tong, Pe-che-li, Shan-si, and Ho-nan; some cities of Kyang-nan to the north of the Kyang; the territories of Kong-chan-fú, Lyu-tau, Fong-tsyang, Si-gan-fú, Ping-lyang, Kin-yang, and Yen-gan in Shen-si.

ACCORDING to the above-mentioned limits, the Nyu-che, or Kin, had larger possessions in China than the Kitán or Lyan; who, although we hear of their ravaging the northern provinces, and once entering the southern, yet seem to have had no acquisitions in any of the provinces, excepting Pe-che-li. Besides, the emperors of Hya were possessed of the greater part of Shen-si, with the countries of Tartary, adjoining on the north and west. However, to make amends, their dominions in Tartary were much larger than those of the Kin; for they stretched 16 degrees farther westward, reaching to Kâshgar, which is above 36 degrees west of Pe-king. And in this part they retained a considerable footing after their empire in the east had been destroyed: so that the empire of Kitay in general, as well as Kâra-kitay in particular, was more extensive under the Lyau than the Kin. But that of the latter exceeded it for grandeur, opulence, and number of people, as having a much greater portion of China belonging to it. However that be, both nations improved in manners, as well as power and riches, by their conquests from the Chineses.

(O) For he places the commencement of the monarchy in 1115. This, and the other circumstances, our author probably took from the express history of the Kin, which, he says, is in great detail both in Chinese and the Manchew language.

(P) Gaubil, p. 87. says, that all the north and north-west of Lyau-tong, as far as the rivers Kerlon, Saghalian-ula (or Oron), Tula, and Orghún, paid the Kin tribute.

The Kin remains.

THE Kin-chau (Q) (after their establishment, we presume, in the northern provinces of China) built towns and palaces in their native country, the ruins of which are still to be seen, as Feneghi-hotun, Odoli-hotun, and Putay-ula, before-mentioned.

In like manner, at the beginning they had neither characters, books, nor history. But in 1119 they made characters (R), in imitation of those used by the Kitan or Lyau, whom they had subdued. Afterwards the Kin emperors erected tribunals for astronomy and history, after the example of the Chineses.

WHEN their dynasty came to be ruined by the Mungls, in confederacy with the Chineses, those who escaped the slaughter were obliged to fly into the western parts of their ancient country, now inhabited by the Solon Tartars, who say they were originally Manchews.

Manchews, their descendants.

THE late emperor Kang-bi said, that his family was descended from the imperial family of the Kin (S). But if one may judge by several words of the Kin language, that of the Manchews now reigning in China is a different tongue; although it must be acknowledged, that the territory whence the Manchews came, is the country of the ancient Nyu-che, or Kin.

CHAPTER IV.

The history of the Si-fân or Tu-fân.

SECTION I.

An account of the Si-fân or Tu-fân; and the country inhabited by them.

The Si-fân's country.

THE country of the Si-fân, or Tu-fân (who are a people quite unknown, at least in name, to the western historians, Asiatic as well as European) is differently represented with regard to its situation and extent, by the accounts sent from China by the missionaries who surveyed that empire, in which these people are included. According to Regis, it borders on the provinces of Shen-si, Se-chwen, and Yun-nan, or Jun-nan, reaching from the 30th to the 25th degree of north latitude; and westward to the river, called by the Chineses, Ya-long Kyang. By another account it extends but a little way along the western borders of Shen-si; or seems to be a narrow tract of mountains, lying between the north-west part of Shen-si and the country of Koko-nor, inclosing this latter on the north and east in form of a bow. But in the jesuits map of Tibet, the territories of the Si-fân are distinctly marked out, as bounded on the east by the province of Se-chwen; on the north by the country of Koko-nor; and on the west by the river Tsacho Tsitfirbâna; which rising southward of the lakes from whence the Whang-ho, or Yellow River, issues, runs through Se-chwen, where it takes the name of Ya-long Kyang; and afterwards that of Kin-cha Kyang.

Site and extent.

ACCORDING to this situation, which seems to be the right, the country of the Si-fân, or Tu-fân, lies between 29 degrees 54 minutes of latitude; and between 12 degrees 30 minutes, and 18 degrees 20 minutes, of longitude west of Pe-king. Its shape is triangular; the base, which lies to the north, being about 300 miles long; and the other two sides, which make

- a an angle to the south, about 245 miles each. This is all which at present remains to the Tu-fân, of a very large dominion they formerly possessed, comprising all Tibet, and even some neighbouring territories of China^b. From hence (as well as on account of the affinity between the languages of the Si-fân and Tibet) it may be presumed it is, that the Chineses, as we are told, extend the name of Si-fân over all that country; and sometimes to all the nations lying to the west of their own empire^c. This great dominion, including the whole region between Great empire China and Hindûstân, with all those wide plains and deserts on the north and west of it, inhabited by the Eluth Tatars (or Mungls) is, in all probability, that which formerly went by the name of Tangût, Tangûth, or Tankût; and the rather, because at present the language and characters of Tibet, still used by the Si-fân, are called the characters and language of Tangût^d.
- b HOWEVER that be, the condition of the Si-fân is very different from what it was formerly: they have not now one town in their possession; and are pent up between the rivers Ta-long on the west, Whang-ho on the north, and Tangtse Kyang (which rises in this country) on the east: whereas anciently their kingdom had fortified cities, very well peopled, and very powerful^e.

THE Chineses distinguish the Si-fân, or Tu-fân, into two sorts of people. The He Si fân, Black Si-fân, or Black Si-fân, and the Whang Si-fân, or Yellow Si-fân, from the colour of their tents, not their complexions, which are in general a little swarthy. The Black Si-fân have also some pitiful houses; and are governed by two chiefs, who depend on a third; but are very uncivilized. Those seen by Regis were dressed like the inhabitants of Hami (A). The women wear their hair parted into tresses, hanging down on their shoulders, full of little glass mirrors.

c THE Yellow Si-fân are subject to certain families, whereof the eldest is made a Lama, and Yellow Si-fân wears a yellow habit. These Lamas are all of the same family, and govern in their respective districts. They have the power of deciding causes, and punishing criminals. They inhabit the same canton, but in separate bodies, without forming large families of the same kindred, which appear like so many little camps. The greater part of them dwell in tents; but some have their houses built of earth, and a few with bricks. They want none of the necessaries of life; and have numerous flocks of sheep. Their horses, though small, are well shaped, mettlesome and strong.

d THE Lamas, who govern these people, do not vex or oppress them, provided they render Their government them certain honours, and punctually pay the dues of Fo, which are very trifling. These dues seem to be a kind of tythes, as being exacted on a religious account. The religion of Fo hath ever been that of the Si-fân, who always chuse their Lamas to be ministers of state, and sometimes to command their armies. There is said to be some difference in the language of these two sorts of Si-fân: but as they understand each other well enough to trade together, they probably differ only as dialects of the same tongue. The book and characters used by their chiefs are those of Tibet. They have customs and ceremonies very different from the Chinese, Old customs, though bordering on them: thus it is usual with them to present a large white handkerchief of cotton or taffety, when they go to wait on persons whom they mean to honour. They have likewise some customs like those among the Kâlka Tatars, and others which resemble the usages of the Tatars of Kokonor.

e NEITHER of the two nations is more than half subject to the neighbouring Chinese Mandarins; whose citations they so little regard as rarely to appear before them when summoned: Nearly independent. nor dare those officers treat them with rigour, or offer to force an obedience; the frightful mountains which they inhabit, whose tops are covered with snow, even in July, securing them against all pursuits. Besides, as the rhubarb grows in abundance on their lands, they are courted by the Chineses for sake of that precious commodity^f.

S E C T. II.

History of the Si-fân, or Tu-fân, intermixed with that of the Hya.

f THE Si-fân, or Tu-fân, according to the Chinese authors (B), had formerly a very extensive dominion, and princes of great renown, who made themselves formidable to their Formerly famous neighbours, and even to the emperors of China. On the east side they not only possessed divers territories, which at present belong to the provinces of Se-chwen and Shen-si; but extended their conquests so far within them, as to subdue several cities of the second rank (C), whereof they formed four great governments. Westward they were masters of all the countries from the river Ta-long to the borders of Káshmir, in the Great Mogul's empire.

*Refused a prin-

A. D. 630.

IN the 7th century, Ki-tson, king of the Tu-fán, possessed this vast dominion, and had several kings who paid him tribute, and from him received their investiture, with patents, and seals of gold. This prince, in 630, coveting an alliance with Tay-tsung, the famous emperor of the Tang dynasty in China, sent him a pompous embassy; which having been received with great marks of distinction, he, by a second, demanded a princess of the imperial blood for his son Long-tsung. The council of state looking on this as a very arrogant proposal, rejected it, without so much as debating on it. Hereupon Long-tsung, on the death of his father, came at the head of 200,000 men to demand the princess; and having defeated certain princes tributary to China, who opposed his passage, penetrated to the borders of Shen-si, where the emperor then kept his court. From thence he sent one of his officers with an haughty letter to his majesty; demanding the princess to be forthwith yielded to him, with a certain quantity of gold, silver, and silks, by way of portion.

*Intrudes

A. D. 640.

THE emperor, more offended than before, amused the envoy with hopes, till his forces were assembled, and then dismissed him, without returning any answer to his master's letter.
At the same time his army attacked that of the Si-fán, and routed it. However, as the loss Long-tsung received was not considerable, he rallied his troops; and the emperor finding that prince was in a condition to give him much uneasiness, in 640 (D), the princess, by advice of his council, was sent with a great deal of pomp to the Si-fán monarch. On this, as soon as the ceremonies of marriage were over, he retired, and became very serviceable to the empire on several occasions afterwards: particularly, when the general Alena usurped a tributary kingdom of China, he joined the imperial army with all his forces, which he commanded in person, and had no small share of the victory by killing the rebel^e.

A. D. 766.

KI-LO-SO, who succeeded Long-tsung, improved the peace he was in with all his neighbours, by the treaties which he made with several nations of Tatars; particularly the Whey-be (E).
This prince dying without issue, Su-si, his next heir male, who succeeded him, was called in with his Tatarian confederates, to succour the emperor Wben-tsung (F); at that time constrained to quit his court at Chan-gan-fú (at present named Si-ngan-fú) and abandon it to the rebel Gan-lo-shan, a foreign prince, whom the emperor, against the advice of his ministers, had advanced to the highest posts, and even intrusted with the command of his army. This traitor, finding himself master of great part of the north, assumed the title of emperor, and marched to attack Chan-gan-fú; which having entered, he plundered the imperial palace (G), and carried the Lo-yang: but by the assistance of Su-si he was routed, and soon after killed in bed by his own son.

Break the peace.

A. D. 772.

Burn the capital.

THE Tu-fán, in reward of their service, besides the rich plunder of Lo-yang, and other rebellious cities, were presented with great quantities of silks, and the choicest things which China afforded. But whether through covetousness, or pride, as soon as they heard of the emperor's death (H), they advanced with a formidable force; and, arriving on the borders of the empire, before there was the least suspicion of their invasion, obliged the governors of Ta-chin-quan, Lan-chew, and all the country of Ho-si-ni (I) to surrender. The prime-minister, who at first could not believe this advice, sent Ko-tsey, the most experienced general then at court, with three thousand horse, to learn the truth. Ko-tsey (K) being informed at Hyen-yang, a city not far from the capital, that the enemy's army, consisting of 300,000 men (L), would be there that very day, dispatched a courier to the minister, to apprise him of the danger, and press for succours: but that officer of state did not stir a step the faster. Mean time the generals of the enemy, who were acquainted with the country, being arrived at Hyenyang, detached a considerable body of troops to take possession of a bridge over the river. The emperor, from whom the ministry had, till then, concealed the danger which threatened him, frighted at the news, forsook his palace. The great men of his court, the officers, and people, all followed his example, and fled. Thus the Tu-fán entered the city without resistance; and having carried away immense riches, set it on fire^h.

a Ko-TSEY, who had withdrawn, to join the troops, which, on the first alarm, left Chang-gan, seeing himself now at the head of 40,000 men, yet unable to cope with the enemy in the field; to supply, by policy, what he wanted in strength, ordered a body of horse to encamp on the neighbouring hills, and there ranged themselves in one line, to make a dreadful noise with their drums, as well as light up great fires every night in different places. This artifice had the desired success: for the Tû-fan, fearing to be surrounded by the united forces of the empire, conducted by a general of known bravery and skill, marched westwards, and blocked up the city of Tong-tsyang. Forced by stratagem

MA-LIN, who commanded in that district, came to the relief of the place; and forcing his way through a body of the enemy's troops, of whom he killed upwards of a thousand, threw himself into the town. As soon as he was entered, he ordered all the gates to be set open, to let the Tû-fan see that he did not fear them. This extraordinary conduct confirming them in their first suspicions, and their fatigued troops being unable to withstand fresh forces, they resolved to retire with the spoil which they had already gained. After their retreat, the Chinese repaired Chang-gan, whither the emperor returned some months after his shameful flight. to retreat.

THESE troubles were no sooner over, than the Chinese were obliged to take the field against a new rebel named Pû-kû, who had confederated with the Tû-fan and Whey-be Tartars, before-mentioned. But Pû-kû being very opportunely taken off by a sudden death, the Chinese had the address to disunite the two nations, by raising a contention about the chief command. Invade fresh. Yo-ko-lo, general of the Whey-be, would needs command the whole army. This the Tû-fan opposed, as being contrary to their orders, and dishonourable to their kingdom, which was much superior to the petty state possessed by the Whey-be. The Chinese generals, who were encamped in their view, secretly supported the pretensions of Yo-ko-lo; and at length openly joined him. Upon this the Tû-fan were attacked as they were marching away, and lost 10,000 men in their retreat.

WHILE the Tû-fan king meditated how to retrieve his losses, he was informed that the Whey-be were retired much dissatisfied with the Chinese. Hereupon he sent his forces to besiege Ling-chew, whose governor, having but a few troops, carefully shunned an engagement. The course he took was, at the head of 5000 men, to attack the magazines of the besiegers: accordingly he not only burnt them, but also carried off all the spoil they had taken, with part of their baggage. This loss compelled the Tû-fan to return home in haste, where they remained quiet for five years, and then brought a formidable army into the field; which, dividing into two bodies, fell almost at the same time on the districts of King-chew and Ping-chew. These troops being numerous, easily defeated several bodies of the imperial forces. But at length, in 779, Ko-tsey routed them intirely by means of an ambuscade. Defeated again.

THIS defeat inclining the king of the Tû-fan to peace, he sent an ambassador, attended with no fewer than 500 persons in his retinue, to the emperor; who, to mortify him, detained him a long time at court without an audience. His master, greatly incensed at such contempt, was preparing to take revenge, when Tay-tsung (D) happened to die. His son Te-tsung, who succeeded (in 781) taking a different measure, feasted the ambassador and his retinue, gave them rich habits, and loading them with presents, sent them back under the conduct of Wey-ling, one of his officers; who had orders to lay the blame of the small regard which had been paid his ambassadors, to their bad conduct, and having too numerous a retinue¹. A. D. 779. Sue for peace.

WEY-LING, contrary to what he expected, was received and dismissed with honour, as well as magnificence; which surprised the emperor himself, and gave him an esteem for the Tû-fan court (E), which promised an inviolable regard to peace. But this king dying in 786, Tsang-po, who succeeded, ordered his army forthwith to enter Shen si. They entered that province without being discovered; and defeated all the imperial troops which they met with, until they arrived at Kyen-chin, called at present Kyen-yang. But the Chinese general, Li-ching, coming up with his troops, as the enemy was upon the point of besieging the city, obtained so complete a victory, as compelled them to sue for peace; which was ratified by oath. For all this, some of their officers, who wanted to have the war continued, endeavoured to seize the emperor's envoy, and carry him to their camp. The general, however, disowned having had any hand in the affair; and without committing any further hostilities, returned home with his army. Break it, and routed.

THIS first expedition not having the desired success, the king of the Tû-fan got ready for a second; and, in 791, sent an army sufficient to oppose both the Chinese and their new allies the Whey-be Tartars. In their way they took some considerable forts, and withal Gan-si; but A. D. 791.

when they were advanced as far as Pe-ting, which lies to the south of Ning-hya, they were surprised and defeated by the Whey-be. For all this they continued their march towards the court, with incredible resolution: but the general Wey-kau falling on them unexpectedly, cut several bodies of them in pieces; in the place where afterwards, to hinder the incursions of the enemy, the fortresses of Tong-ka, Ho-taw, Mupu, and Ma ling, were built in the district of Ning-yang-fu, belonging to Shen-si.

A. D. 801.

THIS precaution however proved useless. For, scarce were those towns finished, when in 801, the Tu-fan returned, and at length reduced Lin-chew, which they had before attempted to do several times in vain. But on the approach of Wey kau, with his army, they abandoned the city, and marched towards Wey-chew in Se-chwen, which was one of the best places they had. Wey-kau pursued them; and finding they did not cease their flight, laid siege to that town. The king of the Tu-fan, startled at this news, sent Lun-ming, his prime-minister, with considerable succours: but being met by Wen-kau, he was routed, and taken prisoner. Upon this victory that general was received into Wen-chew, which he made a place of arms, and went to besiege the fortress of Quen-min-ching; but was baffled there, through the bravery of the governor.

Recovered
again.

WEY-CHEW was one of the royal cities; and the Tu-fan kings, since the time of Ki-lo-so, resided there one part of the year; for this reason I-tay, who succeeded his brother, resolving by all possible means to recover it, raised an army of 150,000 men next year, and sent to besiege it. On the report of their march, the Chinese general threw himself into the city: but the expected succours not arriving, he was constrained, by continual assaults, to surrender, after a siege of 25 days. The Tu-fan, elated with their success, advanced towards Ching-tu fu, the capital of Se-chwen. The emperor's general, unable to oppose their march, spread a report that he was gone to possess himself of the mountain-straits, through which they had passed; and caused his little army to make the necessary motions to induce them to believe it. This had the desired effect; for, through fear of having their retreat cut off, they retired to Wey-chew.

Peace concluded.

As soon as they got thither, I-tay, who was a mild prince, being satisfied with having recovered the place, sent to acquaint the imperial generals on the frontiers, that he was willing to live in peace; and as a proof of his sincerity, enjoined his officers to act solely on the defensive. The Chinese, on their side, acted with great generosity on several occasions. Among the rest, Si-ta-mew, a Tu-fan, governor of Wey-chew, having offered to deliver up that place to the Chinese general, when almost all the other officers were for accepting the proposal, Ni-u-fan opposed it, and declared: That a great empire ought to set a greater value on sincere dealing than on the possession of a city; and that their breach of the peace would authorize all the perfidies which the Tu-fan had committed, or should commit for the future. Hereupon the offer was rejected.

Flourishing
state.

I-TAY took the opportunity of the peace to make new laws, and advanced none to employments but men of approved merit. If he heard of any person remarkable for his knowledge and application to study, he preferred him to those who were equally experienced in the management of affairs. Thus he sent for Shang-pi-pi, one among the Literati of great reputation (F), from the farthest part of the kingdom; and after he had examined him, made him governor of the city and district of Chin-chew, at present called Si-ning^k.

Cause of its decay.

I-TAY died without issue, and was succeeded by Ta-mo, his next of kin, who devoted himself wholly to pleasures. He lived in peace with his neighbours; but became so execrable to his subjects, by his oppressions and cruelties, that they forsook their country in multitudes. In effect, he was the first cause of the kingdom's falling to decay. The public distractions greatly increased after his death: for as he neither left issue, nor had nominated a successor, one of the ministers, gained by the widow queen, in 842, procured the son of Pay-va, her favourite, a child of only three years old, to be proclaimed king.

A. D. 842.

Lu-kong je rebels.

THE report of this election brought Kye-tu-na, the first minister of state, to the palace, to oppose it, in behalf of the royal family: but his fidelity cost him his life; for he was killed in his return home. However, this conduct of the court lost them the hearts of all the people. Lu-kong-je, the great general, who was then with the army near the frontiers, refused to obey the orders sent him by the new government, and even conceived thoughts of ascending the throne himself. He was extremely ambitious, proud, and self-conceited, passionate, and often cruel; but, on the other hand, was brave, skillful, and capable of the greatest undertakings. He first caused a report to be spread, that he was going to root out the usurpers of the crown; and then marched against the new king's army, which he defeated. He likewise took and a plundered Wey-chew. By this time his forces, by the accession of male-contents, were increased to one hundred thousand strong. But before he attempted any thing farther, he tried to bring the provincial governors into his measures.

SHANG PI-PI being one of the principal, and his troops, by the care he took to augment them, the best in the whole kingdom, Lü-kong-je was willing to follow his inclinations first, and after writing him a deceitful letter, advanced towards the city. Shang-pi-pi, who saw through the general's design to deceive him, in his turn, wrote him an answer which flattered his hopes. At the same time setting forward with all his forces, he came upon the rebels so unexpectedly, that without any difficulty he defeated them, tho' much stronger than himself. Lü-kong-je, after this rebuff, withdrew, much enraged at heart. But in 846, having recruited his army, b imagined the way both to regain his authority, and win the affections of his nation, was to enter the territories of China, and give them up to be plundered. He met with some success indeed at the beginning; but was soon after routed by the Chinese generals, who also took from the Tu-fan the city of Yen-chew, and several strong fortresses.

THE rebel, who judged these losses might easily be retrieved, if once he was sole master c of the kingdom, having augmented his army with Tatars, to whom he promised the plunder of the provinces of China, bent all his thoughts on reducing Shang-pi-pi. With this view he began his march; and arriving near Chen-chew, compelled that officer to abandon his camp, though well fortified. However, this latter, after he had passed the river, broke down the bridge, and followed the enemy step by step on the other side, without suffering himself to be drawn to an engagement by Lü-kong-je, who made great ravages in his march for that purpose. Mean time the natural brutishness of the rebel general, joined to the ill humour which the small success of his enterprizes had thrown him into, rendered him so insupportable to his soldiers, that they deserted in troops to Shang-pi-pi, while the Tatars, for the same reasons, returned home. Hereupon Lu-kong-je, despairing of compassing his designs, submitted to the emperor on certain conditions, and retired to Ko-chew, a Chinese city, where he spent the remainder of his days. This happened about the year 849. Submits to China.

DURING the time this ambitious general had under his command almost the whole forces d of the state, the princes of the blood retired to different parts of the kingdom, where they had small patrimonies; and some took shelter in certain forts, which belonged to them, towards Se-chwen, chusing rather to submit to the emperor of China, than to an usurper. Others fortified themselves in the mountains; while some of the most considerable remained in the territories which they possessed, bordering on the government of Shang-pi-pi. Hence arose an infinite number of distractions in the state, which continued a great number of years, and proved the ruin of this monarchy at last. The Tu-fan divided.

THE Tu-fan, divided into several parties, went to war among themselves; and when they e were weary of fighting, many officers and soldiers lifted under Pan-lo-chi (H), prince of Lü-kü, a place in the borders of the district of Chen-chew, which the children of Shang-pi-pi had preserved for the royal family. As soon as the Tu-fan beheld a prince of the blood, they formed an army, and resolved to attack the king of Hya, who had ill requited their services. United again.

THIS new king was a Tatar, originally of To-pa (I), who by the assistance of the Tu-fan, about the year 951, founded a new dominion near the Whang-ho, under Li-ki-tsyen, in spite of all these Chinese could do; the capital whereof was Hya-chew, at present Ning-hya, from whence the kingdom took its name of *Hya*¹, or Si-Hya (K), given to it by the Chinese. This kingdom sprung up to the west of Ki-tay (L), and by degrees became very potent under a prince who assumed the title of emperor. This dominion, which extended over part of China and Tartary, contained the province of Shen-si, all to the north of Ping-lyäng-fü, as far as Kya-yu-quan (M), with the country of Ortus and Etsina (N), the country of Koko. Whence possibly those who founded this monarchy, were the western guards of the great wall, which was intrusted to Tatar tribes; from one of which the king of Hya sprung. And Alakus Khan was a Turkish prince; who, we are told, had the guard of a gate, and gave admittance to Jenghiz Khan into Kitay. Hya is also pronounced Kya, or rather Khya, as in Kya-yu-quan, Kya-chew, and other names.

(L) The kingdom or empire of Hya was not a part of Kitay, or taken out of it; but seems to have bounded it on the west; or perhaps the Chinese, during the empire of the Lian, had some parts both of Shan-si and Shen-si, between those two dominions.

Its growing power.
A. D. 1003.

THE king of Hya had, in the year 1003 (Q), renewed the war with the empire, at that time governed by the Song race, entering suddenly into the western part of Shen-si, which bordered on the small dominion that the Tü-fan were still possessed of. Pan-lo-chi offered to join the Chinese commander with his forces to crush this growing power; provided the emperor would honour him with a title, which might give him more authority among those of his own nation. The proposal being approved of, his imperial majesty sent him patents as governor-general of the Tü-fan. The king of Hya, who knew nothing of these private contracts, after committing some devastations, besieged the city of Silyang, and having taken it, put the governor to death. He intended to push his conquests farther, in a belief that Pan-lo-chi was advancing to join him with his troops. But that prince arriving at the head of 60,000 men, attacked him with so much valour, that he entirely defeated his numerous forces. However, he died soon after the victory, by a wound which he received in the battle.

So-tso-lo's
ambition.
A. D. 1015.

SO-TSO-LO, his successor, in 1015, formed the design of recovering the antient monarchy possessed by his ancestors. His little dominion consisted of no more than seven or eight towns; particularly Tsing-ko-ching, Li-tsing-ching, Ho-chew, I-chwen, Tsing-tang, Hya-chen, and Kan-ku, with some neighbouring territories; but was in hopes that the rest of the Tü-fan would join him, as soon as they should see that he was powerful enough to defend them. He fixed his court at Tsing-ko-ching, where he established officers, the same, both as to number and titles, which the kings his predecessors had made use of. After this he levied new forces throughout his dominions, and entered the territories of the empire several times; but was always defeated, and at length concluded a peace.

states

As the growing power of the king of Hya, who had assumed the title of emperor, gave So-tso-lo some uneasiness; the Chinese monarch, to engage that prince more firmly in his interest, made him governor-general of Pau-shun, which lay very conveniently for his purpose. But So-tso-lo dying soon after, the division which ensued among his children hastened the entire ruin of the Tü-fan state. That prince had, by his first wife, two sons, Hya-chen and Mo-chen-tsu. He had afterwards the prince Ton-shen by a second venter, who prevailed on him to imprison his two other sons, and compel their mother to turn nun. But they having found means to escape, and deliver their mother out of the convent, the people, who had helped to deliver them, declared in their favour.

SO-TSO-LO, who had by this time recovered from his infatuation, approved of this change, and gave Tsing-ko-ching to Mo-chen-tsu for his maintenance; for he had removed his court from thence to Chen-chew (or Si-ning). To Hya-chen he assigned Kan-ku for the place of his abode; and to Ton-shen, whom he judged most capable of keeping-up his family, he surrendered all his authority, with the government of Pau-shun, and the rest of his dominions. Ton-shen resided at Li-tsing-ching, where he was beloved of his subjects, and feared by his neighbours; insomuch that all the Tü-fan, who dwelt to the north of the Wbang-bo, were under his subjection.

Two submit

THIS great power wherewith the younger brother was invested, gave the two elder, and their families, apprehensions of being one time or other oppressed by him. Mü-ching, son of Hya-chen, more uneasy than his father, surrendered Kan-ku, Ho-chew, and all the lands which were in his possession, to the Song emperor; who granted to him, and his descendants, whatever they demanded, in order to support themselves with honour in his dominions.

KYAU-KI-TING, heir of Mo-chen-tsu, the eldest brother, was much beloved in his little state; but did not long survive his father. His son Hya-chen, who succeeded him, incensed his subjects to such a degree, by his violences and cruelty, that they formed a design to depose him, and set up his uncle, Sü-nan, in his room: but the plot coming to be discovered, Sü-nan, and almost all his accomplices, were put to death.

HOWEVER, Tsyen-li-ki, one of the principal officers, having found means to escape, carried with him Cho-sa, one of the family; and seizing the city of Ki-kü-ching, had him proclaimed prince of that petty state. But Hya-ching hastening thither, with his forces, took the place; and put Cho-sa to death. Tsyen-lo-ki, however, made a shift to get to Ho-chew; and having persuaded the governor, Van-chau, to conquer the country of Tsing-tang, he attacked the little city of Mo-chwen, which he took without any difficulty. Hereupon prince Hya-ching, find-a ing himself hated by his people, and at the same time vigorously pressed by the Chinese, in 1099, surrendered all his territories to the emperor, on certain terms, which were granted him. The like did Long-su, a son of Mu-ching, whom one of the Tu-fan chiefs had put in possession of the city of Hi-po-teen: for after several battles fought, with various success, against Kan-chau, wherein he distinguished himself by surprising valour, he submitted likewise upon advantageous conditions.

In the midst of the troubles which arose in the 12th century, between the Chinese emperors of the Song dynasty, and the Nyu-che, or Kin Tatars, the family of Ton-shen, which continued longest in splendor, made an alliance with the kings of the Hya; and, under their protection, enjoyed their territories tolerably in peace; till at length they were involved in the common ruin, by the prevailing arms of Jenghiz Khan. The year 1227, according to the Chinese history, is the era of the entire ruin of the Tu-fan; from which time they have remained in their ancient country, without either name or power^a.

This history, as transmitted by the missionaries, is very defective; especially in this latter part, in which they ought to be most particular. They not only omit the Tu-fan affairs for more than a whole century downwards, from the year 1099; but pass slightly over the destruction both of their decayed state, and the empire of Hya: which yet is the most curious and interesting part of all their history, as being connected with that of Jenghiz Khan. We shall therefore briefly supply the deficiency, especially with respect to the Hya, from the historians who have written the reign of that conqueror of Asia.

c THE Khan of the Mungls began in the year 1205 to make incursions on the territories of the king (or emperor) of Hya; and in 1209 formally attacked his dominions, with design to reduce them under his sway; he began hostilities by forcing several posts near the great wall of China to the west of Ning-hya, the capital city; after which he took the city of Ling-chew, and intended to reduce Ning-hya itself: but its king Li-gan-tsven, to avoid the storm, submitted to become his tributary, and give him a princess to wife. Hereupon the Moguls made a peace with him; and, withdrawing their forces, returned into Tartary^b.

d THE historians of the west of Asia differ from the Chinese in the date of this expedition, which they place in 1206, and in the proper names. They call the prince Shidasku, his kingdom Tangut, and his metropolis Kampion. They relate also, that Kampion was taken by stratagem; but that on the king's paying tribute, and receiving a garrison into the fortress, he was restored (R). They ascribe the cause of the war to his assisting the enemies of Jenghiz Khan, who from thence carried away immense riches^c. The oriental authors seem to have mistaken Tangut and its capital, for Hya and its capital, which lay contiguous to the east. Or perhaps they mean the same places; although, as customary with most nations, they give them different names; and this the rather seems to be the case, as the same events happened in both.

e THE Tu-fan states are not mentioned by the Chinese historians of Jenghiz Khan, as being considered by them only as parts of the empire of Hya: nor is Hya mentioned by the western writers of the Mogul affairs, as they probably knew of no dominion between Tangut and Kitay; and might consider Hya only as the Kitayan name for the county of Tangut. Yet, supposing this to be the case, they have mistaken the capital of this country; if, as we are told, Kampion is not Ning-hya (then called Hya-chew) but Kan-chew; a city indeed near the great wall of China, but 250 miles more to the west. Neither was it the capital of Tangut, considered as a different state from Hya: for it appears from the foregoing history, that the prince of the Tu-fan, who continued longest in splendor, resided at Li-tsing-ching, a town of Shen-si, somewhere more to the south.

f THE kingdom of Hya, and empire of the Kin, had been at peace above 80 years, when Li-gan-tsven, seeing himself pressed by the Mungls, demanded succours of the Kin; but the latter excused themselves, alleging that they could not possibly spare any. Hereupon the Hya, after making peace with the Mungls, in 1210, declared war against the emperor Yong-tsi (who then reigned in Kitay); and in April, the same year, attacked Kya-chew, a city of Shen-si: but they were defeated, and obliged to raise the siege. Four months after Li-gan-tsven died, and was succeeded by Li-tsun-hyu, a relation of his, who was more successful in his war against the Kin; for in December 1213 he took King-chew, a city in the same province. After this he offered to join his troops to those of the Chinese emperor against the Kin: but that proposal not being accepted of, he continued the war separately; and in December 1215 took from them Lin-tau-fu, a considerable city, also in Shen-si^d.

WHILE Jenghiz Khân was on his expedition in the west of Asia, the emperor of Hya did several actions contrary to his engagements as a tributary prince. Hereupon Mûbûli, who had been left as the Khân's lieutenant-general in Kitay, invaded his dominions; and gained great reputation in the war which he maintained against that monarch and the emperor of the Kin (S). In 1221 that general passed the Whang-bo, and struck terror through the whole country of the Hya, whose king thought it his wisest course not to oppose his passage; and by this means avoided being attacked for that time by Mûbûli, who turned his arms solely against the Kin. In the year 1224, Shew, succeeding in the empire of Kitay, made peace with the Hya, who had been at war for many years with his father Sun ^r.

LI-TE, king of Hya, among other causes of offence given to the Mungls, had afforded a retreat to Sun-quen-fî and Che-la-bo, two of their greatest enemies. Of this Jenghiz Khân, on his return from his western expedition in 1226, complained loudly: but Li-te was so far from making him any satisfaction, that he even took them into his service. The Mungl emperor, enraged at this indignity, marched from Ho-lin (or Karakorum); and in February, the same year, took the city of Yetsina (T), Ning-hya (the capital of the kingdom) Khya-yu-quan (U), and Kan-chew (X): Sû-chew (Y), Gan-chew, and Si-hyang (Z), were also reduced. In November he subdued Ling-chew, to the south of Ning-hya, and encamped 20 or 30 leagues to the north. Li-te, king of Hya, was so afflicted to see his dominions become a prey to the Mungl troops, that he died for grief in July the same year.

JENGHIZ KHAN having in the spring, 1227, left an army to besiege Ning-hya (A), detached a great body of forces, who seized on the country of Koko-nor (B), Qua-chew, and Sha-chew (C). He marched himself at the head of another body to take Ho-chew (D) and Si-ning. After this, having cut in pieces an army of 30,000 men, he went and besieged Lin-tau-fû, a city which belonged to the Kin. Mean time Li-hyen, king of Hya, being reduced to the last necessity in his capital city Ning-hya, surrendered at discretion in June; and set forward to humble himself before Jenghiz Khân, who was gone to pass the hot season on the mountain Lu-pan: but was slain as soon as he left the city, which was plundered by the foldiers.

THE history, exaggerating the havoc made by the Mungls, affirms, that not above two persons in a hundred escaped the massacre; representing the plains of Hya as sowed with dead bodies; and the woods, mountains, and caves, filled with miserable people, who fled thither to avoid the sword of the enemy. On the other hand, the same history does not fail to accuse the king of Hya, as having brought on the ruin of his state, by giving protection, as above-mentioned, to the two enemies of Jenghiz Khân, and refusing to deliver his son in hostage, according to his promise. Thus fell the kingdom, or empire, of the Hya, after it had stood 276 (E) years ^s.

THIS is the account given of this great revolution, by the Chinese historians; but those of the west of Asia relate it with some considerable variation, though more in detail. According to these latter, as soon as Jenghiz Khân was recovered from his fatigues, after his return to Karakorum, he applied himself to settle the state. He first summoned to court the great officers in Kitay, to give him an account of their behaviour; of which his brother Utakin (F) having fully informed him, some were rewarded, and others punished. He did the like by the great lords of Mogulistan and Kara-kitay. He sent also for Shidurku (G), sovereign of Tangut, who had offered to continue tributary. But this prince, fearing his former rebellion would not be pardoned, deferred going to court under various pretences; and sought to make a league with

(S) This looks as if the Hya were joined in confederacy with the Kin, for the cause of the rupture with the former is not mentioned; but it appears afterwards that they were then at war.

(T) The Tong-kyen-kang-mû, under the year 1225, mentions the taking of Yetsina, and other places spoken of here. It was a considerable city of the kingdom of Hya, called Ezina, by Marco Polo, whose Suchur (or Sukir) is Sû-chew, and his Kampition (or Kampion) Kan-chew. The Chinese geography places Yetsina (called also Etsina) to the north-east of Sû-chew, and north of Kan-chew, 120 leagues from the latter. This distance is certainly too much, says our author Gaubil; and hence we are inclined to think Kampion should be Ning-hya, with which that distance very well agrees. He adds, that Yetsina is now in ruins.

a¹ the Chinêses of Manji, and the oriental Turks his neighbours. The first complained of Jenghîz Khân's usurping the dominion of Kitay; and the latter of his ill treatment of Queen Turkân Khâtûn, who had always ruled them well when her subjects. Shidaskû having at length gotten together a considerable army, the Mungl emperor sent a body of troops towards Tangut; the news of whose sudden approach much startled the revolting king. Those troops stopped near Ezina or Azina, a city lying south of Karakorum, and 12 days hard journey from Kampion (H), where Shidaskû kept his court¹.

The emperor could not join his troops with the main body of his army before June 1225, at what time the hot season begins in Tangut. His forces consisted of 450,000 men, whereof he sent 100,000 to Kitay, where he feared a revolt in case fortune should favour Shidaskû. He divided this great army into ten bodies: the princes Jagatay (I) and Oktay commanded the two first; the rest were under the conduct of Kârasbar, Ilenku, Bela, Hubbe, Suiday, and other lords, who had signalized themselves in the past wars: but all these generals were subject to Tuli. Besides, he had a flying camp of broken officers, for the instruction of his grandsons Lutay and Alakû. Hej. Cal. A. D. 1225.

AFTER several weeks march from Mogulestân, the army crossed a desert 40 days journey over, in the province lying most eastward of the Naymâns; and arriving on the frontiers of Tangut, called also Kashin, soon took Ezina, which had been closely besieged by the first troops. Jenghîz Khân chose this place for his residence during his stay in Tangut; and by presents won the people of the country to serve as spies. By them he was informed, that Shidaskû had sent 30,000 horse in several parties, to endeavour to surprise him. These, at first, defeated some parties of the Mungls, whom they met with on the frontiers; but retired on advice that the emperor was marching with all his forces against their master. Ezina taken.

Sarbasan had gotten together an army of 500,000 (K) men, the greater part of whom were furnished him by the Chinese of Manji (or the southern China). Jenghîz Khân, confiding in the bravery of his disciplined troops, continued his march. Jagatay and Kârasbar Nevian had 40,000 men under their command; Hubbe and Suida 30,000; Ilenku headed 20,000 Kerâzmians, who had served in several former expeditions. A like number of Indians were under Bela. Badroûdin, who had served the Khân against Soltân Mohammed, because the latter had put his uncle to death, brought 30,000 men from the country of the Getes, and borders of Kipjak. A Khân, named Danishmend, a favourite of the emperor, had under his conduct 30,000 Karazmians, new raised troops. The Khân of the Igûrs led the auxiliary forces, which had, after his example, voluntarily submitted to Jenghîz Khân. The veteran bands were commanded by prince Oktay, and made a body of reserve, which attended the emperor's person: and in this body was the flying camp of reformed officers. Fast armies.

WHEN Shidaskû was within two days march of Jenghîz Khân, he sent 100,000 horse to surprise his van-guard: but meeting with a stout resistance, they retired with loss to the main army of the enemy, who at last came in sight, making a splendid shew, dressed in cloth of gold and silver, as well as the richest silks. The very common soldiers had habits much finer than the Mungl officers. For though they were very rich, the Khân had ordered both them and his soldiers not to dress gaudily. The king of Tangut's army took up a great space of ground: but the Mungls were obliged to fight upon a frozen lake, which derived its waters by a canal from the river Kâramûran. A general battle soon began, and the Mungls quickly had the advantage. The troops of Tangut, with others on the same line in front, were intirely routed; and all the enemy's army had been at the same time defeated, if the Chinese, commanded by Mayan Khân, (whom Jenghîz Khân had ordered to be seized in the Chinese war) and the Turks, led by the prince of Jurjeb, had not strongly withstood the fury of the Mungls: but these two generals charged the two wings of the emperor's army with so much bravery, that it revived the courage of their soldiers, who made a terrible slaughter, killing above 30,000 men. Abloody battle.

This good success became fatal to the victorious troops; who believing the Mungls vanquished, attacked them boldly without keeping their ranks: whereas the Mungls, who always kept close and in order, suffered themselves with much difficulty to be broken. At last the resolute resistance which Mayan Khân and the prince of Jurjeb met with in the center, astonished them; and the corps de reserve, which now came up, falling upon them all at once, made the Turks and Chinese give back, and take to flight. Shidaskû himself, after having shewed The Tanguts overthrown.

(H) This is a farther proof that Kampion must be Nag-han, rather than Kan-chai. Abû'lghâzi Khân calls it the city of Tengut: meaning no doubt the capital.

(I) According to the Chinese history, Jagatay was left behind in Great Bulair, to take care of the western conquests.

(K) Which was 50,000 more than Jenghîz Khân had. But Abû'lghâzi Khân says Shidaskû (as he is called in the translation) had an army nearly equal to that of the Mungls.

an extraordinary bravery, was obliged to fly, and leave the field of battle to the enemy; who cut ^a in pieces all the troops which resisted: and 'tis said that there were killed in all above 300,000 men. How many Jenghiz Khán lost, the Mungl history does not mention: but it speaks of all those who signalized themselves in this great action; and among the rest of the young princes Kublay and Húlakú (R), who gave proofs of an extraordinary courage.

Their king
slain.

AFTER this he marched against the Turks of Jurjeh, who submitted. He likewise secured himself of the countries of Erghimul, Sinqui, and Egrikaya, which were dependant on Tangut. Jenghiz Khán falling sick not long after, the last orders he gave before his death were, to secure Sbidaskú, who was hourly expected at court, as soon as he arrived, and put him to death (S), notwithstanding the promise made to his envoy. To effect this more easily, he enjoined them to conceal his departure; so that Sbidaskú, attended by his sons, and some of ^b his lords, coming to court eight days after, found a great appearance of joy: but they were all seized, and immediately deprived of life¹.

of authors.

WITH regard to the disagreement which there is between the Chinese and other historians, of the Mungl affairs, concerning Hya or Tangut, we shall only observe, that the former name four kings of Hya, from the time that monarchy was attacked to its extinction; the latter only one, as reigning all that while. They speak indeed of two invasions by the conqueror; but Abū'lghazi Khán, the Tatar or Mungl historian, makes the king to be slain in the first; and Sbidurkú (by others Sbidaskú), by whose death the dynasty ended, only as a governor of Tangut, who had revolted from Jenghiz Khán.

(R) The first was then about 11 years old; the last 10; for they are said to have been one year younger, each in 1224, when Jenghiz Khán returned to Karakorum. See De la Croix's history of Genghiscan, p. 363.

(S) According to Abū'lghazi Khán, they had orders to put him to death, and destroy the city of Tangut.

Introduction to the Modern History of China.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, customs, language, arts, sciences, and disposition of the antient Chinese.

THE Chinese, like other nations, assume to themselves too high an antiquity, as fixing the reign of their first emperor Fo-hi near three thousand years before the birth of CHRIST. Their original, as well as that of the Tartars, favours strongly of fable, as does also the history of several of their first emperors. Nor has Father Du Halde offered any thing in defence of the Chinese chronology, though he professes himself a zealous admirer of it, that deserves the least attention, except an eclipse of the sun, which happened in the reign of Chong-kang, 2155 years before the commencement of the Christian Era. This, indeed, he builds much upon, as does likewise Father Premare, who allows, that China was peopled above 2155 years before CHRIST, of which he reckons the aforesaid solar eclipse to be a full and perfect demonstration^a.

M. MAIGROT, Bishop of Konon, with great reason, believes the chronology of antient times among the Chinese to be very uncertain and precarious; as also that the Chinese annalist Cbnbi has adjusted both the years and eclipses solely according to his own fancy. Of this no one can doubt, who considers that the Chinese were little versed in astronomy, even when the Jesuits first came among them; and that they were so far from being able to calculate an eclipse, or even likely to make any celestial observations, 2155 years before the birth of CHRIST, that they probably knew as little then of any thing relating to eclipses, and the other heavenly phænomena, as the bulk of mankind, or even the most illiterate nations, at present do. For a full demonstration of this, we must beg leave to refer our readers to a curious and learned letter of Mr. Costard, Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, published in the Philosophical Transactions for the months of March, April, and May, 1747^b.

THAT China could have been but thinly peopled so late as 1300 years before the Christian Era, we have rendered probable in the history of the Tartars. Nay, that a considerable part of it must have been uncultivated, even in the year preceding CHRIST 637, when the Scythians, under the conduct of Madyes, first made an irruption into the upper Asia, has there likewise been clearly evinced. To which we may add, that had China then been a large and powerful empire, as it has been for many ages last past, notwithstanding the reserved temper of the Chinese, and their great aversion to an intercourse with foreigners, some knowledge of the riches, power, and genius of its subjects, must have transpired. The Persians could not have been kept in profound ignorance of such a state till the decline of the empire, nor even the Greeks till the time of Herodotus, had the Chinese made any considerable figure before that period. But we have not the least intimation of such a people as the Chinese before Alexander the Great penetrated into India, and even then we find nothing of moment related of them^c.

THAT the descendents of Japhet (A) peopled China as well as Tartary, we see no reason to doubt, though when they first arrived in that country, we cannot pretend to say. It is true, that the descendents of Japhet peopled China.

(A) Some of Shem's descendents also may be supposed to have settled in Tartary, India, and China; as Elam, one of his sons, fixed himself in Persia. Couplet deduces the Chinese nation in general from Shem, because fem, in their language, signifies life. But neither this notion, nor the reason that is brought to support it, will, as we apprehend, meet with the approbation of the learned (1).

a in the countries bordering on the mountains of Ararat, supposing them in Armenia, we have sufficient proof. This seems manifestly to imply, if the authority of Moses be of any weight, that the latter of those regions bids fairer for the land of Ararat than the former ^k.

6. THE word Ararat is manifestly of Armenian extraction (B); whereas no term, name, particle, or diction like it is discoverable either in the language of the Indians, Tartars, or Chinese. The radix arar, in Armenian, signifies he made, or he did; and the substantive ararads denotes work, as likewise the world, the earth, &c. As the whole earth, therefore, or the whole race of mankind, arrived on the mountains of Ararat, after they had escaped the deluge, from this circumstance those mountains may naturally enough be imagined to have received their name. Nay, the Armenians, at this day, call the Gordyæan mountains Ararat, b Arasad, Arar, &c. and Onkelos, Jonathan, the Syriac and Arabic versions, &c. render the original הרי אררט the Gordyæan mountains. All which observations amount to a strong presumption, that the land of Ararat is not to be sought for near China, but in Armenia ^l.

7. THAT the land of Ararat was in the neighbourhood of Affyria and Babylon, may be clearly evinced from scripture. 1. The prophet Isaiab tells us, that Adramelech and Sharezer, after they had slain their father Sennacherib at Nineveh, escaped into the land of Ararat. From whence we may infer, that this country was adjacent to Affyria; which will hold true of the Greater Armenia, but by no means of any region at such an immense distance from that ancient kingdom as China. Nay, from this passage it may be farther inferred, that the land of Ararat or Armenia, in the reign of Sennacherib, was, in a great measure at least, independent on the Affyrians. For, had it been absolutely subject to them, it could not have served as a retreat or asylum to those princes, after they had embued their hands in their father's blood; and therefore the prophet could not, with any manner of propriety, have affirmed, that they escaped into it. This may possibly throw some light upon the Armenian history, and contribute towards the support of Moses Chorenensis's authority. 2. The prophet Jeremiah represents the kingdom of Ararat as part of the power which was to reduce Babylon, and at no great distance from that city. Which representation must be allowed incompatible with the remote situation of China, but perfectly agreeable to that of the Greater Armenia. He likewise seems here to suggest, that, when he penned this prophecy, Ararat was governed by a prince of its own, since it had then the title of kingdom. And in conformity to this d notion, it appears from profane history, that though the Armenians were at this juncture tributary to the Medes, yet they still remained under the government of their own kings, one of whose successors acted with Cyrus rather as a confederate than a vassal, at the reduction of Babylon ^m.

8. THE kingdoms of Minni and Asskenaz have been proved to be Phrygia and part of Armenia by the learned Bochart. Now these kingdoms, from the passage here cited, appear to have been in the vicinity of Ararat. As therefore one of them bordered upon Armenia, and the other may be considered as a part of that country, and were vastly distant from China, we may naturally suppose Armenia, but by no means China, or any neighbouring district, to have contained the scripture Ararat ⁿ.

e 9. THE Medes, Elamites, and people of Ararat, were the three principal nations appointed by God, according to the prophets above-mentioned, to destroy Babylon. And, according to profane history, the subversion of the Babylonian empire was effected chiefly by the Medes, Persians, and Armenians. Now it is well known, that the Elamites of scripture answered to the Persians of profane authors. The Medes also of scripture and profane authors appear to have been the same nation. The Armenians, therefore, of those writers must have been the inhabitants of the kingdom of Ararat mentioned in scripture; which seems to put the point we are now insisting upon beyond dispute ^o.

properly so called, as being made of a particular kind of rice, and not the juice of the grape; whereas Noah's wine was the produce of the vineyard he himself had planted (3).

(B) That there was anciently a very large province in the Greater Armenia called Ararat, we are informed by Moses Chorenensis. This province, according to that historian, was divided into the following districts, or lesser provinces: Basenia, Gabelenia, Abelenia, Vahagunia, Arfarunia, Bagrevanda, Zalcota, Siracia, Vandandia, Aragazotia, Lacatia, Maseotia, Cogovitia, Assisa, Niga, Cotæa, Malaza, Varaznunia, Dewna, and Sarur. Mount Ararat was in this province, as well as the royal city of Valarsapata, which at present goes under the name of Eriwan (4).

10. THE kingdom of Ararat, if any regard is to be had to scripture, could not have been far from the confines of Elam and Media. As therefore this circumstance well enough tallies with the situation of the Greater Armenia, but is utterly repugnant to that of China, it must be acknowledged, that the former region has a much better claim to the scripture land of Ararat than the latter ^p.

11. THE Septuagint version expressly calls the land of Ararat Armenia. This testimony, especially in conjunction with what has been offered, is of exceeding great weight, and even seems intirely to overturn Mr. Shuckford's scheme. No wonder then, that the generality of learned men, who have been in any manner conversant with scripture, should place Noah and his family immediately after the deluge, in Armenia. Nor can it be denied, that both sacred and profane history, as well as the best interpreters of scripture, have concurred to establish such an opinion ^q.

12. THE principal argument drawn from Scripture, in support of Mr. Shuckford's hypothesis, is of very little force. It is deduced from these words of Moses: And it came to pass, as they journeyed from the east, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar; and they dwelt there. From whence he infers, that the mountains, on which the ark rested, were in an eastern direction from the land of Shinar, and Babylon; which will hold true of those near China, but cannot, with any manner of propriety, be said of those in Armenia.

BUT, whatever our author may think, these words will by no means amount to an implication, that the whole earth, to use the phrase of the sacred historian, or all Noah's posterity, must necessarily have migrated from China to the land of Shinar. They will by no means bear such a superstructure erected upon them. For though the land of Shinar was in a southern direction from Armenia, and in a western one from China, yet we are under no necessity of supposing, that Noah's family constantly moved from the East, after they had quitted the place where the ark rested. On the contrary, that family not only might, but probably did, march from the mountains of Ararat, supposing them in Armenia, into that part of the tract afterwards called Mesopotamia to the east of the plain they afterwards occupied in the land of Shinar. This has been most clearly evinced by M. Basnage. In which case, they must be allowed to have journeyed from the east, as Moses is supposed by Mr. Shuckford to assert. But farther, the word מִקְּדִים mikkedim signifies sometimes versus orientem, towards the east, as appears from another passage in the book of Genesis, not far from that we have in view, where it is obviously to be taken in this sense. We say, obviously to be taken in this sense, since the situation of Beth-el and Hai, in respect of the plain of Jordan, will not admit of a different interpretation. So that we may suppose Noah's family to have advanced to the land of Shinar immediately from a station to the west of that country, to which the members of this family had gradually directed their march from a more northerly quarter, without offering the least violence to Scripture ^r.

IT may not be improper here likewise, by way of digression, to observe, that our English translation ought to be emended in the first verse of the chapter just referred to. The word הַנִּגְבָּה which is there translated into the south, ought to be rendered into the desert. For Abram went up out of Egypt, not into the south, but into Arabia Petraea, or the tract including the solitudes of Sur, Sinai, Paran, &c. which was N. E. of Egypt. And that the word נִגְב in Hebrew, as well as Chaldee, denoted a wilderness, solitude, desert, or dry barren country, is obvious to every one in the least acquainted with the Oriental languages. The Septuagint version likewise renders the word הַנִּגְבָּה here εἰς τὴν ἐρημίαν, into the desert; which, notwithstanding the authority of the infallible vulgate, may be considered as an additional proof of the truth of our emendation ^s.

13. THE language of China is very different from the Hebrew of the Old Testament, tho' it must be owned, that an affinity between some of their roots or primitive words may be discerned. Now Mr. Shuckford intimates the Chinese to have retained the most obvious marks of the first language, and consequently (according to his principles) to be little or nothing different from that spoken by Noah. The same author also allows the antient Hebrew to have nearly approached the language of Shem, Ham, Japhet, and their immediate descendents, if it was not that very language. According to him, therefore, the tongue communicated by Noah to his postdiluvian descendents had no great affinity with that used by his antediluvian a sons, which must likewise have come originally from him. An assertion this, favouring so strongly of absurdity, that it must greatly shake, if not utterly subvert, his whole scheme".

14. THE Hebrew, and all the Oriental tongues that are dialects of it, must be allowed, if Mr. Shuckford deserves any credit in the point before us, to be more remote from the language of Adam and Noah, or the primitive language, than the present Chinese. Nay, the present Chinese, according to him, is almost intirely the same with that language (C). Which notion, as we apprehend, does not only run counter to the whole stream both of sacred and profane antiquity, but likewise to reason itself. For the language of Shem, Ham, and Japhet, or that of Adam and Noah, was spoken by the whole race of mankind till the dispersion; and that this was either the Hebrew, or a tongue nearly related to it, seems to appear from the first proper names of places, planters, and nations, used by the Greek, Latin, and Arabic writers, in common with Scripture. Nor can any reasonable person believe the present Chinese to have agreed in most, if not all, points with the primitive language; since all languages are in a continual flux, and must necessarily undergo many alterations in the course of four thousand years".

15. THAT Fo-bi, the founder of the Chinese empire, and Noah, as this author supposes, were the same person, can never be proved. The account given us of that prince by the Chinese historians, must be allowed to be little better than a fiction; and consequently no great stress can be laid upon it. Nor, indeed, is either the Chinese history or chronology of the earlier ages of their monarchy worthy the attention of the learned. Their skill in astronomy, for some thousand years after the time of Noah, was so small and imperfect, that it did not enable them to calculate an eclipse, nor indeed prompt them to make any celestial observations, the surest, if not only certain guides in chronological inquiries. And therefore the history of their first reigns can be considered only as a confused jumble of facts, or rather a narration of fabulous events, heaped together without any order or connection; so that we cannot expect to meet with much truth in it. But even admitting, that the fabulous Chinese history of Fo-bi (for it deserves no better an appellation) seems remotely to allude to some circumstances of Noah's life recorded in holy writ, what are we to infer from thence? Not that Noah was the first emperor or monarch of China (for this will by no means follow), but that he was the great ancestor of the Chinese, who retained some faint and obscure notions of him. And did not the antient Chaldeans, Greeks, Romans, Arabs, Etruscans, &c. do the same? Such a faint traditional knowledge of Noah and the deluge seems to have been common to all the politer nations, both of the antient and modern world; and according to the excellent Grotius (D), amounts to no inconsiderable proof, that they were all originally descended from him*.

16. AFTER Moses had enumerated the generations of the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, he adds, These are the families of the sons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations: and by these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood. And the whole earth was of one language, and one speech. Which passage manifestly implies, that Shem, Ham, and Japhet's families made up the whole race of mankind; and consequently that what has been advanced concerning Noah's postdiluvian progeny in China is a downright fiction. Nor will the patriarch's advanced age, when he came out of the ark, permit us to believe, that he had a numerous issue, after the flood, either in China, or any other country. Whereas Fo-bi, if we will believe the Chinese historians, governed some time a considerable, not a powerful nation. The authority, therefore, of these very historians is so far from sup-

(C) Mr. Shuckford, indeed, seems to intimate, that the present Chinese might have received some additions and improvements, as well as the most antient Hebrew; and even insinuates, that there might have been some agreement between them. But, as he immediately subjoins, that the present Chinese is only a first and uncultivated essay, insomuch that it is hardly possible to conceive any other tongue to have been prior to it, he makes it almost intirely the same with the primitive language (5).

(D) Grotius is supported by the testimonies of Berosus, Abydenus, Philo, Alexander Polyhistor, Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Lucian, Molo, Nicholaus Damascenus, and several other antient authors (6).

porting Mr. Shuckford in the point before us, that it evidently tends to the subversion of his hypothesis^y. a

17. It seems more natural to suppose, that Noah and his sons remained together, till they had overstocked with inhabitants the spot on which they first settled, or were dispersed by God himself, than that they separated from one another, before either of those events happened. We may, therefore, reasonably presume, that they all lived together till the dispersion; after which they began to spread themselves over the earth. But this has been set in so strong and clear a light by the sacred historian, that a bare perusal of him is sufficient to obviate every objection that has of late been offered to the common opinion^z.

China scarce known to the antient Greeks and Persians.

CHINA therefore and Tartary were probably peopled by the descendents of Magog, Meshech, and Tubal, as has been already observed; though when any of these first reached those vast and remote regions, it is impossible to determine. The prodigious distance of China from Shinar and Armenia more than insinuates, that no powerful monarchy or empire could have been formed in the first of those countries, till many ages after the dispersion, notwithstanding what has been so positively advanced to the contrary of late by some of the Jesuits. That neither China nor Tartary were known to the Israelites, or indeed any of the neighbouring nations, in the time of Moses, must be allowed probable, since he has passed over in silence the posterity of Magog, Meshech, and Tubal; from whence we may at least infer, that those regions then were very thin of inhabitants. Neither Homer nor Herodotus has dropped any thing which can induce us to believe, that either of them ever heard of the Chinese; nor do any of the antient Persian historians supply us with the least hint relative to this nation, before the declension of the Persian empire. All which has no small tendency to overthrow the sentiments the Chinese have entertained of the high antiquity of their empire, as well as the indefatigable and utmost efforts of some of the Jesuits to support it^a. b

China called Kathay by the Tartars.

It has been remarked by some authors, that the western Tartars call China Kitay, Khatbai, Kathai, or Kathay. Now, that this name was in use among the Asiatic Scythians in the time of Alexander the Great, may be proved from Curtius and Strabo. For the Sophitican kingdom, mentioned by Curtius, is called Cathea by Strabo. It comprehended, according to Von Strahlenberg, Tibet, or Thibet, Tangut, and part of China. As the Mungals and Kalmucks pretend, that their Dalai Lama had his residence, some thousand years ago, in the country of Tangut, one of his predecessors not improbably resided there in the time of Alexander the Great. The Greeks, according to the same author, called the Lamas, or priests, in Tibet, Tangut, &c. (E) sophists, because they were then greatly addicted to predictions, prophecy, and chiromancy, as they have all along been to this day. Indeed, properly speaking, the Tartars apply the name of Kathay only to the northern part of China, and the kingdoms of Tibet and Chotena. The little knowledge Alexander had of these regions he derived from the Indians^b. c

Who the Seres were.

SOME take the Seres of the antients to have been the Chinese, or at least a part (F) of that very remote nation; but others are of a different opinion. Cellarius, who has given us the best system of the antient geography, does not bring this controversy to a decision. He only says, Alii ut in Scythia, ita etiam in Seribus locandis mire variarunt, Others have assigned the Scythians, as well as the Seres, very different situations. Dr. Prideaux, with the generality of learned men, believes the Seres to have been the same people with that remote eastern nation called at present the Chinese; and we have in a former part of this work declared our approbation of this opinion. On the contrary, M. Von Strahlenberg seems not disposed to admit the Seres to have had so remote an easterly situation as the Chinese. But in this we e

(E) Perhaps some of our readers will not so readily come into this notion of M. Von Strahlenberg concerning the reason of the name Sophitis, or Sophitian. For we are told by Strabo, that Sopithes, or Sopithis, from whom this tract was called the kingdom, or empire, of Sopithis, or Sophitis, was sovereign of the country, when Alexander pushed on his conquests in India (7).

(F) Ptolemy connects Sirica, or the country of the Seres, with Scythia extra Imaum, to which it was adjacent. According to him, and the author of the antient geographical table agreeing with him, it was bounded on the west by Scythia extra Imaum, on the north and east by the Terra incognita, and on the south by India extra Gangem. It therefore seems to have answered to part of the country called by the Tartars Kathay. Ptolemy mentions Danua, Asmiræa, Isfiden, Serica, Throana, Thogara, Daxata, and other towns in Serica; but scarce any in Scythia. This seems to be an argument of the superior politeness of the Seres, in the time of that geographer. We shall say nothing farther of the situation of the Seres, since that cannot be determined from the antients; but at present content ourselves with observing, that they have been taken notice of by Mela, Horace, Virgil, and Ammianus Marcellinus, as well as the authors above-mentioned (8).

- a take that ingenious gentleman to be mistaken. For, according to Florus, the ambassadors sent by the Seres, with presents to Augustus, were four years on their journey; which is a full demonstration of the immense distance of their country from Rome; and, if Pliny may be credited, the river Lanos, the Lena of the moderns, to the east of some districts in China, ran through part of the territories of the Seres. It is probable, that the Seres possessed part of the tract comprehending the kingdoms of Kashgar and Tibet, the countries of the Kalkas, Mungals, &c. or Chinese Tartary, and even certain districts of China itself. Nor do we believe, that the word Seres (G) ought to be considered as the proper name of any one particular nation. It seems to be a term of Tartar extraction; the Uzbeks calling merchants living in cities Sær or Sært, which others comprehend under the name of Bukhars. These
- b Særes, or Seres, are now vassals, citizens, and merchants, settled in three different regions; first without the Chinese wall, under the Chinese jurisdiction, where they are called Koton, secondly, among the Uzbeks, who give them the denomination of Særes or Seres; and thirdly, in the kingdom of Kashgar, where they have the appellation of Bukhars. They carried on a trade with the Scythians from very remote ages, and consequently were in the earlier times greatly addicted to commerce; which perfectly answers the character given of them by Pliny. The Seres were antiently famous for their silken manufactures (H), they having first used the way of making silk from the web of the silk-worm. Hence Serica became the name of silk, and Sericum of a silken garment, both among the Greeks and Romans ^c.
- c SOME authors have imagined, that the Chinese were known to the Jews in the time of the prophet Isaiab, above seven hundred years before the birth of CHRIST. They found their opinion upon the following words of that prophet. Behold, these shall come from far: and lo, these from the north and from the west, and these from the land of Sinim. But that Sinim here should denote the Chinese, can by no means be allowed. For, 1. Bochart renders it probable, that Sinim, in this passage, is to be understood of the inhabitants of Pelusium. 2. That the Sinim were not remote from Phœnicia, may be collected from St. Jerom, and the sacred historian. 3. The prophet here having the conversion of the gentiles in view, in order to express the universality of that conversion, mentions the four primary quarters of the world, east, west, north, and south; to the last of which answer the Sinim. Now China is not to the south, but to the east of Judea. 4. The Sinim, or Sinæi, received their name from the Sini of Moses, descended from Canaan. From them the desert of Sin and mount Sinai were so called; they lying to the south of Judea, near that desert and mountain, according to Grotius, with whom Kimchi and St. Jerom agree. So that all conclusions drawn from the identity of the Scripture Sinim and Chinese must be deemed frivolous and chimerical ^d.

As for the form of the government prevailing antiently in China, of this we have not much to say. Nothing material relating to it has been handed down to us by any of the Greek or

(G) This likewise most clearly appears from the words Scythians, Gæd-Tschudi, Ma-Tschudi, Ta-gougi, Ma-gougi, the same as Gog and Magog, or Gojim and Ma-Gojim, all of which are appellatives, and seem never to have been applied to any one particular nation (9).

(H) From the Seres both silk and its name came to the Greeks and Romans. After Alexander had conquered Persia, silk was brought into Greece, and from thence into Italy in the flourishing times of the Roman empire. But, as the Persians took care to keep this manufacture a long while wholly to themselves, silk was sold for its weight in gold for many ages in all these western parts. But at last, the emperor Justinian found means to have vast quantities of silk-worms eggs brought to Constantinople out of Persia, which enabled him to set up the manufacture in his own dominions. From these eggs have been propagated all the silk-worms and silk trade, which have been ever since in several parts of Europe. The antients were so ignorant how silk was made, that they imagined it to grow on the tops of trees; but it has now been known for a great number of ages, that though cotton is produced from trees, silk is made only of the web of the silk-worm. The women only, among the Romans, for a long while, wore silk; and it was thought a great instance of luxury and effeminacy for a man to have any part of his garments made of it. Hence we find, that, in the beginning of Tiberius's reign, a law was made, that no man should defile or dishonour himself by wearing silken garments. Afterwards the men made use of silk and linen, and sometimes woolen, intermixed, which they called subsericum; and, in process of time, some of them, all silk, going among the Latin writers by the name of holosericum.

Roman (I) authors. However, that it was monarchical (K), we have all the reason in the world to believe. The Chinese historians are unanimous in this point, and have given us a long series of their kings or emperors from Fo-hi to the present time. Nor can any thing be more agreeable to reason than such a notion, this species of government having taken place in the East, from the earliest ages. Besides, as the Chinese have never permitted foreigners to settle among them, but constantly and perpetually kept themselves unmixed with other nations, we may reasonably suppose, that they have all along invariably retained this form of government. Now there is no monarchy at present upon earth more despotic than that of China. The emperor is vested with absolute authority, and, to appearance, is a kind of divinity; the respect which is paid him amounting to a sort of adoration. His words are like so many oracles, and the least of his commands as implicitly obeyed as if they came down from heaven. None are suffered to speak to him but on their knees, not even his eldest brother; or to appear before him with ceremony in any other posture, unless he gives orders to the contrary. Only the lords who accompany him are permitted to stand before him, and to bend one knee when they speak to him. We may therefore presume, that the Mandarins, and principal officers, with the utmost alacrity, ever since the time of Shi-wang-ti, have always given the same public marks of veneration for their emperors, in order to maintain that servile subordination essential to every despotic government. From whence the absolute and unlimited authority of those monarchs may be as fairly deduced, as from the express testimony of any antient historian^e.

Laws.

THAT the Chinese emperors for the most part ascended the throne by hereditary right, appears from the nature of their government; though both those monarchs and the dependent princes sometimes broke in upon the succession. However, their first monarch Fo-hi, who was born in the province of Shen-si, was elected by his countrymen on account of his rare qualities, and superior merit. With regard to laws, as the will of the prince was the rule or measure of his subjects obedience and submission, our readers will not expect us to be prolix upon them. However, as the Chinese have at present many salutary political maxims and institutions, wearing the face of laws, we doubt not but something of this kind was current among them, even in the earlier ages. But we shall have an opportunity of discussing this point more fully in the modern history of China, to which such a discussion will more properly belong^f.

(I) In general, we are told by Diodorus Siculus and Quintus Curtius, that the subjects of the Sophitian kingdom were a wise people, famous for the excellency and regularity of their government; and that their kings, at least for some time, were elective, may be inferred from Onesicritus in Strabo. For that author relates, that upon the death of any of their princes, they chose the handsomest man among them for his successor. As for the situation of the Sophitian kingdom, or Catheia, it is a point in which the antients are not agreed; some placing it between the Hydaspes and the Acefinis, and others to the east of the latter river. Be this as it will, it is certain that neither the kingdom of Sophites, or Sophitis, a petty Indian prince, according to Strabo, nor the particular tract called by this last author Catheia, whether these were the same, or distant regions, could possibly have been China; as being both to the west of the Ganges. Berckelius therefore, and Von Strahlenberg, seem to have been mistaken, when they make the Kathay of the Tartars to be the same country with the Catheia of Strabo. This last kingdom, or province, belonged to India intra Gangem, and was traversed by Alexander the Great; whereas that prince never reached the borders of Tangut and Tibet. But, if we suppose, that Kathay, or Catheia, extended in the time of Alexander the Great as far as the Hydaspes, and that the Sophitian kingdom was a province of it, which may possibly have been the case, then we must allow the afore-said gentlemen to have been in the right; though perhaps the reason assigned by the latter of them for the name Sophitian will not so readily gain the assent of some of our readers (1).

(K) China at first seems to have been a country of no larger an extent than the province of Shen-si; for Fo-hi was born there, and elected king, or emperor, by the people of that province. Nay, in the days of Confucius, it was circumscribed by much narrower limits than at present. At first several petty princes, heads of tribes, or phylarchs, exercised a sovereign authority in this country, as well as others. But, when the people became very numerous, and their neighbours formidable, it was found expedient, and even necessary, for the public safety, to elect a person to preside over them, to whom they might have recourse on all extraordinary occasions. So we find Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, to have presided over several reguli, or phylarchs, who, notwithstanding this, exercised a sovereign authority in the district where they held their residence. In like manner, at the siege of Troy, all the petty Greek princes obeyed the orders of Agamemnon, whom Homer represents as king of kings; and that this form of government prevailed antiently in Arabia, Numidia, Etruria, Tartary, &c. has been already evinced. The first emperors of China, therefore, were not entirely despotic, except on some pressing emergencies, though they had the power of convening the feudatory princes, who might have been considered either as their parliament, or privy-council. They also sat at the head of that illustrious assembly, officiated solely in sacred matters, and were dignified with other marks of distinction, which engaged the people to pay an implicit obedience to them. This form of government continued several ages in China; but, at last, all the reguli, or phylarchs, were subdued by the emperor Shi-wang-ti, and totally stript of their authority. Nor could the primæval form of government, which, at first, likewise prevailed in all other countries, be ever afterwards restored in China; but the political system introduced by Shi-wang-ti has continued without interruption to this very day (2).

^a THE first planters of China, instructed by tradition, inspired their children, and, through Religion them, their numerous posterity, at least for several ages, with proper and becoming sentiments of the Supreme Being. They taught them to fear and honour the Sovereign LORD of the universe, to observe the fundamental precepts of the first descendents of Noah, and to live according to the principles of the law of nature engraven in their hearts. Of this we find traces in those antient and valuable books, which the Chinese call by way of eminence, The Five Volumes; being the canonical or classical books of the highest rank, which they look upon as the source of all their science and morality ^g.

THE chief object of their worship, then, at first, was the Supreme Being, the LORD and Sovereign Principle of all things, whom they adored under the name either of Shang-ti, that is, supreme emperor, or Tyen, which with the Chinese signifies the same thing. Tyen, say the interpreters of THE FIVE VOLUMES, is the Spirit that presides in heaven, because heaven is the most excellent work produced by this First Cause. Sometimes the word is also taken for the material heaven, the sense being to be determined by the subject to which it is applied. The father the Chinese called the Tyen of the family, the viceroy the Tyen of the province, and the emperor the Tyen of the kingdom. They also honoured, but with a subordinate worship, inferior spirits depending on the Supreme Being; which, according to them, presided over cities, rivers, mountains, kingdoms, provinces, particular persons, &c. and nearly answered to the demons and genii of the antient Greeks and Romans ^h.

BUT though Shang-ti, or Tyen, was at first the primary, if not sole, object of their worship, yet in after ages they seem to have addressed their vows and homage to the visible material heaven; or, at least, to a celestial Virtue, void of understanding, and inseparable from heaven itself. Nor ought we to be surprised at such a transition from the worship of the Creator to that of the most beautiful part of the material world in China; since the first species of idolatry that prevailed among the Egyptians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Phœnicians, Arabs, &c. resembled this of the Chinese, as might be clearly evinced from a great variety of authors, would the limits we have here prescribed ourselves permit ⁱ.

THAT the Chinese had at first very rational notions of Tyen, or the Deity, appears from one of their canonical books, going under the appellation of Sbu-king. He is therein stiled the father of the people, solely independent, almighty, a being who knows the most hidden things, even the secrets of the heart. He is also there represented as watching over the government of the universe, so that no event can happen but by his orders; as holy without partiality, pleased with the virtue of mankind, superlatively just, punishing wickedness in the most signal manner, even in kings, whom he deposeth, setting up others in their room, according to his will and pleasure. It is likewise there said, that public calamities are the warnings which he gives for the reformation of manners; and that these calamities are followed by acts of mercy and goodness. The first sages of the Chinese nation did not only acknowledge a future day of punishment, but had also their minds influenced by the persuasion, that Tyen, by prodigies and extraordinary appearances, gives notice of approaching miseries, wherewith the state is threatened. His intention herein, according to them, is to excite men to a reformation of manners, as the surest way to appease the impending wrath of heaven ^k.

THE Sbu-king continually inculcates a just dread of the Supreme Being, as the most proper curb for the passions, and the most effectual remedy against vice. It likewise represents all pious suggestions, and holy thoughts, as inspired by Tyen, the source of goodness, order, and perfection. According to the same book, Tyen has an absolute dominion over the wills of mankind, in order to conduct them to his own wise and just ends; though he rewards and punishes men by means of one another, without any detriment to their liberty ^l.

As the antient Chinese ascribed to Tyen power, providence, knowledge, justice, goodness, and clemency, and acknowledged, that the most wicked man, by making use of the assistance Tyen offers him, may attain to the most exalted pitch of virtue, they honoured him with worship and sacrifices, and by the practice of every virtue. They likewise affirmed, that all external adoration is vain and insignificant, if it does not proceed from the heart, and is not animated by the inward sentiments ^m.

THE emperor was the only person to whom the function of offering sacrifices to Tyen belonged. But as Tyen, according to the early Chinese, views from heaven every thing done on earth, has given us a soul capable of reflection, and loves virtue, it was not thought sufficient for the priesthood to be joined to the royal dignity in the person of the emperor. But it was moreover judged necessary, that he should be either upright or penitent; and that, preparatory to the exercise of his pontifical function, he should expiate his faults with fasting and tears. The antient sages believed, that mankind could not fathom Tyen's councils and designs; but that even the minutest and most secret of their actions lay open to his all-seeing eye. They were also convinced, that he examines all our actions, and has erected a tribunal in our own consciences, whereby we are judged ^a.

THE emperor was looked upon as the only proper person to observe the primitive rites, and render publicly solemn homage to Shang-ti, as being his adopted son, and the principal heir of his grandeur on earth. To sacrifice to the first Being of the universe, required, in the opinion of the antient Chinese, no less than the most exalted person in the empire; to the end that, the emperor thus humbling himself, in the presence of his court, by the sacrifices offered in the name of the empire to the Master of the world, the sovereign authority of the Supreme Being might still shine more resplendent, and appear exalted above any equal. Other antient kings, presiding over countries nearer our part of the world, had the priesthood annexed to the royal dignity in them, as has been observed by several eminent authors ^b.

THE Chinese seem to have remained in the primitive religion, or the religion of Fo-bi, till the reign of Shau-bau, when nine chu-bew, or feudatory princes, endeavoured to force their subjects to offer sacrifices to evil spirits. They disturbed houses, according to some Chinese writers, with these spirits, and greatly terrified the people with their delusions. But Chwen-byo, nephew of Whang-ti, who succeeded Shau-bau, extirpated the race of these nine inchanters, appeased the minds of the people, and restored order to the sacrifices ^c.

BUT though the canonical books above-mentioned, especially the Shu-king, place the souls of virtuous men near Shang-ti, yet it does not appear, that they have spoken clearly of the punishments in the life to come. The Chinese in the earlier ages, as well as at present, had a very confused and indistinct notion of the creation of the world. Nor had they any clear idea of the soul, and its operations, either in a conjunct or separate state. But that they believed it to exist after its separation from the body, and were convinced of the certainty of apparitions, has been put by Confucius himself beyond all manner of doubt ^d.

IT is probable, that, before the time of Confucius, idolatry had found its way into China; nay, Confucius's revival of the antient doctrine supposes this. Several ages after his death, the idolatry of Fo, which had before sprung up in India, was introduced into China. After the conquest of Egypt by Cambyfes, the Egyptian priests dispersed themselves over India, Tartary, and even China itself. To their hieroglyphical representations of the Egyptian deities are owing those monstrous idols, which from that time to this have been adored in India, Tartary, China, and other remote eastern nations. But we shall expatiate more largely on this head in a proper place ^e.

Customs.

THE Chinese have at present a great variety of customs (L) peculiar to themselves, many of which were undoubtedly the produce of the earlier ages; but few of these we can trace to their respective sources. However, the following we take to be as old as the first ages of the Chinese monarchy, and therefore shall beg leave to insert them here. 1. In the reign of Fo-bi, the men and women began to go cloathed in a different manner. 2. A law or custom then commenced, by which no man could marry a woman of the same name, whether related or not; which custom is so strictly observed at this day, that no one can take a wife of the same name, although removed twenty generations, or of a different family. 3. The music invented by Fo-bi was performed on an instrument called kin, the upper part of which was convex, to represent the heavens, and the under part flat, to represent the earth. 4. The Chinese sowed only five sorts of grain, during the reign of Shin-nong their second emperor. 5. The emperor, immediately after his elevation to the throne, humbled himself so far as to plough a few furrows, and offered the produce of his tillage to Tyen. This custom prevailed almost from the beginning of the Chinese monarchy. 6. In the time of Fo-bi, the Chinese sacrificed six sorts of animals, some say seven, to Tyen, and solemnly offered those victims twice a year at the two solstices, when all the tribunals, as well as the shops, were shut up. 7. The people on those ^f

(L) The following customs prevailing antiently among the Cathcans are mentioned by Strabo. 1. Every male child was examined by a proper judge, at two months old; and, if found handsome, and of a form similar to that of the generality of its countrymen, it was brought up, otherwise immediately destroyed. 2. They painted their beards with a great variety of colours, looking upon this as a singular ornament. 3. The young people chose themselves husbands and wives, without the intervention of their parents. 4. When any woman survived her husband, she was reduced to ashes with his corpse. But this last custom, and perhaps the others too, rather belonged to the proper Indians, than any of the Tartars or Chinese (1).

- a days were not permitted to undertake any journeys, but obliged to spend them in joining with the prince to honour Shang-ti. 8. Besides the solstitial sacrifices, Shin-nong, who succeeded Fo-hi, added two others at the equinoxes. 9. The antient Chinese offered the first-fruits to Shang-ti, as early as the days of Shin-nong. 10. The Chinese took great delight in magic and enchantments, according to their own historians, towards the end of the reign of Shau-hau, as has been already observed. 11. The priesthood was united to the crown, that the emperor alone might be enabled to offer sacrifices to the LORD of heaven, by Chwen hys, the fifth monarch of China. 12. It was ordained by that emperor, that, if the prince was hindered from exercising the function of pontif, by age or sickness, some Mandarin or great man should perform that duty in his stead. 13. The Chinese allowed polygamy, but some confined themselves to the use of a few wives. This was introduced among them by Ti ko, or Kau-sin, the sixth emperor of China. We might here mention an infinity of other antient customs, some of which had the appearance of laws, still in force among the Chinese. But, as the time of the commencement or institution of these customs is not to be determined with any precision, and as they still prevail in the vast empire whose first state we are at present considering, it will be proper to defer taking notice of any of them till we come to the modern history of China.

THAT the antient language of the Chinese was pretty nearly related to the Hebrew, and the other tongues which the learned consider as dialects of it, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary, we own ourselves inclined to believe. Ludovicus Thomassinus, Philippus Massonius, Olaus Rudbeckius, and Augustus Pfeifferus, seem to have proved this almost to demonstration; though M. Bayer does not come so readily into their opinion. However, he does not deny either the truth or probability of that opinion, nor has he thought fit to urge any thing against the instances they have produced in favour of it. It is true, a great number of words in the present Chinese seem not deducible either from the Hebrew, or any other language; but then these may be considered as an accession to the primæval terms used in China, which were exceeding few, and undoubtedly favoured of the primitive tongue. But, to evince more clearly the point in view, we shall here beg leave to examine the first class of roots, or the primigenial roots, of the Chinese, and shew them to be of Hebrew extraction. For, as the Chinese consider these as the first and most simple words of any in their language, the characters representing them being the most simple of all, and making part of the composition of all the others, nothing can be more strong and conclusive than the argument here drawn from them. These primigenial roots we have been supplied with by M. Bayer himself, in his curious Lexicon Sinicum, for which he has justly merited the thanks of the whole learned world.

1. YE denotes one or unity, and appears to have been derived from the Hebrew יְהוָה bu or yu, he, this, that, or the same individual; which afterwards might naturally enough come to signify one thing, or one individual.^a
2. KUEN or QUEN signifies the relation between a superior and an inferior. It may be supposed to have been at first the same word with גֻּן gun or cun, equivalent to likeness, relation, affinity, &c.^b
3. KIVE, crooked, a crooked hook, connection, &c. This is at first sight deducible from the Hebrew word כִּפּוּף caf or cif, curvity, crookedness, &c.^c
4. FOE, the radical moisture, seems to answer pretty exactly to the Hebrew פֶּאֶה faa or fee, which sometimes corresponds in signification with קֶצֶב ketseb, bound, limit, end, extremity, root, or radix, &c.^d
5. PIE, the innate heat of animals, may have been originally the same word with פֶּה fiab, or pia, warm or hot embers, which not a little resemble the natural heat of animals.^e
6. CHU, an ensign, or mark of honour, power, empire, &c. may be considered as the same word with גֻּבּוּר gub gu or cub cu, denoting eminence, excellence, pride, pomp, &c. unless we would rather look upon it as agreeing with כֹּחַ cub or cu, strength, power, riches, valour, &c.^f
7. YE, one thing, has a character something different from that representing the first of these primigenial words; but that both of them were originally no other than the Hebrew יְהוָה above-mentioned, cannot well be denied.^g

HERE it is to be observed, that bu or ye seems more naturally to have been applied a first to this or that determinate individual, than to unity, or any one thing or individual; that cun, likeness, resemblance, affinity, &c. must have been prior to kuen, one particular relation founded upon likeness, affinity, &c. that cif or caf, crookedness, is more simple than kive, a crooked book, connection, &c. that sea or see, a root or radix, does not exhibit so complex an idea as foe, radical moisture; that pie, the innate heat of animals, does not convey so obvious and rude an idea as pia, hot embers; and lastly, that chu, a mark or token of power, must, in the nature of things, have been posterior to cu strength or power itself. Which if our readers think proper to admit, they will likewise probably allow the affinity between these most primitive Chinese roots and the Hebrew not only to be an irrefragable argument of the surprising agreement of the latter language with the most antient Chinese, but likewise of b its superior antiquity, a point that has hitherto been pretty much controverted among the learned c.

Writing.

OF the Chinese manner of writing we shall hereafter give our readers a full and ample account. However, at present it may not be improper to observe, that, as other nations had, almost from the beginning, alphabets consisting of a certain number of letters, which, by their various combinations, formed syllables and words, the people we are now considering had never any alphabetic characters. They at first, in the beginning of their monarchy, communicated their ideas by drawing on paper the natural images of the things they would express; which answered to the rude picture-writing of the Mexicans. Afterwards they used ænigmatical figures and symbols, which corresponded with the hieroglyphical character of c the Egyptians. As an infinite number of objects could not be represented by drawing (such as the soul, the thoughts, the passions, beauty, virtues, vices, the actions of men and animals, &c.), they by degrees composed more simple figures, and invented many others to express those things that do not come within the verge of the senses. The aforesaid simple figures were formed from the hieroglyphical and symbolical characters. There were at first only the outlines of those characters; but afterwards they received many considerable alterations. So the sun, which the Chinese called Ge, was at first represented by this figure , which in process of time became , retaining still the appellation of Ge. The Fathers Martini and Kircher supply us with many more instances of this kind, which at present we are not willing to transcribe. We must therefore beg leave to refer our curious readers to those learned authors, d for farther satisfaction in this particular d.

M. BAYER, in some measure, opposes this notion, when he asserts the present Chinese characters to resemble the Roman marks published at the end of Gruter, said to be invented by Ennius, but finished by Perfannius Philosophus, Seneca, and others, which contain nothing hieroglyphical or symbolical in them. But these have no connection or colligation among themselves, like the Chinese characters, whose most complex figures are composed of certain strokes that are visible throughout, as has been demonstrated by Father Du Halde. In the mean time, that the modern Chinese characters are truly hieroglyphical, notwithstanding what M. Bayer insinuates to the contrary, appears from hence, that they consist of simple letters, which retain the signification of the primitive characters; as also because human institution has affixed e to the modern figures the same ideas that the first symbols naturally exhibited. To which we may add, that every Chinese letter has at present its natural signification, which it always preserves, though joined with others. We might dwell longer upon this topic, did we not think, that it ought to be resumed, and expatiated upon, in the modern history of China, to which it more properly belongs e.

Arts and Sciences.

IF we will believe the Chinese themselves, they were, even from the remotest antiquity, the wisest and most learned people in the world. Their first princes, according to them, invented agriculture, music, physic, astronomy, and, in short, every art that tended either to improve the mind of man, or civilize him, and make him a fit member of society. They pretend also, that their ancestors cultivated, with great ardour, magic, natural philosophy, f ethics, and theology. As for navigation, commerce, and the mechanic arts, they believe their progenitors to have been better versed in them than any other antient nation. But that these are all vain pretences, appears very plainly from their ignorance when the jesuits first came among them, notwithstanding some of that society have transmitted to Europe very partial and fulsome accounts of them. It is also manifest from the fragments of their most antient classical canonical books, that have been communicated to us, and from the figure they at present make in the republic of letters. But this point we shall more fully discuss in a future part of this work f.

- a THE Chinese seem to have been antiently, as well as at present, of a mild, humane, and modest disposition, and greatly addicted to commerce; for, that this was the character of the Seres, we learn from Pliny. Nor, indeed, can we suppose, that the Chinese have much varied in their genius and disposition, since they have always industriously avoided intermixing themselves with foreigners, and have never suffered any considerable colonies from other nations to settle among them. That this has been one of their political maxims, ever since their acquaintance with the Europeans commenced, may be inferred from the accounts given us by the missionaries, the advices in our public prints, and many relations of modern travellers. The same dislike to foreigners discovered itself in the Seres, according to Pliny, who mentions it as an instance of their great inurbanity. Nor, indeed, can it be considered
- b in a different light by the members of any polite and civilized nation^s.

The history of the Chinese, from their origin, to the commencement of the first dynasty called Hya.

- SOME of the Chinese philosophers maintain the eternity of the world, and others make it the mere effect of chance, or nothing more than the production of a fortuitous concurrence of atoms. However, as we have already observed, their ancestors acknowledged a First Cause, and had some notion, though in the main it was very perplexed and confused, of a future state of rewards and punishments. They likewise believed the existence of good and evil spirits, as also of tutelary genii, or guardian angels, particularly those that presided over cities. Their historians make mention of a deluge as happening about three thousand years before the birth of Christ; but nothing can be collected from them relating either to the cause or extent of it. The sentiments many of them entertained about the cosmogony, or creation of the world, we have taken notice of in the first volume of our Antient History; and therefore should be guilty of a repetition, did we insert them here. Some of their writers make Puoncu (A) the first man to have reigned in China. He was succeeded by Tyen-boang, in whose time the heavenly spirit diffused itself over the world, and contributed greatly towards (B) inspiring mankind with a sense of humanity, and a disposition to the practice of all social virtues, after it had destroyed the great dragon, which had thrown both heaven and earth into confusion. This prince, according to the aforesaid writers, invented those two orders of letters, of which the Chinese afterwards framed their sexagenary cycle. A Chinese author tells us, that he had thirteen successors of one family; but these seem only to have been thirteen heads of families, or chiefs of tribes, that were cotemporary with him. Ti-boang mounted the throne after the death of Tyen-boang, who was famous for his astronomical observations, for his distinguishing the day and night by their respective names, and for his assigning thirty days to each month. Thirteen princes came after him, of whom nothing memorable is related; so that they were probably persons of the same rank and dignity with the chiefs of tribes above-mentioned. Gin-boang, with nine princes of his family, was next advanced to the throne. He divided his dominions into nine parts, one of which he permitted his subjects to dwell upon, but assigned them the other eight solely for cultivation. He first formed the body of his subjects, who were before unconnected and dispersed, into a regular society, as Phoroneus did the people of Argos. His reign the Chinese consider as the golden age; and believe, that the aforesaid partition gave rise to geometry. T'eu, or Yu, who followed Gin-boang, first taught his people to build huts or cottages of wood, to defend themselves from the inclemency of the weather, and the fury of wild beasts. He likewise improved their skill in agriculture; and, by shewing them the method of striking fire out of flint, taught them to dress their meat. Suju, his successor, is said to have been an excellent astronomer, and to have introduced the doctrine of the five elements first among the Chinese. He is likewise reported to have invented knotted cords, which served instead of characters, and taught his subjects the use of them. Though the Chinese were still ignorant of the use of money, he instituted fairs, for the propagation and augmentation of commerce. To

(A) It appears from Bayer and Menzelius, two of the greatest critics in Chinese literature that have hitherto appeared in the world, that the word Puoncu, Puon ku, or rather Puen ku, is not the proper name of a man, but signifies the highest antiquity, or that immense duration which preceded the creation of the world. This will appear from what we shall observe towards the close of this history (1).

(B) This passage seems remotely to allude to the fall and recovery of man; as well as to the expulsion of the wicked angels out of heaven, and their seduction of our first parents, when in a state of innocence (2).

this he was prompted by four of his great officers, men famous for their consummate abilities, a whom he had appointed to preside over four of his principal provinces^a.

THIS is the account given by the Chinese historians of the princes who lived in China before the foundation of their great monarchy by Fo-bi, whom all agree to have been at the head of their emperors. So that whatever has been advanced by some authors, in order to carry the origin of their monarchy up higher, is of no great weight, if it ought not to be considered as a manifest fiction. However, we judged it not improper to communicate to our readers what the Chinese say of themselves, even in the times preceding Fo-bi, since there is something entertaining, and probably some faint emanations of truth, in what even the most barbarous nations have by tradition received from their ancestors concerning their own original^b.

1. FO-HI was born in the province of Shen-si, or, as others write it, Xen-si. His mother, walking upon the bank of a lake near Lan-tyen, a city of Shen-si, saw a vast print of a man's foot upon the sand there; and, being surrounded by an iris or rainbow, she became impregnated, and in due time was brought to bed of Fo-bi. He was elected by his countrymen to govern them, on account of his superior merit, and called by them Tyen-tse, that is, the son of heaven. This name they gave him, not because they believed him to be of divine extraction, but to denote, that he was more favoured by heaven than the rest of mankind, since he had received from thence those exalted and transcendent qualities which raised him to the throne^c.

As the Chinese have placed this prince in Shen-si, one of the most western provinces of China, it seems from hence to follow, that, in the opinion of that nation, the first planters of China came thither from some western region; which very well accords with holy writ. We are told, that Fo-bi was a most profound mathematician, a famous legislator, and taught his subjects first to surround cities with walls. In order to distinguish families from one another, he first gave them names; and, perceiving that the knotted cords above-mentioned were unfit for publishing his laws, and transmitting his documents to posterity, he invented the eight Qua, to remedy that defect. These consisted of three lines each, which, differently combined, make sixty-four, and serve as symbols for expressing every thing that occurs^d.

THESE eight Qua or symbols, whose lines are either whole or broken, signify certain general things or elements, on which depend the generation and corruption of particular things. One represents heaven, another the earth, the third thunder and lightning, the fourth mountains, the fifth fire, the sixth the clouds, the seventh water, and the eighth the wind. He taught them how to make use of these famous symbols; and to give the greater credit to his new laws, pretended, that he had seen them inscribed on the back of a dragon-horse, which rose from the bottom of a lake. He called it a dragon-horse, because it was shaped like an horse, with the scales and wings of a dragon. It is no wonder, that Fo-bi on this occasion should have recourse to a miraculous or extraordinary appearance, to give the greater weight and authority to his institutions, since other antient legislators, the better to accommodate their laws to the taste of the vulgar, ascribed the political systems they had framed to some celebrated divinity. M. Bayer believes, that, of the lines of which the Qua consisted, the Chinese formed their most antient simple characters, and of them the more complex. Thus, for example, of the lines representing fire, the character denoting that element was afterwards formed; from those pointing out the waters of the mountains, the character standing for those waters had its origin; and so of the rest. But this we take rather to be a fancy, than a notion built upon any solid foundation; nor indeed does the ingenious author himself consider it in a very different view. Kircher and Martini, when they look upon the antient Chinese characters as either deduced from the natural images of things, or ænigmatical figures and symbols, in our opinion, approach nearer the truth; tho' here, as in all other dubious points, where something plausible may be said on each side, we leave our readers to determine for themselves^e.

FO-HI chose on this occasion a dragon, or dragon-horse, to be his assistant, because that animal was looked upon as fortunate, or a lucky omen, by the Chinese. From this prodigy, having gained great reputation among the people, he is said to have created Mandarins, or officers, under the name of the Dragon. He called one, whose employment was to compose books, the Flying Dragon; another, who was appointed to make the kalendar, the Latent Dragon; a third, who had the inspection of buildings, the Inhabiting Dragon; a fourth, who had the charge of relieving the people, the Dragon Protector; a fifth, who had the care of the lands, the Terrestrial Dragon; and a sixth, who was to procure a communication between springs, was denominated the Dragon of the waters. Hence we may assign a reason, why a the emperors of China always carried a dragon in their banners. The imperial dragon was allowed five claws to each foot, but that used as a symbol by a private person only four. It was a capital crime for any subject to use the imperial dragon as a symbol on any occasion^f.

FO-HI also instituted marriage, and all the connubial laws. He likewise obliged the men and the women to wear different habits, and confined men to women of different names. He also invented music, as has been already observed, and had nothing more at heart than to give public marks of a religious veneration for the Supreme Being. He bred, in a domestic park, six sorts of animals to serve as victims in his sacrifices, which he offered twice a year, at the two solstices, when the tribunals, as well as the shops, were shut up. Having established a prime minister, he divided among four Mandarins the government of his dominions. According to some, he sat an hundred and fifteen years upon the throne, and, after his death, was buried at a place called Chin; but the most sensible of the Chinese avow, that the length of his reign is unknown^g.

2. SHIN-NONG, the second emperor, invented many implements proper for tillage, and taught his subjects to sow five sorts of grain. This great benefaction so endeared him to them, that they gave him the name of Shin-nong, or Celestial Husbandman. He also communicated to them the art of making salt of sea-water, discovered the salutary and noxious qualities of many medicinal plants, and is considered by the Chinese as the author and prince of physic. He likewise introduced, or, at least, extended, commerce, and appointed public markets. c Whilst this monarch was wholly employed in promoting the happiness of his subjects, a tributary prince, named So-sha, withdrew from him his allegiance. But he was soon dispatched by his own people, who voluntarily submitted to the mild and just government of Shin-nong. Martini tells us, that he reigned an hundred and forty years, which seems not to be confirmed by the generality of the Chinese historians; and that he was at last cut off by a dependent prince, who refused to obey his orders. Be that as it will, he was looked upon by posterity as a religious prince, since he appointed two additional sacrifices at the equinoxes. By the first he intended to influence Shang-ti in favour of agriculture; and, by the other, to return thanks for the harvest, the first-fruits being then offered to him. He likewise cultivated with his own hands the field which furnished him with corn and fruits for these sacrifices. He is said by d some authors to have died at Cha-hyang, a place depending on Chang-cha, called at present Cha-lin-chew, and under the jurisdiction of Chang-cha fu, the capital of the southern part of the province of Hu-quang^h.

3. WHANG-TI is represented by Father Martini as a rebel, who, after he had slain his lawful sovereign Shin-nong, ascended the throne. Other historians place seven emperors between Shin-nong and Whang-ti, to wit, Lin-que, Cheng, Ming, I, Lay, Li, and Yu-wang. The last was deposed, and perhaps the rest were no more than tributary princes. Be that as it will, the best Chinese historians place only Fo-bi, Shin-nong, and Whang-ti, among the first emperors to whom arts and sciences owe their rise and progress. A regulus dependent on China, named Chi-yew, upon the revolt of other tributary princes, appeared in arms against the emperor Yu-wang, e deposed him, and, in conjunction with the other princes, placed Whang-ti, then but twelve years of age, upon the throne. Fu-pau, the mother of Whang-ti, being frightened with a noise of thunder, brought him forth on a mountain called Swen-ywen. He spoke almost as soon as he was weaned from the breast. In his infancy he discovered a great deal of wit and address; in his youth a sweet and engaging disposition; and, in his manhood, an uncommon depth of judgment and sagacity. He fought three battles with Chi-yew above-mentioned, and defeated him; but was prevented from pursuing him by the thickness of the fogs. But, having contrived a card which shewed his soldiers the south and the other three cardinal points, after the last action, he came up with the rebels, and put their leader to death. Some say, that, on the card, were engraven the characters of the rat and the horse, and underneath a needle to point f out the four quarters of the world. Could this be depended upon, it would appear, that the Chinese had something like the use of the compass, from the remotest antiquity, provided this prince preceded Christ above two thousand six hundred years, as Father Martini seems to believe. But the fact, as related, has so much the air of a fiction (it being impossible for such a compass to direct a victorious army in pursuit of a flying enemy out of sight), and the high antiquity assigned Whang-ti by Martini, and others, has so small an appearance of truth, that no manner of stress is to be laid upon either of them. Besides, had so useful a secret as the compass been discovered in so early an age, we cannot bring ourselves to believe, that it would ever have been lost. But, that it was lost for many ages, if Whang-ti invented it, can by no means be deniedⁱ.

HALDE in Whang-ti.

AFTER this, W'hang-ti levelled several mountains, cut through others, made great roads a to facilitate commerce, and extended the limits of his empire. According to some authors, it was bounded on the east by the ocean, on the north by antient Tartary, on the south by the river Kyang, called among the Chinese the son of the sea, which served as a barrier to W'hang-ti's dominions. He created six ko-lau, or prime ministers, and made Tsang-kyay, one of them, his mandarin historiographer. Te-nau, another, had the charge of composing the kya-tse, or cycle of sixty years. It had on one side ten characters, named Tyen-kan, and on the other twelve, called Ti-chi. The former had the denomination of the ten roots; and the latter that of the twelve branches. Every year was marked by two of them, that is one of each sort, which were so combined, that the same two signs never came together till the cycle was expired. The Chinese at present call this cycle Lo-she-wba-kyä, that is, the construction of sixty con- b versions^k.

YONG-CHENG, another of the ko-lau, having discovered the pole-star, and others in its neighbourhood, received orders to form a sphere and kalendar; but the figure of this original sphere is not known. He also attained to great skill in fore-telling the changes of the weather and air. Li-chew's office being to regulate numbers and measures, he invented the following method to cast up any sum. He took a little box, divided into two parts, crossed with several iron wires, thro' which passed little balls. On every wire in the upper division he placed only two balls, each standing for five; but every wire of the lower division, being much larger, had five balls, each of which stood for one. When he reckoned from right to left, the numbers multiplied the same as in cyphering with us. This method of casting accounts, especially in the sexagenary calculus, Father Martini seems to prefer to any used in Europe. c With regard to measures, the same Li-chew determined the dimension of a line by a grain of millet, and reckoned ten lines to an inch, ten inches to a foot, &c. The various ways of ranging these grains, which are of an oval figure, have occasioned a diversity in the measures under different dynasties. Ling-lun, the fifth prime minister, had the care of improving music, in consequence of which, he took upon him to explain the order and arrangement of the different tones; and lastly, Yong-ywen, the sixth, in pursuance of the orders he received, made twelve copper bells, which represented the twelve months of the year. A farther account of the sexagenary cycle and calculus here mentioned will come in more naturally, when we give a description of the present state of China; but, in the mean time, our learned and curious d readers may consult the Fathers Martini, Noel, &c. who have been very minute and circumstantial on this head^l.

W'hang-ti afterwards invented the cap or bonnet called myen; several habits and ornaments suitable to his high dignity; and a variety of useful instruments, such as machines to pound rice, kitchen-stoves, &c. He also found out the art of dyeing, having had this suggested to him by the feathers of the pheasants, as well as various colours of birds and flowers. His own robes were blue and yellow, to imitate the colours of the sky and earth; and, in allusion hereto, some pretend he had his name conferred upon him, W'hang-ti signifying the yellow emperor. He caused bridges to be built over rivers, and coffins to be made for the dead. Barks also with oars he invented the construction of, and taught his subjects how to make bows and arrows; e as well as flutes, fifes, organs, trumpets that imitated the voice of the dragon, and drums that resembled thunder. Waggon, with oxen and horses to draw them, before his time, were not known in China. He drew models for building, and caused a palace to be erected, named Ho-kong, where he sacrificed to the Sovereign Lord of Heaven. In order to facilitate trade, he coined money, which, from the figure of a knife-blade upon it, he called kin-tau. Physic likewise, if he did not discover, he made a great progress in: his empress also communicated to the people the manner of rearing silk worms, of spinning their webs, and of making cloaths thereof. He caused his country to be divided into chew (C); and erected several principalities, wherein he built cities. The empress, according to Couplet, taught the Chinese the art of dyeing. We are told by the same author, that his seat was at Cho-chew, in the province of f Pe-che-li; and that he appropriated the yellow colour to the emperor. He is also said to have invented astronomy, music, and musical instruments; also arms, nets, chariots, architecture, the art of making earthen ware, measures, weights, &c. and to have written several books on the method of discovering diseases by the pulse. The Chinese tell us, that eighty-five emperors

(C) Every one of these chew consisted of ten she, every she of ten tu, every tu of ten towns, every town of five streets, every street of three ho-ki, every ho-ki of three t'ing, every t'ing of nine king, and every king of an hundred mu. a of three imperial families, which continued two thousand four hundred fifty-seven years, derive their pedigree from Wbang-ti. This emperor shewed a greater zeal for Shang-ti than his predecessor. For, in order to prevent being hindered by bad weather, from making the usual sacrifices to him in the open field, he built a large temple, wherein they might be offered under shelter in all seasons, and the people instructed in their principal duties. Without the south gate of his metropolis was a vast inclosure of arable land, which furnished the corn, rice, and other fruits appointed for the sacrifices; and, without the north gate, was another great inclosure full of mulberry-trees, wherein were nourished abundance of silkworms. The same day that the emperor went to till the ground with his principal courtiers, his empress Lwi-tsu repaired to her mulberry-grove with the ladies of her court, encouraging them, by her example, b to make silks and embroidered works, which she set apart for religious uses. Wbang-ti died on the mountain King-shan, and was interred in the province of Shan-tong, in the fortieth year of the second cycle, aged an hundred and eleven years, whereof he reigned an hundred. His memory is even to this day held in the highest veneration among the Chinese ^m.

4. THE empire becoming elective, the son of Wbang-ti was by election raised to the throne. Shau-hau. He performed the duties of religion with great fervour and devotion; which induced Wbang-ti to consent, that he should succeed him, with the title of Shau-hau, that is to say, young Fo-bi. For, from his infancy, he had been a zealous imitator of the virtues of the first founder of the empire, Tay-hau Fo-bi ⁿ.

c It is reported, that the Fong whang, a very extraordinary bird resembling the phoenix, appeared at his coming to the crown. This was looked upon as an happy omen; because the Chinese say this bird never appears but when good kings are upon the throne. The Fong-whang, according to the Chinese way of painting it, is like an eagle; but differs from that bird in the wonderful variety of its colours ^o.

DU HALDE affirms, that, from the appearance of the Fong-whang, this emperor took the hint to distinguish his officers by the figures of divers birds, which they wore on their cloaths. This custom is still observed. Those of the literary mandarins were embroidered with birds in gold, as a mark of their dignity; those of the mandarins of war were adorned with such rapacious animals as dragons, tigers, lions, &c. which they considered as symbols of military fierceness. As the aforesaid bird had appeared in the reign of Wbang-ti, the Chinese considered d it as the forerunner of happiness; but, had it not been seen for a long time before, they would have looked upon it as portending the extinction of the imperial family, and great commotions in the empire ^p.

SOME of the Mandarins of the new creation, called kyew, were obliged to assemble the people; others governed the five sorts of artificers; and others presided over the tillage, as well as the manners of the people. This prince reformed the measures for grain, had a drum to beat the watches, cleared the chanel of rivers, and smoothed the roads over the mountains. He also invented a new sort of music, that, as the Chinese pretend, united spirits with mortals, and reconciled the high with the low; from whence he received the name of Ta-ywen ^q.

e THE emperor Shau-hau increased the pomp and solemnity of the sacrifice offered to Shang-ti by harmonious concerts of music. The greatest part of his reign was peaceable and quiet; but the last years of it were disturbed by the conspiracy of nine chu bew, or feudatory princes, who endeavoured to overturn the established system of government. According to some authors, these nine reguli, whom some have called kyew-li, disturbed the order of sacrifices, terrifying the people with spectres and goblins; which gave rise to superstitions, and brought the empire into great danger. Martini makes Kyew-li to have been a single impostor, and to have frightened the people with his delusions. The same author likewise insinuates, that he introduced idolatry and polytheism among the Chinese. Shau-hau died during the aforesaid troubles, after he had reigned eighty-four years, and gained the esteem and love of his subjects, by the mildness and goodness of his disposition. He was born, reigned, and was buried, at f Kyo-few in the province of Shan-tong; and, though he left four sons, Chwen-hyo, either the nephew or grandson of Wbang-ti, was chosen for his successor ^r.

5. THE people, towards the close of Shau-hau's reign, began to intrude into the sacred Chwen-hyo. ministry, each family affecting to have sacrifices among them; which abuse Chwen-hyo reformed, by annexing the priesthood to the crown, and ordaining, that none but the emperor should offer solemn sacrifices to the LORD of Heaven. He extirpated the race of the nine inchanters, who were the principal authors of the late tumults. He appeased also the minds of the people, and restored order in the sacrifices. Having reflected on the inconvenience of assembling an active restless people in the same place where the emperor came to sacrifice, he separated the place of instruction from that of sacrifices, and established two Mandarins, elected from among the sons of the deceased emperor, as presidents. One of these was charged with the whole ceremonial, and the other took care of the instruction of the people. He likewise settled rules for choosing the victims, ordering that they should neither be lame nor defective, nor of any other animals but the six kinds appointed by Fo-bi. He moreover commanded them to be well fed, and of a colour agreeable to the four seasons wherein they were offered. The Chinese say, that this emperor was an excellent astronomer, and that he changed the method of calculating and observing the celestial motions. As these motions were to be viewed at a distance, he invented an instrument to give a more adequate idea of them; but the figure and construction of this we are ignorant of. We are told, that, in this emperor's reign, there happened a most remarkable conjunction of five planets in the constellation Sbe; but a Chinese astronomer has remarked, that this was only an hypothetical conjunction^a.

CHWEN-HYO regulated the kalendar also, ordering that the year should begin the first day of the month, wherein the conjunction of the sun and moon should fall nearest the 15th degree of Aquarius; whence he is called the father and author of the ephemerides. He pitched on the time when the sun was in the middle of that sign; because then the earth is adorned with flowers and plants, the trees resume their verdure, and nature seems to be in her bloom. He likewise appointed one Mandarin to preside over the mines, another over the waters, forests, &c. and afterwards raised them to the most important posts in the empire. Chwen-hyo reigned seventy-eight years, died in a very advanced age, and was interred at Pu-yang. His seat was at the town of Wba, in the province of Mallet. Ti-ko, or Kau-sin, the emperor Shau-bau's grandson, succeeded Chwen-hyo, whose numerous descendents had afterwards several little provinces conferred upon them, whereof they were kings, or tributary princes^b.

6. TI-KO was raised to the throne by the suffrages of all the orders of the state; and was addicted to the worship of Shang-ti, and the religious observation of the ceremonies, as much as any of his predecessors. The great devotion of this prince, and his empress Twen Kyang, was rewarded with a son called Hew-tsy, from whom sprang a glorious posterity, dignified with a great number of emperors^c.

TI-KO is greatly extolled by the Chinese writers, as a prince of a penetrating judgment, who examined all things himself, and entered into the minutest particulars. He was extremely popular, had a sincere affection for his subjects, and was a most bountiful and munificent prince. He established masters to teach the people virtue, and invented vocal music. Hyen-ho was the first who composed songs by his order. Flutes, both direct and transverse, drums, bells, and other musical instruments, were first made by his direction. He caused that music to be played, which he named Lu-ing, that is, the beauty of heaven, earth, and the four seasons. He took four wives, and introduced polygamy among the Chinese. By the first of these he had a son named Ki, whose descendents founded the dynasty of Chew; by the second Sye, whose posterity founded that of Shang; by the third Tau; and by the fourth Chi, who succeeded him in the government of the empire. He fixed his residence in the province of Ho-nan, upon the spot where the city of Yen-su stands. His brothers and their sons he created sovereign princes in the province of Se-chwen, and died in the thirty-second year of the sixth cycle, aged 105, after he had reigned seventy years^d.

Chi. 7. CHI, who swayed the scepter after the former emperor, was the son of Ti-ko by his fourth wife Chang-ti, who seemed to possess no good qualities worthy of the throne. At first, however, the people conceived some opinion of his merit, and not without reason, according to Father Martini. But afterwards he made his authority intirely subservient to his brutal pleasures. As he indulged himself in the use of women, and intoxicating liquors, without limitation, the tributary princes, who were accustomed to obey wise emperors, could not bear his licentious and dissolute conduct. Having, therefore, in vain admonished him to reform, they deposed and banished him, setting his brother Tau on the throne. He is said to have reigned eight years, having been dethroned in the fortieth year of the sixth cycle, and is not reckoned by Father Martini among the emperors^e.

Yau. 8. YAU is considered as the first legislator of the Chinese, and the model of their sovereigns. Virtue, according to the writers of his nation, was natural to him, and nothing was wanting in him to form a complete and perfect character. He not only became a pattern for all his successors, but brought the sciences to their utmost perfection; which, according to the I king, he could never have done, and that within the first sixty years of his reign, if it had not been for the extraordinary assistance of Tyen. In fine, he was the delight of his subjects, his reign having been so amiable, that the Chinese philosophers usually enforced their maxims of morality from their uniformity with the conduct of this emperor, and his two successors; which conformity, once proved, gave them an indisputable authority^f.

^a THIS emperor, taking great pleasure in observing the heavens, ordered Hi and Ho, two eminent mathematicians, to examine carefully the motions of the celestial bodies, and also to make proper instruments for such observations. By their assistance, he regulated the twelve lunar months, and re-established the intercalated ones, which returned seven times in nineteen years. He is said to have erected six supreme tribunals, which still subsist; and, by the reputation of his singular virtue, to have drawn several neighbouring nations into his dominions. In order to make room for these, he attempted to drain the plains which were overflowed, by opening a passage for the waters to the sea. After this, he associated with him in the empire one Shun, an husbandman, whose virtue, probity, and patience, under the severest trials, joined to the confidence which all good men reposed in him, and to an infinity of other excellent qualities, rendered him worthy of the throne. His empress had the care of breeding silk-worms, and brought the silk manufactures to a surprising degree of perfection. We are told, that, in the reign of Yau, the sun did not set for ten days; and that the Chinese were then afraid of a general conflagration. Various serpents of a monstrous size are likewise said about the same time to have appeared. Yau lived twenty-eight years in perfect harmony with his new colleague, to whom he had given both his daughters in marriage, and died in the hundred and eighteenth year of his age, after he had reigned ninety years, according to Martini, or an hundred, if we will follow Du Halde. The people, who had experienced in this truly amiable prince all the love and tenderness of a parent, mourned for him three whole years ^z.

^c SHUN, though of mean extraction, was appointed by the late emperor his sole heir, to Shun. the exclusion of all the princes of the blood, and even in opposition to all the remonstrances of the successor himself, who did not think himself qualified to be placed at the head of so great an empire. Immediately after his accession, he paid his solemn homage to Shang-ti, and afterwards enacted those wise laws, whereon the government of the empire is founded. He created Mandarins, and gave excellent precepts relating to the five principal duties, of the king and the subject, father and children, husband and wife, elder and younger brothers, and of friends among themselves. As his example gave great weight to those precepts, his subjects were intirely influenced by them. He was, therefore, justly reckoned one of the most excellent Chinese law-givers, as well as his predecessor. Soon after Yau's decease, Shun trusted the government to his ministers, and shut himself up three years in that prince's tomb, the more ^d freely to vent his grief for the loss of a monarch whom he considered as his father. But, having discharged his duty of piety and gratitude towards Yau, he took possession of the imperial palace, and received the homage of all the tributary princes. Finding abundance of gold and jewels in the palace, he caused a sphere to be made exhibiting the seven planets; each of which was represented by the precious stone most suitable to it. He always honoured philosophers and men of learning with his favour and protection. The provinces he visited every year; and, in his progress, rewarded or punished the reguli with so much justice, that he gained the esteem and admiration of all his people ^a.

^e DURING his reign, agriculture flourished, and plenty every-where prevailed. For which end he forbade the governors, under severe penalties, to exact a day's work from any husbandman, as this must naturally tend to discourage industry, and obstruct the progress of tillage. He filled all the important posts in the state with none but persons of merit and capacity; nay, by one of his ordinances, he permitted any of his subjects to set forth on a table, exposed to public view, whatever could be found blameable in his own conduct. Lastly, in the choice of a successor, he consulted the good of his people, by giving them another prince like himself in the person of Yu, though this was done to the exclusion of his own family ^b.

^f WE are told by Martini, that the Tartars, for the first time, in this prince's reign, made an irruption into China; but that they were soon obliged to retire into their own territories. Yu, before he was adopted by Shun, had recovered the drowned lands above-mentioned; which his father had not been able to effect. After thirteen year indefatigable labour, he levelled mountains, turned the great rivers into their natural chanel, drained the lakes and marshes, confined several rapid torrents between banks, and divided the lesser rivers into different canals, which terminated in the sea. By this means he enlarged the provinces, and rendered them more fertile; which important piece of service greatly contributed to his advancement, as well as his singular merit ^c.

SHUN lived seventeen years after he had raised Yu to the throne, which is said to have happened in the fifty-fourth year of the second cycle; and died in the tenth year of the following one, being an hundred and ten years old. He was buried in the province of Shen-si, and vastly regretted by all his subjects. He has been greatly celebrated by the famous Confucius, and the Li-ki, as well as the best Chinese writers of all succeeding ages ^d.

As the most authentic Chinese historians seem to agree, that their chronology, before the time of Yau, who associated Shun with him in the empire, is by no means to be depended upon, and as those historians seem not to have used the computation of cycles before the reign of that prince; we are hereby sufficiently authorized to conclude our history of the antient Chinese with the death of Shun. For this another reason, also, of no small weight, may be assigned: The crown of China became hereditary in the family of Yu, who succeeded Shun; and the Chinese dynasties, of which that called Hya was the first, immediately commenced upon that prince's accession. As those dynasties, therefore, still continue, the commencement of them, by an European historian, may be considered as a new æra, at which the modern history of China will very naturally begin. In the mean time, to the preceding account of the antient Chinese, we shall beg leave to subjoin the following reflections ^a.

Much of the early Chinese history fabulous.

1. THE Chinese history, from the time of Fo-bi to the death of Shun, has in the main manifestly the air of a fiction. The great progress those two monarchs, as well as all the intermediate princes, made in some one at least of the liberal arts, if we suppose them to be as antient as many of the missionaries, together with the Chinese, pretend, is utterly improbable. The number of people there must have been in China, according to the aforesaid history, during the reigns of all those monarchs, will also, upon the above-mentioned supposition, as well as the superior politeness of that people, to every sober and intelligent person, appear absolutely incredible. The fabulous incidents likewise, with which the history of those reigns is interspersed, and which are obvious to every one who peruses the foregoing account, let this point beyond dispute. So that as the greatest part of the Chinese memoirs of all the emperors of China, preceding Yu, have the principal distinguishing characteristics of a fiction, they cannot well be viewed in any other light than that in which we are here considering them. ^b

Chinese chronology to the reign of Yu false.

2. THAT the Chinese chronology to the reign of Yu is very inaccurate, not to say false, most clearly appears from the foregoing history. Nor can all the efforts of some of the missionaries overturn this glaring truth. For, not to insist upon the certainty of the Hebrew chronology, to which the generality of the learned seem willing to adhere, the history whose authority supports it, favours greatly of fiction, as is allowed even by the most rational Chinese, and missionaries themselves. We say the history, whose authority supports it; since in reality the Chinese chronology to the reign of Yu is void of every other support. For nothing besides that authority can be urged in favour of it, except the testimony of Confucius, and other antient writers, the opinion of the Chinese, and their astronomical observations. Now the testimony of Confucius, and other authors who lived many ages after these early princes, that the history of them was extant in their time, and that it was then commonly believed they had existed, will by no means prove the reality of such existence, nor consequently evince their high antiquity. The opinion of the Chinese will indeed prove their zeal for their own antiquities, but by no means evince the genuineness of them. And as for astronomical observations, the Chinese were incapable of making any, at least with tolerable precision, till many ages after the death of Shun; and, even had not this been the case, they might have feigned solar and lunar eclipses, planetary conjunctions, &c. in order to please, flatter, and amuse their emperors. For such false conjunctions often occur in the Chinese history, especially at the change of dynasties; and, as for eclipses, we find none mentioned by the Chinese writers, before the second year of the fourth cycle, in the reign of Chong-kang, about sixty years after the death of Shun. So that the Chinese chronology, for the period we have here considered, must be looked upon as indefensible ^c.

The celestial observations of the Chinese frequently fictitious.

3. To confirm what is here submitted to the judgment of the learned, we must beg leave farther to remark, that some of the earliest celestial observations of the Chinese are full as romantic as any thing else that occurs in their history of the nine first emperors. Of this several instances might here be produced; but at present we shall confine ourselves to one only. Father Martini informs us, that, according to the Chinese, in the reign of Yau, the sun was observed not to set for ten days; which rendered the people apprehensive of a general conflagration. Now will any person be so sanguinely disposed in favour of Chinese veracity, as to suppose this a real observation? And, if not, will it not shake the authority of their other observations, especially when they exceed all belief, or at least are not founded upon a proper degree of probability? Nothing, therefore, can be more uncertain and chimerical than the conclusion drawn from the eclipse that is said to have happened in China 2155 years before the birth of Christ, in support of a fabulous and romantic antiquity ^d.

Chinese historical period of time begins after Yu.

4. FROM what has been advanced it will follow, that the Chinese historical period of time must have commenced at least considerably later than the reign of Yu. Nay, Father Fouquet, Bishop of Eleutheropolis, has obliged the learned world with a table, that fixes the æra of the Chinese history, so far as it is genuine, about four hundred years before Christ; and he even affirms, that some, not without strong reasons, believe, that it might be brought lower still. ^e a He allows, indeed, the Chinese nation to be almost as old as the deluge; but denies, that their history deserves much credit, if we ascend higher than four hundred years before Christ. Nay, M. Fourmont observes, that this opinion pretty much prevails at present among the missionaries. The table above-mentioned was published at Rome in 1729. It contains three large sheets, and is intituled Tabula chronologica historiae Sinicae, connexa cum cyclo qui vulgo Kia-tse dicitur. The founders of the Kang-mo, or great Chinese annals, who are the most esteemed of all the Chinese historiographers, are also of the same sentiments ^b.

5. This likewise in some measure appears from what we have advanced in the history of China and the Tartars. It has there been rendered probable, that a great part of China was very thinly peopled, if not quite void of inhabitants, so late as the year before Christ 637, when the Scythians, under the conduct of Madyes, made an irruption into the Upper Asia. From whence it will follow, that little credit is due to those annals which make China to have been a powerful empire above two thousand years before. For, that it was then absolutely uncultivated, upon the former supposition, there is not the least reason to doubt. This argument might be pushed farther, and insisted upon in a more copious manner, were there any need of it; but, as this is not the case, we think it sufficient just to have hinted it to our readers here ^c.

6. We are informed by some Chinese historians, followed by Father Martini, that the Tartars first made an irruption into China, in the reign of Shun. If this be admitted, it will absolutely overturn the high antiquity of Shun, and his predecessors, as well as the authority of those historians in the point before us. For, the Tartars never committed any hostilities against the Chinese, even according to their own historians themselves, before the time of Ogus Khan. Now, from what has been already observed, no one can suppose that prince to have been prior to Madyes, and consequently to have preceded Christ above six hundred and forty years. Nay, supposing the Tartars to have been the descendants of the proper Scythians, which we think cannot well be denied, they could not have penetrated into China till many ages after Madyes; since the Scythians themselves only began to make a figure in the reign of that prince, having been before confined to a small extent of territory near the eastern bank of the Volga. Nor can we think it probable, that the name of Tartar, or Tatar, was known even among the Chinese till long after the Scythians made themselves masters of the Upper Asia; which conquest their later posterity have not scrupled to extend even to China itself. But such a romantic turn as this is common to all the eastern writers, especially those of not a very antient date; and therefore no manner of stress is to be laid upon it. We might here expatiate more largely upon the point in view, did we not choose to reserve a full and particular discussion of it for the modern history of China ^d.

7. But though the greatest part of the Chinese history, to the commencement of the first dynasty, is apparently fabulous, yet still in this there may be discerned some faint glimmerings of truth. This has been clearly deduced by Bayer and Menzelius, two most eminent critics in Chinese literature, from the beginning of the book intituled Siao ul lun, or, in Latin, Origines Sinicae. These learned men have found some affinity between the Puen ku, or Puoncu, i. e. the first antiquity, as also the Tay ku, i. e. the highest antiquity of that book, and the vast ocean of eternity that preceded the creation of world. The former believes, that the WATER, or LIQUID MASS, of the Siao ul lun, terminating the highest antiquity (or eternity preceding the creation of the world), and separating it from time, as well as the system that followed, resembles the chaos of Ovid, and the tobu vabobu of the sacred historian. The Tien hoam xi, Ty hoam xi, and Gin hoam xi, i. e. The august family of heaven, the august family of earth, and the august family of men, of the Siao ul lun, that immediately come after the LIQUID MASS, M. Bayer proves to denote the creation of the heavens, of the earth, and of man. Nor are we to be surpris'd at the expression of hoam xi, the august family, when it is applied to the heavens, and to the earth; since the greater part of the pagan world, in the earlier ages of idolatry, believed the heavens, the earth, and the celestial orbs, to be animated by spirits, or intelligences of a middle nature between men and the Supreme Being. In like manner the nien gin, or nine men, of the august family of men, mentioned by the Siao ul lun, according to M. Bayer, point at the nine antediluvian generations preceding Noah, who may be considered as the second father of mankind. In the aforesaid book, Fo-bi, who is placed at the head of those generations, is said to have had for his wife one Niu-Kua. Now Kua, or Qua, can by no means be deemed remote from Chava, or Chaua, Adam's consort; which seems to imply, that Adam and Fo-bi were the same person. Fo-bi is represented as having the head of a man, but the body of a serpent. Now among the antients a serpent was the symbol of a man or people sprung out of the earth. This representation, therefore, intimates Fo-bi to have had such an original; and consequently seems to imply, that the earliest Chinese were informed, by tradition, that God formed man of the dust of the ground. We are told, that Wbang-ti, or Hoam-ti, appointed Ta nau, or Ta nao, to form the sexagenary cycle; and that he was the inventor of barks, or small vessels. Now, as from the Chinese series of antediluvian generations above-mentioned it appears, that Wbang-ti, or Hoam-ti, may be supposed to have answered to Noah, we may consider the name Ta Nao, or great Nao, and the invention of barks, alluding to the construction and use of the ark, as pointing at the same patriarch. In fine, these, as well as other instances that there occur, amount to a plain proof, that something of truth may be extracted even from the fabulous history of the Chinese; and that this nation had some obscure traces of the cosmogony, the origin of man, the universal deluge, and other points handed down to us in the clearest light by the sacred historian¹.

8. It appears from hence, that the Chinese of later ages have greatly corrupted their own antiquities. The traditional notions they had received from their earliest ancestors relating to the cosmogony, the creation of man, the deluge, and the antediluvian world, they have ridiculously applied to the ancient state and monarchy of China; by which they have brought the history of their nation, especially the first part of it, into contempt, among the sober and rational part of mankind. However, all other nations have, in some respects, done the same thing. The Chinese have also reduced to their sexagenary cycle many transactions, handed down to them by their first progenitors, which happened long before the invention of that cycle, and by this means introduced great confusion into their chronology. Nor are we to be surprised at this, since they did not begin to compute their years according to that cycle, till long after the discovery of it; as the commencement of the Olympic games did not serve for an epoch to the Greeks till many years after that event happened; nor the restoration of Rome by Romulus to the Romans till the age of either Fabius Pictor, Cato, or Varro; nor, lastly, the birth of Christ to the Christians till the time of Dionysius Exiguus. In fine, that the Chinese annals cannot be depended upon, may be inferred even from Confucius himself, who more than hints the inaccuracy of them; nay, that many of the oldest materials for such annals had been destroyed before he wrote. The present ancient memoirs, therefore, that are obtruded upon us by the Jesuits and the Chinese, must be allowed modern (D) productions, in comparison of the times to which they pretend to relate; so that scarce any thing certain can be deduced from them, though some faint emanations of truth may now-and-then appear^m.

What we are to think of their most ancient historical memoirs.

9. As the Chinese were almost totally ignorant of every branch of literature, when the Jesuits first came among them, what credit can be deemed due to their accounts of things preceding even the historical period of the Greeks, who were a learned, curious, and rational nation? Their great philosopher Confucius complains of a want of genuine historical memoirs in his time; and yet now the Jesuits, in conjunction with the modern Chinese, pretend to give a clear and authentic history of the monarchs of China, who lived two thousand years before

(D) In confirmation of what is here advanced, it may be observed, that neither we nor the Chinese have any thing more than fragments of the classical or canonical books, and those, as it is natural to suppose, greatly corrupted. The emperor Shi-awang-ti, in the year before Christ 213. ordered all the copies of books in the empire, except those written by lawyers and physicians, to be burnt; which was done accordingly. Nay, in order totally to destroy the memory of every thing contained in them, he commanded a great number of learned men, the next year, to be buried alive, that they might not find out a method of transmitting to posterity the historical memoirs of the empire, which he was resolved to annihilate. He was inspired with this resolution by a vanity peculiar to himself. For, being in reality the first absolute emperor of China, he was desirous of burying all the acts and exploits of his predecessors in oblivion, that his own achievements might shine with the greater lustre. This emperor also, in order to prevent the sudden incursions of the Tartars, as he gave out, but probably to indulge the same unaccountable vanity, built a wall from the sea to the extremities of the province of Shen si, the reality of which stupendous work would be now disbelieved, were it not still in being. Vu-ti, seventy-three years after the death of Shi-awang-ti, having collected all the scattered fragments of historical memoirs that had, with the utmost difficulty, been preserved, obliged his subjects with an edition of these fragments. But it is probable, that they met with the same fate on this occasion that happened to the fragments of the Sibylline verses burnt with the Capitol, in the civil war between the senate and Marius, at Rome. The latter, collected from various parts, were undoubtedly so corrupted, as to retain scarce any resemblance of the originals; and the former, as we have great reason to believe, have had so many interpolations and corruptions foisted into them, that they agree in few particulars with those ancient productions whose names they bear (4).

a that philosopher. Nothing certainly can be more absurd than such a pretension (E); and yet it would be unjust to deny every thing those fathers have related of the antient Chinese, since Abdallah Beidauæus, a Persian author, who wrote the history of China in the beginning of the fourteenth century, confirms some articles to be met with in them. We must, therefore, observe a medium between the two extremes which at present divide almost the whole literary world, and allow that the most antient historical memoirs of the Chinese are not intirely void of truth, though in the main they scarce merit the attention of the learned ⁿ.

(E) This most evidently appears from the translation M. Bayer has given us of the Chun çieu of Confucius. This contains a most rude, jejune, and imperfect account of the Chinese dynasties and reguli preceding the age in which he lived, that deserves not the name of an history. M. Bayer, therefore, very justly puts it upon a level with the rude memoirs of the better sort of farmers, and citizens, which contain nothing more than a plain and simple account of the most obvious and common events. Nor were the earlier Greek and Roman annals a whit more perfect or entertaining, according to Tully, and Sempronius Asellio in Gellius. Now, supposing the Chun çieu to be really as old as Confucius, it was written about five hundred years before the birth of Christ. And, if the greatest and most learned man in China at that time was no better qualified to write history, or then had no better materials for one, what can we think of the Chinese historians or historial memoirs of the remotest ages? But there is the greatest reason to believe, that this book is far from being genuine, or coeval with Confucius. For the emperor Shi-wang-ti destroyed all the historical memoirs in China about 267 years after the death of Confucius; and therefore but little of his historical works is probably now remaining. This single observation is sufficient to overthrow the authority of those romantic accounts of the first emperors of China, which the modern Chinese, and their adherents, would impose upon the world (5).

CHAP. I.

The Empire of China.

SECT. I.

A general view of the Chinese empire.

b THIS vast and opulent empire is situate on the most eastern verge of Asia; and comprehends, as hath been already hinted, the kingdom of China, properly so called, and the Chinese, or, as it is sometimes styled, Great Tartary. We have, in the foregoing Introduction, for the sake of those that have not the octavo edition of this work, prefixed a short account of its foundation, antient state, extent, religion, laws, &c. as far as it could be attained from antient authors and records ^a; and have brought down their history to their ninth monarch Shun; in whose family the crown being become hereditary, we thought it the properest period to begin the modern one ^b. In those early days this monarchy was confined within narrow bounds, or perhaps within the compass of one single province ^c; whose first colonies, having once plated themselves in it, seem to have taken such care to bear all the avenues to it from the rest of mankind, as never to be opened to any but ambassadors from other states; by which means they had not only all possible opportunities of extending their dominions, founding their government, and improving arts and sciences from the earliest times; and having so far spread themselves, as to become the noblest and largest monarchy hitherto discovered ^d, and to be justly esteemed the richest, largest, and most populous, of any that is now governed by one prince. Its whole extent, from the fortress of Caypim, in the province of Pe-king, situate under the 41st degree, to the most southern part of the island of Hay-nan, under the 18th degree of north latitude, is 23 degrees, from north to south. There are several other ways of extending its length and breadth to more advantage, which the reader may see in the margin (A). However, according to the best and latest surveys, ^e

(A) To compute the whole extent of this large country in length and breadth, the former must be taken from the north-eastern frontier-town of Xagyzwen, in the province of Lyau-tong, unto the last city of that of Tun-nan, called Chyen-tyen; and then its greatest length will be about 400 German, or 1600 English miles; to which if we add the island of Hay nan, which likewise belongs to China, and lies south of Quang-tong, or Canton, two degrees, or 120 miles, more must be added to its length. Its breadth may be also stretched to a greater extent, by measuring it from the town of Nimpo, a seaport town in the province of Che-kyang, to the utmost boundary of that of Se-chuen, or Su-chuen; by which it will amount to about 315 German, or 1269 of our miles. And if it be measured from the town of Tau-chuan, situate on the utmost eastern verge of Lyau-tong, on the surveys, it is found to be not of a circular, but oval figure, extending most from north to south, as was hinted in the note; and that its least extent, which way soever measured in a straight line, amounts to 360 leagues, of 20 to a degree, or to 60 of our miles^a. The most recent writer gives it still a greater extent; viz. 34 degrees from north to south, or 680 leagues; and considerably above 300 from east to west, even where it is narrowest; so that, according to him, the whole circuit of it extends above 1800 leagues†; but upon what new discoveries he founds his dimensions, we are not told.

Boundaries. CHINA is bounded on the north by Tartary, from which it is parted by the famous Chinese wall, of which we shall give a fuller account in its proper place; and, on the east, by the eastern or Chinese ocean; on the south, by the southern or Indian sea; and, on the west, by a vast sandy desert, and a long ridge of inaccessible mountains, which divide it from western Tartary and the kingdoms of Tibet, &c. It contains fifteen provinces (exclusive of that of Liau-tong, which is situate without the great wall, though under the same dominion; each of which might, for their largeness, fertility, populousness, and opulence, pass for so many distinct kingdoms. Their names and site are as follows: 1. Shen-si; 2. Shan-si; and, 3. Pe-che-li; which extend themselves on the north, along the Chinese wall. Four more are situate along the eastern ocean; viz. 4. Shan-tong; 5. Kyan-nang; 6. Che-kyang; and, 7. Fo-kyen. Four others stretch themselves towards the south and west; viz. 8. Quang-tong; 9. Quang-si; 10. Yu-nan; and, 11. Se-chuen. The four last, viz. 12. Ho-nan; 13. Hu-quang; 14. Quey-chew; and, 15. Kyang-si; take up the middle part: of all which, as well as of that of Liau-tong, we shall give a fuller account in a proper place, according to their order (B).

Provinces. As China extends so far from south to north, as from the second to the fifth climate, so must its temperature vary accordingly. The difference of the length of its days is little more than four hours; the longest, in the most northern parts, being about fourteen hours and three quarters, and the shortest, in the most southern, about ten hours and three quarters; and the nights proportionably^c. It is, however, generally reckoned very moderate, except only towards the north, where the cold is extremely piercing, not so much from its northern site, as from the ridges of mountains that intersect those parts, and are vastly high, and mostly covered with deep snows. Even in those parts which run under the tropics, the winds that blow thither from the large and mountainous parts of Tartary, make the cold weather exceeding piercing and severe during the three, and sometimes four, winter months (C). The southern parts frontiers of Korea, quite to that of Tsing-tau, on the most western part of the province of Shen-si, it will be still considerably wider (1).

Father Le Compte, who supposed the Chinese empire to be circular, gave it still a more extensive breadth; tho' he agreed, in the main, as to its length. But it hath been fully proved by new surveys to be of an oval form; and, consequently, that its breadth, where broadest, came short of its length by somewhat above a fourth part (2); that is, that it extends itself so much farther from north to south, than from the to west (3).

(B) It will not be improper here to apprise our readers, once for all, that in the orthography of these provinces, and all others, proper names of men, cities, &c. (which are so differently spelt by all the authors who have written of this country) we have followed the judicious English translator of Father Du Halde, who hath taken no small pains to reduce it, as near as was possible, to the English idiom (4), both in the maps, and in the body of the work. The power and sound of the Chinese letters, vowels as well as consonants, differ so vastly from those of Europe, that those authors have split themselves into an almost irreconcilable, as well as unintelligible, dissonance, in endeavouring to convey those sounds, which can only be taught by the ear, by such letters of their respective alphabets as they thought came nearest to them: so that, considering the vast difference of pronunciation between most European nations, it was impossible for them to convey those sounds, without spelling them each according to the peculiar pronunciation of his own country: and hence proceeds that vast difference of writing the same name between the Spaniards, Portuguese, English, French, Italians, High and Low Dutch, &c.

What adds still more to this variety, is the number of letters or sounds, peculiar to the Chinese; to which none of our European alphabets afford us any thing equivalent, or even approaching to. This peculiarity, moreover, extends itself not only to vowels and consonants, but much more with respect to some of their gutturals and compound letters; instances of which the reader may see in great numbers in the preface above-mentioned. But, with respect to the gutturals, we shall beg to subjoin a singular one, which that ingenious author hath not taken notice of, but which hath been a pregnant cause of this variety of spellings.

The Chinese language abounds in gutturals, which few of our polite Europeans have. One of them, in particular, is so deep and harsh, that neither the Hebrew, Chaldean, Syriac, Greek, or any other tongue, except perhaps the Arabic, have any thing answerable to it. This the Spanish and Portuguese expressed, as well as they could, by their X, which, with them, is pronounced gutturally, though nothing so deep. But as that letter hath a quite different sound among other European nations, each of them was forced to substitute some other for it, such as seemed to them to come nearest to the original; some by a k, others by a c, others by ch, &c. And hence, to prevent all confusion and misunderstanding, as much as possible, we shall not only confine ourselves to the orthography above-named, as the most adapted to our English pronunciation; but shall likewise, whenever it differs so much from any other authors quoted in the sequel, give those names according to their own way of writing it, that there may be no doubt about our meaning the same person or place.

(C) This would hardly be credited, were it not confirmed to us by most travellers that have visited those parts at the cold season, and particularly by Father Le Compte; who, in the relation he gives of his journey from Nimpo to Pe-king, assures us, that the frost was so a parts, on the other hand, must be supposed to be exceeding hot and dry, the nearer they draw towards the tropic, or extend beyond it ; but those heats are the more easily borne by the help of their fine cooling grottoes, groves, cooling shades, and other refreshing retirements to which they repair during the heat of the day ; at which time there is the same universal silence, and cessation from business, as if it was midnight. These southern parts have indeed neither frost nor snow ; but they are much troubled with storms, and violent rains, about the time of the equinoxes, especially the autumnal, which is all the winter they have ; all the rest of the year being crowned with a serene sky, and a most delightful verdure. Upon the whole, it is universally owned by those who have visited that large empire, that where nature has been most unequal in the distribution of her gifts, the Chinese industry hath so far supplied that defect, by levelling whole ridges of mountains in some provinces, and raising of artificial ones in others ; by providing proper fences against excessive colds in some, and heats and droughts in others ; and by varying their agriculture, their manuring, planting, and sowing, according to the different soils and climates, that every spot almost of that vast territory produces more than enough to make its inhabitants rich and happy, and the whole country delightful and fertile, populous, healthy, and opulent ; all which is farther improved by the vast number of canals cut from one river to another, and the innumerable carriages they keep up by land, by which each canton may easily communicate its own peculiar product to all the rest, as we shall see more fully in the sequel.

UPON all these accounts, the Chinese entertained such extraordinary notions of themselves and country, that they looked upon all the rest of the world, and its inhabitants, with the utmost contempt (D), especially till they became better acquainted with the Europeans, or even till their last conquest by the Tartars. We have formerly spoken of the various names which antient authors, and the neighbouring nations, gave to this country ², that of Cong-qua, by which they themselves style it, signifies the kingdom of the middle, they supposing it to be situate in centre of the world : to this they not only joined the names of the head of each dynasty, as often as the government passed from one family to another, an account of which the reader will see in the following note (E) ; but added likewise some pompous title to the qua, which signi-severe in January and February, that he was forced to lie by till the ice could be broken for his passage over the river Hoambo ; which, though one of the largest in China, was then almost frozen over (5).

(D) The advantages which they had over those neighbouring nations they knew or heard of, appeared so considerable to them, that they looked upon themselves as the only favourites of heaven, and all the rest of mankind as barbarians, whom they represented as dwarfs, monsters, and contemptible creatures. They looked upon their country to be placed in the centre of the earth ; and themselves as the only people who had a human form, size, and shape : whilst all the other nations, or kingdoms, which they made to amount to seventy-two, were scattered about in small islands, without any order ; the biggest of which, according to their maps, was not so large as the least of the Chin se provinces ; and these were stuck up round their empire (to which they gave a quadrangular form), as so many nut-shells, or small satellites attending on their great planet, and designed only to serve and adorn it. They gave indeed the preference to their four neighbouring kingdoms of Tartary, Japan, Tong-king, and Korea ; whom, though they still styled barbarians, they imagin'd to have some considerable improvements by their vicinity to China ; but as to the rest, they were looked upon as outcasts into the extreme parts of the earth, as the dross and refuse of nature ; and characterised them accordingly, in their maps, with such emblems as were aptest to inspire their nation with disdain and contempt of them (6).

It was therefore no small matter of wonder to them, when, upon their coming acquainted with the Europeans, they not only found them as polite and rational as themselves, but far superior to them in all kinds of learning : neither could they conceive how it was possible for them to have arrived to such a perfection in all sciences, without the assistance of their own writings ; so that they, who, till then, had looked upon themselves as the only people whom heaven had blessed with eyes, whilst all the rest of mankind were left to grope in the dark, were now forced to allow the Europeans to have one eye at least (7).

(E) We have formerly given a short account of the first dynasty, from Fo-hi and his eight successors, down to Shun (8). The others, in number, twenty-two, together with the number of emperors belonging to each family, and the number of years they reigned, may be seen at one view in the following table :

so named. a
fies a kingdom; such as, Tum-ming-qua, the kingdom of brightness or perfection; Tayn-chin-qua, the kingdom of purity; Tyen-bu-qua, or the kingdom which contains all that is under heaven; and others of the like import. The Tartars, though they naturally hated the pompous pride of the Chinese, are yet fond of those swollen titles, since they have made themselves masters of that noble kingdom, and become less and less averse to the softness, ease, and luxury, of their new subjects. As to the name of China, which some derive from Cina, or Tsin, one of the ancient monarchs; and others from their silk, which is called Chin^b; it is most likely the Europeans brought it first from Persia, or India, whither that commodity was first imported, and where it is called Chin, or Tsin^c.

When first discovered by the Europeans. b
WHAT imperfect notion the ancients had of this vast empire, and what commerce they had with it, we have elsewhere endeavoured to shew^k. The first European traveller that we know of, who visited it, was Fra. Paulo, a Venetian, more commonly known by the name of Paulus Venetus, or Paul the Venetian, about the end of the thirteenth century. But his swollen account of the great cham, or emperor; of his capital, which he calls Cambalu; and other extraordinary particulars which he related of that country; not only led his readers to imagine, that he there prescribed the empire of Tartary, but that the greatest part of it was too exaggerated to deserve any credit, or a better character than that of a fine romance. The whole, however, was afterwards sufficiently verified by the discovery of China by the Portuguese; when it plainly appeared, that it was this noble empire he had been describing; and that Cambalu, by the particular account he had been giving of it, was no other than the Chinese metropolis, now called Pe-king (F). Since which time, the more they have become acquainted with China, the better they have been satisfied of the faithfulness of that Venetian traveller. c

The Europeans no less so at that of the Chinese. e
ACCORDINGLY, when the Portuguese first discovered this country by sea, above 200 years ago, they were so surprised at the beauty and opulence of it, as well as at the ingenuity and politeness of its inhabitants, so far beyond what they had observed in any other country they had hitherto met with, they scarce knew whether they ought to believe their own eyes: and indeed they had so much more cause to be surprised at it, as they found them a people that live wholly within themselves, and who consequently had received no helps or improvements from any other nations: neither could their first accounts of them meet with any greater credit here in Europe, than those of Paulus Venetus had done before, till they were confirmed by a cloud of other eye-witnesses, whom either curiosity, commerce, or religion, invited into this new and surprising world; especially since the year 1580, when the pope began to send, and hath continued pouring, a great number of Jesuits and other priests into it, in order to bring as many of that polite nation as he could into the pale of his church. Nor were the relations of these last so universally credited (especially as many of them appeared not only exaggerated, but even in a greater measure romantic, at least in whatever related to religion, or their numerous conversions), till we had them, or at least a great part of them, further confirmed by persons of other nations and religions, and less liable to be suspected. So that, upon the whole, it was no less matter of wonder to the Europeans, than to the Chinese, to find a part of the world, at such a distance from them, so like themselves in learning and politeness; while all the vast tracts that lay between them, are still so far inferior, not to say opposite to them, in both respects. It must be owned, however, that the Chinese found as much superior to them in the liberal sciences; witness those vast improvements they have made to them by the assistance of the missionaries, and of that vast apparatus of instruments which have been sent to them from France, and other parts: but, in point of richness, opulence, fundry manufactures, handicrafts, and, to say nothing of their excellent agriculture lately mentioned, and the many excellent ways they have of fertilizing and improving even their most barren lands, it will be hardly denied that they exceed any country in Europe; all which will more fully appear in the sequel. f

China, how divided. THE Chinese empire hath been long since divided into northern and southern; the former of which, commonly known among the Indians, Persians, Russians, &c. by the name of

(F) It is now generally acknowledged, that Cathai is the northern part of China; and Cambalu, the capital of it, to be the same city as is now called Pe-king; which name, signifying the northern court, in opposition to Nang-king, which is the southern one, was doubtless given it when the Chinese monarchs were obliged to remove their court from the latter to the former, in order to be more at hand to suppress the inroads which the Tartars were continually making upon them from that side. It appears moreover, from the relation of the Russian embassy to China, Anno 1653, that the Muscovites still call that northern part of it Chatai, or Kathai, and its metropolis Cambalu, or, according to some others, Cambalet, which names signify the city of God (11). We shall have further occasion to speak of them both, when we come to the division of that empire, and the description of the city of Pe-king.

(11) Texeira, & al. Vid. et hist. des Tartar, D'Herbelot sub Kathai, & Martiniere sub Cambalu.

Chatai,

- a Chatai, or Katai, contained six of its provinces; and the latter distinguished by the name of Mangi, which contains the other nine. Cambalu, or, as it hath been since called, Pe-king, was the capital of the one, and Nang-king that of the other¹. We have already given the name and situation of these provinces which compose this vast territory; and shall only observe here, that, as they divided the whole heavens into 28 constellations, so they did their provinces; each of which latter they placed under one of the former, without leaving any of them for the rest of the globe. To each province they allowed not only an unreasonable length and breadth; but likewise dignified them with some swollen title, answerable to those which they gave to the empire in general. They have indeed been taught since, by the Europeans, a better sort of astronomy and geography, and how to judge more truly of the rest of the world; but it must be owned, that, till then, the great advantages they enjoyed above those few nations they knew, might naturally enough inspire them with that partial value and opinion they had of their own.

- THEIR country is so divided by art and nature from the rest of the world, as if designed to have been still contained within its own limits; being bounded, as was lately hinted, on the east and south, by the ocean; on the west, by deserts and inaccessible mountains; and, on the north, by a wall of such length, height, and strength, that it is justly esteemed the greatest piece of art that the world can boast of: so that the coasts along the sea being defended either by prodigious high rocks, shelves, and small islands, or by a vast number of sea-ports equally strong and commodious; and their frontiers on the west and north by fortified towns, castles, and other fortresses, and large garrisons; it seems as if the Chinese monarchs had had no other view than to secure themselves from all foreign invasions, without any design of enlarging their dominions beyond those limits. Their history hath however shewn us, that they were mistaken in both their reckonings; since they have not only been more than once conquered by the Tartars, under whose dominion they now are, and themselves have also been obliged to extend their conquests into some of the Tartarian provinces, in order to prevent the frequent and dreadful incursions they made on them from that side, notwithstanding their strong barrier; all which sufficiently shews the shortness of human forecast; since it was their too great confidence in these, and some other advantages we are going to mention, that lulled them into that state of luxury and indolence which made them fall so easy a prey into the hands of their warlike neighbours, when they the least thought of it, or were least able to make head against them.

How defended.

- ANOTHER advantage, for which this country has been famed from the earliest times, was, the vast number of its inhabitants. It doth not indeed appear to us to have been so soon peopled as the Chinese records affirm; much less to have been so immensely populous so few ages after the flood as is there pretended; but, that it became so in process of time, there is not the least doubt to be made, if we consider either the vast quantity and largeness of their cities, towns, and villages, which, in most provinces, are so thick, and close to each other, that the whole seems but one continued town, and all of them swarming with inhabitants; every one employed in some manufacture, trade, or some kind of traffick or work; or their roads from place to place, which are crowded with passengers night and day, with coaches, carriages, wag-gons, and sometimes with whole caravans, all of them employed in carrying on some useful commerce, and in conveying all sorts of merchandizes, provisions, and other wares, from one end of the kingdom to the other; or the vast standing armies that are kept in constant pay, and the numerous garrisons they are forced to maintain on their frontiers and sea-ports; or, lastly, from the registers that are regularly kept both of their forces, and of the rest of the nation.

Vast number of inhabitants.

- ACCORDING to these, we are told by some authors, that the number of families, exclusive of soldiers, and those that pay no taxes to the government, amounted to 11,502,872; but, including the army, the whole number of males was computed to amount to 59,788,364: the army, then, consisted of 902,054 men, who guarded the frontiers, and 989,167 horses, always ready for auxiliary forces, besides 767,970 men kept in their garrisons^m (G). To these Niewhoff, quoted in the last note, adds 564,200 horses more, maintained by the emperor, to supply his troops, or to serve for posts and messengers on public and extraordinary occasions. For these, as well as for the accommodation of the Mandarins, and other officers of the court, that are sent to different parts of the empire, there are reckoned 1145 inns, or places of entertainment: so that, upon the whole, to speak in the style of one of

^m MACAILLAN, LE COMPTE, LA MARTINIERE, & al.

(G) This prodigious account is in a great measure confirmed by Niewhoff, who attended the Dutch embassy into China; and who tells us, that, at that time, the registers made the number of families to amount to 10,090,792; and that of the fighting men to 55,410,476, including horse and foot, garrisons, &c.

their natives (H), the Chinese empire is so immensely populous, that its inhabitants are not to be computed by thousands, but by millions; and, if we may believe the accounts of some of the Jesuit missionaries, some of their capital cities contain little less than two millions of inhabitants^o.

Barges that supply Pe-king.

Vast numbers living on the water.

Number of their cities and fortresses.

Their different ranks.

Military ones.

Castles.

Towns, &c.

THE very number of barges, and those very capacious ones, appointed by the government for the conveyance of provisions, silks, rice, and other necessaries, from the southern provinces to the metropolis of Pe-king, amount to 9999; which number is strictly kept up, not so much out of a superstitious fondness for that number, if we may believe those writers, as because it carries a much greater sound, than if, by the addition of one more, they were to make it a complete 10,000. Thus much may suffice to give our readers an idea of the populousness of this vast empire: we might indeed add to it the many myriads of families which live almost continually on the water along the coasts, on the rivers and canals; and carry on a considerable traffick on their large flat-bottom boats, or, as they call them, floating villages; and are resorted to from those that live at land in such vast crowds, that they appear like so many fairs kept on that element: but these we shall find a more proper occasion to speak of in the sequel.

WE lately hinted, that this country doth so abound with cities, that a man is scarcely got out of one, but he enters into the suburbs of another. We shall defer, however, the further description of them, till we come to speak of the several provinces they belong to: in the mean time, as we are now upon the subject of the strength and populousness of this vast empire, it will not be amiss to give our readers the sum of them at one view, and according to their rank: together with their other fortresses and strong-holds, as they are scattered through the whole; some within the heart of the provinces, to guard the roads; others on the mountainous parts, to suppress the robbers and freebooters; and a third sort to guard the frontiers on the west and north side, especially on the latter, against the Tartars. The number of them, as it was taken by Father Magaillan, out of a Chinese book, compiled by an expert Mandarin for the use of the government, is as follows: Walled towns, 4402; and these are divided into two orders, viz. civil and military, of which 2045 belong to the former, and 2357 to the latter. The civil are again divided into three different ranks, stiled by the Chinese Fû (or, as they pronounce that word, Foo), Chew, and Hyen; of which, 175 are reckoned of the first rank, stiled Fû; 270 of the second, or Chew; and 160 of the third order, or Hyen.

THE militaay ones are distinguished into seven different ranks; of which, 629 are reckoned of the first, 560 of the second, 311 of the third, 300 of the fourth, 150 of the fifth, 100 of the sixth, and 300 of the seventh. Father Le Compte tells us, that 1000 of these only are reckoned of the first rank; and that their strength rather consists in their situation, and numerous garrisons, than in the stoutness of their out-works^p (I). Some of those military cities are assigned to the soldiery; together with a quantity of land to their neighbourhood, for their maintenance. As to the castles on the coasts, which are computed at 439; several of them are very large, and come little short of walled cities for the number of their inhabitants; and all of them strong by nature and art, and defended by good garrisons: besides which, they reckon no less than 2022 towns, or boroughs, along the sea-coasts, most of them equal in bigness to walled towns. The inland towns and villages, we are told, are almost numberless, and every-where crouded with inhabitants. From all these the emperors receive an immense income, as will be seen in the sequel; there being but thirty-two that are wholly exempt from taxes; and these, being governed by their own lords, or petty kings, are however obliged to pay a kind of homage, or perhaps some small tribute to the court^q.

^q LE COMPTE, ubi supra, letter 3

(H) The writer here meant was called Dionysus Kao, a Chinese convert, who had been employed by some of the court Mandarins to write an accurate survey of the then state of China. His account was since brought into Europe by his excellence Mr. Ixbrandt Ides, who was sent ambassador from the late czar, Peter the Great, to the court of China, Anno 1694, and is highly recommended by him (12).

(I) It may not be amiss to observe here, that Kao the Chinese, mentioned in the last note, doth differ from our Mandarin in the number of these cities, and makes the whole number of them to amount to but 1700; and Navaretta only to 1536, that is, 148 of the first rank, 239 of the second, and 1549 of the third. Other authors differ still more from him, and from each other; which shews either that they took their account from different surveys, or perhaps from report, or that there may have happened some changes in the ranks of those cities. We have followed that of the Mandarin above-mentioned, on the authority of Father Maguillan, as being the most likely to be authentic, and being the most agreeable to the newer accounts published by Du Halde; as will further appear, when we come to give the number of them belonging to each distinct province.

- a To this vast number of their cities and fortresses, and the immense one of its inhabitants, if we add their prodigious wealth, brought in by such a vast quantity of hands continually employed either in a foreign or domestic commerce, in a great variety of rich and curious manufactures, and ingenious handicraft trades; in the cultivating of the most fertile, or improvement of the most barren, lands; in digging up of gold, silver, copper, and other metals and minerals, from the bowels of their many rich mines, besides a great variety of diamonds, and other precious stones; if to these we add the excellent situation of it for commerce, the richness and vast extent of it abroad, the many navigable rivers and numberless canals for carrying it on at home; the infinite variety of their carriages both by land and water; the healthiness and serenity of their climate, and industry of the inhabitants, the encouragement given to it, as well as to the arts and sciences, by its politic government, and the happy genius of the nation for promoting and improving every kind and branch of them; or, lastly, the vast power and riches of the sovereign, the excellence of their laws and government, and the remarkable fondness of the people for that as well as for antient laws, customs, religion, &c.; it will no longer appear surprising, that an empire, which enjoyed such a vast number of advantages, should have maintained itself in such a height of wealth and splendor during such a long series of ages. The wonder will rather be, how they came, after so long and glorious a continuance, to degenerate so far from their valour and politics, as to suffer their whole country to be over-run and conquered, and their monarchy overturned, in almost as few years as it had stood thousands. But, before we come to speak of that strange event, and the changes it hath wrought in that vast empire, it will be necessary, according to our usual method, to give a general description of the country, and of every thing that is most remarkable in it.

Signal advantages of the Chinese monarchy.

A topographical description of the fifteen provinces of China.

- d TH E situation, limits, extent, and division, of the Chinese empire, have been shewn at the beginning of the last section; where we mentioned its being divided into fifteen provinces, viz. six styled northern, and nine southern (exclusive of that of Liau-tong, which, being situate without the wall, will be spoken of in a more proper place); the other fifteen are reckoned in the following order:

Fifteen provinces described.

- e 1. THE province of Pe-che-li, alias Lipa-fu, but most commonly called, from its great metropolis, Pe-king, which is now the seat of the empire, is bounded on the east by the yellow sea; on the north, by the great wall which divides it from eastern Tartary; on the west, by the province of Sban-si; and, on the south, by those of Sban-tong and Ho-nan. It is now the first and chief of the whole empire; and extends itself, in a kind of triangular form, from the 36th to the 41st degree of latitude, and from the 113th to the 119th of east longitude. It is divided into nine districts, each of which is under its capital city, styled by the Chinese Fu, or city of the first rank; from which a number of other cities depend (A), viz. 20 of the second rank, or Chew; and 120 of the third, or Hyen; besides a great many large towns, and villages without number^a.

1. The province of Pe-che-li.

- f THIS province, though the most northern next to that of Liau-tong, in the whole empire, is blessed with a very clear air; and, though excessive cold in winter, enjoys a very serene sky, which is seldom overcast with any clouds, even during that hard season. The rains are not very frequent; but that defect is amply compensated by the fruitful dews. The country affords but little rice; but abounds with other grains, pulse, and variety of cattle.

The climate, soil, and produce.

(A) It will be necessary here to observe, once for all, that every province in the Chinese empire is divided into a number of districts or jurisdictions, called by the Chinese Fu, or city of the first rank. On these depend a lesser sort of districts, named Chew and Hyen, because each of them depend on their respective Fu, as here our bailiwicks, or inferior courts, do on the superior ones. The president of the supreme court is styled Chi-fu, or governor of a city of the first rank, the next in order Chi-cheu, and the last Chi-Hyen. Hence in every Fu there is always a Quan-Fu, or Mandarin with the title of Chi-fu, and at least another with that of Chi-Hyen. But in the great cities of all, whose territories are so large as to be divided into two inferior districts, each of these have their particular Chi-Hyen.

When mention is made here of a Hyen, or city of the third rank, the reader must not suppose it to mean a district of a small extent, there being many of them of 60, 70, or even 80, leagues in circuit, and which pay several millions into the emperor's treasury (1). Neither must it be imagined, that those other towns, which are excluded from any rank, are inconsiderable ones, there being many of them as large as cities; the reason of their being denied that title, is, because they are encompassed with neither walls nor ditches, as the cities are (2).

(1) See Du Halde in English, p. 2.

(2) Ibid. p. 67. Vid. et Le Compte, lett. 3. & al.

The inhabitants are stout and warlike; but are more unpolished and ignorant than in the southern provinces. The rivers are often frozen, more or less, here, from November to March; and yet the weather is nothing so piercing as it is in Europe, under the same climate.

Its cities.

General view of them.

THIS province reckons about 140 cities, amongst which those styled Fû, or of the first rank, are Pe-king, al. Shun-tyen-fû, the metropolis of the whole, under which are twenty-six districts, or cities of the second and third rank; viz. six of the former, and twenty of the latter; whose names we shall not trouble our readers with, much less with their description, which would swell beyond our bounds. It will be sufficient to add here, to what we have said of their largeness, opulence, and populousness, that they are for the most part built of a square or oblong-square form, as much as the ground would permit. Their walls are high, thick, and strong, adorned with lofty towers. The gates are spacious, deep, and stately; and the great streets strait and broad, and intersected with others which cross them at right angles, and both sides filled with houses. The squares, or piazzas, are wide, and adorned with noble structures; and some of them, as well as some of their streets, with triumphal arches, and other decorations; particularly, with stately towers, some round, others octagonal, from six to nine storeys high, embellished with galleries, carvings, gilding, and variety of other ornaments (B).

Shops finely set out.

Streets dusty and dirty.

THE city-walls are mostly high and strong, and encompassed with broad ditches, some dry, and others, filled with water. As for their edifices, especially their public buildings, such as their temples, palaces, monasteries, &c. they are more remarkable for their vast extent, than for their magnificence. Their private houses are likewise large, but low, few of them exceeding one storey in height, and without any windows towards the street. The shops are delightfully set out with all their rich merchandizes, such as china-ware, silks, japan cabinets, screens, and other such goods, with great variety of gold and silver work, jewels, and all other commodities both domestic and foreign. Before each door stands a pedestal, to which is fastened a board, from 20 to 22 feet high, on which is either carved, painted, or gilt, the shopkeeper's name, his sign, and some of his principal wares, with these words at the foot, Pû-hû, in large characters, that is, he will not cheat you. This double row of pilasters, set up at equal distances, yields likewise a very agreeable prospect^b. The misfortune is, that those streets that are not paved (and few of them are so in China) prove so dusty in dry and windy weather, that it is not only very offensive to the vast crowds that continually throng them, but hurtful likewise to the fine merchandizes that are exposed; in so much that they are obliged to cover them with some sort of cloths, to prevent their being spoiled. These clouds of dust, which are still increased by multitudes of horses, chaises, carts, waggons, and other carriages, not only stick upon their silken clothes, and spoil the fine lustre of them, especially those made of satin, which they commonly oil, to give it a better gloss; but penetrate even into their very houses and closets, though they have no windows towards the streets: so that, take what care they will, their furniture is quite covered, and the people almost choaked, with it. They do indeed endeavour to prevent it as much as possible by frequent watering of the streets; but they either soon get dry again, or else become dirty and miry. In rainy weather they are still more incommodious on that account; so that, winter or summer, they are very troublesome, and even unhealthy, to walk in. This great inconvenience is not confined to their inferior cities, but runs through all their most considerable ones, and even to the very capital itself^c, as the reader may see by the description we are going to give of it.

Cities of the first rank.

1. Pe-king described.

THE cities of the first rank in this province are, 1. Cbun-tien-fû, since called Pe-king; 2. Pau-ting-fû; 3. Ho-kyen-fû; 4. Cbing-ting-fû; 5. Shun-te-fû; 6. Quang-ping-fû; 7. Tay-ming-fû; 8. Yung-ping-fû; 9. Swen-wha-fû.

1. SHUN-TYEN-FU, since styled Pe-king, or the northern court, on account of its being become the imperial residence, and metropolis of the whole empire, is pleasantly situate on a large and fertile plain, under the 40th degree of north latitude, and 117° 30' of east longitude, about twenty miles south from the great wall. It was formerly of a square figure, and about four leagues in compass: but, since the conquest of the empire by the Tartars, the Chinese being excluded out of it, and permitted to build a new one adjoining to it, it is now of an oblong square form, and about six leagues or 3600 paces in circuit; or rather

(B) We shall, for the satisfaction of our readers, find a proper place for giving them a sketch of one or two of the most curious of them, by way of sample, when we come to speak of their artificial rarities; as likewise for describing some few of their most considerable cities, public structures, &c. in the course of this section, so as to give them a sufficient idea of the rest;

as they, generally speaking, observe pretty much the same symmetry in their form, buildings, &c. That of Pe-king, especially, which is the metropolis of this province, and the present seat of the empire, deserving a more particular notice, will be described at the close of this article, and the others in their course.

^a is become two cities, the old one of which is called the Tartar, and the other the Chinefe, ^{Old and new city.} town; and this last, though the least, is reckoned the most populous (C).

THE walls of both cities are stately and strong, being computed by some 40, by others ^{The city walls.} 50, cubits high, which quite obstruct the sight of their finest and stateliest edifices, and are thick enough for several men on horseback to ride abreast upon them: they are moreover flanked with stately towers, at the distance of a bow shot from each other, and all kept in good repair; a horseman may ascend those of the new city by means of a ramp, or flow ascent; and in several places there are houses built to serve for a corps de garde; and some of the towers are capacious enough to lodge a corps de reserve.

^b THE gates are nine in number; three on the south front, and two on the other three sides. ^{Stately gates.} Their structure is altogether magnificent, and beyond any thing we see in Europe (if we except the architecture). They are of a surprising height; and inclose a spacious court within four stout walls; over two of which, viz. on the city and country side, are built stately lodgings, or rather castles, which yield a very noble prospect, being about eight or nine storeys high, each storey being perforated with windows and loopeyholes. The lowest storey is a large hall for the officers and soldiers, who are either upon duty, or going to be relieved; and before some of those gates, in the city of Ching-ting-fu, is seen a spacious area, or parade, about 360 feet, encompassed by a semicircular wall of the same height with those of the city.

^c THE streets are spacious and beautiful to a great degree, being all laid out with the line, ^{Noble streets;} and most of them at least a league in length, and about 120 feet wide, with shops for the most part on both sides; but the houses, which are but one story high, bear no proportion ^{thronged with people.} with the largeness of the streets: however, they are very spacious within, and so crouded with inhabitants, that it is surprising to see what a number of families they hold. This makes the city to be so thronged with people, as well as horses, mules, camels, asses, carts, waggons, &c. that many of our great cities in Europe are said to look like solitudes, in comparison with them: infomuch that people of quality are forced to have men on horseback to clear the way before them; and the very tradesmen chuse to ride in their chaises, not only to break through the crouds, but likewise to avoid the dust and dirt of the street (D).

^d What is more surprising, is, that, among those vast throngs of men, there is not a woman to be seen. The streets, as every-where else, have all their proper names, and the great ^{Their names.} ones of all some pompous one: such as, the street of the king's relations, of the white tower, and the noblest of all is styled the street of eternal rest.

(C) Father Le Compte, who measured it by the emperor's order, reckons it to be about four times as big but as Paris: as the houses are but one storey high, the streets very wide, and the imperial palace in it, together with its parks, gardens, canals, &c. take up a vast extent of its ground, he doth not take it to lodge a much greater quantity of inhabitants than that French capital; though he owns, at the same time, that the inhabitants of Pe-king hardly take up half the room in their lodgings that the Parisians do: he computes, however, upon the whole, that each of those capitals contain about two millions of people (3); which, if true of Pe-king, is near double the number at least of what will be found either in Paris, or even in London, which is allowed the bigger, and the more populous, of the two (4).

(D) We lately took notice, that most cities in China, for want of being paved, labour alternately under these two inconveniences: which is not a little surprising in a country seemingly so well regulated in every thing else, and much more so to see so noble a metropolis as this is more plagued with them than any other; at least this was the condition in which Father Le Compte found it when he was there (5). However, we are informed that it hath been rectified since (6); and that not only every citizen is obliged to sweep before his door, but that the very soldiers are employed to keep the new city clean, even when the emperor is absent; so that it is chiefly the old city, which, by reason of the narrowness of its streets, is more neglected, and left to lie in mud and dirt.

As to the city in general, there may indeed be many causes assigned for its being more crouded and thronged than any of the rest, besides the vast number of its inhabitants.

For, 1. Great multitudes of people daily resort thither from all the adjacent parts for many miles round, who bring all manner of provisions to its market.

2. As no river comes up to the city, all kinds of merchandizes, and all manner of other necessaries, that are pouring into it from morning to night, must come thither by land carriage, which fills their streets with continual droves of carts, waggons, and beasts of burden; infomuch that, at the opening of the city gates in the morning, they are so thronged with them, that many of them must wait some hours before they can get in.

3. The great concourse of quality that flock to the court, and the great retinue that attends them, the Mandarins, and other officers, in their formalities, the princes of the blood, and other persons of distinction, who are always escorted with a numerous train of horsemen and servants, do all contribute more or less to fill up the streets, so as to make the city appear more full of inhabitants than it really is.

To all these we may add the vast numbers of carmen, porters, chairmen, and other people, that ply the streets; and a much greater of handicraftsmen, such as taylors, smiths, brasiers, carpenters, &c. who are obliged to go about in quest of business: for, as few of them work at home, but at their customers houses, great crouds of them must be supposed to turn out daily in such a city as this, and help to increase the throng; especially as many of them, either for want of better employment, or natural indolence, will stand staring in large groups at every juggler and mountebank they see; or listening to fortune-tellers and ballad-singers, who are to be met with in every part of the town.

Form.

THIS last, which runs from east to west, is terminated at the north end with the walls of the imperial palace; and, on the opposite side, with the city tribunals, and the palaces of men of quality. Its breadth is computed about sixty yards, and its length above a league and a quarter; and is adorned on each side of the finest edifices. All the great streets, which run in a strait line parallel with the walls from gate to gate, have their corps de garde; where the soldiers, with swords by their sides, and whips in their hands, keep watch day and night; and chastise, without distinction, all that cause any disturbance, and confine such as make any resistance. There is the same watch kept in the lesser or cross streets, which terminate in the great ones, and are shut up at each end in the night with wooden cross-bar-gates, thro' which the watch in the greater streets may see all that pass in the lesser: and both cities are kept under such strict regulations, that, except the great hurry of the day, occasioned by the throng lately mentioned, which ends with or soon after it, every part of the town is kept under the greatest discipline and quietness, peace and safety (E).

Guard.

Suburbs.

BESIDES the old and new city above-mentioned, every side hath likewise a capacious suburb without the walls, of which that on the west side is the largest. The streets in these are built much after the same manner as those within, being parallel to each other, and to the city-wall, and crossing each other at proper distances: so that, if these be added to the rest, the circuit of Pe-king may be computed to extend about 25 miles. The private houses, both within and without the walls, are low, but deep and long, and mostly built with brick, and covered with glazed tiles; which, when the sun shines upon them, make such a glittering as is painful to the eye. They make but an indifferent shew without, except in their fine shops; but are exceeding neat and convenient within, though neither richly nor elegantly furnished, and most of them crowded with families.

Houses.

Plenty of all things.

WHAT is the most surprising of all, in this great city, is the plenty and cheapness of all sorts of commodities and provisions; especially considering its vast concourse and number of its inhabitants, and that it is situate in one of the most barren spots in the empire. But it must be remembered, that all the merchandizes and treasures of the Indies, &c. are transported hither from all parts by means of the eastern or yellow sea, and of the royal canals: that several thousands of the emperor's vessels, besides a much larger number of others belonging to private persons, are continually employed in supplying both court and city with every thing that can be wished for, either for the support or pleasure of life; so that it is a common saying among the Chinese, that though nothing grows about Pe-king, it never knows the want of any thing. The governor of the city is the person who has the direction not only of the soldiery and guards; but his jurisdiction extends over all the people, in whatever concerns the civil state, and the public peace and safety (F).

How supplied.

The governor's office.

Public edifices.

IT is time now to speak of some of the public buildings which adorn this metropolis; such as the imperial palace, temples, monasteries, &c. We begin with the first of them, as being the most spacious and magnificent of all, and one of the greatest curiosities in the whole empire.

The imperial palace described.

IT is situate in the very heart of the Tartar city, fronting the south, as all the public buildings there generally do; and is, properly speaking, a prodigious group of edifices, vast courts, gardens, parks, ponds, &c. all surrounded with a stately brick wall, of an oblong square form, and considerable height; and about twelve Chinese li's, or furlongs, in compass. This wall hath battlements along the curtains, and is adorned at each angle with little pavilions; and over each of the gates is another pavilion, stronger and more lofty than the former, and surrounded with a gallery supported by pillars resembling our peristyles; and

(E) Each watch is obliged to patrolle all the night in their respective streets, as soon as the signal is given for the shutting of them up at night; so that no quarrel or disturbance can happen, or even people pass unperceived. None are suffered to walk in the night, except they give a good account of their errand; such as fetching a physician, surgeon, or midwife, or being sent about the government's business. Even these last, if their answer is such as gives the officers any cause of suspicion, when questioned by him, are confined in the guard-room till the next morning, and then brought before a proper judge. The officer of the guard likewise, that is kept on the high pavilions over the city-gates, and beat the watch on large kettle-drums, having full view of all the streets, is obliged to send some of his subalterns to examine the quarters belonging to the gates where they are posted. All these are kept under such strict discipline, that the least neglect of duty is severely punished the next morning, and the officers broken for it; and what keeps them still more on their guard, is, that the governor of the city, who is likewise obliged to go the rounds, often comes upon them when they least expect him (7).

(F) This grand officer, who is a Manchew Tartar, is styled Kyu-men-ti-tu, or general of the nine gates, and hath a quantity of ministers under him, answerable to his great post. And such strict discipline is observed under him, both by the soldiery and citizens, that one shall hardly hear, in several years, of an house being broken open, or a man murdered; which is so much the more to be admired among such an infinite multitude and mixture of Tartars and Chinese; all which is owing to the excellent order which is kept under him, which makes it next to impossible for any such crimes to be committed, and the authors escape their due punishment (8).

THE outward wall which surrounds the inclosure above-mentioned, is fifteen li's, or fur-^{The outer in-}longs, in circuit; and the space between it and the inner is chiefly taken up with the houses ^{closure, and} or apartments of the chief officers of the emperor's household, with the several tribunals, ^{its apartments.} treasury, storehouses, wardrobes, and eunuchs belonging to it. These last, in the time of ^{Eunuchs sup-}the Chinese monarchs, we are told, amounted to 10,000; and were at length become so ^{pressed.} powerful and corrupt, that they proved the main cause of their ruin: for which reason the wiser Tartars have so suppressed them by degrees, that there is but an inconsiderable number left of them, who are now looked upon as an useless and dangerous weight to a court.

b To some of those officers is committed the care of providing necessaries for the service of the prince; while others are to preserve good order, decide the differences, or even punish offences committed by the domestics of the imperial family. These apartments are spacious and stately; but those of the inner inclosure much more so, being adorned with parks, gardens, ^{inner apart-}sumptuous baths, pleasure-houses, halls of state, the whole embellished with every thing ^{ments describ-}that is delightful and magnificent; particularly an artificial lake, of about a mile and quarter ^{ed.} in compass, full of variety of fish, and surrounded with sumptuous buildings, gardens, baths, ^{An artificial} &c. In the middle of it is the imperial, and a number of other barges, for the court to take ^{lake.} the diversion of fishing. Each facade of the double inclosure hath a lofty gate, or rather three gates, one in the middle, and one at each end; the former of which is the most lofty and rich, and is only opened to the emperor: and the others stand open from morning till ^{The gates} night, to all comers and goers. Each gate hath a draw-bridge, and a proper guard (G); ^{strictly kept.} and none are admitted to go over them but Mandarins, officers in the highest posts, or such as bring an ivory ticket from them, specifying the business they are sent thither for.

THE great hall of audience, or, as it is styled by them, the hall of the great union, is a ^{Hall of au-}lofty building, about 130 feet long, and of an almost square form; the cieling of which ^{dience.} is all of carved work, varnished with green, and adorned with gilt dragons in bas-relief. The pillars that support the roof are about six or seven feet in compass, and embellished with a kind of raised work made of paste, and japanned over with vermilion. The pavement is covered with a kind of tapestry, and the walls are washed with a fine shining white, but without hang-^{The throne.} ings, looking-glasses, branches, or any other sort of ornament. The throne stands in the centre of the hall; and consists of a lofty alcove, very neat, but neither magnificent in ornaments or inscriptions, except that it bears the word Shing, which some writers have translated holy, though it more properly signifies excellent, most wise or perfect. On the platform ^{Lesser halls} before it stands a very large and thick vessel of brass, wherein are burnt some fine perfumes ^{behind the} during the whole ceremony; and candlesticks, cast in the shape of birds, are made to hold a ^{great one.} number of lighted flambeaux. On this platform, which is continued northward beyond the hall of audience, are reared two lesser halls, which are hid by the former; one of them is a handsome rotunda, with windows all around, and wining with varnish of divers colours; and here, they say, the emperor reposes sometimes, either before or after the audience, and changes ^e his clothes^{*}.

BUT the most magnificent of all is, that which they style the innermost court of all; and in which the emperor and empress, his wives of the second rank, and some of his favourite concubines, live, in all imaginable splendour and delight. This court is not only the most magnificent, but the loftiest of all; as the others are raised one higher than the other, the nearer they approach to this. The ascent to it, from the next, is by a flight of six steps on all sides, surrounded by a noble balustrade, adorned with lions, dragons, and other embellishments. In this last quadrangle, amongst other insignia of the Chinese magnificence and luxury, stands a tower of gilt brass, fourteen or fifteen feet high, finely wrought, in which were constantly burnt the most costly gums and perfumes, the smoke of which came out at a great ^f number of little holes or windows of curious workmanship, and dispersed itself all over the palace: but whether the Tartarian monarchs keep up this custom constantly, or only in

(G) Some authors have affirmed, that the emperor's elephants stand guard at these gates; which custom, we are since told, hath been left off, or, which is perhaps more likely, was only a mistake: for these creatures are lodged within the palace, in two very noble apartments, or courts, the one for the summer, and the other for the winter; these last are not only smaller, but are kept warm like stoves, without which they could not bear the rigour of the season.

As for the guards of the palace, they have no other arms than their broad scymetars, and are nothing so numerous as they were in the time of the Chinese monarchy, the Tartars seeming to despise a great deal of that pomp and political grandeur. However, they have always a vast number of Mandarins, and other officers of distinction, attending the emperor at all audiences, and other solemn occasions; and who pay him such a profound respect by their awful distance, gestures, and prostrations, as come very near to a kind of adoration of him (9).

(9) Le Compte & Du Halde, ubi supra.

times of audience, and on other solemn occasions, we cannot be certain. And thus much shall suffice for this superb edifice : those who want a fuller description, may read it in the authors last quoted.

The pagods, or temples.

NEXT to the imperial palace, the pagods, or temples, are the most splendid and magnificent, and in the greatest number, both in the city, suburbs, and parts adjacent : and, indeed, both Chinese and Tartars, nobles and people, are so superstitious, that they rear and adorn these structures, at immense charges, and with vast numbers of costly statues. The roofs are particularly remarkable, for the lustre of their yellow tiles, numberless figures of dragons, lions, and other creatures, curiously wrought, painted, and gilt, and other decorations, after the Chinese taste, and some of them sumptuous and costly, beyond description. It is observable, however, that some of those that belong to the Tartars are abhorred by the Chinese, and vice versa (H). Those that are in the country about, commonly stand on eminences, either natural, or reared up artificially, with a great deal of cost and labour, and, by their height, and sumptuous ornaments, yield a most delightful prospect. As it would be endless to dwell upon a description of them, we shall give a sketch of one of the last sort in the margin (I), and content ourselves with describing here that of the sun ; which is a very curious edifice, not only on account of its richness and grandeur, but as it is that to which the emperor repairs once a year, at the entrance of that planet into the winter solstice ; not with that pomp, splendor, and numerous retinue, that usually attends him on other solemnities, but in a plain homely dress ; without gold, jewels, or even the yellow garments, which colour is peculiar to the imperial family.

THIS vast and noble pile of building stands about half a mile from the east gate of the city, and is surrounded with a wall, near a mile in circuit. Within this inclosure, are reared several stately apartments, and groups of lofty trees, and in the centre a spacious round hall, of a considerable height. The dome, or roof, is supported by eighty-two columns, curiously painted with gold and azure, representing the sky. Hither the emperor repairs, at the season, and in the homely garb, above-mentioned, and sacrifices a great number of bullocks, rams, goats, hogs, &c. The whole ceremony is performed in a proper manner, to express the deepest humility. The three other temples, for the other cardinal points, are no less curious and rich, and stand at the same distance without the wall, each at its proper point of the compass from it ; and in these are likewise performed some particular ceremonies, at the sun's entrance into each of those cardinal signs. Besides these, they have also a number of others, for the sun, moon, the seven planets, twelve signs, twenty-eight constellations ; and an infinite variety of others, both public and private, which we have not room to mention ; and shall conclude this head with a remarkable ceremony, which is performed yearly, at that which is called the temple of the earth, and by every new monarch, upon his accession to the throne ; and is as follows :

A remarkable ceremony performed by the new monarchs.

IMMEDIATELY after his coronation, he is conducted, with all the royal formality, to this temple, which stands on the west side of the city, and at a small distance without the wall. Here he divests himself of his imperial robes, and cloaths himself in the habit of a common ploughman ; and, in this humble guise, proceeds, with his numerous retinue, to a spot of ground, kept for that purpose, within the cincture of the temple. Here he finds a plough, finely varnished and gilt, to which two oxen, with gilded horns, are fastened ; and taking the plough in his hand, drives it the length of two or three furrows. Whilst he is at this laborious exercise, his empress, attended with her ladies, prepare some homely dish for his dinner, and bring it to him, into some private apartment, in the most ordinary vessels, and sit down and eat with him. This excellent custom is of Chinese extract, and great antiquity,

(H) This is partly owing to the difference of their deities, statues, and way of worship. But what is most shocking to the Chinese, is, that the Tartars have some of their idols carved, or painted, naked ; for the former profess an utter aversion to all such nudities, either in temples, houses, or in any other way ; and, upon that account, were highly offended at the dress of the Europeans, as discovering too much of the nakedness of the body ; which they, on the contrary, strive to conceal, by their long gowns, wide sleeves, breeches, and boots. Much more, consequently, must those naked idols, so common among the Tartars, appear shocking to them. There is, among the rest, in this metropolis, a stately Tartarian temple, in which the Deity is represented in the figure of a naked man, of an extraordinary bigness, and which it would be a scandal for any Chinese to set his foot into.

(I) This surprising edifice is built on an artificial mountain, raised in the form of a sugar-loaf, of such a height and bigness, and with such transverse perforations, or chasms, that it looks like a huge parcel of mountains thrown one upon another, with horrid caverns between the interstices ; and the whole so rough, that it can hardly be beheld without dread. But the Chinese, it seems, are fond of such monstrous curiosities of art.

On the top of the mountain stands the temple above-mentioned, which is likewise very lofty and spacious, and richly built. Near it is reared a stately tower, of most curious workmanship, of a round form, twelve storeys high, with galleries, windows, and other decorations, like those that are commonly seen in some of their cities ; a taste of which we shall give our readers, in a proper place. Round the uppermost gallery of all, are hung, by long chains, or wires, fifty bells, which are so easily moved, by the least blast of wind, that they keep a continual tinkling night and day, and are seen and heard at a great distance.

a and was designed to put their new monarch in mind, that his revenue was owing to the sweat and labour of his subjects; and that he ought to abstain from all superfluous expences, and ease them of all needless burdens'. And thus much may serve, to give an idea of the pagods in this city: their statues, and other representations of their deities, monasteries, &c. will best seen, when we come to speak of their religion.

As to the places of the noblemen, Mandarins, and other officers of distinction, they have nothing worth describing, being all but one storey high, and rather convenient than sumptuous. We are even told, that it would be a crime in any of them to excel in this way (K). Neither are they more curious in furniture, and household ornaments: and, indeed, considering how liable they are to be deprived of their dignities, upon the least suspicion, or dislike, b it would be imprudent for them to do otherwise; because these palaces belonging properly to the emperor, whatever additional furniture they bring into them must remain there, for the use of those that succeed them.

BEFORE we leave this metropolis, it will not be unacceptable to our readers, if we give them some short account of its so much boasted imperial observatory. The Chinese had such an opinion of it, we are told, that they thought nothing in the universe could come up to it; and some European travellers, upon their credit, had cried it up to such a height, that one of the most celebrated mathematicians of the royal academy of Paris, hath made no scruple to represent it as one of the greatest prodigies of art and ingenuity, of beauty and magnificence (L): and yet, when this celebrated structure came to be viewed, by more proper c and unbiassed judges, it appears to have been of little worth as to its ancient machines, and less as to its situation; and that all that it is now valuable for, is owing to the improvements which were made to it by Father Verbieft, a Flemish Jesuit, in high repute there, and who caused a new set of instruments to be made, with extraordinary care, neatness, and exactness. The difficulty was to get them introduced into the observatory; and such was the Chinese fondness for their old defective ones, above the most perfect new ones, that they could never have been prevailed upon to admit them, if they had not been forced to it, by an express order from the emperor Kang-hi.

THIS fabric stands in a court of a moderate extent, and is built in the form of a square tower, such as were formerly used to fortify the city walls, and is contiguous to that of the city on the inside, and raised but ten or twelve feet above its bulwark. The ascent up to d the top is by a very narrow stair-case; and on the platform above were placed all the old instruments, which, though but few, did yet take up the whole room, till Father Verbieft introduced his new ones, which he disposed in a more convenient order. These are large, well cast, and embellished with representations of dragons, &c. and, was but the neatness of the divisions answerable to the work, and the telescopes fastened to them according to the new method, instead of pins, they would be equal to those of Europe: but the Chinese artificers were, it seems, either too negligent, or incapable of following his directions. The reader will form a better idea of their disposition, as well as of the whole platform, by the draught here annexed, and by the description of the chief instruments, which he will find in the following note (M). As to the old ones, they were, by order of the emperor, set aside, as e useless,

† LE COMPTE, letter 3. DU HALDE, English,

(K) Our author (10) gives us an instance of it, in a chief Mandarin, who having built him an house something more lofty than the rest, was accused for it before the emperor, by those whose province it was to take notice of such crimes. Whereupon the nobleman, fearful of the event, made haste to pull down the house, while the business was under examination, and before it was decided against him.

(L) His words are to this effect: "Nothing in Europe is to be compared to it; whether for the magnificence of the place, or the largeness of those vast brazen machines, which having been, during these 700 years, exposed on the platforms of those large towers, are still as fair and intire, as if they were but newly cast. The divisions of these instruments are most exact, the disposition most proper for their design, and the whole work performed with an inimitable neatness. In a word, it seemed that China insulted her sister nations, as if, with all their learning and riches, they could not come up with her in that point (11)."

(M) These are;

1. An armillary or zodiacal sphere, six feet in diameter (marked a in the plate), and supported by four dragons heads, whose bodies, after some windings, are fastened to the ends of two brass beams, laid across, that bear the whole weight of the sphere. These beams are supported by four lions, of the same metal, whose heads may be raised, or lowered, by screws. The circles are divided, both in the in and outside, by cross lines, into 360 degrees, and each degree into sixty minutes, and these last into portions of ten seconds, by small pins.

2. An equinoctial sphere, of six feet diameter (marked b), supported by a dragon, cast in a sleeping posture, whose claws extend to the four corners of the pedestal. This last, like the preceding, consists of two cross beams, borne by four small lions, which serve to level it. The design is grand, and well executed.

3. An azimuthal horizon (marked c), six feet in diameter, which consists of one large circle, placed horizontally. The double ruler, which is just its diameuseless, and laid in the hall near the tower, where they may be seen through a cross-barred window, all covered with rust, and buried in oblivion.

*A meridian
gnomon.*

*Five persons employed in

OUR author tells us, however, of a gnomon of Chinese invention, which is pretty well contrived, and might be of use to a careful astronomer. It is placed in a lower room of the fabric, and the slit which lets in the sun's rays, and is made of two copper-plates suspended, which, by being moved to and fro, make the entrance larger or smaller, is horizontally placed, about eight feet from the ground. Under it lies a table, trimmed with brass; in the midst of which there is struck, lengthwise, a meridian line, fifteen feet long, divided across by other lines, which are neither exact nor fine. On the sides they have also cut a number of small holes, wherein to put water, in order to set the table exactly horizontal. This, and the instruments above-mentioned, is all that is remarkable in this famed observatory, in which there are five mathematicians employed night and day, each in a proper apartment on the top of the tower, to observe all that passes over their heads. One of them is gazing towards the zenith, and the others towards the four points of the compass, that nothing may escape their notice. Their observations extend themselves not only to the motions of the heavenly bodies, but to fires, meteors, winds, rain, thunder, hail, storms, and other phænomena of the atmosphere; and these are carefully entered in their journals, and an account of them is brought, every morning, to the surveyor of the mathematics, and registred in his office^u. And thus much shall suffice for the city of Pe-king; in describing of which, we have been the more diffuse, as it is the metropolis of this vast empire, and is, as it were, the soul of it, which puts in motion, and keeps in order, every part of it. All that needs be added is, that it hath jurisdiction over six cities of the second, and twenty of the third rank, besides the general one which it hath over the whole realm, by its six supreme courts which sit in it; an account of which will be given, when we come to speak of their government. The other head cities of this province, and their inferior ones, are as follow:

*2. The city of
Pau-ting-fu.*

2. PAU-TING-FU, the residence of the viceroy; which hath three cities of the second, and seventeen of the third rank. It hath a lake in the middle of it, which is chiefly famed for producing vast quantities of a sort of flowers, called by the Chinese lyen-wha; and which the reader will find described in the margin (N).

3. HO-KYEN-FU,

ter, and slides over the whole limb, carries round along with it an upright triangle, the upper angle of which is fastened to a perpendicular beam fixed in the centre of the horizon. Four twisted dragons bend their heads underneath the great circle, to keep it firm, whilst two others, winding round two small pillars, raise themselves on either side, in almost a semicircular form, as far as the top of the axis, to which they are firmly fixed, in order to keep the triangle steady and upright.

4. A large quadrant (marked d), of six feet radius, and graduated at every tenth second. The lead, which fixes it in a vertical position, weighs a pound, and hangs from the centre by a very fine brass-wire. The alhidade, or ruler, easily slides round the limb; and a dragon, folded in several rings, holds the parts firmly together, lest they should start from their due position. The whole body of the quadrant hangs in the air; and an immoveable axis runs thro' its centre, by which it may be turned towards any part of the heavens. And, to prevent its weight shaking it out of its vertical position, two other beams are raised, one on each side, and firmly fixed below upon two dragons, and fastened to the middle axis by carved clouds, which seem to descend from the sky. The whole work is firm, and well-contrived.

5. A sextant, of eight feet radius (marked e), representing the sixth part of a great circle, supported by an axletree, whose basis is concave, and is held steady by dragons, and crossed in the middle by a brass pillar; on the end of which is fixed a machine, with wheels, which facilitate the moving of the instrument. To the middle of this machine is fastened a copper bar, which represents one of the radii of the sextant, and keeps it immoveable. Its upper part terminates in a thick cylinder, which is the centre round which the ruler turns; and the lower part reaches about two feet below the limb, for the engine, which serves to raise and lower it, to take hold on. These unwieldy machines, however, are so difficult to be moved, that they are rather an ornament to an observatory, than of any use to an observer.

6. The last is a celestial globe, of six feet diameter (marked f), which is the handsomest, and best made, of all the rest. The body of it is cast exactly round in brass, and neatly polished; the stars are well formed, and in their true places, and the circles of a proportionable breadth and thickness. It is likewise so exactly hung, that the least force will turn it round; insomuch that a child may elevate it to any degree, though it weighs above 2000 pounds. A large concave brass basis, with a chanel round its edges, is supported by four mis-shapen dragons, placed at equal distances, whose bristly hair sustains a magnificent horizon, of a considerable breadth, and curiously wrought and ornamented. The meridian, which supports the axis of the globe, is upheld by clouds issuing out of the basis, and slides easily between them; its motion being facilitated by hidden wheels, by which the globe is easily turned to any elevation: besides this, the horizon, the dragon, and the brazen beams which cross each other at the centre of the concave, are all moved at pleasure, without stirring the basis, which still continues fixed. This makes it easy to place the horizon level, so as to intersect the globe just in the middle. The whole is as well finished as if it had been done by the best European artist; and, as most of these six machines are ten feet high, they are, for the convenience of the observers, encompassed with marble steps, in the form of amphitheatres, as the reader may see by the plate (12).

(N) This flower seems to be the same with our nymphaea, or water-lily, which, tho' little valued by us, is much admired and esteemed by the Chinese, both for its beauty and medicinal qualities. The truth is, they bestow so much pains in improving it, particularly in

- a 3. HO-KYEN-FU, so called, because it is seated between two rivers, is near four miles in compass; and hath two cities of the second, and fifteen of the third rank, under its jurisdiction. 3. Ho-kyen-fu.
4. CHIN-TING-FU, seated near a fine river, is of an oblong figure, well walled, and near four miles in circuit. It hath thirty-two cities under it, viz. five of the second, and twenty-seven of the third rank. North of it are mountains which produce a great variety of medicinal herbs; and upon which are seen several stately monuments reared to their heroes, and one in particular consecrated to the memory of the first emperor of the dynasty of Han. 4. Chin-ting-fu.
5. SHUN-TE-FU hath but nine cities under it, all of the third rank; but which are very considerable, and well peopled. The whole territory is fertile, and well watered; and, among other things, produces a fine sand, which is used for polishing of precious stones, and the best touch-stones for gold in the whole empire. 5. Shun-te-fu.
- b 6. QUANG-PING-FU, situate on the southern part of the province, hath only nine cities of the third rank under its jurisdiction, and nothing particular worth mentioning. 6. Quang-ping-fu.
7. TAY-MING-FU hath one city of the second, and eighteen of the third rank, under it. 7. Tay-ming-fu.
8. YUNG-PING-FU is advantageously situate, being encompassed by the sea, by rivers, and by mountains covered with very fair trees. It hath only one city of the second, and five of the third rank. 8. Yung-ping-fu.

Not far from it is the fort of Sbang-bay, which is as it were the key of the province of Liau-tong, and is situate near the great wall, which extends itself, from the bulwark built in the sea, for the space of a league, in a plain country, before it ascends the hills.

- c 9. SWEN-WHA-FU is a large, well-built city, full of inhabitants, and seated among the mountains, not far from the great wall. It hath two cities of the second, and eight of the third rank: besides some forts along the wall, strongly garrisoned, to guard the entrance between China and Tartary. Its mountains produce fine crystal, marble, porphyry, and a sort of yellow rat, larger than those of Europe, whose skins are in great request among the Chinese. 9. Swen-wha-fu.

II. The province of Kyang-nan.

- d THE next province in dignity (for, in such historical works as this, we think it much more proper to mention them according to their rank, than as they stand contiguous to each other, as is done in geographical ones) is that now called Kyang-nan, or Nan-king, and is the most fertile, trading, and wealthy, of the empire. It is bounded on the west by those of Ho-nan and Hu-quang; on the south by Che-kyang and Kyang-fu; on the north by Shan-tong; and, on the east, by the gulf of Nan king. It extends itself from the 29th to the 25th degree of latitude, and from the 112th to the 119th of east longitude; so that, for its extent, as well as opulence, it justly deserves at least the second rank, though the Chinese writer Kao, in his survey, places it but in the ninth. We have already observed, that the ancient emperors kept their constant residence at its metropolis of Nan-king, till, for reasons of state, they removed it to Pe-king; notwithstanding which considerable loss, it hath, by the advantage of its maritime commerce, as well as the richness of its soil, and vast number and industry of its inhabitants, been enabled to keep up its ancient splendor and rank; inso-much that the yearly tribute it pays to the emperor in rice, silks, cotton, salt, &c. amounts, communibus annis, according to Martini, who had it from the then governor of the province, to near 32 millions of taels (O), or ducats, exclusive of the duties arising from all that is their artificial fish-ponds, that it grows large, double, and very lively in its colours which are commonly a mixture of white and violet, or red and white.

This flower shoots up about a yard or more above the water, not unlike our tulip, and consists of a little ball supported by a small filament, much like that which is found in a lily; its smell is pleasant, and its fruit of the bigness of a hazel-nut, and contains a white kernel, very grateful to the taste; the root is knotty, like that of reeds, its pith and substance very white. There is nothing in this plant but what is of some service; and they make even a meal of it, which they use upon several occasions. The leaves of it are long, and float upon the water; they are fastened to the root by long strings, and are used by gardeners to wrap their ware in.

The virtues which the Chinese physicians attribute to this plant are, that it is a great refresher and nourisher of nature, and a great restorer of decayed constitutions.

But, as to what Kercher, and some other authors, add, that its root will soften copper, by being put into a man's mouth with it (13), it hath been since exploded by those who tried the experiment with less prepossession.

(O) Equivalent to a Chinese ounce of silver, or to about eight shillings and seven pence sterling (14).

Perhaps it will not be unacceptable to the reader, if we subjoin here a fuller account of this tribute, by way of specimen; seeing all the other provinces pay the same, and the difference is only in the more or less of each commodity. That of the rice here amounts, communibus annis, to 5,995,034 sacks; raw silk to 6863 pounds; wrought ditto, 28,452 pieces; linen to 2,077 pieces; that of cotton is paid in silver, and is no less considerable; and the rest of their commodities bear a proportion to their affluence; but that of the salt, which is here made in vast quantities along the sea-coasts of the provinces, is the biggest of all (15).

imported or exported, for the receiving of which there are proper officers assigned^a. The number of families in it is computed, according to the Chinese registers, at 1,969,816; and the men at 9,967,429, or near ten millions; among whom, the city of Shang-hay, and villages belonging to it, are said to contain 200,000, employed in weaving of callico.

Jurisdiction. KYANG-NAN hath fourteen fû's, or cities of the first rank; under which are ninety-three of the second and third, besides towns and villages without number, all of them large, populous, and wealthy; for all the commodities that come from any of the cities, but especially from the capital of this province, such as those of japan-work, ink, paper, and other manufactures, in which they drive a vast trade, are more esteemed, and bear a greater price, than those of any other province. The inhabitants of Kyang-nan are polite and courteous, and have a more than ordinary disposition for the sciences; insomuch that it is famed for the great number of doctors it produces, who, by their merit, attain the highest posts and dignities of the empire. It hath but few mountains, except towards the south; all the rest is a fruitful champain, abounding with all the necessaries and conveniencies of life. It abounds with convenient sea-ports, resorted to by an innumerable quantity of vessels from most parts of Asia; and a great number of canals, and some navigable rivers, for the convenience of import and export. The most considerable of these are the Yang-tse, which runs quite thro' the middle of it; and the Whang-ho, which bounds it on the north.

THIS province, besides its fourteen districts, each under its proper capital, is divided into two governments, the eastern and western, each under a respective viceroy; the former of whom hath his residence at Sû-chew-fû, and the latter at Ngang-king-fû. The order in which they stand is as follows: 1. Nan-king; 2. Sû-chew; 3. Song-kyang; 4. Cbang-chew; 5. Chin-kyang; 6. Way-ngang; 7. Yang-chew; 8. Ngan-king; 9. Whay-chew; 10. Ning-que; 11. Chi-chew; 12. Tay-ping; 13. Fong-yang; 14. Lyu-chew.

To these may be added the island of Tsong-ming, which likewise belongs to this province, and of which we shall speak at the end of this article, after we have given a short description of what is most remarkable in those fourteen capitals, and especially in that of Nan-king.

Nan-king described. NAN-KING, alias Kyan ning-fû, capital of the whole province, and once styled the spacious, stately, opulent, none-such, &c. stands in latitude 32, and east longitude 116, or two deg. 38 min. east from the meridian of Pe-king. It is by far the largest city in the whole empire, though much reduced of its ancient extent; of which the Chinese tell you, that if two horsemen set out in the morning at one of the gates, and galloped round it at different ways, they would not meet till the evening (P). The figure of Nan-king is one of the most irregular in the whole province, if not in the whole empire; for which Du Halde, who hath given us a sketch of it, gives this reason: that the hills within it, and the nature of the ground about it, could not well admit of a more regular form. Its decay not only from its ancient extent, but from its pristine grandeur, was owing to the removing of the imperial residence, and supreme tribunals (on which account it had the title of Nan-king, or southern court), to that of Pe-king, since which time the Tartars have given it the name of Kyang ning; and though, in common discourse, it be still called by its old one, yet it is never suffered to be used in any public instruments. It hath not only lost its ancient name, but all the other monuments of its royal grandeur. The imperial palace, once a most magnificent structure, hath nothing now left but its ruins. The stately monuments of its ancient monarchs, and other public buildings, are all run into decay; and even its once so famed observatory lies now neglected, and almost demolished; most of those superb edifices being destroyed by the avarice of the Tartars, who first invaded it, out of hatred to the Chinese dynasty then reigning.

Palace, and other buildings, destroyed. ABOUT one third part of the city hath since lain waste; the rest, however, is not only well built and inhabited, but drives on a very considerable commerce by means of the Yang-tse above-mentioned, which, being a large navigable river, is ever bringing in a prodigious number of barges; some of which, especially the imperial ones, are nearly as big as, if not exceeding, our middling vessels. All these come into that river, from other parts of the empire, by the help of a good number of canals; and in such quantities, that a stranger cannot forbear being surprised at the vast hurry that reigns through the whole city; nor at the prodigious number of these barks, which, we are told, were thought by some of the Jesuits, and first European adventurers, to have been sufficient to form a bridge between that capital and

(P) The survey of Dionysius Kao gives it between sixteen and seventeen French leagues, that is, about forty-eight miles, in circuit: but it appears, from the ruins of its old wall, to have been considerably larger; insomuch that some writers have computed it to have been thirty leagues, or ninety miles. How much it hath shrunk from that time, may be reckoned from the last survey which Du Halde tells us was taken of it, which gives its wall no more than sixty-seven Chinese li's, or five leagues and half, of twenty to a degree, and about 466 fathom over, which is short of eighteen miles (16).

a Europe. What adds to the wonder, is, the richness of those vessels, not only in their costly lading, but in their fine paintings, carvings, and gilding, and the vast crouds that are seen upon them, and make it appear like a great fair kept upon the water.

THE streets of the city, though narrower by much than those of Pe-king, and other Chinese Present gran- towns, are however curiously paved, and consequently freer from dust and dirt. Some of deur them are covered in the middle with large marble slabs; and in the sides with variety of pebble and other stones, so neatly inlaid, that it would be a delight to walk thro' them, if they were not so greatly thronged from morning to night. The city-gates, some of the Public build- pagods, palaces, arches, towers, and other public buildings, appear quite splendid, especially ings the palace of the viceroy, who always resides here. But the most curious and stately fabric b in this city, is its octagon tower, which will be more properly described in the sequel, among the artificial rarities of this country. The number of its inhabitants is no less surprising; Number of and hath been computed by Dionysius Kao, Father Le Compte, and others, to amount to two inhabitants millions of souls, exclusive of its great garrison (Q). The tribute which it pays to the crown, and the customs for imports and exports, come to an immense sum: but, besides these, the city sends every year to Pe-king five large vessels laden with the finest silks, cloths, and other rich commodities, in order to ingratiate itself with the Tartar monarchs (R), and to secure the protection of its commerce.

NOTHING is more pleasant than the territory about this city, which not only abounds with Territory all necessaries, but is moreover adorned with the greatest variety of villas, pleasure-houses, about it c turrets, gardens, orchards, and other embellishments, that can heighten the prospect of it. The most delightful object of all these is a wood of about twelve miles in compass, and Charming pro- planted with stately pines, in the heart of which is raised a mount of a sufficient height to fects overtop them, which is covered with temples, and other sepulchral monuments of the ancient Chinese monarchs. It stands about six miles from the city; and about the same distance from it, on the same plain, is another mount, upon which is raised a spacious terrace of large square stones, with four flights of marble steps, and, on that, a temple truly royal and magnificent. The roof is supported by two rows of marble pillars, finely carved and polished, twenty-four feet high, and of a proportionable thickness: every thing else, both within and without the structure, is answerable to it. The gates are lofty, and curiously carved in bas- d relief, and inlaid with gold and silver. The windows are fenced with a small kind of wire-net, of the same metal; and so surprisingly fine, that it can hardly be perceived. Within-side are several stately thrones, enriched with pearls, and other precious stones of immense value, and the most excellent workmanship. We omit many other curious things belonging to this city, both within and without it, for want of room*; and shall only add, that it abounds Learned men with men of learning in all sciences, and with many noble libraries, as well as rich book-sellers shops, furnished with the greatest plenty and variety of valuable books. The paper, ink, and other instruments for writing and printing, do here excel all others in the empire. Nan-king hath only eight cities of the third rank under its jurisdiction.

e HAVING dwelt so long on the description of these two celebrated capitals of the Chinese empire, we shall be much more brief in the remainder not only of this, but of the other provinces, and content ourselves with just mentioning what is most curious in every one; referring our readers, for a fuller account of them, to the authors last quoted in the margin.

2. THE second city in the province of Kyang-nan is Sû-chew, the capital of the eastern divi- Sû-chew sion called I-tong, and is not only large and populous, and rich enough to vie with Nan-king last described, but is, for its commodious and pleasant situation, esteemed an earthly paradise. It is compared to Venice, on account of the many canals that run through its streets; but with this difference, that the one stands on the sea, and this in fresh water. The canals are Site on fresh capacious enough to carry the largest barges, and are continually crouded with them. Sû-chew, water like some others in China, may be reckoned three cities; one of which, within the walls, is

(Q) We must, however, observe, that some later writers have struck off near half that number, exclusive of its garrison, which consists of 40,000 men, and which the governor or lieutenant-general of the southern provinces is obliged to keep up here (17). Du Halde hath said nothing precisely about it; so that the reader is at liberty to believe which side he will; but to us it seems, upon the whole, as if this last calculation came as much too short as the other may be supposed to go beyond the real mark.

(R) These vessels, which are styled lung-y chew, or the ships of the dragon's cloathing, because the emperors bear the dragon in their arms, are so respected, that every vessel is obliged to lower their sails to them. There is likewise another sett of them, which go from Nan-king to Pe-king every April or May, with great quantities of a peculiar sort of fish caught in this neighbourhood, and which are covered with ice to keep them fresh. And, tho' these two cities are above 600 miles distant from each other, we are told these vessels must perform the voyage in eight or ten days, under severe penalties, that fish being mostly for the emperor's use (18).

(17) Cornille diction. La Martinicre, & al.

Vast number of vessels. computed above four leagues in compass; another in the suburbs, which extends a great way on both sides of the canals; and a third in the barks, which are so many floating houses, ranged on the water in several rows, above a league in length, many of which are equal in bulk to our third-rate ships¹.

Commerce. THE territory about it, and of the cities under its jurisdiction, is fertile and delightful, rich and opulent; and all carry on a considerable commerce not only with other parts of China, but with Japan, from which this province is divided by a narrow chanel, which the trading vessels commonly cross in two or three days, with a fair wind. The chief manufactures here are brocades and embroidery, which are the finest and cheapest in proportion in the whole empire. The city hath six stately gates towards the water-side, and as many towards the land; and a jurisdiction over one city of the second, and seven of the third rank, all of them beautiful and rich, and about one and an half or two leagues in compass².

Mines of gold, &c. THE other cities of this province have nothing more remarkable than what hath been already observed; except that of Whay-chew, whose mountains have mines of gold, silver, and copper, and whose territory is said to produce the best tea. That of Fong-yang-fu, the birth-place of Hong-wu, the first emperor of the preceding dynasty, was once designed by that monarch for his imperial residence, and a plan was drawn for making it one of the noblest cities in the empire: but the unfitness of the ground, scarcity of water, and other reasons, made him exchange it for that of Nan-king, to which he removed his seat. It retains, however, some marks of the royal magnificence, such as a stately temple, some pagods, and monuments, which the reader may find in the author last quoted.

Island of Tsong-ming described. THE last thing to be mentioned of this province, is the island of Tsong-ming, separated from it by a small chanel of five or six leagues. It is about twenty leagues long, and five or six in breadth; and was formerly a barren desert, to which robbers and banditti were banished, and left to starve; to avoid this, necessity soon drove them to cultivate it; after which, some poor Chinese families came over, and helped to improve it, as far as the ground was capable of it; so that now some spots of it yield wheat, rice, barley, and other coarser grain; cotton, lemons, and other fruits: but the greatest product is salt; which is here made in such plenty, as to serve the inhabitants, and is transported in vast quantities into the continent. This salt is made out of a sort of greyish earth, which grows dispersed in spots here and there on the north side of the island, and of the largeness of an acre or two.

ANOTHER part of the island, towards the north, produces naturally a great plenty of reeds, of which they drive a considerable commerce: with some of them they build very handsome country-houses; and the rest is sold to serve for fuel, not only to the inhabitants, but likewise along the coasts. Their other lands yield them two harvests, the one in May, which is of corn, rye, barley, and rice; and the other in September, which chiefly consists of cotton and rice; which last is here most curiously cultivated.

City and towns. THERE is but one city in the whole island, which is of the third rank, and encompassed with high walls supported by good terraces, and surrounded with a ditch full of water: but there are in the arable lands such a vast number of villages, that they seem contiguous to each other. The air is wholesome and temperate; and the country pleasant, but intersected with a great number of canals, to prevent its being laid under water³.

III. The province of Kyan-fu

Kyang fu described. IS bounded on the north by Kyang-nan; on the west by Hu-quang; on the south by Quang-tong; and, on the east, by Fo-kyen and Che-kyang. It extends itself from the 24th degree and one-half to the 30th of latitude, and from the 110° to the 115° 10' of east longitude. The mountains which part it from Quang-tong and Fo-kyen are almost inaccessible and barren (S); but, being once passed over, discover very fruitful vallies, and plains exceedingly well improved. The whole province is well watered and fertile; but is so populous

(S) The vast ridges of mountains which run between this province and those of Fo-kyen and Quang-tong, or Canton, are inhabited by a rude and savage sort of people, who pretend to be independent of either the Chinese or Tartars, and keep themselves so by the inaccessible height and ruggedness of their habitations, which are for the most part in deep caverns on the tops of those mountains. From these they come frequently down in bands to plunder the lower grounds; but dare not venture far from their dens, for fear of falling into the hands of some of the garrisons, which are here kept in strong castles in good numbers, and from whom they can expect no mercy.

Great pains have been taken at different times by the government, either to subdue or extirpate these wild freebooters, but as yet without success; tho' their reduction would be so much more advantageous, as the vallies between them are very fruitful; and some of the mountains have mines of gold, copper, and lead (19).

a withal, that the lower lands can scarce suffice to furnish them with a sufficiency of corn and rice; so they are forced to live very parsimoniously; and are, on that account, become the subject of scorn and raillery among their neighbours (T): yet they commonly are endowed with an excellent genius; and many of them advance themselves to the highest posts by their learning and merit. The number of people is computed to amount to 1,363,629 families, or 6,549,800 men ^b.

THE country abounds with lakes, brooks, and rivers; some of the last very large and navigable, particularly the Can, or Kan, al. Kyang, which runs through the whole province, and receives a great number of others in its course. All these yield a great plenty and variety of fish ^c, particularly salmon, trout, and sturgeon; and the mountains which encompass it are either covered with woods, or are famed for their minerals and medicinal herbs. The lake called Po-yang-hû is particularly remarkable for its largeness and depth, it being 300 miles in circuit, and navigable by the largest ships: it is said to receive all the rivers in the province; and hath its borders covered with large towns and villages, which drive a considerable trade upon it. There grow likewise great quantities of the lyen-wha, or water-lily, upon the surface of it; which plant we have described in a former note ^d. What renders this lake most famous, is, the fine china-ware that is made in some parts of its neighbourhood, particularly in the town of Kin-te-sim, or, more properly, King-te-ching, in the district of Zhau-chew-fû; and is the finest, most in request, and made in the greatest quantities, of any in the whole empire. The cause of its extraordinary beauty is supposed to be some peculiar property in the water; since we are told, that the same materials and workmen will not produce the like in any other place ^e.

THIS justly-famed borough, which is as populous as most cities in China, and only wants the walls to merit the name of one, is computed to have above a million of inhabitants, mostly employed in that manufacture; the rest being the merchants who deal in that ware, whose houses take up a great deal of room, and who employ a vast number of workmen (U). The town extends itself along the banks of a fine river, a league and half; the streets are long and strait, tho' rather too narrow, crowded, and noisy; and intersect each other at certain distances in a very regular manner; and not one scrap of waste ground is to be spared in it. They reckoned anciently but about 300 porcelain furnaces in the place, which, we are told, are now increased to about 500 ^f; the clouds of smoke and flames of which, ascending in different parts, shew at once the length, breadth, and circumference of it; which, in the night, appears like a large city all on fire, or like a huge furnace, with its vast number of vent-holes. Strangers are not admitted to stay, or even lodge at night, at King-te-ching, unless some responsible persons of the town will answer for their good behaviour. This regulation, joined to that which is observed day and night in it, and which is the same as in the great cities, keeps all things in good order, and secures the place from the attempts of an infinite number of robbers ^g.

THIS province hath 13 fû's, or capitals, which, with the districts of the second and third order, under them, are as follow:

1. NANG-SHANG, the metropolis of the whole; which hath one city of the second, and seven of the third rank, under its jurisdiction.
2. ZHAU-CHEW hath only seven districts of the third order, besides towns and villages in great number.
3. QUANG-SIN, which, though situate in the midst of high mountains, is yet well cultivated and inhabited. It manufactures a good sort of paper, and the best candles in all the empire; and hath only seven districts of the third rank under its jurisdiction.

(T) The neighbouring provinces despise them for their frugality, which they style sordidness, and for which they give them the title of mice. There are indeed vast numbers of them; who, not being able to subsist at home, wander about the empire, under the notion of fortune-tellers, jugglers, conjurers, &c.; and some of them, who have had a learned education, are taken into families, and serve as tutors to their children. It must be owned, however, that the generality of the people of this province are much given to superstition, and hold the doctrine of the transmigration of souls; observe a number of heathenish fasts, and many other such superstitious fooleries, above any other province (20).

(U) They are reckoned to consume in this place, one day with another, 10,000 loads of rice, and one thousand hogs a day, besides other animals, fish, fowl, &c. which makes provisions much dearer than in other parts of this province; notwithstanding which, it is become the refuge of an infinite number of poor families, who could subsist no-where so well; for here is employment found for young and old, strong and weak, and even the lame and blind may get a living by grinding of colours, &c. There is likewise a vast number of hands kept employed in the barges that ply to and from this place, and extend themselves in two or three rows on the river, some miles in length (21).

4. Nang-king. 4. NANG-KING, or Nan-king-fu, is pleasantly situate on the lake Po-yang lately mentioned; and abounds with fish, corn, rice, &c.; and a kind of hemp, of which they make a good summer cloth. Its jurisdiction extends only over four cities of the third rank. ^a
5. Kyew-kyang. 5. KYEW-KYANG is situate about four miles on the north-west side of the lake Po-yang, and on the south side of the famed river Yang-tse, which, though here at the distance of near 100 leagues from the sea, furnishes it with plenty of salmon, dolphins, trout, &c. The river, which runs along the walls of it, ebbs and flows at the new and full moon; and runs so slowly thence into the sea, that its course is hardly perceived. Our author doth not tell us what jurisdiction this city hath.
6. Kyen-chang. 6. KYEN-CHANG hath but three cities of the third rank under it; and is only noted for a good sort of wine made of rice, and a kind of linen much esteemed, and worn during the summer-heats. ^b
7. Fû-chew. 7. FU-CHEW, or Vû-chew, hath six cities of the third rank. Its walls are of a large extent; yet it hath hardly 50,000 inhabitants, it having been sacked, and almost destroyed, by the Tartars in the late wars; and a great part of its ancient buildings lying in ruins.
8. Lin-kyang. 8. LIN-KYANG hath no more than four cities of the third rank under it. Its chief traffic consists in oranges, with which the surrounding mountains, which are cut into terraces, are covered, and from whence they are sent into the neighbouring provinces.
9. Ki-ngan. 9. KI-NGAN hath nine cities of the third rank. The Kan, or Kyang, river, on which it is situate, runs there so rapidly, among a number of rocks which are even with its surface, that it requires all the skill of a good pilot, as well as strength of hands, to pass the current safely. ^c
10. Shwi-chew. 10. SHWI-CHEW is divided into two parts, or cities, by the river Kan, which have a communication with each other by two stout bridges; one of stone, with ten arches; and the other of boats, which rises and falls with the water. The north side is styled the Mandarin city, because both the great and small of that dignity dwell in it; whilst the other is chiefly inhabited by burghers and tradesmen. How far its jurisdiction extends, we are not told; but it is so happily situated both for health and fertility, that it is styled the happy.
11. Yven-chû. 11. YVEN-CHU hath only four cities of the third rank under it; but is blessed with every convenience of life, and furnishes the rest of the empire with vitriol and alum, with which the country about it abounds. ^d
12. Kang-chew. 12. KANG-CHEW hath twelve cities of the third rank under it; and is, besides, a place of great traffic, as it is situate on the river of its name, which receives another at a small distance; at the confluence of which is a large bridge built with boats; and near it, the custom-house, where vessels are searched, and examined whether they have paid duty. The country about it abounds with those trees from which the gyran, or varnish for japanning, distils, and is some of the best that China affords.
13. Nan-ngan. 13. THE last and most southern capital of this province is called Nan-ngan, and hath four cities under it. It is large, populous, and rich, on account of the great resort of vessels to it, because all the merchandizes that go to, or come from, the province of Quang-tong are obliged to land here: and thus much may suffice for this third province. ^e

IV. The province of Fo-kyen

- IV. Fo-kyen described. IT is bounded on the east by the sea; on the west by Kyang-si, last described; on the north by Che-kyang; and, on the south by Quang-tong. It is one of the smallest provinces in the empire; and extends itself only from the 23° and an half to the $28^{\circ} 20'$ of latitude, and from the 114° to the 118° of east longitude; but it is so advantageously situate for navigation and commerce, as to be esteemed one of the richest; and hath a great many forts built along the shore, to defend its coasts. These are so irregular, by reason of the number and variety of its bays, that it gives the inhabitants an opportunity of carrying on an illicit trade with strangers, in spite of all the Chinese prohibitions, of diamonds, and other precious stones, gold, quicksilver, spices, amber, and other commodities, of which they make a vast traffic and gain. They maintain such a great number of ships, that, when the emperor of China was threatening a war against that of Japan, this province is said to have offered to furnish him with such a number of them as should be sufficient to make a bridge that should reach from one country to the other. And indeed most of their mountains, which are here in great number (W), are covered with forests full of large and lofty trees, fit for building

(W) The Chinese have an excellent way of improving these mountains, by cutting those that are of a soft nature into the form of amphitheatres and terraces, one above another, and sowing them with corn, rice, &c.; and, as the latter only grows in water, they take care to supply each such spot with it, either from the springs that a building of ships. Some of them have rich mines of iron and tin, and others of gold and silver; but these two last are forbidden to be opened, under pain of death.

THE commodities with which this province abounds, besides those already named, are, Chief commo- musks, silks, hempen and callico cloths, steel, and all sorts of utensils curiously made, &c. dities.

Those that are imported, are, cloves, cinnamon, pepper, sanders-wood, coral, amber, and such-like. The countries this trades with, are, Japan, Formosa, the Philippine Islands, Siam, and others, along those eastern coasts. The climate is hot and sultry in summer, but serene and healthy; so that it produces the same grains, fruits, &c. with the other parts of the empire, and some in greater perfection; particularly oranges, which are here much larger, and of a more beautiful red, and have, besides, a fine muscadine taste and favour.

b THE people of this province not only speak a language quite different from the Chinese; Distinct lan- but, what is still more incommodious to those that travel through it, every district hath a dialect dialect of its own: even the Mandarin language, which is the only one that is generally spoken through the empire, is understood but by few of them. But it must be observed, that Formerly a se- Fo-kyen was formerly a separate kingdom; though whether tributary to China, or no, we parate king- cannot learn; and the prince who governed it at the time of the Tartaric invasion, who was dom.

c no less potent than courageous, held out against those invaders long after the rest of the provinces had submitted to their yoke. We shall speak more fully of that war when we come to the historical part; and only hint here, that they were at length subdued, not by superior strength or valour, but by downright treachery; and to this day brook their subjection very unwillingly; and hence that difference of language, and their aversion to the Chinese. They have, however, many learned men among them, who are not a little fond of the sciences. The rest of the people are generally industrious, witty, and affable; but, according to common report, given to all manner of vices; and notorious, above all the Chinese, for cheating those they deal with.

FO-KYEN hath nine fû's, or cities of the first rank (amongst which they reckon Tay-wan, or Tayovan, the capital of the island of Formosa, of which we shall speak at the end of this article), and sixty hyens, or cities of the third rank.

THE fû's, or cities of the first rank, are, 1. Fû-chew, the metropolis; 2. Tswen-chew; Capitals of
3. Kyeng-ning; 4. Teng-ping; 5. Ting-chew; 6. Hing-wha; 7. Shau-û; 8. Chan-chew; Fo-kyen.
d 9. Tay-wan; to these may be also added Hya-men, or the port of A-mwy, or Amoy; and the island of Pong-bû, which doth likewise belong to this province.

THESE cities are remarkable chiefly for their largeness, richness, and populousness, and such other general advantages, not worth, however, a further description; what is most worth notice in some of them, is as follows: Tswen-chew is famed for a fine temple, adorned with Tswen-chew's two stately towers built of stone and marble, seven storys high; each storey hath a gallery on two stately the outside, around which one may walk, and view the beauties of the city and country. It towers. hath likewise a bridge of extraordinary length and breadth, built with a blackish stone, and supported, not with arches, but with 300 stone pillars, ending on the two sides with an acute angle, to break the force of the stream. It is said to have cost the governor that built it

CHANG-CHEW, the eighth and most southern city in this province, is situate on a river which A noble bridge. ebbs and flows; over which it hath a stately bridge, of 36 very high arches, and broad enough to admit of shops on both sides, which are stored with all sorts of rich merchandizes, both of China and the Indies. Its vicinity to Amoy, a place of vast commerce, occasions a constant traffick to be continually carried on between them. The neighbouring mountains produce the finest crystal, of which they make buttons, seals, figures of animals, &c.¹

HYA-MEN, or the island and port of A-mwy, Emoy, or Amoy, is one of the most con- Port of Amoy
venient and safe harbours in all India, on account of the road which is formed by that island described. between it and the continent; which is so deep and capacious, that it can receive 1000 ships

f of the largest size, which can come as near to land as they please, and ride safe from all winds; on which account its commerce hath increased to such a degree, that there is constantly a vast number of Chinese transports that trade from thence to other parts of India; and that come down from the mountains, or from those of the plains, which they have the art of raising up to the highest mountains, and of conveying from one mountain to another, by pipes made of bambo, which this province takes care to cultivate in great quantities for that purpose; so that every stage or terrace from the top to the bottom is plentifully supplied with water to nourish whatever grain is sown upon it.

And here it must be observed, that the mountains which are formed in this shape, are commonly of a soft nature: but, where the rock is too hard to be so cut, or where the water cannot be easily conveyed in the manner above-mentioned, they content themselves with planting such mountains with variety of trees for building, fuel, &c. according to the nature of the soil, or their own exigencies; so that no spot of ground on them is left uncultivated (22).

(22) De his, vid. Navaretta, Martini, Le Compte, Martiniere, Du Halde, & al. mult.

the emperor keeps there a garrison of 6000 or 7000 men, under the command of a Chinese general. Our East-India company had once a factory in this island, which hath been since removed to Quang-tong, or Canton, where the merchants are better treated. Amoy stands in about $25^{\circ} 33'$ of latitude, and $115^{\circ} 50'$ of east longitude. There is a number of other small islands, not worth mentioning here, except that of Pong-hû, and the more large and considerable one of Formosa.

Islands and
hû.

PONG-HU is rather a group of small islands, lying under the 23d degree and half of latitude, and 117° of east longitude, and forming a kind of Archipelago between those of Amoy and Formosa. They are all rocky and barren, and obliged to have all sorts of necessities, and even firing, from China or Formosa: however, the port is good, and secure against all winds, and from twenty to twenty-five fathoms deep. The Dutch, when they were masters of Tay-wan, built a kind of fort at one end of the isle of Pong-hû, to guard the entrance of it; of which nothing now remains but a few ruins, which the Chinese call Hong mau-chay, or the fort of the red-haired men. However, this port of Pong-hû is thought absolutely necessary for the preservation of Formosa, or rather Tay-wan, which at present, it seems, draws but seven or eight feet of water, and is unfit for large vessels; and therefore there is a literary Mandarin now residing in it, to watch the ships that pass and repass from China, and bring a considerable revenue to the state*.

Island of For-

BUT the most considerable of all the islands belonging to China, is that commonly styled by the Europeans Formosa, or Hermosa, and, by the Chinese, Tay-wan, or Tay-wan, which is situate over-against the province of Fo-kyen, and is severed from it by a chanel of about 20 leagues, where narrowest; and stretches itself from south to north somewhat above three degrees and a half, that is, from the 22° to the $25^{\circ} 40'$, being crossed a little south of the middle, by the tropic of Cancer. It spreads itself in breadth a little more than one degree, or sixty miles, that is, from the $117^{\circ} 25'$ to $118^{\circ} 36'$ of east longitude, where broadest; but is much narrower at each end. The land lies high, and is very mountainous; notwithstanding which, and its nearness to China, it doth not appear to have been known to them till the dynasty of Ming, that is, about A. C. 1430; nor to have been in the possession of the Chinese till above two centuries after, even by the Chinese historians; it being then looked upon as a barren uncultivated country, inhabited only by barbarians, and not worth their regard (X), especially as China was then miserably rent by their intestine wars.

Become masters of the island.

ABOUT the end of the year 1620, a Japanese squadron landing on the island, the commander, thinking it worth conquering, left part of his men there, with orders to get what intelligence they could to forward his design. Not long after, a Dutch ship was driven into it by a storm, in its course to and from Japan; and landed in it, the Japanese being in no condition to oppose them; and, finding the country to their liking, and very commodious for trade, did, by a subtle stratagem, obtain leave of them to build a house, which was not to contain more ground than an ox-hide would inclose: but, having cut the hide into very narrow thongs, gained ground enough to build a large fort, which they called Castel Zelandia, Anno 1634. The Japanese highly resented the treachery, when they found that the fort made them masters of the only passage by which a large ship could enter the island: but, whether they found themselves too weak to resist them, or whether they heard no more of their commander, or on some other discontent, they left them masters of it, and returned home. This is the account we have of their first settlement there, partly from the *European*¹, and partly from their own writers; to which we shall only add, that the Dutch, finding themselves now sole masters of the island, the natives not being in a condition to oppose them, built a new fort, with four demi-bastions, over-against that of Zelandia, by which they quite secured the entrance

(X) The account which the Chinese historian gives us of its first discovery, is, that one of the emperor's eunuchs, called Wansan-pau, returning home from the west, was driven upon it; where, finding the country as delightful as the inhabitants were barbarous, he staid some time, in hopes of making some discoveries, which might be worth carrying to his master; tho' all the benefit he reaped from his inquiries, was only the knowledge of some few plants and medicinal herbs, which have been used in China ever since with good success.

The next was the commander of a Chinese squadron, named Yu-ta-yew, who, in his cruise on the eastern sea, had a bloody engagement, A. C. 1564, with a corsair, who had seized on the island of Pong-hû; and, after five hours sharp contest, had forced him to retire towards the coming on of the night. Lin-tau-kyen, who commanded the corsair, thought of having refreshed his troops in that island, and to have renewed the onset the next morning; but found the entrance into it blocked up by part of Yu-ta-yew's squadron, whom that experienced commander had sent on that errand: so that, finding his men too much weakened and intimidated to force an entrance into the port, he judged it more prudent to steer his course towards Formosa. Yu-ta-yew pursued him thither; but, being unacquainted with the entrance into the port, and finding the sea too shallow, he returned to the isle of Pong-hû, made himself master of them, and left a strong garrison in the port. The news of his success were received at court with joy, and a literary Mandarin was sent from thence to govern those islands.

In the mean time Lin-tau-kyen, who was landed in Formosa (which the Chinese historian, quoted above, says, was then uncultivated, and inhabited by barbarians), finding it not answerable to his ambitious views, massacred all the natives that fell into his hands; and by, an unparalleled piece of inhumanity, made use of their blood to caulk his ships; and sailed thence to Quang-tong, where he soon after died miserably (23).

a into the port. How they were afterwards driven out of it, and that island, or at least the western part of it, became, with the rest of the Chinese empire, subject to the Tartars, will be best seen in the historical part. It is now time to say something of the island, and its inhabitants.

THE coasts of it are rocky, and high all around, and without any harbours or creeks to come into it; which makes it strong by nature, and difficult to be invaded, there being but one bay, viz. that of Tay-wan, which is at the mouth of a river, at which any ship of bulk may approach it; and this is so narrow, and so well defended by forts and high rocks on each side, that there is no entering it by surprize; tho', when the ships are once got in, they are safe, and sheltered from all winds. The climate must of course be very hot in summer, when the sun is vertical over it; but, as it lies high from the sea, the air is mostly serene and healthy, and the sultry heat allayed by constant breezes which fan it on all sides. The soil is mostly mountainous, especially on the north side; and yet is fertile enough to produce a more than sufficient quantity of rice, which is here used instead of wheat, to support its inhabitants, besides a great variety of excellent fruits, some of them unknown to us; as the bananas, ananas, papayas, goyavas, cocoes: others such as ours, but vastly finer, as peaches, apricots, figs, grapes, pomegranates, chefnuts, and some of the finest citrons and oranges. It likewise produces several sorts of spices, physical and other herbs and roots, and great plenty of sugar, tobacco, tea, and other plants. And much greater plenty and variety might the island produce, were the natives ingenious and industrious in cultivating and improving every spot to the best advantage, like the Chinese: but the men are, it seems, above minding agriculture, as fit only for women and slaves; whilst hunting, fowling, and other such manly sports, are their chief exercise and delight, the country abounding every-where with all manner of game. They have some large rivers, which, though not of any length, yet furnish them with plenty of fish. Their mountains have rich mines of gold, silver, copper, and sulphur: this last in such great abundance, that it makes the island liable to frequent and dreadful earthquakes. The vallies afford plenty of pasture for their cattle, oxen, sheep, goats, hogs, and deer of various kinds; and the woods, we are told by some authors, are no less infested with tygers, leopards, and other wild creatures, of the furs of which the natives make a considerable traffick. This is the account we have of the island, not only from some of our Europeans, but likewise from the Chinese writers: but these extend it only to that part of it which is under their dominions, which they style the northern; but which is at best but a small and inconsiderable slip of it, in comparison to the whole, as the reader may see by the account and map which the Jesuit missionaries have since given us of it, in a letter to Father Du Halde, written Anno 1715, and published by him in his Recueil, Anno 1720^m; from which it plainly appears, that the Chinese dominions in it extend but little more than three degrees along the coasts; and but a few leagues to the inland, which is intersected all the way by high and inaccessible mountains, over which they never venture to pass.

As to the southern, and by far the largest, part of the island, we much question whether they have any knowledge of it. However, they have ventured to describe it, and its inhabitants, after their usual way; the one as a rocky barren wilderness; and the other as so many wild savages, but one degree removed from brutes. But, as their singular contempt for all other nations gives us but too much reason to think their account of the latter to be exaggerated to their disadvantage, and with a design perhaps to insinuate as if the whole island had been much alike till the former became subject to them; we shall give the remainder of their contemptuous picture of it in the margin (Y); and go on here with what we find most worthy of credit on this head.

SURE

(Y) The Chinese divide this island into two parts, which, they say, are severed by such high ridges of mountains, that they have hardly any communication one with another. The one, which is nearest to China, and now subject to it, they describe in the manner we have done above; but the other they represent as barren, wild, and inhabited only by barbarians given to all manner of vices, and strangers to even the most common virtues, and without any traces of religion or morality. According to their accounts, these live in poor cottages made of dirt and bamboes, and covered with straw, raised on a kind of terrace about three or four feet wide, and built in the form of a tunnel inverted; the largest of them from thirty to forty feet in diameter, and with partition walls; all of them without chairs, benches, tables, beds, or any kind of moveables. In the midst is a kind of hearth, or fire-place, raised about two feet from the ground, where they dress their diet, which is commonly rice, and other small grain; and the game, which they either kill with their arrows or darts, at which, though they are of the plainest make,

they are so expert, that they will shoot pheasants, and other birds, with as much certainty as we can with a gun; or, which is still more surprizing, which they catch by dint of running, they being swifter of foot than the fleetest horses.

They are no less slovenly in their diet than in their house-furniture, having neither dishes, spoons, plates, trenchers, or any thing to put their victuals in, except a piece of wood, or mat, out of which they feed themselves with their paws like monkeys. They eat their flesh and fish half-raw, and their beds are only the leaves of some trees common to their country, with which they litter their bed-chamber, and so lay themselves down to sleep. Their whole apparel is a single cloth, which covers them only from the waist down to the knees; but, in lieu of other finery, they have a much more costly way of adorning their bodies than the proudest of our beaux and belles, viz. painting or imbossing on their bodies the figures of beasts, birds, plants, &c. the operation of which puts them to such exquisite pain, that it would in all likelihood kill them, were the complete ornament

The inhabitants described. SURE it is that the Chinese writer often quoted (who, by the way, makes no such distinction ^a between the northern and southern) gives the whole country in general a much higher character, when he says, that it is a very beautiful island, naturally fruitful, and blessed with a serene and healthful, as well as temperate air; extraordinarily well situate, in the neighbourhood of Japan, China, and the Manillas, and capable of carrying on a considerable commerce eastward and westward; it being possible for ships to sail to and from it the whole year roundⁿ; and, as to the character of the natives, even of those that are still unsubdued, Du Halde gives us a short relation out of their Chinese accounts, which is far more to their advantage than to that of their polite invaders, and as well worth inserting here.

A horrid instance of Chinese treachery. THE Chinese, says the account, who knew there were gold mines in Formosa before they subdued it, went in search of them as soon as they got possession of it. But, as they found ^b none in that part of which they were masters, they resolved to examine the eastern part, where they were assured they lay: but, being unwilling to hazard their lives in crossing the high mountains that parted them, they equipped a small ship, to go thither by sea. The inhabitants received them with surprising kindness, offering them houses, provisions, and all sorts assistance. They continued there eight days; but still found all their inquiries after the mines to prove ineffectual (whether by the fault of the interpreter, who might perhaps have apprised the natives of their design, or else through their own politic fear of giving them cause of suspecting them, whom they knew to be but too jealous of the Chinese power); so that, of all the gold they came in quest of, they found none but a few ingots lying in the cottages, of which the poor people made no account. But these proved a dangerous temptation to the Chinese; who, ^c vexed at their ill success, resolved at least to get at them, though by a most inhuman stratagem; and, having equipped their ship, by the help of those hospitable natives, who furnished them with all necessaries for their return, they invited them to a great entertainment, by way of acknowledgement; and, having made them all drunk, cut their throats whilst they were asleep, and carried off the ingots. The consequence of this bloody treachery was, that, the news of it being spread through the eastern part of the isle, they all armed, and entered into the northern part belonging to the Chinese, and massacred man, woman, and child, without mercy, and set fire to some of their habitations. From that time these two parts of the island have been at constant war with each other^o; and hence most likely it is that the Chinese give them so disadvantageous and undeserved a character. ^d

European writers account of Formosa absurd. THE European writers have not been more favourable to them; and Candidius, the chaplain to the Dutch factory there (whom, by the way, Niewhoff, and most of the rest, have either copied, or taken most of their accounts from him, and left out what appeared too absurd to be credited), and who pretends to have resided some time among them, hath painted them even in more disagreeable, tho' different colours, than the Chinese. The reader may see the sum of what they say of them, and of their religion, customs, &c. in the margin (Z). What the ornament to be put on at once; to prevent which, they take up several months, or even a whole year, to go through it; so that they must be contented to undergo every day some considerable torture, to obtain their finery, and distinguish themselves from the vulgar: for it is not every one that is permitted to wear these marks of distinction, but only such as have, in the judgment of the most considerable men in their canton, or village, excelled in some manly exercise, such as hunting, running, &c. whilst the rest must be content with some few scars over their faces, arms, &c. They are all allowed, however, to blacken their teeth, wear bobs in their ears, bracelets above their wrists and elbows; collars and necklaces consisting of several rows of small grains of different colours, with coronets of the same round their heads, which commonly end on the top with a large tuft made of the feathers of cocks, pheasants, &c. which they pick, and stick up with great care. So that, according to our author (24), whoever can form an idea of these fantastical ornaments on the body of a man of a slender easy shape, olive complexion, with sleek hair hanging negligently over his shoulders, and all his clothes a piece of linen two or three feet long, and covering him from the waist to the knees, will have a true picture of a native of the southern part of Formosa.

(Z) According to Candidius, and his followers, the Formosans are tall, stout, and swarthy, rude and barbarous, and go quite naked six months in the year. They have neither religion, laws, nor moral virtue; tho' others, likely upon better evidence, have since represented them as polite, affable, and ingenious, and covering their middle parts with a girdle, when the hot season doth not permit them to wear any other cloathing. Their women, who are still more modest, wear a short petticoat about their thighs, and a short cloak about their shoulders; which, however, they make no scruple to pull off three or four times a day, to wash themselves at their own doors. They are smaller of stature, and less sun-burnt, than the men, and agreeable enough in their persons and temper. Men may marry two or three of them, but not till they are fifty years old: neither are their wives suffered to bring forth children till they have passed the thirty-seventh year of their age. If any of them be found pregnant before that time, the juibus, or priestess (for they have no priests in the island), is sent for, and obliged to stamp upon their belly till they miscarry.

This is the account Candidius gives of that unnatural custom; of which it is hardly needful to observe the absurdity, since such an unnatural violence would wholly incapacitate those females from pregnancy long before the thirty-seventh year of their age: besides, it is well known, that, in those hot climes, women begin so early to bear children, that they seldom, if ever, have any after the thirtieth year. However, our author, if we will credit him, gravely assures us, that he had conversed with one of those women, who had been forced to submit to this unnatural custom seventeen times; but told him, that she, having now attained to her thirty seventh year, was in no small hopes of becoming the real mother of some children (25).

a the Chinese add concerning that part which is subject to them, is as follows: These, being Their dress. situate some degrees more northward, cover themselves with the skins of stags, which they kill in hunting, and of which they make themselves a sort of coat without sleeves. They wear a bonnet made of the leaves of the bananas, in form of a cylinder, which they adorn with coronets placed one over another, and fastened with very narrow bands, or little locks of hair, of various colours; and the top they adorn with a crest, or tuft of feathers, like those in the south. The dress of the women differs but little from that of the men, except in their coats being somewhat longer and finer, and their head-tire a little more bedecked with finery.

In their marriages they are less barbarous than the Chinese; for they neither buy their wives, nor suffer the parents, or go-betweens, to settle the bargain, without the liking of the parties Wife away of courtship and marriage. most concerned; but every young couple chuse each other, without regard to fortune, family, or any inducement but reciprocal affection and liking, their parents having scarce any hand at all in the match. The courtship is commonly begun by the young man; who goes, at the head of some musicians with their instruments, and serenades the lass he hath taken a fancy for, at her own house, for several days. If she approves of him, she goes out without any farther ceremony, and settles the terms with him; and both acquaint their parents with them, who then prepare a marriage-feast for them. This, contrary to most other nations, is done at the bride's father's, which the new son-in-law from thenceforward looks upon as his own, and himself as the support of it, never returning more to his father's house but as a visiter. Hence the parents look upon daughters as greater blessings than sons, because they procure sons-in-law, which become the support of their old age.

In their way of government, they still retain some of their antient forms, notwithstanding Government. their subjection to the Chinese; each town chusing three or four of the antientest, or of the greatest repute for probity and wisdom, to be their judges, to determine all causes and differences that arise among them, absolutely; and if any one refuses to submit to their decision, he is immediately driven out of the town, without hopes of ever being re-admitted into it; nor dares any other receive him.

From that time the Chinese have divided their lands into three hyens, or districts of the third rank, each under a particular governor, and other officers, subordinate to that of the capital of Tay-wan, as this last is to the viceroy of Fo-kyen, the metropolis of the province. The tribute Tribute. they pay to the Chinese court consists chiefly in rice, and the skins or tails of stags, and other such commodities as the island affords: to levy which, there is in every town or district a Chinese officer, who learns their language, and serves as an interpreter to the Mandarins; and both these treat them with such tyranny and oppression, as quite tires their patience: insomuch that, of twelve districts that were subject to them on the south, three of them have since revolted, driven their interpreters away; and united themselves to their eastern countrymen, who live free from tribute and foreign subjection. The Chinese, however, pretend, that many other cantons have submitted themselves to the present emperor, and that they are in hopes that the rest will in time follow their example. However, it plainly enough appears from the map that was since made of their dominions in it, and published by the Jesuits Anno 1720 *, that they have rather lost than gained ground in it; and from all that we have hitherto met with, that they were never masters of one-eighth part of it.

We may add, that, notwithstanding its vicinity to China, it doth not appear that it was How and when discovered. discovered till about the year 1430, in the reign of the emperor Siven-ti, of the Ming dynasty, discovered.

* Lettr. cur. & edifiant. recueil 14. p. 18, & seq.

The ceremonies used towards their dead are no less strange and unnatural. They neither bury nor burn them; but lay their bodies to dry over a slow fire, made under a kind of low scaffold made of bamboes, which causes the body to give a most disagreeable smell. From this ceremony, which lasts full nine days, they proceed to the next, which is, to wrap up the dried corpse in a mat, and lay it on a higher scaffold raised within the house, over which they rear a kind of canopy made of shreds of silk, cotton, linen, &c. It is left to lie in that state till the third year, when they take it, or what is left of it, down, with some kind of solemnity, and deposit it in a proper place under-ground. At each of these three ceremonies an entertainment is made to the relations and friends, accompanied with music, dancing, &c. at which the jebuses, or priestesses, are likewise invited to act their antic part.

These priestesses are rather a kind of jugglers, who, in their worship, which consists in the sacrifice of some hogs, deer, rice, &c. work themselves into a kind of phrensy by their songs, indecent postures, invocations, &c. after which, they pretend to see strange visions, to tell fortunes, to foretell the weather, drive away evil spirits, &c. all which is readily believed by the people. And in these, and some other such-like superstitious ceremonies, our authors tell us, consists all their religion, and without the least sign of their having any notion of a Deity: tho' others, with much greater probability, assure us, that they have temples and idols in almost as great number and variety as they have in China; and if what some add, of their laying a pitcher or vessel of clean water near the dead bodies, for the soul to come and wash itself every day, be true, they must be allowed to have also some imperfect notion of its immortality, and of its being in some state of bliss or punishment; which some tell us they believe to consist, the one in their being removed into some places full of all manner of refreshments; and the other, in their being confined to others full of all manner of filth, stench, and misery (26).

when the eunuch Owan san-pao, in his return from a voyage into the west, was cast upon it by a storm. Here finding the country inviting, though the people seemed to him somewhat savage, he staid to get what intelligence he could of the island, to bring to that monarch; but to no purpose; and all he could bring away from thence, was only a few physical plants, which have continued in great vogue among the Chinese ever since †. How they came afterwards to make themselves masters of it, will be more properly seen in their subsequent history. In the mean time we will conclude the character of these islanders in the remarkable words of our authorⁿ. They are styled barbarians by the Chinese, yet appear to have truer notions of wisdom than some of their philosophers. One finds among them, even by their own confession, neither cheating, thieving, quarreling, nor any law-suits, except against their interpreters. They practise all the duties of equity and mutual benevolence; and whatever is given to any of them must not be touched by him, till those, who share in the labour, partake of the wages.

converts among them.

As to their religion, we shall only add to what hath been said in the last note, what some Dutch writers affirm, that many of those islanders had been converted to Christianity during the short time of the Dutch factory at Tay-wan^o. And Du Halde accordingly tells us, that, upon the Chinese coming thither, they found several of them who understood Dutch, read their books, made use of their characters in writing, and had some fragments of Scripture in the same language still in their hands. These, says the same author, worship no idols, and even abhor every thing of that nature. They neither perform religious worship, nor say any prayers; yet we have met with some of them who had the knowledge of one Supreme Being, Creator of heaven and earth, in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. They likewise knew that our first parents were called Adam and Eve; and that they had, by their disobedience, brought down the anger of God on themselves and their posterity; and that recourse was to be had to baptism, to wash out that stain. They were likewise acquainted with the form of that sacrament, though they could not tell whether they had been baptized, or not. Thus far Du Halde^p.

described.

WE shall conclude the account of this island with a description of its capital, and its commodious harbour. We have already taken notice, that it was called Tay-wan, or Tayovan, and was one of the nine fū's, or capital cities, of the province of Fo-kyen. It is large, populous, and well built, and drives a considerable commerce; insomuch that it is reckoned little inferior to most cities in China. It abounds with all sorts of commodities and provisions, either of its own produce, or which are brought thither from other countries; such as rice, corn, sugar, wine, tea, tobacco, salt, and a kind of dried venison, much admired by the Chinese. The streets are as strait as a line; and covered, during the seven or eight hot months of the year, to keep off the heat of the sun. They are not above thirty or forty feet wide; but all well paved and clean, and some of them about three miles long. All the houses on each side belong to dealers, whose shops are stored with all sorts of rich goods, such as silks, china ware, japan-work, gold and silver utensils and trinkets, &c. all ranged in a most delightful manner, in which art the Chinese excel; so that these streets look rather like the galleries of our exchanges, where nothing is to be seen but shops richly furnished; and would be viewed with greater pleasure, were they not so continually thronged. Both the Tartars and Chinese live in this and the other two cities very peaceably; and more of the latter would in all likelihood come over, and settle in it, if the former, jealous of their becoming too numerous, and shaking off the yoke, did not prevent it (A). There is likewise a good number of natives that live among them, but they are most of them servants to the other two.

Garrison
forces.

THE city of Tay-wan hath neither walls, nor any fortifications, but is defended by a numerous garrison. The Tartars have in the island no less than 10,000 horse and foot, under the command of a lieutenant-general and two major-generals, and a proportionable number of other officers, who are all duly changed every three years, or oftener, if need require it. The two other hyens, or cities of the third rank, are Fong-shau and Chu-lo, which are mostly inhabited by Chinese, and kept under by a sufficient number of troops. They have likewise some considerable villages; but no forts, except that of Ngan-ping, situate at the foot of the castle of Zelandia, and inhabited by about 400 or 500 families. The garrison of it amounts to 2000 men, under the command of a major-general.

(A) There is no doubt but the commodious situation of this island would induce a much greater number of Chinese families to come and settle in it, for the sake of traffick; but, as that cannot be done without a particular passport from the Chinese Mandarins, nor this be obtained without giving some sufficient security to them, there are very few who venture to grant them, except some of the rapacious ones, who do it underhand, and are well paid for it. The rest are, on the contrary, very careful to examine all passengers that go to, or come from, the island; lest, if they should become too powerful there, they should seize on it, and cause some great troubles in the empire: and it is to prevent it, that they maintain there such a number of forces, to keep them in awe.

- a THE port is pretty good, and sheltered from all winds, but the mouth of it becomes every Port, day more and more difficult. It had formerly two entrances ; the one called Ta-kyang, where the greatest ships might ride with ease ; and the other Li-ulb-men, where the bottom is rock, and has not above nine or ten feet water at the highest tides. The first of these is now become impracticable ; some places not having above five feet of water, and those where it rises highest not above seven ; and is more choked up by the sea rolling daily fresh quantities of sand into it^a : to which we may add, what a modern traveller was told there, that the Tartars, after their conquest of China, ordered this harbour to be spoiled, to prevent the Chinese, then in rebellion against them, from fortifying themselves in it ; and commanded the foreign merchants to come and trade in the main^b. But the Dutch formerly entered the port by that way ; at the entrance of which they had built the two forts last mentioned, to prevent either Chinese or Japanese vessels coming into it.

- Thus much may suffice for the island of Formosa ; in the description of which, we have wholly overlooked a fabulous account of it written in English, and translated into other languages, about forty-nine years ago, by a pretended native of the place, and convert to Christianity ; but in such a romantic style, and fraught with such monstrous absurdities, as if he had rather designed to ruin, than to establish the credit of it. Our chief motive, therefore, for mentioning it here, is, that the author, who is still in England, having long since ingenuously owned it to be a vile forgery, to his acquaintance, and within these few years, in print, in a late geographical work[†] ; and expressed a desire that those, who had read that work, should know what judgment to make of it, from his own free confession ; we thought it would not be unserviceable to the publick, to hint thus much of it here, till that more full account comes out which he hath written concerning that shameful imposture, and the fatal means by which he was unwarily drawn into it ; and which, he there tells us, he designs to have published after his death, when there will be less cause of suspecting him of having disguised or palliated the truth.

V. The province of Che-kyang, or Tse kian.

- THIS province, formerly the residence of some of the antient monarchs, and one of the most considerable on account of its maritime situation, extent, riches, and populousness, is bounded on the south by Fo-kyen, last described ; on the north and west by Kyang-nan and Kyang-si ; and, on the east, by the sea. It extends itself from the 27th to the 31° 20' of latitude, and from 116° to almost 120° of east longitude, according to the meridian of Paris. The climate of it is serene and healthy ; and the inhabitants very stout and numerous, amounting, according to their registers, to 1,242,135 families, or 4,525,700 men. It is so rich and fertile, that the Chinese say of it, that, next to Nang-king, this is the paradise of arts, and the paradise of the gods^c, on account of its plentiful flow of all things. The country is so beautifully variegated with well cultivated mountains, fruitful vallies, and plains, that there is not a spot in it which is not turned to advantage. It is moreover intersected by a multitude of rivers and canals, the last cut wide and deep, and lined on both sides with some hewn stone ; the plains of which on both sides have a communication with each other by a vast number of bridges ; so that one may travel through the whole province either by land or water ; and the many springs which fall down from the mountains and large lakes, with which it abounds, contribute no less to its fertility.

- But their greatest manufacture is that of silk, which is here the finest, and more richly and curiously wrought with gold and silver, than in any other province ; and yet is so cheap, that a good silk suit will cost less than one of the most ordinary cloth in Europe. The tribute they pay of it to the emperor is said to amount to 370,466 pounds of raw, and 2574 of wrought, besides some other quantities of the finest, sent as a present to the court, by the imperial barges called Lung-y-chew. What is sent besides from this province into others of the empire, and what is exported into Japan, the Philippine Islands, India, and Europe, amounts to an immense quantity, notwithstanding their having still a sufficiency left to supply their own wants at so cheap a rate. The truth is, the inhabitants employed in it are not only very numerous, but have an excellent genius at cultivating and improving every branch of that manufacture from first to last ; and as experience hath taught them long since, that those worms yield the finest silk, which are fed on the tenderest mulberry-leaves, they take such care to have a constant supply of young dwarf mulberry-trees for that purpose, that they are able to produce the greatest quantities of that kind.

THIS province is famed for making the best hams, and for the great quantities of candles which they make from a certain tree called U-kyew-mu, or tallow-tree, of which we shall speak among their natural rarities. They have likewise here a curious shrub, with a small white flower, not unlike our jeffamin, but with more leaves ; and of such fragrancy, that one single flower will perfume a large room, some say a whole house. These shrubs are in such esteem among the Chinese, that they cultivate them with the same care as we do orange and other exotic plants, to preserve them from the rigour of the weather. Some parts of Che-kyang produce such infinite quantities of mushrooms, that they send them, salted and dried, all over the empire ; and these, when they have been soaked a while in water, resume their freshness, and taste as if they were newly gathered.

Fishes.

Bamboes.

Canals.

THE lakes and rivers yield great variety of excellent fish, particularly the golden one, which will be described among the natural rarities, and the finest cray-fish in all the country. This province likewise produces the greatest quantities of bamboes, there being in some parts whole forests of them. These are very large and hard, and of vast use to the Chinese ; and, though hollow within, and divided into joints, are very strong, and will bear a great weight. They are easily slit into thin slips, of which they make their mats, boxes, combs, &c. ; and, being hollow from end to end, are likewise used either to convey water from place to place, or for telescopes, or to serve as tubes, cases, and other such utensils. The whole country is not only every-where cultivated to the best advantage ; but the plains are intersected with a vast number of canals, which swarm, as well as their rivers, with multitudes of vessels of all sorts and sizes, some of them beautifully carved and gilt without, and neatly furnished within. The inhabitants are ingenious, polite, and courteous to strangers, but are reported to be horribly given to superstition.

CHE-VYANG hath eleven capital cities, or cities of the first rank, and seventy-seven of the second and third rank ; besides eighteen fortresses, most of them upon the sea-coasts, and large and populous enough to pass in other countries for considerable cities, to which we may add a prodigious number of large towns and villages.

Cities of the first rank.

THE chief cities, or fû's, are, 1. Hang-chew ; 2. Kya-bing ; 3. Hu-chew ; 4. Ning-po ; 5. Shaw bing ; 6. Tay-chew ; 7. Kin-wha ; 8. Kyu-chew ; 9. Yen-chew, or Nyen-chew ; 10. Wen-chew ; 11. Chu-chew.

1. HANG-CHEW, the metropolis of the province, and, according to the Chinese, the paradise of the world, is one of the largest, most populous, best situate, and richest, of the empire. Its circumference, which is almost oval, is computed near twelve miles, besides the suburbs, which are of a prodigious extent : and the number of its inhabitants, which amount to a million (B). The walls of the city are lofty, strong, and thick ; the streets fair and strait, though narrow ; and the shops richly and beautifully set out. It hath a prodigious number of bridges over the canals that run through it, and the greatest variety of arches, and triumphal monuments, erected to the honour of Mandarins, and other considerable officers of the highest rank and merit ; all which are beautifully erected in the piazzas, and places of greatest resort. It hath, besides, four large towers of considerable height, adorned with galleries, carvings, gildings, &c. after the Chinese manner. The commerce it drives in all sorts of commodities, but especially in its fine and rich silks, silver and gold brocades, &c. equals that of the most trading cities ; and both town and suburbs abound with plenty of all provisions : the only misfortune it labours under, is, that the waters of the canals, especially within the walls, are bad and unwholesome. But what sufficiently supplies that defect, and renders the situation most delightful and convenient, is a little lake named Si-hû, which is about two leagues in compass, and comes almost close to the walls on the west side of the city, and whose water is exquisitely clear and sweet. The sides of it, where the water is low, and covered all over with the beautiful flower Lyen-wha, already described ; and, on the banks round about, they have, reared upon wooden stakes, a kind of saloons, or piazzas, supported by pillars, and broad causeways paved with large square stones, for the convenience of those that walk ; and have openings left at proper places for the boats to pass ; and handsome bridges built over them, for passengers on foot.

THE lake hath two little islands, whither the people usually repair after they have taken the diversion of rowing in their barks ; and where they have built a temple, and houses of recreation. The sides of the lake are likewise adorned with variety of temples, fine pleasure-houses,

(B) Father Martini hath made it pretty evident (27), that this is the very same city that Paul the Venetian had described under the name of Quin-say, and particularly with relation to the 10,000 bridges he affirmed it to have over the many canals that run through and around it ; which number Martini, and others, think is not at all exaggerated, if we suppose him to have included a prodigious number of triumphal arches built over them in the city, and a vast multitude of other bridges which are seen in the large suburbs, and parts adjacent, especially those about the lake Su-hû, on the east side of which the city is situate ; and which amount to such a vast number, that, when added to those of the city and suburbs, they may be well enough supposed to amount to the number above-mentioned.

a and some large monasteries for the Bonzas ; and more particularly with a small but delightful palace, for the use of the emperors, when they travelled into the southern provinces (C).

HANG-CHEW, as metropolis of the province, hath a garrison of 3000 men, under the vice-Garrison. roy of it ; and another of 7000 more, under a Tartar general : but these last live in a large fortress, separate from the city by a wall. The river Ciew-tang, which runs on the south side of it, is computed by some two miles, and by others a German league, in breadth ^a, and is always covered with a vast number of vessels of all sorts ; and both that and the canals, especially without the walls, with floating villages, in which whole families live, and carry on their business. The reader may guess at the populousness of the whole city and suburbs, by the consumption of eatables which are devoured in it, of which he may see a short sketch in the margin (D). The last thing worth mentioning, of this great city, is the mountain of Ching-bo-ang, on which stands a high tower, which, by the help of a large water-glass which is made to turn ^{A fine water-dial.} the hand of a dial, shews the hour of the day at a considerable distance ; the figures of the hours being gilt, and about eighteen inches long. Hang-chew hath seven cities of the second and third rank under its jurisdiction, which are likewise rich and opulent ; but we have neither room to describe them here, or any of the others of the first rank, except that of NING-PO, or, as the Portuguese call it, Lyang-po, or Liampo, which is a handsome sea-port Ning-po. on the eastern sea, over-against the coasts of Japan ; and stands on the confluence of two small rivers, which form a canal thence to the sea. The plain ground is a kind of spacious oval ^{Canal.} basin, terminated by hills, which extends itself a considerable length and breadth, and is exceedingly fertile. The town, which stands near the centre, is encompassed with a strong wall of free-stone, and 5074 geometrical paces in compass. These have five noble gates, two of which look eastwards, towards the port ; besides two large arched water-gates, at which the barges come in and out. The port is defended by a citadel built on a very high rock, at the foot of which ships must necessarily pass within the distance of half a pistol-shot. One tide brings them up along the fine chanel above-mentioned, which is here above 150 fathoms wide, and every-where seven or eight deep. The entrance of Ning-po, however, is difficult, especially for large vessels, there being but fifteen feet of water at the bar in the spring-tides ; ^{Commerce with Japan.} but that doth not hinder its carrying on a great traffic with Batavia, Siam, and especially with Japan, Nanga-zaki being only two days sailing from it ; and it was partly on this account d that our East-India company did once endeavour to have established a commerce with it.

ABOUT eighteen or twenty leagues from Ning-po lies the island of Che-w-shan, whose port is pretty good, but not so convenient for trade ; and there it was that our English ships put in by accident, not being able to find out the way to Ning-po, through the many islands that lie scattered along that coast : the reader may see the island described in the margin (E). The chief commerce of Ning-po consists in the fine silks which are manufactured in this province, and which are exported into foreign parts ; especially Japan both raw and wrought, together with sugar, drugs, salt-fish, and flesh (F), wine, &c. in lieu of which, they bring back copper,

(C) Those who have read Martini's swollen account of this lake, and its adjacent structures, will find this, we have chiefly taken from Du Halde, to come vastly short of it : but Father Le Compte had already retrenched some considerable exaggerations of his brother Jesuit, with respect to its largeness ; and especially of its pretended stately palaces, and magnificent buildings, which he rather represents as a parcel of wooden houses, reared up either for convenience or diversion. Whether, therefore, Martini's description was designedly exaggerated, or whether those sumptuous structures have been since destroyed, or gone to ruin, which is not for us to decide, we have no reason to suppose that the lake makes a better figure now, than that in which Du Halde hath described it.

(D) It is computed to amount to 10,000 sacks of rice (each sack containing as much as will suffice 100 men) and 10,000 hogs per day ; oxen, cows, sheep, goats, fish, fowl, &c. in proportion ; all which are here sold very cheap, and eaten in great quantities.

(E) Che-w-shan, Shusan, or Che-w-xan, is about fourteen leagues in length, and three or four in breadth, under the thirtieth degree of latitude, and between the fifth and sixth of east longitude from the meridian of Pe-king. It is mostly inhabited by Chinese, who fled thither from the invading Tartars ; and so well peopled, that it hath, we are told, no less than seventy-two cities, or large towns, seated along the coasts, and within the bay (28). The capital bears the name of the island, and is well walled and peopled ; and here it was that our East-India company began to trade, Anno 1700 ; as they were not permitted to sail to Ning-po, the town having a very convenient bay. There is a great number of small islands round this of Che-w-shan ; but none of them worth notice, except one called Pou-to, which is chiefly famed for its great resort, on account of some extraordinary worship performed there by the idolatrous Bonzas (29).

(F) The people of Ning-po not only drive a vast trade of this salt-fish and flesh abroad, but eat it in such quantities, that it is a common saying among the Chinese, that their bodies, after death, cannot corrupt, because they have been salting them all their lives against it. Some particular excellency, however, there must be either in their salt, or way of salting those meats, which preserves them, whilst alive, from the scurvy, and other diseases, which the too frequent use of that sort of food is known to cause : neither is it the scarcity of other provisions that makes them live so much upon upon this, the town abounding with as great a variety of others as any one in the empire.

Vu-chang described.

Opulence, traffic, &c.

THIS is the first in rank of the inland provinces, and is surrounded on the east by Kyang-si and Kyang-nan; on the south by Quang-si and Quang-tong; on the west by Quey-chew and Se-chwen; and, on the north, by Shen-si and Ho-nan. It is a very large province; and extends itself from $24^{\circ} 45'$ to $33^{\circ} 20'$ of latitude, and eight degrees in west longitude from the meridian of Pe-king; and the river Yang-tse, which crosses it in the middle, from east to west, divides it into two parts, or viceroyships, the northern and the southern. It is little inferior to any other province in fertility, healthiness, and opulence; the greatest part of it being a rich flat soil, intersected with a number of rivers, besides the Yang tse above-mentioned; and a vast multitude of canals, and some considerable lakes (G); all which greatly contribute to its fertility, and facilitate its commerce. What mountains there are in it do likewise produce something that helps to enrich it: some are covered with stately pines, and other trees, fit for the noblest structures; others abound with medicinal and other herbs and plants. Some have mines of crystal, iron, tin, tutenag, and other base metals; to say nothing of those of gold and silver, which are not permitted to be digged; for, from those mountains is washed down some quantity of gold by the torrents that flow from them. As for wheat, rice, and other grain, fruits, &c. it yields such plenty of them, that it is emphatically styled the granary of China, and sends accordingly vast quantities yearly into other provinces.

BUT the greatest manufacture of this province is that of cotton, which grows and is wrought here in vast quantities; and of a sort of paper made of bamboes, which grows in great plenty in the low-lands. The plains likewise nourish an infinite number of a little kind of worms, which produce a fine wax, of which we shall speak in a proper place. This province was formerly governed by a great number of princes, descended from the imperial family of Hong-wu, who made almost as great a figure as the Chinese emperors; but that noble and numerous race hath been intirely extirpated by the Tartars *.

HU-QUANG hath fifteen cities of the first rank, eight of which belong to the northern, and seven to the southern part of it. The former hath also sixty of the second and third rank; and the latter fifty-four, besides eleven military ones, and other fortresses, and towns and villages in much greater number.

THE eight cities belonging to the northern part are, 1. Vu-chang; 2. Hang-yang; 3. Ngan-lo; 4. Syang-yang; 5. Twen-yang; 6. Te-ngan; 7. Kin-chew; 8. Whang-chew.

THOSE belonging to the southern part are, 1. Chang-cha, the capital of it; 2. Yo-chew; 3. Pau-king; 4. Heng-chew; 5. Chang-té; 6. Ching-chew; 7. Yong-chew.

VU-CHANG, the metropolis of the whole province, as well as of the Hu-pe, or northern part, and the residence of the governor, or viceroy, is seated, as it were, in the centre of the Chinese empire; and, by means of the river Yang-tse, which runs through it, hath an easy communication with every province of it, and hath a great resort from them. It suffered very much, as well as the rest of the province, during the late wars; but hath so well recovered itself since, that it is hardly inferior to any other in China, either for largeness, populousness, or opulence. Among other of its magnificent edifices, it stills shows the sumptuous palace of its antient princes, and five stately temples, famed for their largeness and elegance. The vast concourse of vessels to it, which are seldom fewer than 8000 or 10,000, and lie ranged some miles in length upon the river, many of them of a large size, and finely built, joined to the fine prospect of the city, is, when viewed from some neighbouring eminence, esteemed one of the most delightful vista's that can be imagined.

VU-CHANG stands in latitude $30^{\circ} 34'$, and west longitude from Pe-king $2^{\circ} 15'$; and hath under its jurisdiction one city of the second, and nine of the third rank, besides military ones, forts, &c. The rest of the cities of this province have nothing particular worth mentioning.

* KAO, MARTINI, LE COMPTE, MARTINIERE, DU HALDE, & al.

* Ibid.

(G) This province of Hu-quang seems to have its name from those lakes, or at least from one of the largest of them, of which we shall subjoin a short description (the word Hu signifying a lake, and quang a territory). It is called Tong-ting-hu; and is computed about 400 miles in circuit, and is situate very near the middle of the province. It hath on the north-east end a communication with the river Yang tse, and with a vast number of other rivers and canals: so that there is always a prodigious quantity of vessels navigating to and from it.

It is, however, apt to be very stormy and dangerous at some seasons, whence many considerable shipwrecks happen upon it. One in particular is recorded in their history; in which 300 large transports, with 50,000 men, perished all in one night (29). In other respects, it is not only of vast benefit to the province, on account of the great commerce above-mentioned, but of the prodigious quantities of fish and wild-fowl that breed in and about it.

VII. The province of Ho-nan, a IS bounded, on the north, by those of Pe-cheli and Shan-si; on the west, by Shen-si; on the south, by Hu-quang; and on the east, by Shan-tong; it is likewise watered by the Whang-bo, which runs across the north part of it, from west to east, and divides it from Shan-si, and part of Shan-tong. The Chinese give this province the title of Chong-wba, or, the flower of the middle, because it lies in the heart of the empire; and, consequently, according to their deep knowledge of geography, in the heart of the world. It extends itself from $31^{\circ} 2'$ to 37° of latitude, and from $6^{\circ} 15'$ of west to $0^{\circ} 20'$ of east longitude, from the Pe-king's meridian: so that the mildness of its climate, joined to the fertility of its lands, render it a most delightful abode. The Chinese affirm, moreover, that Fo-hi, the great founder of their monarchy, fixed his court in this province, whose reign, according to some authors, began 2592 years before Christ: which, if true, would confirm the chronology of the Septuagint^v. But we hope that we have elsewhere sufficiently exploded that pretended antiquity of the Chinese monarchy^z; and shall say much more on the subject in the sequel.

HOWEVER, it is not improbable, that the delightfulness and fertility of this province might invite some of their antient monarchs to choose it for their residence; and, accordingly the Chinese history affirms the city of Kay-fong-fu, the metropolis of it, to have been the seat of the empire, during a long succession of monarchs, till it was, at length, overflown, and covered with sand^a, by a great inundation, of which we shall speak in the sequel. It is indeed so healthful and fertile, that it abounds with every thing for life or delight. The eastern part of it, especially, is so rich, and well cultivated, and so variegated with gardens, orchards, pleasure-houses, noble seats, &c. that one may travel through it above seven days with surprising delight. The western part is, indeed, more mountainous; but those mountains are no less rich, in fine timber, variety of metals and minerals, plants, &c. and the vast quantities, as well as variety, of corn, rice, fruits, and other product, which both the hills and dales do yield, as well as the tribute the province pays for them, and for silks, cloths, cottons, and other commodities, is almost incredible. It is likewise famed for a remarkable lake, which draws to it great numbers of those who are concerned in the silk manufacture, on account of the inimitable lustre which its water gives to that commodity. There is likewise, in the neighbourhood of the city of Nan-yang, a kind of serpent, whose skin is speckled with little white spots, which the Chinese physicians infuse in a phial full of wine, and make use of the infusion as an effectual remedy against the palsy^b.

Ho-NAN hath, besides fortresses, castles, and military towns, eight cities of the first, and 102 of the second and third rank. Those of the first, are, 1. Kay-fong-fu; 2. Que-te; 3. Chang te; 4. Ve-kyan; 5. Whay-king; 6. Ho-nan; 7. Nan-yang; 8. Vu-ning.

KAY-FONG-FU, or Shai fong, the metropolis of the province, and once one of the noblest in Kay-fong-Fu. the empire, was situate in a large fertile plain, about four miles and a half from the Whang-bo, or yellow river, and in latitude $34^{\circ} 52'$, and longitude west from Pe-king $1^{\circ} 56'$; but its low situation beneath the waters of that river occasioned its ruin, in 1642, when being closely besieged by the rebel Ly-chuang, at the head of 100,000 men, the general, who was sent to relieve it, contrived the fatal design of drowning his army, by breaking the great bank, which had been reared, at a vast charge, to preserve the country from being overflowed by that great river (H). His project succeeded indeed; but proved the ruin and destruction not only of this noble capital, but of 300,000 of its inhabitants, by the violence and swiftness of the overflow^c.

By what is still to be seen of its ruins, it appears to have been three leagues in compass. The annotator on Dionysius Kao adds, that it had lain ever since like a pond, or morass; and that all the vast pains and expence, to drain and restore it, had proved so unsuccessful, that the

(H) This river, it seems, runs so much higher than the adjacent lands, and had made such horrid devastations among them, that, to prevent as much as possible the violence of its waters, their monarchs had caused high and strong dikes to be thrown up along its banks, the length of about thirty leagues. Yet these sometimes proved so weak against the violence of its current, that the adjacent cities were obliged to cast up new ones, at some small distance from their walls, to suppress its rapid fury (30).

The river, Father Le Compte, who calls it the Hoambo, tells us, hath its rise among the farthest part of the mountains which cover the province of Su chwen, in the west; whence it throws itself into Tartary, and flows a considerable way along the great wall, at which it re-enters China, between the provinces of Shan-si and Shen-si; thence it continues its course through this of Ho-nan; and, having crossed part of that of Nan-king, and flowed about 600 leagues through the land, disembogues itself, at last, into the east sea, not far from the mouth of the Kyang (31).

court had given over all further thoughts about it^d. However, a new one hath been rebuilt since (as most authors tell us, on the other side of the river, though Du Halde takes no notice of this last particular), on which great pains and cost have been spent, to raise it to its pristine grandeur; but it comes still very short of it. However, its jurisdiction is still very extensive, and contains four cities of the second, and thirty of the third rank. The others have nothing particular worth our mentioning here, except that of Ho-nan, which, though situate in the midst of mountains between three rivers, is of late become very considerable, both for its wealth and noble buildings, particularly some stately temples, dedicated to antient heroes. The Chinese, who called their country the navel of the earth, styled this city the center of the navel, because it stands in the center of the empire. Its district extends over one city of the second, and thirteen of the third rank. In one of the latter, named Teng-fong-hyen, stands the high tower built by the celebrated Cheu-kong, where he used to observe the stars. They shew you there likewise the instrument which he made use of to find the meridian shadow, in order to discover the height of the pole. They attribute to him the invention of the mariner's compass, though he lived above 1000 years before Christ^e.

SHAN-TONG, Xan-tun, Can-tong, Shan-ton, is bounded on the west by Pe-cheli, and part of Ho-nan, last described; on the south, by Kyang-nan, by the Tong-yang, or eastern sea, on the east, and on the north, by the same sea, and part of Pe-cheli. It extends itself from 34° 30' to 38° 20' of latitude, and from 1° to 6° 25' of east longitude, from Pe-king; and is one of the most fertile provinces, and finest climates, in all China. It not only produces every thing that is necessary for life and delight, but in such great plenty, that one crop is sufficient to afford its inhabitants several years sustenance, though this is partly owing to its not being so populous as some other provinces of the empire.

It hath a good number of lakes, rivers, and brooks, which contribute to fertilize and enrich it, besides the great imperial canal, which crosses some part of it, and by which all the barks that come from the southern parts sail to Pe-king; where the very tribute of the vast quantities of merchandizes, &c. which they bring, is computed to amount to more than ten millions^f: so that nothing can obstruct the richness and fecundity of this province, but either too long a drought (for it rains but seldom in it), or the great havock which is frequently made by the locusts, which breed in the plains, in a dry season, and destroy every thing they come at.

THESE insects are reckoned one of the three plagues with which this province is infested. The next is, the vast droves of wolves which range among the mountains and plains, which are very fierce and ravenous, and do a great deal of mischief. The last is, the numerous gangs of robbers which infest the highways over the mountains, and often come down into the plains, and plunder and ravage the villages and open towns. In other respects, Shan-tong enjoys a serene and mild climate, a fruitful soil, and a good traffic.

THE inhabitants, which are computed to amount to 770,555 families, or 6,759,675 men, are healthy and stout, insomuch, that the boys are commonly seen to go naked in the coldest weather, and take a pleasure in fousing one another in water. They manufacture silk in great quantities and variety; and, besides the common sort, which is produced by the silk-worms, they have another sort, which is found upon trees and bushes in great plenty, which is spun by a kind of worm, not unlike our caterpillars. This last, though coarser than the common sort, is stronger, and more compact; and of both these they drive a great trade, by means of their rivers and canals.

AMONG other curious fruits, which this province produces in common with the rest, that which the call se-tse, which are a peculiar kind of figs, no-where to be met with but in China, grows here in greater plenty than in any other province. These do not ripen till the beginning of autumn; and, being dried as other figs are, contract a kind of crust of candied sugar, which gives them a delicious taste: so that these are sent from hence into all the provinces of the empire, and even out of it, in great quantities. By these means, it hath been able to raise itself to its pristine splendor, from which it was sunk into the lowest degree of desolation, having been almost totally ruined by the civil wars, on account of its being so often forced to shift sides, and thereby becoming a prey to both. However, what renders this province most venerable among the Chinese is, that their great philosopher Kong-fu-tse, commonly called by us Confucius, drew his first breath in it^g; of whom we shall have occasion to speak more fully, in a proper place.

SHAN-TONG hath six cities of the first rank, all very populous and flourishing; and these have no less than 114 of the second and third rank, besides a great number of towns and a villages, and fifteen fortresses, some of them very large, and all of them built to guard the entrances of their ports, and the mouths of their rivers. There are likewise several islands Islands. scattered along the gulph, which are no less populous, and afford convenient harbours for Chinese transports, and a quick and easy passage to and from Korea and Lyeau-tong ^b (I).

THE cities of the first rank are ; 1. Tsi-nan ; 2. Teng-chew ; 3. Tong-chang ; 4. Tsing-chew ; 5. Ten-chew ; 6. Lay-chew.

TSI-NAN, Zi nan, Ci-nan, the metropolis of the province, is conveniently situate on the south Tsi nan de- side of the river Tsing-ho, otherwise called Tsi, or Li, by which it hath a communication with scribed. the great canal, and carries on a great commerce by it into other provinces. It is large, and well peopled, and famed for its many public buildings, some of them of exquisite beauty, and for having been the residence of a long series of monarchs, whose stately monuments yield a most noble prospect, from the adjacent hills, on which they are reared. Seventy-two of those monarchs are celebrated, in the Chinese annals, for their pacific reigns, and the many stately temples, monasteries, arches, bridges, and other public edifices, which they built, as well as for their singular application to religion, and the welfare of their subjects.

TSI-NAN hath four cities of the second, and twenty-six of the third rank ; and stands in Chinese gl. st. $36^{\circ} 45'$ of latitude, and in $10^{\circ} 39'$ east longitude, from Pe-king. The others have nothing particular in them, except the great borough of Yen-ching, famed for the manufacture of a sort of glass, but more brittle than that of Europe, and which breaks when exposed to too sharp an air ⁱ.

IX. The province of Shan-si.

c SHAN-SI, Shang-si, Xan-si, or Chan-si, is bounded on the east by Pe-cheli ; on the west, IX. by Sben-si ; on the south, by Ho-nan ; and on the north, by the Chinese wall, which Shan-si de- parts it from Tartary. It extends itself but a little way from east to west ; viz. from 1° to $6^{\circ} 23'$ of west longitude from Pe-king ; but from north to south much more ; viz. from $34^{\circ} 37'$ to $40^{\circ} 50'$ of latitude. It is affirmed, by the Chinese, to have been the first inhabited province in the whole empire ; and, though it be nothing so large as some of those we have described, yet is to the full as fertile and populous, in proportion to its extent. Its climate is serene and mild, though it hath a great number of mountains, and some of them of a frightful height and ruggedness ; but the greatest part of the rest are well cultivated, and cut into terrasses from top to bottom, and bear plenty of corn, and other grain (K). East high mountains.

d THE plains are still more fertile, but have not so great a quantity of canals to irrigate them ; on which account, they do not yield such abundance of rice as other provinces do. Their vines produce excellent grapes, of which the Chinese might make wine, did they not prefer the eating of them dried, and sending the remainder into other parts of the empire.

THIS province furnishes also abundance of musk, porphyry, marble, jasper, &c. and Product. hath some mines which yield great store of iron, which is fabricated into variety of utensils, especially culinary, which are sent into other provinces. The people are stout, and obliging, but illiterate ; and the women much admired for their beauty, and slender shape.

THIS province hath five cities of the first rank, and eighty-five of the second and third ; Cities. those of the first rank are ; 1. Tay-ywen ; 2. Ping-yang ; 3. Lu-ngan ; 4. Fwen-chew ; 5. Tay-tong. The number of families in it amounts to about 589,959, or 5,084,015 men.

ⁱ DU HALDE, ubi supra, p.

(I) The three most considerable of them are, Fou-xu, Xa-muen, and Ten-heng ; the last of which is famous for being the dreadful stage on which 500 Chinese philosophers were murdered, by order of the emperor Xiu, or Chi-xwang ti, the same who built the great wall. This prince being a consummate warrior, but a mortal enemy to all philosophers, ordered them all to repair to a certain place, under pretence of consulting them about some important point ; but, having got them all together, shipped them off to this island, where they were all murdered ; though others say, they drowned themselves (32). He was no less an enemy to all learning, and learned men, as we shall have occasion to shew, when we come to speak of his reign.

(K) Some of these mountains, we are told, are so soft on the surface (33), that one may dig four or five feet deep, without meeting the least stone ; and some of them have very spacious plains on the top. They are, moreover, remarkable for their inexhaustible mines of coals, which the inhabitants use for fuel, where wood is scarce.

There is one very remarkable thing, which Martini tells us, of these mountains, not indeed of his own knowledge, but on the report of the inhabitants ; viz. that they open, in sundry places, in the form of fiery wells, though without flame ; so that, by narrowing the mouth of them, one may so concentrate the heat as to lay pots, kettles, frying-pans, and other culinary vessels, and dress victuals over them. The fire, he adds, burns but dimly ; and if, to accelerate the heat, one throws any wood into these holes, it will hardly flame, but will burn like our charcoal (34).

TAY-YWEN, Tai-ven, Tba-yen-fu, metropolis of the province, is situate on the river Fwen-bo, in $35^{\circ} 53'$ of latitude and $3^{\circ} 55'$ of west longitude, from Pe-king. It is antient, populous, and large, its walls measuring about three leagues in compass; but is much decayed of its former splendor, when the princes of the blood, of the imperial family of Tay-ming, resided in it, whose stately palaces are since run into decay, and some of them lie in ruins, none daring to rebuild them. The city hath a fruitful and delightful territory around it; and the adjacent mountains yield a curious prospect of royal monuments, all either of marble or hewn stone, and of a considerable extent; besides triumphal arches, statues of heroes, figures of lions, horses, and other animals, in different attitudes, and very natural. The whole is encompassed with a kind of forest or antient cypress, planted chequer-wise.

THE jurisdiction of Tay-ywen extends over five cities of the second, and twenty of the third rank.

Division.

SHEN-SI, Xen-si, Xien-si, is bounded on the east, by the Wang-bo, which parts it from Sban-si, last described; on the south, by Se-chuen, and Hu-quang; on the north, by Tartary, and the great wall; and on the west, by the Mogol Tartary. It extends itself, in some parts, from 32° to 40° of latitude, and from $5^{\circ} 40'$ to almost 16° of west longitude, from Pe-king, but in a very irregular manner. It is divided into two parts, or governments, the eastern, and the western, which contain eight cities of the first, and 106 of the second and third rank, besides a great number of fortresses, castles, and redoubts, built at proper distances, along the great wall†. Among those fortresses, or, as they may be more properly called, military cities, those especially of the first, being as large, rich, and populous, as most of the inland cities, and are twenty-three in number, the two following are most considerable; viz. Kan-chew and Su-chew; the former of which is the residence of a viceroy, and several Mandarins, the principal of whom receive their orders from none but the court; and the latter is equal in strength, and its governor in power, with the former, only this is divided into two parts, one of which is mostly inhabited by Chinese, and the other by strangers^c. Here are, besides the twenty-three above-named, a good number of others, of a second and third order, but nothing so large, though very strong, and well garrisoned, besides the forts and redoubts, which are chiefly designed to guard the great wall.

Government.

SHEN-SI is one of the antientest and largest provinces in the empire; and had formerly three viceroys over it¹, though, at present, it hath but two, exclusive of the two governors above-mentioned, who are independent on them.

Climate.

THE air here is very temperate; and the people more civil, and affected to strangers, than in any of these northern provinces. The soil is rich and fruitful; and some of the mountains have mines of gold, though forbidden to be opened under the severest penalties; but the rivers and torrents, which flow from them, bring down such quantities of that metal, that an infinite number of people maintain themselves by the bare profit that arises by washing and separating it from the sand. The plains yield but small quantities of rice, for want of a sufficient number of canals: but they make ample amends for it by the prodigious plenty of corn they produce, besides medicinal and other plants, roots, &c. particularly rhubarb, which is here excellent, and cultivated with great care. One misfortune, however, this province labours under, viz. frequent and extraordinary droughts, which never fail of being followed with such prodigious swarms of grasshoppers, and other insects, as quite darken the sun, and eat up every herb, bush, and even the small boughs of the trees: at such times the whole country come out, and kill them as fast as they can, and eat them as a great dainty. In some parts of Shen-si, particularly in the neighbourhood of its metropolis Si-ngan, or Sigan, is a sort of salt earth, which, being boiled and crystallized, makes a very good white salt; and, in some other places further, the ground, after a good shower of rain, emits a kind of froth, which is made into an excellent soap. The head cities belonging to this province are as follow:

Cities.

IN the eastern part, called I-tong, are, 1. Si-ngan; 2. Xen-ngan; 3. Fong-tsyang; 4. Hang-chong.

AND in the western, called I-si, 5. Ping-lyang, 6. Kong-chang; 7. Lyng-tau; 8. King-yang.

Famed walls.

SI-NGAN-FU, the metropolis of the whole province, is a very large city, commodiously situate on a delightful ascent on the south side of the river Whey, in latitude $34^{\circ} 16'$, and west longitude from Pe-king $7^{\circ} 35'$. Its walls are strong and lofty, about four leagues in compass, and flanked with a great number of towers, of an excellent fabricature, which hath given rise to the saying, that it is girt with a golden girdle. Among other noble buildings that adorn it within, is still to be seen the palace of the antient kings who reigned in this

a province, and who were once very powerful, and possessed a vast tract of the empire; some stately temples, triumphal arches, &c.

THE principal forces of the Tartars, designed for the defence of the north of China, are garrisoned here, under a general of their nation, who, with his troops, live in a separate part of the city, divided from the rest by a wall. The chief Mandarins of the province, who are here likewise in great numbers, are mostly Tartars. The mountains adjacent abound with deer, hares, and other game; and produce, among other fossils, a white kind of earth, which is much valued by the ladies, who infuse it in water, and whiten their complexion with it.

It was near this city that Father Le Compte tells us there was a monumental marble table dug up Anno 1645, which was ten feet long, and six broad; and on the top of which was engraved a cross; and a little below it an inscription, in characters partly Chinese, and partly Syriac, importing, that an angel had brought tidings of the Messiah's being born of a virgin in Judea, and of his birth's being manifested to eastern kings by a new star in the heavens, who came and offered the divine infant their presents; that so the law, and predictions of four-and-twenty prophets, might be thereby accomplished; and that Olopouen came into China in the year of Christ 636, where he met with a kind reception from the emperor; who, having examined his law, and acknowledged the truth of it, issued out an edict in favour of him and his religion (L). It appears by this inscription, therefore, that Christianity flourished in the Chinese empire from the year 636 to 782, when the monument above-mentioned was set up. Our author tells us, that the emperor then reigning, when it was first digged up, ordered it to be kept in a pagod, or temple, about a mile from this city, where it is supposed to be still at this time^m.

THE other cities we pass by, as having nothing particularly remarkable; excepting that called Han-chong, the high road to which, over the high mountains that surround it, hath something vastly surprising, both with respect to the number of men who were employed in making of it, which amounted to 100,000, and the great difficulty, and quick dispatch, of the work; to complete which, they levelled high hills, made lofty arches from one mountain to another, and supported them with pillars where-ever the intervening valley was too wide. These bridges, which form part of the road, are in some places so high, that one cannot behold the vast precipice below without dread. They are wide enough for four horsemen to ride abreast over them; and, for the better security and convenience of the passengers, are railed on both sides, and furnish'd with villages and inns at proper distances, for their accommodationⁿ. There are many more such stupendous works in other parts of China, especially amongst the mountainous parts of it^o, some of which we may have occasion to mention among their other artificial rarities; though this, with respect to its length, height, &c. seems to excel all the rest.

XI. The province of Se-chwen.

^c SE-CHWEN, Seu-chu, Su-cheu, Su-chuen, is bounded on the north by Shen-si, last described; by Hu-quang on the east; by Quey-chew and Yun-nan on the south; and by the kingdom of Tibet on the west. It extends itself from 24° 50' to 32° 50' of latitude, and from 6° 20' to 15° 25' west longitude from Pe-king. It is a large and fruitful province; but

(L) The copy and contents of the whole inscription, and history of its discovery, may be seen in Kercher's China Illustrata, and in Father Le Compte above-mentioned (35); and the purport of the edict, according to their version, runs as follows:

"No particular name comprehends the true law; neither are saints confined to any one place, but are dispersed through the world, that they may be universally useful. A man of Judea, of exemplary virtue, arrived at our court; we have examined his doctrine, and found it worthy of admiration, and without any mixture of pride, and built upon those principles which suppose that the world had a beginning. This law, which teaches the way of salvation, cannot but be extremely beneficial to our subjects. I therefore judge it necessary that it be taught to them." The inscription goes on with an account of that monarch's ordering a church to be built, and of his appointing twenty-one persons to officiate in it; of his son and successor Tay-loum's highly honouring the bishop Olopouen, and promoting this religion with the same laudable zeal; so that the Bonzas were alarmed at the progress it made, and used all possible means to put a stop to it. They accordingly raised a bloody persecution; but which, in a little time, served only to make it break out with greater lustre, and meet with greater encouragement from the succeeding monarchs. In the mean time Ki-bo, a new missionary from Judea, arrived, who met with the same kind reception and success that Bishop Olopouen had done before; and the Chinese monarchs not only encouraged it with all their might, but much more by their pious examples, and by the most signal instances of piety; in memory of which wonderful change, this monumental inscription was set up A. C. 782. This is the substance of the inscription, which the reader may see at full length in the authors above quoted.

is one of those that suffered most, and was almost laid waste, by the late civil wars^p. It hath, a however, recovered itself so far since, as to vie with some of the best northern ones in fertility, populoufness, and opulence. The great river Yang-tse, which runs through it, not only Great traffick. enriches its lands by the multitude of canals cut from it; but much more so the inhabitants, by the great trade that is carried on by its means, of vast quantities of silk, iron, tin, quick-silver, sugar, excellent loadstones, lapis Armenius, musk, rhubarb, china-root, and other commodities, which are exported into other provinces. The country, being mostl. plain,
Product. and well-watered, produces plenty of rice, wheat, and other corn; insomuch that the bare tribute of the former amounts to 6,106,666 sacks. The only necessary that is wanting here is salt: which, by reason of the distance from the sea, cannot be so conveniently brought thence. To supply which defect, they dig up wells in the mountains, whence they draw a b kind of salt water, which, being evaporated, leaves a salt behind, but not so good for seasoning as that of the sea^q.

A small monarchy within it. We are told of a petty monarchy in this province, situate on the mountains which part it from that of Ho-nan on the north-east, and called the kingdom of King, which is quite independent from the Chinese, and is governed by its own princes. It was founded during the late wars, when the Kingiangs, a brave people, to avoid being enslaved by the Tartars, or being exposed to their cruel ravages, went and erected themselves into this little state, among those high and rugged mountains, where they live free and unmolested, and avoid all commerce with the Tartars, Chinese, or any other people^r.

Cities. THE province of Se-chwen hath ten jurisdictions, or cities of the first rank, and eighty-eight of the second and third, besides five military ones; nine large fortresses of the first, and twenty-five of the second order, and forts, castles, &c. depending upon them.

THE ten capitals of the province are, 1. Ching-tu; 2. Pau-ning; 3. Shun-king; 4. Su-chew; 5. Chong-king; 6. Que-chew; 7. Ma-hu; 8. Long-ngan; 9. Tsun-i; 10. Tong-chwen.

Chin-chu-fu ruined by the wars. Re-established. CHING-TU-FU, the metropolis of the province, and formerly the royal residence of some of the Chinese monarchs, was one of the largest and finest cities in the whole empire, till the civil wars, under which it suffered most of any, quite ruined it, and the whole province, Anno 1646; and, though it hath in some measure recovered itself, yet doth it shew little of its pristine grandeur, except the sad remains of its once stately palace, some few temples, bridges, and such-like, and in its present populoufness and the great commerce it now d carries on. It is seated almost in the heart of the province, and in a fruitful territory, the only plain one in the province, which is by that means intersected with a great number of navigable canals, cut from the river Ta, or Ta-kyang, whose course here is rather slow than rapid: but, when the canals are reunited to it, and its waves increased by the confluence of the Hin-sha-kyang, it becomes exceeding rapid and dangerous, being much incumbered with rocks, especially in its next course through the province of Hu-quang.

An extraordinary bird. CHING-TU stands in latitude 30° 41' and 12° 18' west longitude from Pe-king. Its jurisdiction is considerable, and extends itself over six cities of the second, and twenty-five of the third rank. It is chiefly remarkable, Martini tells us, for a small extraordinary bird with a red bill, and the finest variety of feathers. It is called Tong-hoa-fang, that is, the bird of e the flower Tong-hoa, from which they pretend it to be produced, and to live no longer than that doth; and is so like it, that one would imagine it to be a living flower^s.

XII. The province of Quang-tong.

XII. Quang-tong described.

QUANG-TONG, Quang-tung, Quoang-tung, Quan-ton, Canton, and, by some, Quang-chew, from its metropolis, is bounded on the north by Kyang-si; on the north-east by Fo-kyen; on the west by Quang-si, and the kingdom of Tong-king, or Tonquin; and the rest is washed by the Nan-hay, or sea of the south. It is reckoned the most considerable of all the provinces; and extends itself from 20° 15', or, if you include the island of Hay-nan, f which is under its jurisdiction, from 18° 20' to 25° 33' of latitude, and from 1° east, to 9° 8', west, of longitude from Pe-king. It is no less so on account of its vast commerce, opulence, populoufness, advantageous situation, and the great number of its commodious ports; so that though it suffered incredibly during the late wars, both from the Tartars and the Chinese, and other pirates, its traffick and fertile soil soon restored it to its antient splendor, by the extraordinary industry of its inhabitants, who are computed by the registers to amount to 383,360 families, or 1,978,029 men.

Fertility. THE soil is so fertile, that it yields two crops of corn yearly; and produces in the like plenty all sorts of grain, fruits, vegetables, and every thing that can contribute to the a pleasures of life. The climate, though warm, is clear, and the people very stout and healthy; hence they have a common saying, that Quang-tong always enjoys a sky without snow, trees always laden with fruit, and men that continually spit blood; by which last is not meant any distemper of that kind, but their chewing a medicinal root which gives the saliva the colour of blood.

THE commerce which this province, but more especially that which its metropolis, drives, Manufactures. is one of the richest and grandest in all the Chinese empire, and extends itself to the most valuable merchandizes, such as diamonds and precious stones of all sorts, pearls, gold, silver, and other metals curiously wrought, and for all uses. They are famed here for a sort of gun-barrel which never bursts, or, at most, only splits itself, without farther hurt; and for an odd kind of rice manufacture, which they turn into all kinds of utensils, and which bears a fine natural gloss, but is only fit for sight. Silks of all sorts, cottons, and other linen, are likewise manufactured and exported in great quantities, and beautiful variety, as well as those of gold, silver, copper, lead, tin, china ware, japan-work, and in all which infinite multitudes are constantly employed; insomuch that, though the country here be as fertile as any in China, yet it doth not produce sufficient provisions for its inhabitants, but is assisted by some Eggs hatched in ovens. of the neighbouring provinces. They use the same way here of hatching and porting of eggs, especially those of ducks, which are in great plenty, in ovens and dunghills, as they do in Egypt; but have a particular one of preserving them fresh all the year, by covering them with a sort of paste. We are told a curious singularity of the ducks and chickens so hatched; viz. that the owners carry them in boats to the sea-side, at low-water, where they feed on oysters, cockles, and other such sea-insects, and where one drove naturally intermixes with another, as there are great multitudes of these boats so employed: but as soon as the droves-owner strikes on a balon, every flock returns to his own boat, as pigeons do to their holes^t. Some other varieties this province affords, which the reader may see in the margin (M).

QUANG-TONG, being a maritime province, and the most removed from the court, is Government. one of the most considerable in the whole empire, especially as he, who is the Tsong-tu, or viceroy, of it, is likewise so of that of Quan-si; for which reason he commonly resides at Chau-king, to be nearer at hand to communicate his orders to both provinces. He keeps also a great number of soldiers under him, to suppress the highwaymen and pirates, which d would else grow numerous enough to destroy the commerce between them. There are, for the same end, a great number of fortresses, both on the sea-coasts and in the inland, most of them like large cities, very strong and well garrisoned, besides inferior ones, forts, castles, &c. dispersed in proper places.

QUANG-TONG is divided into ten capital jurisdictions; whose cities are, 1. Quang-chew, or Cities. Canton, the metropolis of all; 2. Shau-chew; 3. Nan-yong; 4. Whe-chew; 5. Chau-chew; 6. Chau-king; 7. Kau-chew; 8. Lyen-chew; 9. Lwy-chew; and, 10. Kyun-chew, which last is the capital of the island of Hay-nan.

QUANG-CHEW, vulgarly Quang-tong, Quang-tun, Kan-ton, and commonly, by the *Euro-Canton de-*peans, Canton, is situate on the mouth of the Ta ho, or great river, which is here wide and scribed. spacious, and forms the bay called Hu-men, or the tyger's gate, though it hath nothing terrible in it but its name, and some few forts, which are only built to keep off the pirates. It stands in latitude 23° 12', and longitude 3° 31' west from the meridian of Pe-king; and is not only one of the largest, being computed, with its suburbs, to be above twenty miles Great traffick. in compass (N), but likewise on account of its advantageous situation, one of the richest, finest, best

(M) Among the great variety of fruits which here grow in great plenty, they have a particular sort of limon, full as thorny as the citron tree, but much larger. It bears a white flower of an exquisite odour, which, when distilled, yields a very pleasant liquor. The fruit, which is almost as big as a man's head, hath a rind much like that of common oranges; and its substance within, which is either white or reddish, hath a taste between sweet and sour. They have another sort of fruit, the largest that is any where to be seen, which grows not on the branches, but on the body of the tree; its rind is very hard; and within are seen a great number of cells, containing a yellow pulp, which is very sweet and agreeable when the fruit is full-ripe.

Another kind of rarity in this province is the tree which the Portuguese call iron-wood, which resembles that metal in colour, weight, and hardness, and will sink in water. That which they call rose-wood is no less admired; and is of a blackish colour, inclining to red, beautifully veined and speckled, and used by joiners to make tables, escritaires, chairs, stools, &c. Their osier is likewise so pliable and tough, that they make cable and other ship-ropes of them. We omit a number of other such natural rarities, which Kercher, Martini, and others, speak of, which are not so well attested. The last and most remarkable of those that are, is the crab that is taken on the coast of a lake in the island of Hay-nan, which, they tell us, petrifies as soon as it is taken out of the water, and grows as hard as flint, and is said to be a good remedy against burning fevers (36).

(N) Quang-chew may be properly said to consist of three cities, each of them surrounded with its own best peopled, and most trading, cities in China, the largest vessels being easily brought to the fine canals that surround it, and the port and city being perpetually thronged with ships and merchants, and stored with the richest commodities of all kinds from Europe, and most parts of India.

Populousness.

THE number of its inhabitants, exclusive of strangers, is computed to be at least a million, some say near two millions, but that is exaggerated. However, the city is better filled with them than most in China, because it hath but few gardens and orchards, and no waste-ground. The streets are strait and long, and, excepting some few of the better sort, which are adorned with palaces, temples, triumphal arches, and such-like splendid edifices, the rest are rather narrow than wide, but all of them neat, and well-paved; and the shops beautifully furnished, and set out with the richest wares. The harbour, quay, and canals, are covered with such an infinite multitude of barges, boats, and other vessels, and so close together, that they appear like a huge floating city. Every street hath a gate at each end, which is not only shut up every night, to confine every person to his proper quarter; but likewise in the day-time, whenever any disturbance happens, in order to prevent its spreading to the next.

Canals.

Government.

THE Mandarin, who resides here as viceroy, hath a stately palace at one of the most distant parts of the city; which makes it very inconvenient for those who are to apply to him, and still more so, because the building is very deep, and a number of courts must be crossed before one comes to the hall of audience, where he administers justice in great state: the reason of which is supposed to be, either to prevent frivolous complaints, which would otherwise too frequently happen among such an infinite multitude and variety of inhabitants, or perhaps, more probably to keep up the greater grandeur and state (O). His government, besides the metropolis, extends over seventeen cities; viz. one of the second, and sixteen of the third rank.

City of Macao described.

ON the entrance into the bay of Quang-tong stands the famed Portuguese port of Makau, or, as it is vulgarly called, Macao, in latitude $22^{\circ} 12'$, and west longitude from Pe-king $3^{\circ} 19'$. It stands on a small peninsula, or rather small island, (because separated from the continent by a river, which is enlarged by the tide), and is joined to it only by a small isthmus, or neck of land, across which they have built a wall. It is a convenient trading port, of which the Portuguese obtained the possession, on account of their having assisted the Chinese in driving away a famed pirate who infested those seas, and had besieged the capital of the province; and obliged him to retire to Makau, where they slew him some time before the year 1660. Some authors tell us, that they built the city, the island before being inhabited by none but banditti, who only lived in huts and woods. However that be, they fortified this place with strong walls, and other works, and drove a great trade with other parts of India; but were afterwards so disturbed by the Dutch, that its traffick, as well as strength, hath been very much reduced; and they now only maintain a small factory and garrison, and are so very poor, that the Chinese despise and lord it over them (P).

strong and lofty walls; yet so as to have a communication with each other by stately gates, which are only shut up at night. The landscape which offers itself on each side of the river which leads to the city, is one of the most delightful prospects that can be imagined. It is various, animated, and gay, all the way. On one side we behold a vast extent of lovely green meadows, terminated only by the horizon; on the other, groves and little hills appear, which rise up in form of amphitheatres, which are ascended by steps made of green sods. Here your sight is delighted with high rocks covered with moss; there with country seats half-buried amongst verdant copses: now one meets with canals variegated with small islands, and beautiful banks adorned with stately trees, which yield a most delightful shade, verdure, and fragrance; and there some spacious villages encompassed with plains, woods, &c.

Among others of these villages, there is one to be seen within about twelve miles from Kanton, called Fo-shan, or Fu-xan, in which are computed to be at least 600,000 families, or a million of souls, mostly employed in manufacturing of goods for the market of that metropolis. It is computed to be nine miles in compass, and is become very rich since the civil wars; during which, that city was almost ruined, and most of its manufactures removed thither (37).

(O) We are told accordingly, that he seldom stirs abroad without a retinue of about 100 officers of different ranks, besides his standard-bearers, and other inferior attendants. He is commonly carried on the shoulders of eight lusty fellows, in a chair of state like a throne, with a large canopy over his head; and, as his power is very great, so the same respect is paid to him as to a little monarch, where-ever he appears (38).

(P) They were reckoned in Gemelli's time about 5000 of the former, most of them mongrels, born in India, and of Indian women; and above 15,000 of the latter. The former chuse a magistrate from among themselves, who hath the management of all civil and criminal affairs, but with whom the latter are not concerned; their political government being under a captain-general, appointed by the king of Portugal, and the spiritual by a bishop. All these and other officers are maintained by the city, which allows the captain-

a THERE is also in the city a Chinese Mandarin, as well as a Portuguese governor; the former of whom hath his palace in the heart of it, and commands in chief; so that whatever he will have done, must be complied with, especially where the Chinese interest is concerned. To that end, the fortifications of the town are kept in good repair, and well provided with cannon; and, as its small garrison is supplied with all necessaries by the Chinese, who are more numerous in it, these hardly think it worth their while to become masters of it. It pays to the Chinese court a tribute of 10,000, others say 100,000, ducats, for the liberty of chusing their magistrates, and the exercise of their religion and laws, besides a heavy impost on every vessel and merchandize which is brought into the port; the entrance of which being guarded by the Chinese, no ship can come in, or go out, without their knowledge and leave.

b THE town is well built, though not large. The houses are after the European manner, but low; and the churches, and public buildings, pretty handsome for that country. The ground on which it stands is very uneven, being hill, valley, and plain; and defended by three forts, all of them built on some advantageous eminence, which, with the rest of the city, terminates the sight on that side from the ships that ride at anchor: but betwixt this land, which is of some extent, and the town, there is a safe and commodious port, along whose shores the city extends. The commerce of it was formerly so considerable, whilst the Portuguese were permitted to trade with Japan, that it was a common saying, that Macao might pave its streets with silver: but, since they were forbidden to come thither under such severe penalties, they are dwindled into such a state of poverty and servitude, that the town and port are gone quite into decay, having but five ships of their own to maintain all the vast charges above-mentioned; and these, instead of the 300 per Cent. which they were wont to return from Nangazaki, bring in now but an inconsiderable profit; which will be lessened still, says Careri, by the setting up of the new East-India company, which forbids their resort to several ports, and their trading in some sorts of their commodities*. Before we take our leave of this port, we must take notice of one remarkable singularity relating to it; viz. that the Sunday with them is the Saturday with the Spaniards in the Philippine Islands; the reason of which the reader will see in the margin (Q).

d THE last thing we have to mention concerning the province of Quang-tong, is the island of Hay-nan, which belongs to its jurisdiction, and lies opposite to it, on the gulf of Cochin-China, being parted from it by a very narrow channel, so that it may be easily descried from the opposite coast, in a clear sky. It is a pretty large island, and extends itself from $18^{\circ} 10'$ to $20^{\circ} 8'$ of latitude, and from $5^{\circ} 55'$ to $8^{\circ} 20'$ of west longitude from Pe-king; so that its greatest length from east to west is between sixty and seventy leagues, and from north to south between forty and fifty, and its circumference about 160.

c It is mostly mountainous, except the length of about fifteen leagues from the north coast, which is plain, and well watered by rivers. The inhabitants, who are pretty numerous, cultivate their ground so well, and the rains fall down so seasonably, that the country produces rice, and other corn, enough for their sustenance, and commonly yields two crops a year: besides which, they have plenty of fruits, venison, game, &c. The only thing they want, especially on the southern side, is wholesome water: for want of which they are obliged to boil a sufficient quantity of it in the morning to serve them all the day*.

THE Chinese are not masters of the whole island, but only of most of the coasts, and some of the plains in the inland, which the natives abandoned to them, that they might go and enjoy their liberty on the high mountains, where they actually live independent, and never have any commerce with them, except to exchange some of the gold-dust which they gather from their rivers and torrents, for Chinese salt and cloths: for, though they are supposed to have some rich mines of gold and silver, yet they are either too indolent or inexpert to turn

general a piece of eight per day, and 3000 every three years; 500 to the bishop per Annum, and so proportionably to the inferior ones: which charge is defrayed by the duty of ten per Cent. on all Portuguese goods, and two per Cent. on money; over and above what is paid to the Chinese government (39), and other impositions from the Mandarin that commands in it; and the viceroy, who comes often to visit it, and must be entertained in a grand manner, and glutted with high presents. &c. To all which hardships they are forced to submit, because all their provisions coming to them from the Chinese, they might be starved by them upon the least dislike.

(Q) This difference, which extends itself equally to all the other days of the week, doth not proceed from any difference of longitude between those two places, which is inconsiderable, but from the different ways of sailing of those two nations: for the Portuguese, in coming hither from Europe, sail eastward; whereas the Spaniards, coming from America, sail westward; so that, between them, they have sailed round the world, by opposite points; in doing which, there must of course be the loss of one day, as every one knows that hath learnt the bare elements of the globe.

them to any advantage. There are hardly any coasts on the eastern sea which produce larger and finer pearls than the northern ones of this island. The inlands yield a great variety of fragrant woods, and of beautiful colours, particularly those called eagle, rose, violet, and ebony-wood, all which are bought up by the Chinese, to make household ornaments, or for dyeing. It breeds likewise variety of fine birds, beasts, and a particular kind of black monkey, with a face the nearest to human.

Dress of the people.

THE islanders, both men and women, wear their hair in a ring on their forehead; and a hat on their heads, made of straw, or rattan, and tied under their chin. Their habit is only a piece of callico, either black, or of a deep blue, which covers them from the waist to the knees; besides which, the women wear a kind of waistcoat of the same. These streak their cheeks from the eyes downward with indigo: both men and women wear ear-rings of gold and silver, shaped like a pear, and well made. Their weapons are bows and arrows, at which they are not very dexterous; and a kind of hanger, which they carry in a little basket fastened to their girdle behind; and this last is all the tools they have for cutting down timber, or for carpenters work.

Capital described. Port.

THE capital city in the island is called Kyun-chew-fu. It is situate on a promontory; and the ships come to anchor under its very walls. The port, which is about two leagues distant from it, on the north side of the island, is formed by a pretty large river, whose mouth is defended by two small forts: but, as it hath not above ten or twelve feet of water, any vessels made after a different manner from those of China would find it difficult to enter it. Between the port and the capital is a fine plain full of beautiful Chinese sepulchres; among which is one with a cross on it, in which lies interred an Italian missionary, and the first who landed in that island. Kyun-chew-fu hath under its jurisdiction three cities of the second, and ten of the third rank, most of them seated along the sea-coasts. It stands in latitude $20^{\circ} 2'$, and west longitude from Pe-king $6^{\circ} 40'$, and is governed by a literary and a military Mandarin (R).

XIII. The province of Quang-si.

XIII. Quang-si described.

QUANG-SI, Quàn-si, Quam-si, hath Quang-tong, last described, on the south-east; Hu-quang and Quey-chew on the north; Yun-nan on the west; and the ocean, with part of the kingdom of Tonquin, on the south. It extends itself only from $21^{\circ} 50'$ to $26^{\circ} 15'$ of latitude, and from $4^{\circ} 10'$ to $11^{\circ} 48'$ of west longitude, from Pe-king. It is for the most part mountainous, and short of the fertility of other provinces; yet hath some vast spacious plains, especially on the south, so well cultivated, that it is able to supply that of Quang-tong with rice and corn for six months in the year. It is watered by a great number of rivers, which flow from the mountains eastwards into the Ta-ho, or great river which runs into Quang-tong. And, as several of them are navigable on the east part, the people are more given to traffick, and much more polite, than those on the west and north side, who are a rude sort of mountaineers, disdaining all subjection, and live like independent savages.

Mountains.

Manufactures.

THESE vast ridges of mountains are covered with large forests, though many of them abound with mines of gold (S), silver, copper, iron, &c. several sorts of curious woods used by the joiners; among which there is one particular sort of tree, which, instead of pith, contains a soft substance, which they grind into meal, and doth not taste amiss. The insect that produces the wax is in great plenty all over the province, which breeds likewise parrots, and other fine birds, rhinoceros's, porcupines, and other wild beasts. The cinnamon which grows here is better, and more odoriferous, than that of the island of Ceylan; and the silks that are manufactured here bear a good price: but the chief one of this province is that of porcelain, which is made much finer than in other parts, though one of the ingredients is brought from that of Nan-king; it being observed, that the water of the former, and the sand of the latter, must concur to make that ware complete. The number of inhabitants was once com-

(R) Near this island is that small one called Sancian, or Shang-chewen shan, and famed for the death of the modern apostle of the Indies, Francis Xavier, whose tomb is still to be seen, and is much resorted to by travellers. It stands on a little eminence, at the foot of a hill: and behind it is a small plain, with trees on one side, and gardens on the other.

The island is not desert, as was reported; but hath about five villages; inhabited by poor fishermen. The Portuguese Jesuits built a chapel here above fifty years ago, which, though only of plaster, doth yet look very neat; the Chinese having japanned it over with red and blue varnish (40).

(S) There was a rich one, in particular, which the inhabitants of the district obtained a patent from the court, to have the privilege of working at their own charge, on condition they paid the emperor 40 per Cent. and his officers attending on it five per Cent. out of the profits arising from it; but that monarch since took it into his hand, and worked it at his own charge (41).

a puted to amount to 196,719 families, or 191,054,760 men. The province is divided into twelve jurisdictions; whose capitals are as follow: Quey-ling, the metropolis of the whole; 2. Lyew-chew; 3. Kin ywen; 4. Se-ngen; 5. Ping-lo; 6. U-chew; 7. Sin-chew; 8. Nan-ming; 9. Tay ping; 10. Se-ming; 11. Chin-ngan; 12. Se-chin.

QUEY-LING-FU, the metropolis, is said to have its name from a flower, which, though Cities. very common in China, yet grows in greater quantity there (T). It is situate on a river which falls into the Ta ho; and runs with such rapidity through the narrow vallies, that, though large, it is not navigable, or of any service for traffick. The city is large and well-built, Quey-ling fu described. and in some measure after the manner of our antient fortifications; but is still vastly inferior to most other capitals, and is surrounded with savage and barbarous people, who are settled in the mountains, and, as was lately hinted, live in a kind of independence from the Mandarins. It stands in latitude $25^{\circ} 13'$, and west longitude from Pe-king $6^{\circ} 14'$, and hath a jurisdiction over two cities of the second, and seven of the third rank. The bird called King-hi (U) is caught within this territory, whose feathers are variegated with such bright colours, that they weave them in their silks^a

XIV. The province of Yun-nan.

YUN-NAN, Yu-nan, Jun-nan, is bounded, on the north, by Se-chew, and the territory of the Lamas; on the west, by the kingdoms of Ava, Pegu, and some unknown barbarous nations; on the south, by the kingdoms of Law, or Lau-chwa, and Tong-king; and on the east, by the provinces of Quang-si and Quey-chew. It extends itself from $21^{\circ} 34'$ to 28° of latitude, and from $10^{\circ} 16'$ to $18^{\circ} 34'$ of west longitude from Pe-king. It is said to be one of the richest and most fertile of the empire, being every-where watered by rivers, several of which rise from some considerable lakes; and others descend from the mountains, and bring down great quantities of gold sand, and some precious stones, particularly rubies of singular beauty are dug out of these mountains; and, if the golden mines were suffered to be opened, they would in all probability amount to immense sums. They likewise produce, among other baser metals, one called Pe-tong, which is white within and without, but in other respects is much like the common copper; and, among other valuable stones, the lapis armenus, a kind of reddish amber, and a fine sort of marble of divers colours, whose veins naturally represent flowers, trees, mountains, rivers, &c. and of this they make tables, and other ornaments. XIV. Yun-nan described. Golden mines.

THE country produces plenty of corn, rice, and all kinds of provisions, medicinal plants, roots, gums, musk, &c. besides plenty of silk, cotton, and flax. It likewise breeds variety of animals, particularly elephants, horses, and a curious kind of stags, which are neither taller nor thicker than our ordinary dogs, and are kept by the rich in their gardens for their diversion. Here is also bred the golden hen, described in the last note, and other curious birds. The whole province is divided into twenty-one districts, or jurisdictions, of the first rank, which have under them fifty-five others of the second and third, besides eight military cities, and a good number of fortresses, castles, &c. The cities of the first rank are, 1. Yun-nan, the metropolis; 2. Ta-li; 3. Ling-ngan; 4. Chu-byang; 5. Ching-kyang; 6. King-tong; 7. Quan-nan; 8. Quang-si; 9. Sbun-ning; 10. Ku-tsing; 11. Tau-ngan; 12. Ko-king; 13. Vu-ting; 14. Ly-kyang-fu; 15. Twen-kyang; 16. Mong-wba; 17. Tung-chang; 18. Tung-ning-tu; 19. Tung-pe; 20. Kay-wba; 21. Saw-ta. Product. Cities.

YUN-NAN, Ju-nan, Ju-nung-fu, metropolis of the province, is situate on the north-east side of a large and deep lake, or, according to the language of the country, on the coast of the south sea, in latitude $25^{\circ} 6'$, and west longitude from Pe-king $13^{\circ} 37'$. It was not long ago very remarkable for its beauty, and the number of its stately buildings and fine gardens within its walls, which are three miles (if not rather leagues) in compass, it having been the Yun-nan described.

(T) The word signifies the forest of the flower Quey, which flower grows upon a tree not unlike our laurel, and yields a fine taste and smell, and, when dried, is commonly mixed with some sorts of cakes, to raise their flavour and relish. There is a mount likewise on the east end of the city, which bears the same name, from the vast quantities of that flower with which it is perpetually covered, and which perfume the whole country: for it is observable, that no sooner one falls, but another breaks out in its place. Some think, however, that Quey-ling hath its name from the river Quey, which runs near its walls.

(U) This rare bird, whose name signifies the golden hen, is much esteemed for its extraordinary beauty both of colour and shape, as well as for its exquisite taste, which is affirmed to excel that of our pheasants. Its feathers are of a delightful mixture of blue and red, finely shaded towards the extremities of the wings and tail, and intermixed with variety of other colours. The body is finely shaped, and the head crowned with a beautiful crest (42). It is very common in this and the next province we are going to speak of.

residence of several monarchs. At the time of the Tartars invading it, they gave the then reigning prince the investiture of the province, with the title of king (W): but he, growing weary of the yoke, and having taken up arms against the emperor, Anno 1679, his family was ruined; and, he dying soon after of old age, his army soon dispersed itself, and his kingdom, and stately palaces, as well as his court, fell into ruin and desolation^b.

Traffic.

facture.

THE metropolis hath not fared much better; though it is still the residence of the Tsong-tû, or governor-general of the provinces of Tun-nan and Quey-chew, as well as of the viceroy of the province. Its traffick is chiefly of metal, which is greater here than in any other part of the empire; and its principal manufacture a particular sort of satin, made of twisted silk, without flower or gloss, and dyed of all colours like the common sort, but which are neither bright nor lively. They likewise make here a sort of carpets of the same kind of twisted silk, The inhabitants, who are here a stout, courageous, and active people, and given both to agriculture and arms, have a breed of horses, which though small, are strong and fleet, and which they ride with only a carpet instead of a saddle under them. Tun-nan hath in its district four cities of the second, and seven of the third rank.

XV. The province of Quey chew.

chew.

QUEY-CHEW, one of the smallest provinces of the empire, hath Quang si on the south; Hu-quang on the east; Se-chwen on the north; and Tun-nan on the west; and extends itself from 24° 40' to 29° of latitude, and from 7° to 12° 30' of west longitude from Pe-king.

Fast groups of
mountains.

The whole country is naturally barren, on account of its vast, rugged, and inaccessible mountains, which are here in such great quantities, that it looks as if the whole body of them had made it their rendezvous. The late civil wars have rendered it still more disagreeable and uncultivated, and so thinly peopled, that the emperors have been obliged to send colonies thither from other provinces, and sometimes disgraced governors, with their whole families (X).

Wild sort of inhabitants.

As for the natives of the province, they bear an exact resemblance to the country, and are a rude, barbarous, and lawless people, who live in constant defiance with the Chinese government, make war or peace with it as best suits their interest or humour, and often harraß and ravage them in their settlements: for this reason they are obliged to have here a vast number of military cities, fortresses, castles, &c. all strongly garrisoned, to keep them in awe; for, this province being the direct and only road to that of Tun nan, there is a necessity to keep it open at any rate; and such a number of forces they keep here in pay for that end, that the tribute which is levied upon the country not being sufficient to maintain them, the court is obliged to make up the deficiency by new supplies every year.

Mines of gold,

THE mountains, however, are rich in mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, and copper, of part of the latter of which the small coin that is current in the empire is mostly made. The vallies between are some of them large, fertile, and well watered; and would yield much better crops, if duly cultivated. They carry on no manufacture of either silk or cotton here; but make themselves stuffs of a kind of vegetables, not unlike our hemp, which is a proper wear for summer.

Cattle.

The inhabitants breed vast herds of cows, hogs, &c. and the best horses in all China. The wild fowl is in the greatest plenty and variety, and of excellent taste. The only commerce between the Chinese and the natives consists in a frequent exchange which the latter are obliged to make of some of their gold-dust, cattle, wild fowl, &c. for a supply of salt, calicoes, and the like goods, which they want. Upon the whole, the province abounds with all sorts of provisions, and most of them very cheap. It is divided into ten districts of the first rank, under which are thirty-eight of the second and third, besides military cities, fortresses, &c. The capital cities (which, by the way, are vastly inferior in largeness, beauty, and wealth, for the reasons above-mentioned) are, 1. Quey-yang, the metropolis; 2. Se-chew; 3. Se-nan; 4. Chin-ywen; 5. She-tsyen; 6. Tong-jin; 7. Ngan-chan; 8. Tu-yun; 9. Ping-ywen; 10. Wey-ning^c.

(W) This prince's name, Kao tells us, was Vu san-gui (43), or, as Du Halde and his translator write it, U-san-gbey (44), who was the unfortunate person that called in the Tartars to suppress the rebels, and, by that unadvised step, proved the cause of the loss of the Chinese empire, as will be seen in the sequel.

(X) This province is much the same to the Chinese that Siberia is to the Muscovites; and those Mandarins and governors, who are sent thither with their families, and sometimes for life, are only such as have been guilty of some state crimes. These Chinese colonies live in their strong walled towns and fortresses, under the protection of their governors and soldiery; whilst the natives, who inhabit their high and rugged mountains, avoid all commerce, except that of making some plundering excursions upon them. Great pains have been taken by the government to suppress them, but hitherto to little effect (45).

QUEY-YANG-FU, metropolis of the whole, is one of the smallest and worst built in all China; its walls being scarcely three miles in compass, and the houses mostly of earth and brick. It stands in a pleasant and fertile plain, on a small river, but which bears no boats; whence the commerce of the town is inconsiderable. It is encompassed at a distance with very high and deep mountains (Y), which are inhabited by a people of different extract from the Chinese, whence they were called Sina-ni, or western barbarians, because they lay west of China; and, after their reduction, were with much difficulty brought to conform to the Chinese customs. We read of some few stately buildings within the city, which, though gone to decay, shew it to have been formerly in a more flourishing condition, or, as some say, a royal residence. But there stands, without the walls of it, a large temple, said to have been built by the Tartar family of Xwen, and allowed to be a magnificent edifice.

QUEY-YANG stands in latitude $26^{\circ} 30'$, and $9^{\circ} 52'$ west longitude, from Pe-king; and hath a jurisdiction over three cities of the second, and four of the third rank, besides a great number of forts, with which it is in a manner surrounded.

WE have now gone through the fifteen provinces within the walls, and the principal islands belonging to them; and shall now close the geography of this great empire with a short account of the province of Lyau-tong, which is situate without the walls, and on the frontiers of Tartary, but is, like the other fifteen above described, subject to the same government.

The province of Lyau-tong, or Quang-tong.

THIS province, which is now proved, on all hands, to be situate without the great Chinese wall (Z), which parts it from that of Pe-cheli on the south-west; is bounded, on the east, by the kingdom of Korea; on the north, by the mountains of Yalow, or Tartary; on the south, by the gulf of its own name; and on the west, by the country of the Moguls. It is but a small province, compared to those of China we have gone through; and extends itself only about 270 or 280 miles, where longest; but, in other parts, is much shorter. It reaches from 39° to almost 43° of latitude, and $2^{\circ} 30'$ to almost 9° east longitude, from Pe-king. It was reckoned, in Dion Kao's time, the sixteenth province in the Chinese empire, though seated without the wall^d; but hath since lost that dignity under the Tartars; and is now treated as a conquered province, for reasons we shall have occasion to hint at in the sequel.

THE land is fertile, and well cultivated, though mostly mountainous and uneven; and had formerly a great number of large cities and towns, which lie now in ruins, having been mostly destroyed during the wars with the Tartars, without ever being able to recover themselves since. On the contrary, we are told, that the Tartars have, instead of them, built a great number of military cities, fortresses, and castles, to prevent it, and to keep the Lyau-tongers under, who are a stout and warlike people, very numerous, and uneasy under the yoke (A). Some of these fortresses are indeed so large and populous, and have raised themselves to such a degree of splendor and opulence, as to be little inferior to some of those of the first and second order in China; and the inhabitants, soldiers as well as others, are grown very rich.

(Y) Among them, those that follow are worth a curious reader's notice; 1. Tong-cu, or the copper kettle-drum, because it is observed to make some such kind of noise at particular seasons, especially before rain. 2. That of Nung-huang, which is so steep and strait, that few creatures can climb up to it. A third, called Ven-pi, which stands by itself, on the south side of the city, and is cut in the shape of an isosceles cone, which terminates in an acute point (46).

(Z) Nieuboff, and, after him, Martini, were the first who placed this province within the walls. The first, in his map prefixed to his Dutch Embassy; and the latter in his Atlas. But that it was an oversight in them, plainly appears from what we have quoted above out of the Chinese geographer D. Kao, as well as from Verbiest, who travelled thither with the court, and Le Compte, and other more modern writers (47).

(A) Dion Kao, lately quoted, tells us, that this province was the way through which the Tartars, now reigning in China, came into it (48): from which his translator, in his notes on him, concludes, on what authority is not easy to guess, that, in gratitude to them for their assistance, and easy passage through it, they made it a new province of the Chinese empire, and endowed it with the same privileges with the other fifteen. Whereas by the severe treatment they have received from them, one would be apt to think they had rather opposed their entrance, and shewed too much fidelity to the Chinese.

And, indeed, that writer plainly tells us, that the Tartars made an irruption into Lyau-tong, where they met with a repulse from the Chinese emperor Vang-ty, or Van-li (49); by which it seems as if the Chinese were then masters of that province; for the getting it into their hands was one of the most effectual means to secure China from invasions from that part of Tartary; and either that, or some other Chinese monarch, might endow the Lyau-tongians with the privileges of his Chinese subjects, either as a reward for, or to secure, their fidelity to the Chinese government. we may offer some further conjectures on this head, when we come to their history, and their wars with the Tartars.

and powerful in them, and drive a good commerce with the northern provinces of China, particularly with the capital one of Pe-cheli, whilst the Lyau-tongers are, for the most part, kept in a state of subjection and slavery under them.

Root Jin-seng.

THEY are, however, a very stout, tall, and brave people; and their frequent wars with their neighbours, on all sides, have rendered them expert and warlike. But though they partake more of the temper of the Tartars, they are affirmed to be fonder of the Chinese government, religion, and customs: which, in some measure, confirms what we observed in the last note. They are much given to agriculture and traffick; by the former of which they have made such improvements on their lands, that they are become much more fertile than they naturally were; and those who live near the sea carry on a good commerce with China, Korea, and Japan, the chief part of which consists in furs of beavers, sables, and other wild beasts; and a much larger would they, in all probability, drive, if they were not kept so under by their masters. They do not seem, indeed, to have such a happy genius for arts and sciences as the Chinese; but the former flourishing condition of their country, though deprived of many singular advantages, of soil, climate, rivers, &c. which China enjoys, shews that they were at least equal to them in diligence and industry. So that if their noble ancient cities are now left to go into ruin, if their trade and manufactures languish, and their wealth is now passed into other hands, it can only be owing to the oppression they suffer under the present government, under which they appear to have groaned ever since the conquest of China, of which it was then the sixteenth province: for though one might have expected that the Tartars, after they were become masters of the whole Chinese empire, would have left this province to enjoy its antient privileges; yet, for some reason or other, probably those we hinted at in the last note, they thought fit to deprive it of them, and reduce it to the condition of a conquered or tributary one (B).

We read but of two capital cities, or cities of the first rank, in Father Martini's time; the first of which was called Leao-yung, which name, he tells us, was given to it by the Tartarian family of Kina; and the other King-ywen, or Ning-yuen; neither of which have any thing worth farther notice, they being both gone into decay. Since then, Father Fountainey, a Jesuit, who came from China about the beginning of this century, as well as Father Noel, mentioned in the last note, make the city of Chin-yang to be the metropolis^f. From which, we may suppose the Tartars to have made some considerable alterations in the government of this province, since this last is likewise styled the metropolis of Eastern Tartary, and the residence of the four grand tribunals. Those of the second and third rank must still be more inconsiderable; but their fortresses of the first order are said to be as large, populous, and opulent, as some of the capitals of China. These are eleven in number, besides the metropolis above-mentioned. The same number there are of those of the second rank, and about seven or eight of the third; which last are more remarkable for their strength and garrisons, than for their largeness or opulence.

THE country produces plenty of corn, millet, and other grain; but very little rice, for want of such rivers and canals as the Chinese have. They abound with variety of wild fowl, and wild beasts, fruits, herbs, and roots, both culinary and medicinal. Among the last, the famed root, called Jin-seng, Ging seng, or Jin-sen, so much esteemed among the Chinese physicians, as an infallible medicine to restore decayed constitutions, and renew the vital heat, grows here in great plenty, and is reckoned of the best kind. The doctors give it in hectic, pestilential, and other desperate fevers, and dangerous diseases, but prepared, and mixed with other drugs (C). They esteem those roots which are large, bright, and weighty, as the best.

(B) This seems fully confirmed, by a letter of Father Noel, a Chinese missionary, to the general of the Jesuits, anno 1703, concerning the then state of their mission; wherein he acquaints him, that they had not as yet made any settlement at Lyau tong; but that they had formed a project of making one at Chin-yang, capital both of that province and of all Eastern Tartary. That city, continues he, is very considerable, the emperor having established four sovereign tribunals, to judge, without appeal, of all matters relating to the Tartars: for Lyau-tong, says he, is now esteemed as a province of Tartary, and the Lyau-tongers are no longer looked upon as Chinese, but as native Tartars (50). Thus far the missionary, who might more truly have styled them subjects, or slaves, to the Tartars, since their condition is no better, whilst the Chinese, more favoured than they, enjoy the same advantages and privileges, some few points excepted, which they did under their own monarchs, and scarcely feel the weight of a foreign yoke; as will be more fully seen in the sequel.

(C) The dose of it, such is its extraordinary virtue, is no more than two or three grains, minced, or pounded small, and boiled in chicken-broth, or, if that fail, in fair water; but care must be taken that the pot be well covered, else its virtue will evaporate.

According to Father Le Compte's description of this excellent root, which he highly commends, they have hardly any in China, but what comes from this province. The Gin-sen, says he, which is at present used, is brought to us from Lyau-tong, a province separate from China, and situate in East Tartary. Which words we chiefly quote here, because it confirms what we have

- a best. They wrap them up in paper, and keep them in dry earth, and some also in pepper, for use ^z.

THIS province hath a considerable share of mountains, some of which produce timber for building, others metals and minerals. Those that are worthy of notice, are, the great ridge, called Eang-pee, one end of which lies close to the place where the Chinese wall begins, and extends itself quite into Tartary. It is of a great height, and hath a lake about eighty furlongs in circuit, and of a prodigious depth, out of which spring the two famed rivers Yalo, which runs into Tartary and Quong-tong, which, after a course northward, of some length, winds eastward, and falls into the Yau; which last empties itself into the yellow sea. The other mountain worth mentioning, is that called Ou, or Xu, which forms an island on the gulph of

- b Lyau-tong, on which is built the fortrefs of Xan-gbay. There are several other islands on the same gulph, over-against the cities of Kay-chew, King-chew, and Ning-ywen, so conveniently situate, that they form a good safe road for ships ^h.

AND thus much may suffice for the description of this province, and of the Chinese empire. As to what relates to the history of the Lyau-tongers, it chiefly consisting of their wars with the Tartars and Chinese, we shall refer our readers to what we have already said on that head, in the history of the former ^{*}, and to what we may have farther to add in that of the latter [†], we are now upon; by which we shall avoid swelling this work, as much as possible, with needless repetitions.

said a little higher, of its being situate without the great wall, and of its being calhiered from being a Chinese province. The same author adds, with respect to this famed root, that it ought not to be cut with a knife, because iron diminishes its virtue; but advises rather to bite it in pieces with one's teeth (41).

Of the antient religion, and new sects, among the Chinese.

- c WE have already given an account of the antient religion of the Chinese, in a former part of this work ⁱ, out of their canonical books; from which it appears to have been so like that of the antient patriarchs, that many learned men have looked upon it as a pregnant proof (among many others they have alleged to support their hypothesis), that Noah, or some of his near descendants, did at first people this country ^k. But as that point did not appear to us to have been sufficiently cleared, we contented ourselves with a bare recapitulation of all the arguments which had been, or might be, objected against it ^l; not so much indeed from any dislike we had to it, or its learned authors, as in hopes that we should excite thereby some of our judicious correspondents, whom we knew to be well versed in that curious controversy, to communicate their thoughts, or what farther discoveries they had made in it, to us. It was not long, accordingly, before we had the pleasure of seeing our expectations fully answered, from a certain quarter, and the system above-mentioned handed to us in a quite new light, all the material objections against it fairly answered, all its difficulties removed, and a new sett of proofs in favour of it, added, which we flatter ourselves will, with every impartial reader, give it the appearance of something more than a probable hypothesis. But as the chief evidence depends on one certain fact relating to their chronology, and confirmed by our own Hebrew one, and all the collateral ones are founded upon inferences fairly deducible from several articles of their religion, laws, customs, &c. we shall postpone the farther particulars to one of the last sections of this chapter, which relates to the Chinese chronology; by which time the reader, having run over, and got all these several points fresh in his memory, will be the better able to judge of the validity and merit of the whole. This, we hope, cannot but be acceptable to him, as the subject is no less important than curious, and, as we may venture to say, will be treated there in a manner suitable to its dignity, and such as will strike a variety of new lights upon the origin and foundation of that antient nation and monarchy. In the mean time,

WITH respect to their antient religion, as deducible from their canonical books, the topic we are now upon, we cannot but observe, once for all, that the later date we allow to the latter, the longer will the Chinese appear to have preserved the former in its primitive purity, and untainted from the idolatries, superstitions, and false notions of the Deity, which did so early spread themselves over the face of almost the whole earth, and, at length, over a great part too of their own country: for, if we may believe a late writer of Chinese affairs^m, this idolatry was brought to them from some neighbouring part of the Indies; and though it is supposed to have begun so early as 300 years after Belus, yet it doth not appear to have taken footing in China till about 1200 years afterⁿ; to which we may add, that it neither was universally received, and made the religion of the country; nor did it presently sink here into that low degree of superstition, folly, and impiety, as we find it to have done among other polite nations, such as the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, Canaanites, &c. They neither deified their monarchs, and other great men, nor introduced any of those impious and unnatural rites into their idolatrous worship, as were practised by other nations; and when a bold attempt was once made for introducing the worship of demons and evil spirits, it was presently after suppressed, the whole race of those pretended enchanters destroyed, and religion restored to its antient state^o, so great was the care of the government to prevent any innovation that may prove prejudicial to it (D); and to that is owing, that the antient Chinese doctrine continues still to this day to be the prevailing sect among the learned.

Idolatry, when introduced.

The antient doctrine preserved.

Idolatry most in vogue.

Philosophers forced to comply with it.

THERE are, however, two others, which may be reckoned among the principal sects; namely, that of the idolaters, mentioned a little higher, as brought hither from India, about thirty-two years after the crucifixion of Christ, and is called the sect of Fo, or Foe, which is the deity they worship, and is pretty ripe, and universally received, among the common people, whose fondness for all kinds of superstitions and idolatrous shew hath risen to such a height, that the whole body of philosophers have been carried away with the torrent, and, though against their conscience, have been forced to join with it, to prevent the effects of their fury.

THIS therefore may be looked upon as the most prevailing sect among the bulk of the nation, though not as the established religion of the country, and to owe its settlement rather to the excessive power and ascendant of an unruly populace, than to the consent or approbation of either the philosophers, or of the Mandarins, that compose the tribunal of rites.

THE third sect is, that of the disciples of Lau-kyun, which is nothing but a mixture of the most extravagant and impious opinions. The reader may see a sketch of them in the following note (E), whilst we give them here a fuller account of the doctrines and rites of the other two.

(D) This, we are told by Du Halde, was chiefly owing to the vigilance of a supreme tribunal established among them, almost from the foundation of that empire, and styled the tribunal of rites, which has power to suppress and condemn any superstition that may be introduced. This court hath proved a main support to the antient Chinese religion, even to this very time, inasmuch, that tho' the Mandarins, who compose it, are sometimes observed to practise certain superstitions in private, yet, when assembled in a body to deliberate about them, they openly condemn them (42).

(E) This sect, which is called Tau-tse, had its rise from Lau-kyun, above-mentioned, of whom his disciples have recorded many monstrous extravagancies; such as his laying fourscore years in his mother's womb, and breaking his way out through her left side. His books are all extant, but are supposed to have been altered by his followers, and abound with noble maxims to conduct men to real happiness; such as, the love of virtue, contempt of riches, and raising the soul to a sense of its own self-sufficiency. He taught, that the Deity was altogether corporeal; and yet, as if he had dived into some of the deepest mysteries of it, he is reported, among many other memorable ones, to have often repeated this, That the ray, or law of reason, had produced one, one had produced two, two had produced three, and three had produced all things. His morality, like that of Epicurus, consists in quelling the passions, in establishing the soul's tranquility, and freeing it from anxiety and cares, as enemies to life; and, in order to exempt it from that unavoidable fear of death, they pretend he found out an elixir which makes them immortal.

They are commonly great alchemists, and pretenders to the philosophers-stone, as likewise to a familiar intercourse with demons, by whose assistance they can perform wonders; and do actually, our author says (43), deceive the people with such prodigies, as can be ascribed to nothing but to the power of those evil spirits.

By those juggling tricks, but especially by their pretence of rendering men immortal, they have not only got Mandarins, and other persons of distinction, especially women, to learn this pretended magic under them, but likewise several of their monarchs became their disciples and protectors: so that stately temples were erected, and a worship paid, to those demons, through most parts of the empire. The successors of the head of this sect are all honoured with the title of Great Mandarins, and reside in a town of the province of Kyang-si; where they have a magnificent palace, to which crowds of people resort, from all the neighbouring provinces, either to procure remedies, or to have their fortunes told; and, for the money they readily pay to those jugglers, they receive a billet, filled with magical characters, which is to answer all their ends.

Among those monarchs who were carried away by their delusions, Chin-tsong, the third of the dynasty of Song, was infatuated enough to go on foot, to fetch a book of theirs, which they had hung, in the night, on one of the principal gates of his metropolis, and pretended to have dropped from heaven; and to carry it, with the greatest veneration, to his own palace; where he inclosed it in a golden box, and kept it with the utmost care. The book was filled with nothing but magical characters, and sentences for invoking demons, the number of which they multiplied at plea-

- a THE first, and principal one, which follows the Chinese canonical books, we have already spoken of, in the Introduction^p; and all that needs be added to it here is, the improvements which it received from the writings of their truly excellent philosopher Kong-fu-tse, or, as he is vulgarly called, Confucius: for as for those canonical books, which are styled of the second rank, they are no more than comments on the five ones of the first, and since written by some of their learned men, at various times, and so need no farther mention here; especially, as Confucius, above-mentioned, hath extracted the very quintessence out of them into his own writings; which have been held in such great veneration ever since, that the least alteration made in them would be punished as a great crime, and a quotation out of them never fails of ending any controversy amongst their learned men, and to stop the mouth of sure, and worshipped as deities; insomuch, that one of the great Chinese doctors attributes the extirpation of that dynasty to the impieties which these sorcerers had introduced under it, and which, like a plague, had infected the whole empire. The victims they offer to those infernal spirits are of three kinds; viz. a hog, a fowl, and a fish; and, in their invocation of them, they use very surprising postures, make hideous outcries with their throats and noses, with their drums and kettles: pretend to shew strange sights in the air, and many other such impostures, to intimidate and amuse the people: so that the fascination spreads itself from those of the highest to those of the lowest rank. Such of our readers as want to know more of this pretended magical and diabolical sect, may consult the author last quoted.
- b the most obstinate wrangler.

(F) Confucius was, as has been already observed (44), born in the province of Schan-tong, but then called the kingdom of Lu, in the twenty-first year of the reign of Ling-avang, the twenty-third emperor of the race of Chew; that is, according to some, 300, according to others, 500, but, according to Du Halde, 551 years, before Christ, and two before the death of Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece: so that, according to this last, he must have been cotemporary with Pythagoras and Solon, and somewhat earlier than Socrates. He was but three years old when his father Sho-lyang-he died, in the seventy-third year of his age, who, though he had enjoyed the greatest offices in the kingdom of Song, yet left him no other inheritance, than the honour of being descended from Ti-he, the twenty-seventh emperor of the race of Schang, and, by his mother Shing, from the illustrious family of Yen.

He shewed, from his tender years, great tokens of sagacity and virtue; and, about his fifteenth year, gave himself up to the study of the antient books.

He married at nineteen, and had a son named Pe-hu, and by him a grandson named Tsu-tse, who, by his extraordinary merit and learning, raised himself to the highest posts in the empire. As for himself, he was soon taken notice of, for his admirable qualities, learning, and virtues, especially those of humility, sincerity, temperance, disinterestedness, contempt of riches, &c.; and though every state in the empire, as well as his own, was over-run with the opposite vices, yet was he soon raised to several places of eminence in the magistracy, which he accepted chiefly as means of promoting his intended reformation, both in religion and in the state, maugre all the opposition he expected, and did actually find, from the grandees of his own, as well as of other provinces. But, as soon as he found that his endeavours did not meet with deserved success, he threw up all his employments, though very considerable, to go in search of some more tractable people, who would reap a greater benefit from his excellent doctrine.

In the fifty-fifth year of his age, he was again invited, and raised to some of the highest posts in his own kingdom of Lu; where the prince then reigning paid such regard to his virtues, and salutary counsels, that, in less than three months, not only his court, but his whole dominion, were totally changed for the better; insomuch, that the neighbouring princes were alarmed at the sudden reformation; rightly judging, that the king of Lu would soon become too powerful for them, if he continued to follow his new counsellor's rules.

The king of Tsi, in particular, after many consultations with his grandees, bethought himself of an expedient, the most likely to defeat all Confucius's measures: and, accordingly, under the fair pretence of an embassy, sent him, and his nobles, a present of a great number of beautiful young girls, who had, from their infancy, been brought up to dancing, singing, and all other captivating arts. These were not only received with open arms, both by the king and court, but entertained with such frequent feastings and diversions, that they presently abandoned the business of state, to give themselves up to pleasure. The king himself became inaccessible to his most zealous ministers. Among the rest, Confucius having tried, in vain, all possible means to recall him, divested himself of all his offices, left the court and kingdom, to go in quest of more docile minds to follow his maxims; but, to his great mortification, found his doctrine and morals dreaded, in every kingdom through which he passed. So that, by that time he was come to that of Shing, he found himself reduced to the greatest indigence; yet without losing any thing of his greatness of soul, and usual constancy.

This obliged him to resume his former functions of a private sage, in which he met with better success. His learning and merit, and, above all, his great modesty and condescension, gained him a vast number of disciples (some say 3000, 500 of whom did, in time, raise themselves to the highest posts, in several kingdoms); and all of them continued firmly attached to his person and doctrine. These he divided into four classes; the first of which was, to make virtue their chief study and practice; the second was, to learn to reason and write closely, justly, and elegantly; the third was, to study the art of government, and to instruct the Mandarins and great ministers in their respective duties; while the last was to learn to write, in a concise and elegant style, the principles of morality. In all these classes, he had some very eminent ones; but one especially in the first, whose premature death caused his master to shed abundance of tears.

As his practice still kept constant pace with his excellent philosophy, princes sometimes invited him to their court, that they might reap the benefit of his instructions; and shewed the greatest regard to his learning and merit. At other times, upon the death of one of them, by whom he had been highly honoured, he has seen himself become the contempt of the court, and the ridicule of an insulting populace; yet, under those extremes, he never shewed the least change in his looks, or behaviour, but preserved still the same steadiness and tranquillity. His reliance on the divine providence was still more remarkable, insomuch, that he hath beheld, without the least fear or emotion, an ofcorruptions which had been a long while predominant, both in religion and in the state, and a was endowed with all the proper qualities for such a noble work. We are told, that he condemned the idolatry, which was then become very rife, in China: if so, it is a wonder that his disciples should afterwards rear statues, altars, and temples, to him. However, it plainly appears, that his main design was not so much to intermeddle with the outward, as the inward and essential, part of religion, the reformation of the hearts and lives of his countrymen; all his studies, lectures, writings, precepts, and practice, were chiefly tending that way; and in this, notwithstanding the great opposition which he met with from the vicious Opposed by the Mandarins and grandeers. grandeers of every court (for tho' each province was under the emperor, yet those petty kings that governed in them were, in some measure, despotic, and frequently became formidable to the imperial throne, and were not only very debauched themselves, but suffered their ministers to be so too; and this was the real state of the empire, at the time that Confucius was striving, with all his might and sagacity, to introduce his intended reformation); yet in this, we say, notwithstanding all their opposition, he had the pleasure to see his excellent morality at least universally admired: and deservedly so, not only for the beauty and nobleness of his precepts and maxims, but much more for the judicious way he took to inculcate them, and to make virtue appear lovely and desirable to all his disciples and readers. b doctrines.

Noble notions of the Deity.

His philosophy, though sublime, was quite free from those subtle and intricate questions and inquiries, with which that of the best Greek philosophers was mostly clogged; and Confucius, instead of diving into those physical and abstruse notions about the nature and attributes of the supreme being, the origin of the world, of evil, and other such speculative c points, too high for unassisted reason; or of dogmatizing about the nature of rewards and punishments of virtue and vice, confined himself to speak with the deepest regard of the great Author of all beings, whom he represents as the most pure and perfect essence, principle, and fountain, of all things, to inspire men with greater fear, veneration, gratitude, and love, of him; to assert his divine providence over all his creatures; and to represent him as a being of such infinite knowledge, that even our most secret thoughts are not to be hidden from him, and of such boundless goodness and justice, that he can let no virtue go unrewarded, or vice unpunished. He had likewise a most masterly hand at painting the one in its most lovely, and the other in its most deterring, colours; and to enforce the practice of the one, and abhorrence of the other, by the most powerful arguments, worthiest motives, and, in the best d of methods, his own extraordinary example, which may be justly styled a pattern of moral virtues. And though it must be owned, that neither the one nor the other had the good ficer of the army, named Whan-ti, by whom he was hated, come full-drive at him, with his sword drawn, and hath given this answer to some friends, who advised him to haste away from the danger, If Tyen protects us, of which we have now a sensible proof, what harm can the rage of Whan-ti do to us, though he is president of the tribunal of the army?

Confucius lived to finish his philosophical and historical works, and died in the kingdom of Lu, his native country, in the seventy-third year of his age, greatly lamented, both by the king and court, and much more by his disciples, who had the highest veneration for him.

A little before his last sickness, he told them, with abundance of tears, That the disorders which reigned in the empire had well-nigh broke his heart; and began, from that time, to languish till the seventh day before his death, when he told them again, in the same melancholy tone, Since kings refuse to follow my maxims, I am now no longer useful upon earth, and it is necessary that I should leave it. He fell immediately, after those words, into a lethargy, which lasted seven days, at the end of which he expired, in the arms of some of his disciples. They built him a handsome sepulchre, on the river Su, near the city of Kyo-few, on the same spot where he used to assemble them. It hath been since inclosed with a wall, and now looks like a small city; and the veneration which all good men had for him increasing with time, he came, at length, to be respected as the chief doctor of the empire.

He was tall, and well proportioned, his breast and shoulders were broad, his eyes large, complexion olive, nose flat, and beard long, and his voice strong and piercing. His works, which are esteemed a perfect rule of government, and contain all that he had collected out of the antient laws, are as follow: 1. His

Tay-hyo; that is, The grand Science, or School of Adults. 2. The Chong-yong, or Immutabile Medium. 3. That called Lun-yu, or Moral and pithy Discourses. 4. Meng-tse, or The Book of Mencius; so called from one of his disciples, who is supposed to have compiled, or finished it from his master's writings, and contains a perfect rule of government. These four are held in the greatest esteem, and are the chief ones among the canonical books of the second rank; to which they add two more, as the next, if not equal, to them in authority; viz. The Hyau-king, which treats of filial respect, and contains the answers which Confucius made to his disciple Tseng, concerning the reverence due from children to parents. 6. The Syau-hyo, or The School or Science of Children; which is a collection of sentences and examples, extracted from antient and modern authors. It would carry us beyond our bounds, to enter into a farther detail of those books. Those that are curious to know more of them, may consult the Latin version which Father Noel, one of the antient missionaries into China, hath given of them, printed at Prague, anno 1711, or the extract which Father Du Halde hath made of it, and printed in his description of the Chinese empire (44). One thing we cannot forbear observing here, concerning those books, that, though the four first contain the most sublime doctrines of morality, and are universally held to be of the greatest authority, next to the canonical ones of the first rank, of which we have formerly spoken, yet they have had but few followers among the degenerate Chinese; whereas the two last, which treat of the duty of children to parents, are so universally observed throughout the empire, that one may venture to affirm, there is not a country in the world where parents are more respected, both during their life, and after their death; as we shall more fully shew in the sequel.

a effects they deserved, and that he hath had but few followers, except among his most celebrated disciples, who have made it their glory to copy after him, yet his writings, as well as his sect, have been always, and are still, held in the highest esteem^a. So that it shows, at least, some kind of merit in the Chinese, that they can still profess so universal admiration for him and his doctrine, though so few of them care to practise it.

THE other principal sect, and indeed the most predominant of all, is that of Fo, Foe, or Seel of Fo, Fwi, whom some writers have confounded with the Fo-bi, who was the founder of this monarchy, though it is plain that this worship was not brought hither from India till sixty-five years after the birth of Christ, as was lately hinted^{*}. The occasion of its being introduced into China, where it made such swift and rapid progress, was a dream which the emperor Meng-ti, of the dynasty of Han, had about that time, which put him in mind of a sentence which had been often in the mouth of Confucius, that the Holy one was to be found in the west. Upon which he immediately sent ambassadors in search of him, and with express orders not to return without bringing a full account of him and his religion. But they, whether discouraged at, or tired with, the length and difficulty of the journey, proceeded no farther than India; where having met with the worshippers of the idol Fo, or Foe (G), they brought it with them, and, with it, the doctrine of transmigration, and other fables, superstitions, and atheistical notions, with which the Indian books are filled: all which were greedily received at court; from which the contagion quickly spread itself through other provinces, and in a little time through the whole empire, which was already but too much infected with the magical impieties of the sect of Lau-kyun, mentioned in a late note[†].

FROM that time this chimerical god met every-where with worshippers; the greatest number of idols, altars, and temples or pagods, were reared to him; some of them magnificent to the highest degree, whilst the Bonzas, who became his priests, filled the country with large volumes of his pretended miracles and prodigies, which they also represent in printed figures, after their manner; insomuch, that he is now celebrated by his followers as the saviour of

(G) It is not easy to guess in what part of India this monster appeared, or whether he was man or devil; if half of what his disciples have reported of him were true, he could be no other than a devil incarnate. We shall give our readers a few particulars, by which they may judge what credit is to be given to the rest of what those Indian wonder-mongers relate of him.

His father, whose name was In-sang-uan, was, they say, king of an Indian territory, called by the Chinese Shun-tyen sho; his mother, named Meye, the most of the time of her pregnancy, dreamt that she had swallowed a white elephant, or, as others will have it, that she conceived by that animal, or by the devil in his shape; and hence arose that veneration paid by the Indian kings to the white elephant. However, she was delivered of him thro' her right side, and died soon after. They add, that he stood upon his feet as soon as he was got out of her womb, and walked seven steps, pointing with one hand to heaven, and with the other to the earth; and then pronounced the following words distinctly: There is none either in the heaven, or in the earth, who ought to be adored, but I alone.

At the age of seventeen he married three wives; and at nineteen forsook them, to retire into a solitary place, under the guidance of four sages; and, at thirty, he was transformed on a sudden into a god; from which time he minded nothing but the propagating his doctrine, and how to make himself adored by the vast number of miracles which he wrought, and with the account of which his Bonzian priests have filled several large volumes. There were no less than 80,000 of his disciples employed in dispersing his impious tenets throughout the east, and, amongst them, ten of a more distinguished rank and dignity, who published 5000 volumes in honour of their master. The Chinese call his followers, or priests, Song and Ho-shang; the Tartars, Lamas or La ma-seng; the Siamese, Talapous; and the Japanners, and, from them, the Europeans, Bonzas or Bonzes.

This strange god, however, found himself mortal, and died in the seventy-ninth year of his age, or, as his disciples believe, passed into the state of immortality; and, to crown all his impieties, finding his death approaching, expressed himself to the following purpose to his disciples: I have hitherto concealed the truth, and spoke to you these forty years in parables and enigmas; but now I am going to leave you, I will reveal to you the whole mystery of my doctrine: Learn, then, that there is no other principle of all things but emptiness and nothing; from nothing all things proceeded, and into nothing will they all return; and this is the end of all our hope (45).

These last words caused a kind of schism among the Bonzas; some of whom became the heads of an atheistical sect, which hath continued ever since; whilst the much greater number adhered to his former doctrine, endeavouring to palliate this last by a subtle distinction of exterior and interior doctrine, which is merely evasive, and means nothing; and to propagate his worship by the most impious cheats and fables, particularly by pretending that he had been born 8000 times, and transmigrated into the bodies of a great variety of animals before he was deified, in whose forms he hath been since worshipped by his infatuated followers. The next note will give an account of the villainous methods which those Bonzas take to delude them.

As for those Bonzas who fell in with Fo's last atheistical doctrine of all things being produced out of nothing, &c. tho' they and their disciples are fewer in number, in comparison of the opposite sect, they have likewise endeavoured to refine upon their master, by introducing a great variety of subtle notions, on the hypothesis of a vacuum, which they suppose pregnant of, and producing, all things, and then swallowing them up again into their primitive nothing; but these are ever exposed, not only by the other Bonzas, but likewise by the Literati, a still more modern sect, of which we shall speak by-and-by (46).

the world, great law-giver of mankind, sent by heaven to teach them the way of salvation, and even, according to Le Compte^a, to make atonement for the sins of all men. The emperor, who is a Tartar, follows the idolatry of his own nation, which differs little from the Chinese, excepting that the Lamas, or Tartar priests, worship their deity, which Le Compte tells us is the same with the Chinese Fo, under the shape of a young man, who, they pretend, never dies. He is kept in a stately temple, attended with numberless Lamas, who serve him with the greatest veneration; and, when he dies, they chuse another from among themselves, as much like him as they can in stature, features, &c. to pass on the people for him: whereas the Bonzas, or Chinese priests of Fo, worship him in several forms, such as those of a dragon, ape, elephant, &c. through which they pretend him to have transmigrated before he was deified^b. The Lamas that are in China, only serve the Tartar nobility there as chaplains, whilst the Bonzas engross his worship to themselves in all the Chinese temples, and make a vast gain of it by the vilest and most impudent impostures on the people. The emperor, to outward appearance, pays an equal respect to both, but despises their legends and superstitions in his heart; and, if we may believe the Jesuits accounts, worships only the Supreme Lord of heaven and earth. They own, however, that he paid the same honours to Confucius, and offers the same sacrifices in the heathen temples, that the rest of the Chinese did; but this, they tell us, he only submitted to for reasons of state; which, they add, was the main obstacle to his declaring himself a Christian, though they pretend to believe him to have been one in his heart.

his heart.

WE shall have occasion to examine this matter more closely when we come to that great monarch's reign. In the mean time we shall only observe here, that such a supposition is quite inconsistent with a declaration, which, they tell us, he once made to them: That, if he could be satisfied once of the truth of their religion, he would not delay one moment to embrace it; though he was sensible, that, if ever he declared himself a Christian, the whole empire would do the same in a few years. For, if he had been really a Christian in his heart, what could divert, much less deter, him from professing it, when he knew that his whole empire would so soon follow his example? Father Le Compte, therefore, seems to us to have more rightly judged, that it was partly the fear of disobliging his subjects, and partly the gratification of his predominant passion, which he knew was opposite to the spirit of Christianity, that were the main obstacles to his embracing a religion, which, how much soever he might admire it, was neither suitable to his present circumstances, nor to the superstitious temper of his subjects, much less to the taste and interest of the whole juggling and rapacious bonzaic tribe, who might easily cause an universal revolt in the empire.

Countenances
the Bonzas.

Their sad character.

AND this was, doubtless, the motive which made him not only outwardly comply with their rites, but express such an extraordinary regard for their persons, as to suffer some of those of the first rank to live in his palace, whom his mother had formerly settled there. Though he could not but be sensible that the greatest part of that fraternity were the vilest cheats and villains in his whole empire, as well as the most impudent tyrants on his bigotted subjects, if those of another society have not painted them in worse colours than they deserve. The reader may see a sketch of some of their most flagrant impostures in the next note (H); and

(H) They make the greatest shew of sanctity, abstinence, mortification, &c. by which they pretend to atone for the sins of the living and the dead; but, in truth, are given to the most scandalous vices, even those of the most unnatural kind. They will drag heavy chains, fastened to their arms and legs in such manner, that they wound every step they go. They beat their heads against the stones and posts, till they fetch blood, to extort alms from the people: some, we are told, have got themselves carried about in a kind of sedan, with nails drove on every side with the points towards them, so that they could not stir without wounding themselves; and these nails they sold to the gazing populace for a few pence, as amulets, and preservatives against all harms, and as efficacious means of bringing down blessings upon the buyer and his family. These jugglers at the same time declare, that the money thus given to them is not to be applied to their own private use, but to build temples, altars, &c. to Fo, who will not fail of proportioning his favours to them, according to their munificence to him.

The doctrine of the transmigration of the soul is another never-failing source of gain: they pretending to know precisely the present state of the dead, and the future one of the living, that is, into what kind of bodies the former are transmigrated, and even to know the very identical creature or person into which they are past; and into what kind of one the living will shortly go. In the first case, which they seldom fail of representing to the surviving friends as either dreadful, miserable, or uncomfortable, they extort money from them to procure the deceased a speedy release, and passage into a better state, as out of a dog, snake, or insect, into an elephant, a philosopher, Mandarin, and the like. In the other, by threatening the living with an unhappy transmigration, they either get money of them to procure them a happier one, or leave them to live in dread of the fatal change.

Le Compte tells us a story of an old man, whom these Bonzas had made to believe that his soul should, in her next migration, pass into the body of one of the emperor's post horses. They had likewise advised him to eat sparingly, and bear it patiently, that so they might the sooner send him into a better habitation. The poor man, unable to reconcile himself to such a change, could neither sleep day or night, through the dread of it; but grieved at such a rate, as would soon have ended his days. Happily for him, he learned that the souls of the Christians had a particular exemption from these kinds of metamorphoses; upon which he applied himself to one of our Jesuits, and earnestly begged of him, that he would make him a Christian; assuring him, a and a greater detail of them in Le Compte or Du Halde above quoted ^u, for which we have no room, in a work like this.

As to their principles, they pretend that their god Fo hath left them ten commandments. ^{The principles of that sect.} The first of them is, not to kill any living creature, of what kind soever. 2. Not to take away another man's goods. 3. Not to indulge in acts of impurity. 4. Not to lye. 5. Not to drink wine. What the others are, we are not told; but they lay a great stress on acts of mercy, charity, and in building of temples to Fo, monasteries for his priests, and providing for their maintenance, as the most effectual means to partake of the benefit of their prayers, mortifications, penances, and other meritorious actions, towards the atonement of their own sins, and obtaining a happy transmigration in another life. On the other hand, they threaten ^{Transmigration of the soul.} no less those who with-hold their benefactions from them; telling them, that they will trans-migrate into the bodies of rats, horses, mules, and other such creatures; which last point seldom fails of making a deep impression on the credulous vulgar, insomuch that they often persuade them to burn paper gilt, or washed with silver, silk, cloth, and other garments, ^{The reward and punishment in the next life.} which, they tell them, will be turned into substantial gold and silver, clothes, &c. in the other world, for the use of their deceased parents, friends, and relations, or else be laid up for them against their coming thither: for, say they, you must not imagine that good and evil are as confused in the other world as they are in this; for there are rewards for the good, and punishments for the bad, according to every one's merit, or according as they have taken care, by their generous benefactions, to make sure of a title to those of their teachers ^x.

c ONE thing they particularly recommend, viz. the often calling upon him for happiness and salvation. Fo, in one of his books, had mentioned another deity more antient than himself, ^{Fo frequently invoked by the credulous vulgar.} called O-mi-to, since worshipped by the Japaners likewise, under the name of A-mi-da, who formerly had appeared in the kingdom of Bengal, and had raised himself to such height of power and merit by his great sanctity, that the bare invoking of him was sufficient to obtain the pardon of the most damnable crimes. Him the Bonzas have coupled with their Fo; whence the Chinefe of this sect have continually in their mouths the word O-mi-to-fo, which, their masters tell them, is sufficient to expiate for their blackest sins. All these pleasing notions to corrupt nature fail not to gain greatly on vulgar minds, and to inspire them with an uncommon generosity to their soothing teachers; whilst the wiser and better sort pity the former for their simplicity, and despise the latter for their extravagancies and impiety; being but too well convinced, that the greatest part of them are arrant cheats, and men of debauched lives, notwithstanding their sanctified looks, and specious pretences to mortification and holiness ^y.

BESIDES the various representations under which they worship their god Fo in their temples, ^{How represented.} among which that of a dragon is esteemed the noblest, and next to it the elephant, they have a variety of others, which, whether they look upon as different deities, or different images of the same Fo, is not agreed. Two in particular they have in their pagods, commonly about twenty feet high, and pretty much in the same attitude; the one is called the god of immortality, and is represented in the form of a gross fat man, sitting cross-legged, him, that he would rather be of that, or any religion, than be turned into a post horse. The good father, who could not but pity his simplicity, took care to inspire him first with better motives of becoming a Christian, and then readily granted his request (47).

He relates another instance of the knavery of the Bonzas, to the following effect: A young prince of the blood, being inconsolable for the loss of one of his most amiable companions, applied himself to them, to know into what state his soul was passed. To which they answered, that he was now turned into a Tartar boy, whom, they told him, they could procure, for a sum of money, to be brought to him. The prince readily agreed; and a Tartar boy was accordingly presented to him, as the person into whose body the soul of his favourite was transmigrated; and he was accordingly received into favour as formerly, to the no small comfort and satisfaction of the prince, who failed not to give those jugglers some tokens of his generosity (48).

The same authors relate several other instances not only of the same unprecedented villainous kinds; but some of them of such an atrocious and barbarous nature, as can hardly be read without horror, or rather perhaps without diffidence, though related by pretended eye-witnesses. Of this kind, we are told, is their privately seizing on men and women, and hurrying them away into a close sedan, where nothing is to be seen but the tops of their heads, and their eyes moving in a dreadful manner, to the next river or canal, and drowning them without mercy, before whole crouds of spectators, who are harangued by one of the fraternity into a firm belief that the persons had earnestly requested to be thus dispatched out of the world, in order to obtain immortality in the next. One can hardly think that those jugglers, bad as they may be, would dare attempt such atrocious enormities, in so polite and regular a government; and yet Father Le Compte assures us, that he saw an instance of it; and, by discovering the imposture, had saved a young man, whom they were violently dragging into a river, from becoming a victim to their inhuman knavery and impiety. But this may suffice to give our readers an idea of those religious cheats (49): those who desire to see more, or greater variety, of them, may consult the authors above quoted.

with a smiling or laughing countenance, and a monstrous prominent belly, quite bare; the other not quite so thick, and covered before with a thin drapery, and in the same sitting posture, whom they style the god of pleasure. Between these two is commonly placed a third, richly clad, with a rich crown on his head, and some ornamental drapery hanging loose from it. This last is called the great king Kang, and is thirty feet high, and richly gilt and carved. To these we may add an innumerable variety of others of all sizes and forms, which they set up in their houses, streets, ships, fields, burying-places, and such-like, to whom they burn incense, and other perfumes, and offer up their prayers, and other parts of the same worship which is performed to them in their temples. They are styled by their votaries their household deities, and are to be found among the poorest, as well as among the richest, and are often treated in the same contemptuous and vindictive manner as the Portuguese are said to use some of their favourite saints; that is, after having prayed to them a good while, and with some importunity, if they do not answer their petitions, they first upbraid them for their neglect and ingratitude, and then proceed to chastise them. This last is commonly done by bastonading, dragging them along the streets through dirt and mire, dunghills, &c.; which done, they throw them by, as useless, into some obscure corner of their houses: but, if they happen to obtain the effect of their prayers, they then fetch the poor idol out with great ceremony and respect, restore him to his place, with a promise to have him new painted or gilt. They then fall down and adore him; confess that they have been as much too hasty towards him as he hath been remiss and negligent towards them; beg of him to forget and forgive what is past, which cannot now be recalled; and that he will be more diligent and kind to them, and they will be more careful of their duty, and more lavish of their incense and perfumes to him².

An unwary reader might be naturally inclined to believe these to be fables, invented merely to expose some of the like kind of superstitions practised in a neighbouring church, were they not conveyed to us by some of her most eminent missionaries; one of which tells us a long, and still more surprising, story, which happened at Nan-king during his stay there; the substance of which is: That a man, who had lost his only daughter, notwithstanding his most fervent prayers, sacrifices, offerings, &c. to this god, and the promises of the Bonza that she would recover, resolved to sue the idol before a magistrate, either as a faithless or impotent, and therefore an unworthy or insignificant, deity. The cause was dragged from one tribunal to another; and the judges, bribed by the Bonzas, still advised him to drop his prosecution; whilst the priest endeavoured to persuade him, that, if he did, the god would make him ample amends for the loss of his child. The man, whether through grief or resentment, proved deaf to both; and, after several hearings, carried his point. The idol was condemned to perpetual banishment, as useless to the nation; the temple to be demolished; and the Bonzas that attended it to be severely chastised, though not degraded from officiating at some other pagoda. These stories are not indeed so consonant with what these authors elsewhere tell us of the Chinese learning and politeness, and would induce one to believe them to be told by those reverend authors with a design to palliate the superstitions of their own church, by exaggerating those of the Chinese: but, whether so or not, it is allowed on all hands, that these extravagancies are despised and condemned by the wiser sort, and especially by the sect of the Literati, of whose rise and tenets we shall now give a short account, before we dismiss this article.

This sect, which is a very modern one in comparison of the rest, may be said to have sprung up from the dregs of those two last spoken of, Lau-kyun and Fo; by both which the whole country had been for a long series of ages immersed in all kinds of magical witcheries, superstitious idolatries, and the most universal depravity of manners; all which, together with the frequent wars and devastations which naturally flowed from so general a corruption, had driven the antient religion and learning in some measure out of the empire. There were but a small number of Confucius's disciples left to keep it up, and these had neither credit nor courage enough to awaken the rest out of their lethargy. At length there started up a small number, about the years of Christ 1070 and 1200, who, by their writings and example, effectually stirred up many of the wiser sort to the love of learning; so that it began to flourish again by degrees, insomuch that, anno 1400, Yong-lo, the then reigning emperor, and a great encourager of it, made choice of eighty-two of the most learned doctors of the empire to compile a system, or body, of doctrines, agreeable to the sentiments of the antient writers, which might serve as a pattern or directory for the learned hereafter. The emperor's authority, and the reputation of those doctors; their concise and polite style, together with their high boasts of understanding the antient writings; soon gave a reputation, and gained a great number of disciples, to their sentiments.

a BUT these doctors, instead of reforming the corruptions and errors of the Chinese religion, according to the antient books, and particularly to the writings of Confucius, rather strove, by forced interpretations, and false glosses, to distort their sense, agreeably to their own prejudices, and introduced a new kind of concealed atheism, and licentious freedom from the worship of God, at the same time that they spake of him in the same magnificent expressions which the antients had done. They acknowledged him to be the most pure and perfect essence, fountain, and origin of all beings; but represented him, at the same time, as nothing differing from nature, that is, from that power, energy, or natural virtue, which produced, and still keeps all things in the same constant order. They farther explained themselves to mean by it a kind of insensible soul of the world, which, they pretend, penetrates through matter, and, on it, produces all those effects and operations we see; so that, though they speak of God in the same manner as the antients did, yet they ascribe to this kind of natural power an energy, and all the perfections, which those attributed to the Godhead. These notions were, however, readily swallowed on all sides; one sort, and that by far the most numerous, admired them, because they tended to destroy all kinds of religion: and another liked them, because that little of religion they contained would cost them no pains or trouble to practise. Thus was this new sect of Literati, or learned, formed and propagated; and, being supported by the imperial authority, took such firm root at the court, that they began to persecute all other sects with great violence, and with a resolution of exterminating them, thro' the whole empire. They found, however, many obstacles to their design: for as, on the one hand, there was still a powerful body of learned men who protested against this upstart doctrine, and appealed to the true meaning of the antient books against it; so, on the other, the bulk of the people were too strongly biassed in favour of their idolatrous superstitions, to have suffered their temples, altars, &c. to be demolished, without making some strong and dangerous opposition against it; so that they were forced to content themselves with a bare condemning all other sects as heretical (which they still continue to do, it seems, every year at Pe-king) without taking any other measures to suppress them^b.

BUT though this sect is become so powerful at court, and in such high esteem among the men of letters, courtiers, and great men, yet they do not care much to be thought to hold those atheistical notions which they are charged with by the rest; and, to clear themselves from it as much as possible, have clogged their systems with such subtle glosses, distinctions, such abstruse and unintelligible terms, that it is hard to guess whether they themselves really understood them, or any one else could make clear sense of them; at least, from the extract which Du Halde hath given us of it^c, for which reason we shall say no more of it here.

FATHER Le Compte tells us, that even the emperor Kang-bi, who was at the head of that sect, and thoroughly versed in that sort of learning, told Father Verbieft, his mathematician, one day, that if they (the Christians) would call God by the same name that the Chinese did, the latter would be less averse to their religion. To which the good Father replied to this effect: Your majesty doth indeed follow the old doctrine of China, which these new doctors have forsaken; should we therefore make use of their terms, would it not be thought that we believe as they do? but if your majesty will, by a proclamation, publicly declare, that the word Cham-ti (or rather Shang-ti) signifies the same in effect that the Christians understand by Tyen-tchu (I), we are ready to make use of the one as soon as of the other. The emperor, our author adds, liked the Father's answer; but, for reasons of state, declined complying with it^d. However, we learn since, that some of the new missionaries have gone so far as to tell those doctors, that there was no other way to wipe off the aspersions of atheism from their sect, than by the emperor's explaining the words Tyen and Shang-ti; and declaring, that he meant by them not the material heaven, or a blind material celestial virtue, but the supreme Lord of heaven; which if he once consented to do, the imputation of atheism would cease of course, as his majesty was the properest person, as high-priest, legislator, master of the empire, and head of the sect, to fix the true meaning and import of those words. They therefore resolved to consult that prince anno 1700; but in such a manner, that he should not perceive the drift of their application to him for this explication: and obtained an edict according to their desire,

(I) Tyen signifies heaven, and Tyen-tchu the Lord of heaven, which is the name by which the Christian missionaries chose to express the Godhead, in opposition to the Literati, who call him Cham-ti, or, more properly, Shang-ti, sovereign emperor; though, by their explanations, they seem to mean no more than heaven, nature, or the blind celestial virtue which produces and acts upon all things (50); so that the missionaries were certainly right to distinguish between that and the supreme Lord and Ruler of it, until they could obtain a declaration from the throne, that both terms were equivalent, and signified the supreme Almighty Creator of all.

which was soon after published in all parts of the empire, the purport of which the reader may see in the margin^e (K).

Thus much we thought necessary to say of this so famed new Chinese sect, and their principles; but whether or no they be really so free from downright atheism as they pretend, that doth not hinder them from dealing in all the magical and diabolical superstitions of that of Lau-kyun: for all the Chinese in general, of whatever sect, rank, or condition, are extremely fond of all such kinds of witchery; and even their greatest men will practise a great variety of them in private, tho' they are obliged to condemn them in public. They are likewise all very fond of the notion of all sorts of fortune-tellers, of invoking and dealing with good and bad spirits, of apparitions, exorcisms, incantations, and all the whole tribe of sorcery and fortilegious trash^f; neither the philosophy of their great Confucius, and other learned men, nor the new refined atheism of their Literati, nor their pretended superiority of reason and knowledge above all other nations, having hitherto been able to root those absurd notions out of their minds. Some of their sects likewise pay a kind of worship to the sun, moon, stars, planets, to mountains, rivers, &c.; and most, if not all of them, to the souls of their ancestors, to whom they rear statues, altars, chapels, and even temples, according to their rank and faculties: and the notion that is propagated amongst them, that those souls are still present, and take particular notice of the actions of the living, generally proves as great a deterrent from vice, and spur to virtuous actions, as the many volumes of morality of their philosophers can be. The same sort of worship, but in a higher degree, they pay to their deceased monarchs, great philosophers, and other eminent persons, who have done any signal services to their country, to all of whom they build temples, altars, triumphal arches, &c. And as this last kind is the worship paid to Confucius, and to some of their best monarchs and great men, and stiled by the philosophic and learned sects a civil one, so was it complied with by the Jesuit missionaries, and permitted to their proselytes, under that notion, tho' highly condemned and complained against by those of the Dominican, Franciscan, and other orders, as idolatrous, and a scandal to the Christian religion. Whence arose those fatal discords between them, appeals to Rome, and other feuds, which ended in the almost total excision of Christianity in this empire, as we shall see at the close of this chapter. And thus much may suffice for the religion and sects of the Chinese.

Worship paid to the sun, &c. To the souls of the dead; to those of eminent men.

WE have already taken notice of Mohammedanism introducing itself likewise into the empire, thro' some of the north-western provinces bordering upon Tartary. This sect hath

(K) This decree, which hath been since preserved in their archives, imports, "That it was not to the visible and material heaven that sacrifices were offered, but only to the Lord and Master of the heavens, earth, and of all things: and that, for the same reason, the tablet, before which such sacrifices were offered, bears this inscription, To Shang-ti, that is to say, To the supreme Lord: that it is from a deep sense of respect to that supreme Being, that none of them presumes to call him by his proper name; and that they chuse to invoke him by those of supreme heaven, bountiful heaven, universal heaven, in the same respectful manner as when speaking of the emperor, they call him not by his own name, but say, the steps of his throne, the supreme court of his palace, and such like: and, lastly, that those names, tho' expressed in different terms, are nevertheless the same with respect to their import and signification." The emperor, upon another occasion, in which he was speaking in public, affirms, that the learned Chinese say, like him, that the principle of all things is called Tyen, heaven, in an exalted and figurative style, in the same manner that the emperor is called Chau-ting, from the name of his palace, which is the place where the imperial majesty shines with the greatest splendor (51).

The same author farther assures us (52), that that monarch, not content with having published the abovesaid edict in the most authentic manner, got it moreover confirmed, and subscribed to, by a great number of the most eminent Mandarins, doctors, and other members of the sect, with their president at their head; all of whom appeared surprised to hear that they had been suspected by the learned of Europe of having honoured such a lifeless and inanimated being as the material heaven; and universally acknowledge, that they understood by

Tyen and Shang-ti, and as such worshipped and invoked, the supreme Lord of heaven, principle of all things, the dispenser of all good, whose all-knowing and all-seeing providence gives us all things. This one would think sufficient to clear the Literati from the suspicion of atheism; but yet there were many of the missionaries who still suspected the imperial declaration, as well as that of the Literati above-mentioned to have been the effect, the one of politeness, and the other of complaisance, especially as both are conceived in such ambiguous and equivocal terms as no atheist would refuse to subscribe to. Nor need we indeed greatly to wonder that these good fathers, who are such adepts in the art of equivocation, should suspect those Literati of the like prevarication.

However, if we may judge by their practice, and that be not likewise misrepresented, we shall have but too much reason to join in the suspicion; and though we may in charity believe that some of the wiser and better sort may still adhere to the ancient doctrine, and really acknowledge a supreme Being, and his divine providence, which, we are told, Father Favre proved against an assembly of 300 Literati, from the authority of their canonical books, and without the least opposition from any of them; yet the far greater part do, in their hearts, disbelieve it, whatever declarations to the contrary they may subscribe to, merely to avoid the odium of atheism, and of being thought enemies to all religion: for this last class is known to be as much addicted to all the extravagancies, and ridiculous notions, of demons, magic, witchcraft, and other superstitions, as the professed disciples of the other two sects, and practise them as much in private as they pretend to condemn them in public.

a spread itself thro' most provinces of China; and hath been tolerated by the rest, without any great disturbance, on account of their peaceable behaviour, they never entering into disputes with others; but quietly enjoying their liberty, without studying to propagate their doctrine, even by intermarriages out of their own kindred. They are indeed neither considerable Makes but a small figure. enough for their number or wealth, to harbour any such views, there being reckoned no more than about 5000 or 6000 families of them, and those dispersed thro' the whole empire, and, for the generality, of the lower rank, as husbandmen, artificers, &c. Besides, we are told, that in those places where they are most numerous, and make the best figure, as in some territories beyond the Whang-ho, where they have been settled during several generations, in some of the towns along the canal, and have very high mosks built after a different manner from the Chinese taste, they have been still looked upon as of foreign extract, and have been frequently insulted by the Chinese people. Even a few years ago, in the city of Hang-chew, in the province of Hu quang, the populace, upon some dislike taken at the indiscreet behaviour of some of them, made no scruple to destroy their fine mosks, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the magistracy to prevent it^b.

It is not easy to guess, from the Chinese accounts, when Mohammedanism was first introduced into China, some placing it no earlier than the beginning of the sixteenth dynasty, and others carrying it as far back as the thirteenth. However, from the small encouragement The emperor not a Mohammedan. they have had, and still meet with, as well as from what we have lately observed of the emperor's religion, upon more occasions than one, it is plain, that those monarchs are not of that religion, as hath been affirmed by Mr. Collier; nor own any of Mohammed's doctrines, except that of worshipping one supreme Being; on which account only, both they, and the sect of the Literati, have thought fit to tolerate them^b.

WHETHER Christianity was preached in this empire so early as the times of the apostles, hath Christianity when planted. been a matter of controversy among the learned. That St. Thomas carried the gospel into Ethiopia, Persia, and several other parts of India, we have shewn in the octavo edition of our Anti-^{it is better by St.} History part of this¹; but that he proceeded so far as China, we have no other proof, than an antient Malabaric breviary, written in the Chaldaic tongue; in some of the lessons and anthems of which, mention is made of that apostle's planting Christianity in Ethiopia, Persia, India, and China. To confirm which, another proof is fetched from the second part of the Synodical Constitutions (ch. 19.), wherein mention is made of Chinese metropolitans. Other proofs, drawn from some antient crosses, and monuments of still more doubtful authority, we omit, all of which the opposite side think sufficiently confuted by one avowed fact; viz. that the first missionaries, who set foot in China about the middle of the fifteenth century, found not the least footsteps of it in any part of the empire.

BUT that this is no conclusive argument against its having been formerly planted and propagated in some provinces of it, is plain from that antient and venerable monument which was dug up near the city of Si-ngan-fu, in the province of Sben-si, and of which we have given an account in the last section^k; by which it appears to have been brought into this empire A. C. 782 or 783; to have been readily received by the then reigning monarch Lyen-tsong, or rather Tay-tsong, and highly encouraged during the reigns of several of his successors, under whose auspices they freely propagated the gospel, built a good number of churches, monasteries, hospitals, &c. Introduced An. 782. maugre all the opposition of the Bonzaic sect. And though it Its great progress. is not easy to know from the Chinese records, which seldom meddle with any events but those which concern the civil government, when, or by what means, it was afterwards suppressed, so as to have left no traces behind; yet it is commonly believed to have happened about the year 845, in which they mention an edict of the emperor Vu-tsong, given in the fifth year of his reign, and condemning, among other Bonzas, those of Ta-tsing or Judea (and supposed Total suppression. to be the Christian priests), in number 3000, to return to a secular life¹. Such an authentic testimony, therefore, puts it beyond all doubt that Christianity was preached, and had made a considerable progress, in that space, whatever be the cause of its having been since so thoroughly abolished and obliterated at the time of the Roman missionaries arrival thither^m.

In this state of superstition and gross idolatry it had continued above seven centuries; during which, severe laws were enacted against all foreigners entering into any part of the empire: The Jesuits first attempt. when Xaverius found means to land in it undiscovered, with a design to replant Christianity there; but died soon after, in a little island we have spoken of in the first sectionⁿ. Above thirty years elapsed before any other of that society ventured to come thither: but those who were settled at the city of Ma-kau, or Macao, lately described, were all that time contriving the most proper means to gain a safe entrance into it; in order to which, several of them were perfecting themselves in the Chinese tongue; and Father Valignau, the then superior-general Their policy.

of the mission, was procuring a great number of European curiosities, such as watches, clocks, maps, quadrants, globes, and all sorts of mathematical instruments, and a multitude of other valuable things, as the most powerful introducers of his brethren to the greedy Mandarins and grandees, and the most likely means to recommend them to the imperial court. They met accordingly with a very kind reception and encouragement from the viceroys and grandees; but were soon after as sternly repulsed. At length, after divers attempts, Father Ricci found means to recommend himself to the court of Pe-king, and became a great favourite of the emperor (L), and was permitted to settle at that metropolis; where he and his companions took a handsome house, had a pension settled upon them; and were allowed the liberty of one of the courts of the palace, into which none but the officers of it were allowed to enter. Here he soon gained an extraordinary reputation, on account of his great skill in the mathematics, and the rich presents he made to the emperor, and his court; insomuch that his house became the receptacle of all the grandees and learned men, and particularly of the principal Kolau, or first officer of the empire, who gave him, on all occasions, the greatest marks of his esteem.

Ricci, thus firmly settled in the favour and esteem of the emperor and his court, began then in good earnest to propagate the Christian religion in that capital; and (if we may depend upon the relations given us of it by those of his society) with incredible success and reputation; and, among other judicious precautions, ordained, that no converts should be admitted to baptism till they had made a public and solemn protestation, expressing their abhorrence of their past lives, and the sincerity with which they embraced the gospel; and this they were obliged to comply with, to prevent all doubting about their sincerity, and real sentiments. The reader may see the form of it in the author often quoted^o, from that which was made by a celebrated Mandarin, named Li, which was designed as a model to all the rest, and which runs in the most pious and sincerest strain; and concludes with a prayer to God, that he would enable him not only to live up to the rules of his holy gospel, but to fit and permit him to preach the same faith to others, and with the same fervent zeal as he had embraced it.

Li's example was soon followed by a multitude of other grandees, Mandarins, and Literati, and by much greater numbers of people of both sexes and inferior ranks, who all became not only zealous professors of the Christian faith, but great promoters and advocates for it. They likewise proved such liberal contributors towards the building of churches and oratories, that, we are told, there were built in the single province of Kyang-nan no less than ninety of the former, and forty-five of the latter. They were no less careful to translate some of the Christian comments on the gospel, together with others of the like nature; all which one single lady, a zealous convert, caused to be printed at her own charges, and to be dispersed abroad among the unconverted of all ranks (M). For these great acts of piety and liberality she was so highly respected at court, that the emperor himself honoured her with several rich presents, and with the title of Sbo-ijn, or virtuous woman. This raised a

(L) Though we are obliged to abridge the account of this celebrated missionary, the reader must not thence suppose his success to have been so quick as we relate it; on the contrary, we are told, that he spent twenty years, from his first attempt to settle at Pe-king, to his obtaining leave to do it; during which he met with the most mortifying discouragements and repulses from the rapacious and jealous viceroys and Mandarins, who, being apprised of the valuable curiosities he had brought with him, were all greedily gaping for a share of them. He was likewise imprisoned, and met with many other obstacles and difficulties; but his presents at length overcame them all, and procured him the settlement he had so long endeavoured after.

The presents he made to the emperor, in particular, were, a fine picture of our Saviour, and another of the Virgin Mary, and a clock of extraordinary workmanship; the former of which, we are told, were conveyed into an honourable place in the imperial palace; and a fine tower was built for a repository of the latter (1).

(M) This excellent lady, who was at her baptism named Candida, was the daughter of Syu, one of the most celebrated Literati, and one of the most earliest and most zealous converts that Father Ricci had made. His daughter, being also become a sincere Christian, was married at the age of sixteen; and, by her wisdom and piety, converted her husband, who left her a widow at thirty. From this time she spent the remainder of her life in the service of religion, and the education of eight children she had had by him; and though she provided handsomely for them all, yet, by her good œconomy, she saved enough of her fortune, not only to defray the charges of printing so great a number of books, but likewise to build some churches in the provinces of Kyang-si, Hu-quang, and Se-chwen (into the last of which she followed her son Basilus, who held some considerable posts there); after which, she invited some of the missionaries to come and take care of them.

Her charity extended to the poor infants and children, whom the poverty of their parents forced to expose to the wide world: for these she erected an hospital, which was presently after so filled with these objects, that, notwithstanding the care of the nurses, and those about them, 200 of them died communibus annis. The very lowest dregs of people, the old and lame, or pretended so, who went about the streets cheating people out of their money, under pretence of telling them their fortunes, she caused to be taken up, instructed, baptized, and provided for. She lived forty-three years in widowhood, and in all such kinds of charities; and died, as she had lived, an eminent and exemplary Christian (2).

a noble emulation in other great ladies of quality to imitate her example; who, by their zeal and piety, brought their husbands to become not only profelytes to, but great supporters of, the Christian cause; infomuch that the churches multiplied in every province of the empire, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the Bonzas, who left no stone unturned to prevent the spreading of a new religion, which was so contrary to their passions and interest (N).

This is the account given by those missionaries of their first planting the gospel in this great empire; and though we may reasonably enough suppose, that they have set it out to the greatest advantage, yet, all things impartially considered, there can no doubt be entertained of its having made a very swift as well as considerable progress through most of its provinces; and which might, in all probability, have proved much greater, and more lasting, had not the unhappy divisions, which began to reign among the several orders of those missionaries, and the persecutions which the Jesuits raised against Cardinal Tournon, and other fellow-labourers, for too freely censuring their shameful compliance, and that of their profelytes, to some pagan rites (O), put a stop to it.

Divisions among Christians put a stop to its progress.

THESE

(N) There is scarcely any room to suppose that these persecutions are much exaggerated by the missionaries, when we consider the infamous character of the whole Bonzaic tribe; though there is great reason to believe they have the many miraculous instances in which the divine Providence is said to have interposed in favour of the persecuted. The reader will readily judge of it by these two that follow, and which we have singled out of a great variety of others which lie scattered among their other accounts, as so many authentic attestations of God's seconding their endeavours, and causing all the malicious devices of their enemies to fall upon their own heads.

The Bonzas having endeavoured to stop the progress of Father Ricci's conversions, by dispersing a scandalous lampoon about the court, in which they accused the emperor of having apostatized from his old religion, and being become a profelyte and promoter of this new one, which they scrupled not to paint in the most odious colours, as well as its preachers; the result of their wise scheme was, that they were all apprehended, and punished in the severest and most mortifying manner: and that the principal among them, though a man highly respected at court, and revered as a prophet by the people, was condemned to such a dreadful bastinado, that he expired under it; whilst Father Ricci had the pleasure to see his credit and success increase, in proportion to their opposition against him.

After the death of Father Ricci, his colleague Adam Schaal was no sooner chosen preceptor to the young emperor Kang-hi, than a petition was presented to the regents, by one of the Literati, full of the bitterest invectives against him, and three others of his society; and a most dreadful persecution was raised against them. They were all clapt into gaol, loaded with chains, and very severely used Anno 1664; and, in the next year, Christianity was proscribed, as false and pernicious, and Father Adam condemned to be strangled. But, that being thought too honourable a death, they exchanged it for a more infamous and cruel one; which was, that he should be brought out, and exposed in a public place, and, whilst alive, be cut into ten thousand pieces. The sentence was sent to the princes of the blood, and regent Mandarins, for their confirmation, when God was pleased to interpose in a signal manner; for, every time they attempted to read it, a sudden earthquake shook the hall with such vehemence, that they all ran out of it, to prevent being crushed under its ruins. We are not told how often this was repeated; but only, that it threw the people into the greatest consternation, and made them believe it occasioned by the unjust sentence against Father Adam. But, adds our author (2), the earthquake, which was renewed more violently than ever, and a fire which consumed most part of the palace, with several other concomitant prodigies, opened the eyes of the unjust judges, and convinced them that Heaven interested itself in favour of the prisoners, who were immediately set at liberty; and Father Adam permitted to return to his place, till the young emperor ordered it otherwise (3). These two instances may serve as samples of the rest, which credat quicunque vult; only one cannot forbear wondering that Providence should display itself in such a signal manner in favour of these preachers of Christianity; and yet suffer them to fall so soon after into such violent and unchristian divisions, as proved the main cause of its utter extirpation out of the empire.

However, those good fathers did not so far trust to these miracles, as to omit other means to recommend themselves, and their religion, to the Chinese nation: and we must not omit one signal advantage which they gained over the Bonzas, by means of some quinquina, or jesuits-powder, then altogether unknown in China, and brought thither from France by Father Fountenay, one of their society. The emperor had languished some time under a tertian ague, which was very uneasy to him; and, upon the proclamation being made at Pe-king, according to custom, that those, who knew any effectual remedy against that distemper, should come and declare it at court, one of the Bonzas came, and pretended to cure, as is usual in such cases, some persons, afflicted with the same disease, by a glass of water, over which he had repeated some words, and performed some magical ceremonies. The medicine not succeeding, two eminent Jesuits proposed the trying of the quinquina; which effectually performed the cure. Father Fountenay, when in England in the year 1703, told the Royal Society one circumstance which Du Halde hath omitted; viz. that they prepared three doses of it, one of which the emperor was to chuse for himself; and they to drink the other two before his face, to prevent all suspicion of poison. The emperor, by that means, was easily persuaded to take it, and was perfectly cured by the first dose; and in gratitude to them, for having, as he expressed it, saved his life, assigned them a noble apartment in the W'hang-ching, or first court of his palace, caused it to be fitted up for them; and, being informed by them, that it was not usual for Jesuits to have houses without a church, granted them a large adjacent field, on which they built a stately one, which was finished, and opened with great ceremony on the 9th of December, 1702 (4).

(O) We lately mentioned a kind of worship which the Chinese pay to the souls of their ancestors, of some of their great monarchs and eminent men, and especially to their great philosopher and lawgiver Confucius; which worship, however, we are told, is styled by the philosophers and Literati, who are obliged to comply with it, a mere civil worship, in order to avoid

AFTER having said thus much on so remarkable a transaction as the introducing and propagating of Christianity through this vast empire, we shall not go so far out of our bounds or province, as to enter into a detail of those disputes which occasioned the total suppression of it; much less of the intrigues of the Jesuits at the court of Rome, and the pope's partial behaviour to that society, the subject being so well known to most of the learned in Europe; even those who only read Father Du Halde's account of it^p, and consider that he was one of them, and writes rather a vindication of his brethren against Cardinal Tournon, Bishop Maigrot, and other of their opposers, will easily perceive where the fault chiefly lay; and those, who are desirous to see those transactions more impartially stated, may read it at full length in the book intituled, De Cultu Sinenfium, printed at Cologne, Anno 1700.

the charge of idolatry. The Jesuits readily took hold of this distinction (if they were not really the authors of it); because, as they alleged to the pope, that paid to the great men above mentioned, being established by the law, could not be dispensed with without manifest danger to Christianity; and that paid to the souls of their ancestors was so deeply rooted in the Chinese nation, that few, if any, would have cared to become Christians, if that had deprived them of the liberty of performing what they esteemed so essential and delightful a part of filial duty; upon which account they thought it very expedient to indulge them in it. But, for both these, they were highly blamed, and at last complained against both to the pope, and to the society de propaganda fide; and the distinction between religious and political or civil worship exposed as a mere subterfuge, to palliate a compliance which they judged highly injurious and scandalous to Christianity.

The truth is, these complaints were made by other missionaries of the Dominican, Franciscan, or some other order, none of whom ever loved that of the Jesuits; and were, in all likelihood, joined with them in the mission, by the political court of Rome, to be a check upon that subtle and insinuating society. Upon which account their charge may be reasonably enough supposed to have been in some measure aggravated, and prosecuted with too great animosity. However, the Jesuits, to disculpate themselves, procured, by their great interest at court, an explanation of these Chinese ceremonies to be drawn up by two learned Mandarins, and to be approved and confirmed by the emperor, to the following effect (5):

“ When the Chinese honour Confucius, they do it to shew their respect to him on account of the doctrine which he hath left among them; and, having once embraced it, how can they better perform the due honours to him, than by prostrating themselves, and touching the ground with their heads, to him whom the whole empire acknowledges as their master. As to the libations, and other rites, performed to their deceased parents, they are only paid as a mark of respect, and acknowledgement that they revere them as the heads of their race and family. And as to the pictures (statues it should rather be) which they set up in honour of their ancestors, they do not mean by it, that their souls reside in them, neither come they to ask any favours from them; but only set meat, and other presents, before those pictures, to express their constant love towards them, and their sorrow for being deprived of them.

“ As for the sacrifices which the ancient kings and emperors were wont to offer to heaven, they are such as the Chinese philosophers style Kiao che, that is, the sacrifices which are made to heaven and earth, by which, they say, Shang ti, or the sovereign Lord, is honoured; and it is for this reason that the little pictures, before which those sacrifices are offered, bear this inscription to Shang-ti, that is to say, To the sovereign Lord; from whence it is evident, that they do not offer sacrifices to the visible and material heaven, but only to the Lord and Creator of heaven and earth: and, because their veneration and respect for him will not permit them to call him by his proper name, they invoke him under the appellations of the supreme heaven, the beautiful heaven, the universal heaven.”

The emperor Chang's (or rather Kang-hsi's) approbation was to this effect: “ That which is contained in this writing is very right, and conformable to the grand doctrine: to pay our devours to heaven, to our lords, to our parents, to our masters, and to our ancestors, is a law common to all the world. The things contained in this writing are very true, and need no amendment.”

But neither this declaration, nor any other apologies which the Jesuits made for their conduct, could hinder its being publicly condemned by the pope's legate at Canton, Anno 1707, by a decree dated from that city, forbidding all Christians, both profelytes and others, to pay any such honours either to Confucius, or to the pictures of their ancestors. Upon which they found themselves obliged to procure a more favourable one in their behalf from the pope, Anno 1715; which ordained, that the word Tyen-ki, that is, Lord of heaven, should be used to signify the true God, as had been long since done by the missionaries; and that the same conduct should be observed with respect to the ceremonies to be allowed to Christians, confining them only to such as were purely of a political and civil nature: and lastly, that the apostolic commissary, and visitor-general, for the time being, in China, or his deputy, should be consulted, if any difficulty arose upon that head. This decree was directed to the pope's legate, bishop Tournon, with the title of cardinal; but he died before it arrived, and, as is supposed, of grief, on account of the persecutions raised against him by the Jesuits.

It proved, however, a means of increasing, rather than of removing, the difficulties about which both parties contended; they still differing as much as ever about what ceremonies were purely civil and political, or not so. Upon which the pope thought fit to send a new legate thither, to compromise those disputes, Anno 1720: but he was, soon after his arrival at Canton, not only forbid to come to court, but received express orders from the emperor to leave China, with all the other missionaries; for that the pope's decree being inconsistent with the laws and usages of the empire, the Christian religion could no longer subsist there. He was, however, permitted, Du Halde tells us, to wait upon the emperor; and was received and dismissed with singular honours, and permitted to leave China only to go and give the pope an account of the state of the Christian mission, and with a promise to return back in three years with the same character; but the death of that monarch, which happened soon after, and was followed by the total proscription of Christianity, put a stop both to his legation, and the further progress of that mission (6).

(6) Ibid. Vid. & Du Halde,

- a ALL that we need to add, by way of conclusion to this article, is, that, after the conquest of China by the Tartars, the two emperors Shun-chi and Khang-li likewise favoured them with their special friendship and protection during their whole reigns; but, immediately after the demise of the latter, a number of petitions and remonstrances were presented both to his son and successor, and to the tribunal of rites, against the Christian religion; upon which it was proscribed by several edicts, and these published in most of the capitals of the empire. The tribunal above-mentioned gave this decision against the missionaries (or, as they are there styled, Europeans): That such of them as were at court might be kept there, as they were useful for reforming the calendar, and other services; but that those who were dispersed in the provinces, were not only useless, but dangerous, as they built churches, and drew the ignorant people, both men and women, to their religion; and should therefore be all sent away to Ma-kau (a Portuguese town on the Chinese coast, and lately described). This order was confirmed by the emperor, in words to this effect, written with the red pencil: That it should be done according to the above decree; and that the Europeans, as foreigners, should be sent to Ma-kau: but that, to prevent any insult being offered to them in their way thither, a Mandarin should be appointed to conduct them safe through every province, and convenient time allowed them for repairing to that place.

Remonstrances and edicts against the missionaries.

Emperor's decree against them.

- THE Jesuits made use indeed of all their arts, and interest they had with the emperor and Mandarins, to ward off the fatal blow: but all they could obtain from him, was, to have the city of Canton, instead of Ma-kau, to be the place of their exile; and this only on condition that they behaved so as to give no cause of complaint. This last order was immediately published in all the gazettes, and in all the provinces of the empire; and the missionaries, without distinction, were all driven out of their churches, and conducted either to Pe-king or Canton; the emperor further declaring, in a new book written for the instruction of his subjects, that he tolerated only some few of them, on account of the advantages which the empire received from their skill in arts and sciences. Pursuant to those edicts, more than 300 churches were destroyed, or turned into pagods, schools for the Literati, and other common uses; and above 300,000 Christians deprived of their pastors, and exposed to the mercy of the unbelievers, and without any prospect of seeing their religion restored.

Destruction of their churches.

- THE Jesuits, however, have still three Chinese natives, and the society de propaganda fide a few priests of the same country, who privately mingle with the new converts, and officiate among them; and, as these are too few for so great a number of converts, they employ some of the most skilful catechists, who disperse themselves among the provinces, furnish them with calendars, books of devotion, and other helps, and endeavour to keep up the spirit of Christianity among as many as they can; for the doing of which with more safety, they put themselves under the protection of some Mandarins, which is not to be obtained but by some considerable presents; and this is the present melancholy state of Christianity in the Chinese empire.

- BUT this is far enough from being the only country in which not only the Christian religion, but the very names of Christian, Praguay or Portuguese, and European, are held in the utmost abhorrence, through the misconduct, or rather ill designs, of those who are sent to propagate it; and where, after a most promising prospect of a plentiful, if not an universal conversion, and the greatest encouragements given to them by the reigning monarchs and great men, all their hopes have been quashed as in an instant; the preachers, and their profelytes, persecuted with the greatest severity, their religion proscribed and detested; all farther avenues closely stopped, and carefully watched against; and as many as have since attempted, under any disguise, or upon any pretence, to gain admittance, have been put to the most speedy and excruciating deaths. That this has been the case of a great number of those Romish missionaries, not only in Ton-king, Cochin China, and Korea, as we have seen in a former part, but in Japan, Siam, Tibet, and the greatest part of Industan, we have from their own testimony, and the letters that have been transmitted from time to time from those parts, and are to be found in that large collection printed at Paris, under the title of Lettres curieuses et edifiantes; and with this aggravating circumstance, that those missionaries, who attempt to penetrate into any of those Indian dominions, to avoid the suspicion of being either Christians, Praguays, or Europeans, which would not fail of proving fatal to them, are obliged to disguise themselves under the name, garb, and profession, of eastern sanjassi's, or penitents, such as we have described in a former chapter, and to conform to all their rules of living; that is, to abstain from eating any thing that has life, drinking any thing exhilarating, to eat but once in twenty-four hours, to lie and fare hard, sleep little, and rise by the earliest dawn, and observe a great number of other austerities peculiar to that sect; the omission of any one of which would render them suspected, and despicable to the brotherhood. To avoid, moreover, the suspicion of their being Europeans, on account of the difference of their complexion, they affect to call themselves northern sanjassi, a or teachers; and tell the Indians, that they come among them with no other view than to instruct them in a more worthy way of worshipping the supreme Creator, to give them more just ideas of his attributes and perfections, and to direct them into a better way of obtaining his favour and blessings in this and in the next life, than any they have been able to learn from their own teachers. By these, and such-like disinterested suggestions, they introduce themselves among them; by their learning and address they quickly gain the esteem and protection of the great; whilst the austerity of their lives draws upon them the eyes and admiration of the vulgar: the result of which is, that they soon make a sufficient number of proselytes to build a church, and perform the divine worship. The mission goes on and flourishes, without meeting with any opposition, except from the idolatrous priests, who are great enemies to, because great losers by, this new religion, which is levelled against their own. But no sooner is the pretended sanjassi discovered, or even barely suspected, to be an European, and his doctrine that of the Praguays, or Portuguese, than a dreadful persecution is raised against the preacher and his converts, and their religion is proscribed and forbidden, under pain of death: so odious and detested are become the very names of Christian and European all over the eastern parts of India, even to the farthest boundaries of the Chinese dominions*.

Whether there were any Jews in China.

WHETHER any Jews were ever settled or tolerated in China, hath been a question among us in Europe till the beginning of this century; though whoever considers how they swarm in Spain and Portugal, where the laws are so severe against them, could hardly find any room to doubt of their being invited in much greater numbers into that rich and opulent empire, by the same prospect of a gainful commerce, where there are not, that we can find, any laws, or imperial edicts, to interdict them from it: but all that while our news from thence made no particular mention of them. Father Ricci, and some others of the first missionaries, seem indeed to hint, that there were some of that nation dispersed about the country; but, whether they met with any difficulty in it, or did not think it worth their while to find them out, we heard nothing farther about them till the year 1704, when Father Paulo Gozani, a Jesuit missionary, being come upon some occasion into the province of Ho-nan, had the good fortune to find a considerable synagogue of them, and, as they themselves told him, the only one in the whole empire, in the city of Kay-fong fu, the capital of that province, and situate in the very centre of the Chinese dominions. He soon contracted an acquaintance with some of their learned chiefs; who, on account of his character, shewed him a more than ordinary respect, introduced him into their synagogue, and shewed him one of the volumes, or parchment rolls, of the pentateuch†, written in Hebrew, and in fair and legible characters, together with some others of the Old Testament, as those of Josbuz, the Judges, Samuel, Kings, some of the prophets, and some others containing their liturgy, commentaries, and the like: these last much worn, and kept in boxes under their seats; but all of them written in the Hebrew tongue and character. They owned to him, that they had lost some of the sacred books, and some of their targums or paraphrases, expositors, &c. by a violent overflowing of the great river Hoam-bo (Whang-bo), or yellow river, which had laid that capital wholly under water, and had likewise much damaged their thorah, or roll of the pentateuch: upon which they ordered twelve fair copies to be taken of it, which are still preserved in the like number of partitions in the tabernacle, where it is kept.

THEY informed him, that they divided the Chin-kin, or five books of Moses, which they distinguish, like all other Jews, by the name of the first word in each book, as Beresbith, Elleshemoth, &c. into fifty-two parashahs, or lessons, one for every sabbath-day throughout the year; which division is supposed to have been instituted by Ezra‡. They retain the same number of letters, which they reckon twenty-seven, including the five final ones§; but whether they have admitted the use of the vowel points, we are not told; our author not being, as he frankly owns, acquainted with the Hebrew tongue, and consequently not capable of making all the inquiries one could have wished, about this and other curious matters. They acquainted him furthermore, that two famed Jesuits, viz. Father Roderigo de Siguero, who flourished under the last dynasty, and Father Enriquez, who flourished about the beginning of this, had had frequent conferences with the then chiefs of that synagogue, but without coming to any agreement; from which, as well as from those two learned men neglecting to get a transcript of their pentateuch, he supposes that they found it corrupt and mutilated: and concludes, from the whole, that those Jews are of the Talmudist sect.

THEIR synagogue is there built much after the manner that they are 'in other parts of the world, excepting that it is turned towards the west, that is, towards Jerusalem, towards g a which they turn their face when they pray, as all others did, which were situate eastward of that metropolis, once the centre of their worship. It is moreover divided into three ailes, or partitions; but whether in imitation of the three courts of Solomon's temple as Father Gobien, the publisher of this account, would insinuate in his remarks, at the end of it, or no, is scarcely worth inquiring after, or easy to determine from the imperfect sketch here given of it: but, if so, it differs in that particular, from all those we have seen in Europe, if not from all that are in the world.

In the centre of the middlemost aisle is placed their reading-desk, or, as it is styled, Moses's Reading-desk, chair, where the law, and other portions of the Old Testament, and their usual liturgy, are read with great ceremony. This chair, or desk, our author tell us, is grand and lofty, and b richly adorned with crimson velvet, with gold fringe, tassels, &c. with stately candlesticks, and large candles, perfume-pots, and other ornaments; and over it, instead of the emperor's arms, which their law doth not permit them to represent, is fixed a fine large board, with his name and titles superbly inscribed upon it. At the farther end of the same aisle, and facing the chair above-mentioned, is the tabernacle, or repository of the sacred roll of the law, of the c twelve transcripts lately spoken of, each of them in a separate niche, shut up with folding-doors, and a rich curtain drawn before it; the whole inclosed within a handsome balustrade, into which none but their khakam, or chief officer, is permitted to set his foot. The rest of the synagogue is decorated with inscriptions taken from the pentateuch, and other sacred d books, and proper to inspire them with devotion; they also cover their heads with the usual
 e thaled, or veil, all the time they are praying.

THEY strictly retain the rite of circumcision, and observance of the sabbath, during which they suffer no fire to be kindled in their houses: the three grand feasts, of the passover, weeks of pentecost, and of the tabernacles, together with other occasional festivals, fasts, and other
 f ancient institutions, are likewise kept with great strictness among them, though in some other cases they readily comply with the Chinese customs, and religious ceremonies. They call themselves Kiao-kin kiao, a name which was at first given to them by the Chinese, on account of their abstaining from blood, and their peculiar way of killing the animals they eat; but which they gladly retained, in order to distinguish themselves from the Mohammedans, who are called Tee-mo-kiao, with whom they entertain not the least commerce, and from d whom they affect to distinguish themselves by some peculiarities in their dress, and the different turn of their whiskers.

THEY call the Supreme Being by the Chinese name Tyen, and worship him under the titles of e Cham-tien, Cham-ti, Sham-ti, or rather Shang-tyen, the Lord of heaven, Shang-ti, the supreme Lord, Teao-van-voe-tche, or Creator of all things, and of Van-voe-tchu-tcai, or Governor of the universe; which names, they owned they had taken from the Chinese books, that of Tyen signifying properly heaven, as we have already observed upon another occasion*. Their law they call Tyen-kiao, or the law of God, or of heaven; they likewise style it sometimes Kow-kiao, or the antient law; and Israel's Kiao, or the law of Israel: where, by the way, we cannot but observe, that they have, by long disuse, lost the pronunciation of the f R, for which they substitute the L, as do the Chinese, among whom that letter is never used, when they pronounce some European name that hath it, as Aalon, Miliam, instead of Aaron, Miriam, &c.

AGAIN, as they have their Literati and graduates, our author asked them, whether they paid the usual honours to Confucius that the rest do? To which they answered, one and all, in the affirmative; and added, moreover, that they performed they same ceremonies that other f Literati did, at the halls of their great men. They likewise owned to him, that they all conformed to the solemn rites which are performed to their ancestors, with this only difference, that, instead of offering swine's-flesh, which is forbidden by their law, they substituted that of some other clean animal; and that, in their more usual ceremonies to the deceased, they contented themselves with setting before them some dishes of meat, sweetmeats, and perfumes, served in china-ware, accompanied with profound prostrations, after the manner of the country.

THEY conducted our author to this grand hall of ancestors, which is contiguous to their
 f Ty-pai-sou, or synagogue, and where those rites are performed every spring and fall. Here, instead of such pictures and figures as are used by the Chinese, but forbidden by their law, they had only a number of perfume-pans, or boxes, answerable to that of their Chingins, or great men, the largest of which was that of their great Father Abraham, and was placed in the heart of the hall. Next to that were those of Isaac and Jacob; and, next to them, those of his twelve sons, whom they styled Che-cum-pai-tse, patriarchs, or heads of the twelve tribes. The next in rank and dignity were those of Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Samuel, Era, and other illustrious persons of both sexes, belonging to their nation; excepting, how-

THE missionary, being thence conducted to a house of entertainment, took occasion to ask them some questions about the promised Messias; and tells us, that they seemed greatly surpris'd at what he told them concerning Jesus Christ: but gave him no other answer, than that their sacred books made indeed mention of one Jesus, the son of Sirach; but that they had never heard any thing concerning the other of whom he spoke. He took likewise that opportunity to compare some parts of his own bible with their Hebrew one, particularly that which relates to the lives of the patriarchs from Adam to Noah; and assures us, that they agreed exactly in every particular. Now if his bible was the vulgate Latin, of which there is not any room to doubt, that being the only one authorized by his church, it follows, that their Hebrew is exactly conformable to those we have in Europe, because the vulgate is so; and, consequently, that the æra between Adam and Noah, or the creation and the flood, according to the septuagint, exceeds them by 606 years, as the reader may see by the tables we have given of it at the beginning of the Antient History †. As for the occasion of this present remark, it will be best seen when we come to speak of the Chinese chronology, towards the end of this chapter.

ALL that needs be added concerning those Jews, is the time in which they first settled in that empire; concerning which, they told our author in general terms, that it was during the Han-chau, or fifty dynasty, which began 206 years before, and ended in the 220th year after, the birth of Christ; but in what part of it, they did not tell, and, in all likelihood, could not inform him: but, supposing it had been at the very latter end of it, it is plain they could not be Talmudists, as he suspects them, much less guilty of mutilating and corrupting their sacred books with their false and fabulous glosses; seeing neither of the Talmuds, nor any of their fabulous traditions and commentaries, are of so old a date by several centuries, as we have shewn in our Antient History ‡. Neither is it just, on the other hand, to suppose the Talmudists to have corrupted the sacred text, which they have been scrupulous to preserve, even to a superstitious degree, though they have visibly perverted the sense of it by their false glosses and comments. Our author, therefore, seems plainly to have misapprehended what they told him out of the latter to have been quoted out of the former: but as their adopting the fabulous traditions of the Mishnah and Ghemarra shews them to have been infected with the Talmudic leaven, so they must of course have imposed upon him with respect to the time of their first coming into that country, and that it must have been of a much recenter date. This is no strange supposition, especially from a Jew to a Jesuit; and, if so, may we not as justly suspect what they told him about their having no other synagogue in the empire; and what they further added to him, probably from the same spirit of diffidence and fear, that, though they were pretty numerous at their first coming, they were at that time reduced to seven families, whose names were Thao, Kin, Che, Theman, Li, and Ngni *?

THUS far our author's account goes, of those that he met with in that great city. How many thousands more there may be of them, dispersed and disguised throughout the empire, and who outwardly conform to the religion and customs of the country, as they do in Portugal, Spain, and other Christian countries, where, instead of being tolerated, they are proscribed by the laws, can only be conjectured by those who know what stratagems they will use, what hazards they will run, for the sake of gain. But we have dwelt long enough upon this one article, and shall now proceed to a new topic.

Of the government, laws, politics, &c. of the Chinese.

Chinese government monarchical and despotic.

THE Chinese nation had been, from its first beginning, so inured to, and, we may add, so highly delighted with, a monarchical government, that, when the Dutch ambassadors, made their first application to it, they found it very difficult to make them comprehend what they meant by the high and mighty lords the states general, and the republic of Holland. What their antient form and state was, we have already given an account of in a former part ^a, as far as could be collected from the Chinese records, for no mention is made of it in any other authors; neither is there any reason, from the singular tenaciousness of that nation for its antient laws, customs, &c. or from what we read of the reigns of so long a succession of monarchs, to suppose that it ever received any considerable alteration; so far from it, that we find their very conquerors, contrary to the usual practice in such cases, of altering and inverting, a have shewn a singular readiness to conform to it, and made as few changes in it as they possibly could: and this not so much out of complaisance to the conquered, as from an unavoidable esteem and regard for the excellency of their laws and constitution; insomuch that, in this respect, they seem rather to have submitted to, than to have given their laws to, their new subjects.

It cannot, however, be denied, nor indeed is it at all to be wondered at, that this vast overgrown state hath formerly split itself into a number of petty kingdoms, some of which (tho' all of them, according to the fundamental constitution of that monarchy, were dependent on a supreme emperor) would yet now-and-then shake off their subjection, and make themselves despotic in their respective states; but time and fortune have never failed to reduce b them back to their former dependency (P); so that there is no reason to doubt of its having continued, in the main, much in the same despotic form of monarchical government in which the Tartars found it at the time of their conquering it: since that time it is become, if any thing, rather more absolute and arbitrary than ever; seeing the power of those new monarchs extends itself not only over all civil and military, but, as we have seen under the last article, is absolute and uncontrouled in all religious matters.

THE Chinese monarchs, besides their own proper names, were wont to assume some high Emperors pomp- and swollen titles, such as holy sons of heaven, lords of the whole world, sole governors over the earth, great fathers of the people, and others of the like pompous sound; besides which, the government passed from one branch or family to another, he who was the first or head of it gave his name to it, which continued as long as the dynasty remained in his family, Dynasties, which was, from him, called the dynasty (or rather, as the Chinese word Chau imports, the from whom epocha, or term of years) of such a king. Since the conquest by the Tartars, that monarch styles himself Cham, or Kang, or emperor; and his power extends itself not only over all the sixteen provinces described in the first section, but likewise over several others of eastern Tart- named. their exten- tary, over some of which he hath an absolute sway, whilst other are only tributary, and some of them only pay a kind of homage to him; but is no-where more despotic and arbitrary than in these his new conquered dominions.

HERE he hath the power of life and death not only over all his subjects, but even over all the princes of the blood. His will is the sole law, and his commands admit not the least dispute or delay, under the severest penalties. He is indeed obliged to govern according to the laws; and to consult his proper courts and council in all important matters, whether civil or criminal, military or religious: but as he is the supreme and uncontrouled interpreter of the former, and bears an absolute sway over the latter; or, in case of any too strenuous opposition from these, can displace, punish, or new mould them at pleasure; the whole government must center at last in his sole will. The crown is hereditary in his family; yet he hath the power to alter the succession, and either during his life, or even on his death-bed, may name his successor out of what branch of it he pleases, or even out of it, as some affirm; but, in this last case, his choice must be confirmed or ratified by his great or supreme council, which consists of princes of the blood, and the chief ministers of state; for their concurrence is esteemed of such consequence, that not only the Chinese monarchs before the conquest, but even those of the Tartaric race, have always thought it necessary, before they ventured to enact any new laws, to reverse or suspend the old ones: insomuch that we read of some instances, in which, though the emperor and his Tartars have agreed upon passing some decree, especially in matters of religion, or such as related to the ancient Chinese laws and customs, yet they have chosen to lay it aside when they have found too great a majority of the Chinese against it, rather than run the hazard of a rebellion*. But these instances, we may say, happened when those monarchs were not quite so firmly settled on the throne: for it hath since plainly appeared, that the late emperor Kang-hi, both in these religious matters which were brought before him, and in his appointing his fourth son to succeed him, ventured to act in a more despotic and uncontrouled manner; and no wonder he should, when he saw himself so firmly secured

(P) This is plainly hinted by the Chinese author often quoted (7), who speaks of several such revolutions, civil wars, &c. which made a short alteration in the form of government, but which soon after disappeared; after which, things returned to their former state. He adds, that the empire was one while divided into 100, nay, into 300, parts or polyarchies, and afterwards reduced to seven, then to three, and at length to its primitive state of one intire monarchy, solely subject to one sovereign (8).

We need not therefore wonder that they should be at such a loss what to make of the pompous language and titles used by the Dutch ambassadors to them, as we lately hinted out of Nieuwhoff (9); much less at their being able to comprehend, as the same author adds, how such a political state (which appeared to them rather as a monster with many heads, the spurious offspring of lawless ambition and stubbornness, begotten and bred, as they supposed, in times of anarchy and confusion) could possibly subsist without some sovereign power to curb and suppress the one, and steer and govern the other (10).

4. Ping-pu. 4. THE court of Ping-pu, or tribunal of arms, superintends all the soldiery in the empire; a examines their arms, exercises, &c.; grants commissions to the army and fleet; orders levies to be made for both; replenishes the magazines, and keeps all the garrisons, towns, and fortresses, in repair, and furnishes the soldiery with arms.

5. Hing-pu. 5. THE court of Hing-pu, or Him-pou, superintends all criminal causes brought hither from the inferior courts, by appeal, and passes a final sentence in all criminal matters: and under it are fourteen subordinate tribunals according to the number of the provinces.

6. Kong pu. 6. THE court of Kong-pu, or Cam-pou, or tribunal of public works, superintends all public structures; such as, the king's palaces, fortifications, public roads, public temples, palaces, sepulchres, bridges, towers, triumphal arches, dykes, navigable rivers, lakes, canals, &c.; and hath four inferior courts under it, who prepare matters for their inspection. Both upper b and lower tribunals have likewise different chambers, or committees, appointed to their respective businesses, for the more regular and ready dispatch of them. Every high court hath a chief inspector appointed by the emperor, who gives him an account of their proceedings, as well as of their failings and misbehaviour. These are commonly of the first rank of Mandarins, or kolaws; and are in such authority, that the very princes of the blood stand in awe of them^y.

The four military tribunals. OF the four, or, according to others, five military courts, which are, in some measure, subordinate to the fourth superior one, called Ping-pu, or tribunal of arms; the first disposes of all military employments; and sees that the troops be well armed and disciplined. The second distributes the officers and soldiers into their respective stations, for the securing the public tranquility, and the cities and high roads from robbers and highwaymen. The third superintends the horses of the empire, the posts, stages, imperial inns, and barges appointed to convey provisions for the soldiers to their respective stations. The fourth orders the making all sorts of arms, and laying them up in arsenals^z.

The courts inspected by proper officers, THERE are several other courts of the military rank, of which we shall take notice, when we come to speak of the military government; and only observe here, that all these tribunals have likewise an inspector set over them by the emperor, who gives him an account of every thing that is transacted in them, and of the behaviour of every member; and these are obliged, by their office, not only to assist at all their assemblies, and watch over their conduct there, but even to pry into their most private management (U), and make a faithful report of all to d him. This obliges every member to speak and behave with the utmost circumspection. And several provinces of those courts are so prudently linked together, as to be a check to each other. Thus, for instance, the army, which is under the command of the Ping-pu, or fourth tribunal, and paid by that of the Ho-pu, shall be ordered to march by the former, but cannot stir till their subsistence-money is sent to them by the latter.

Viceroy, and other magistrates, subordinate to the tribunals. SUBORDINATE to the above-mentioned tribunals, are the viceroys and governors of provinces, judges, and magistrates, and all inferior officers, in city and country, for the easier dispensing of justice to the subjects, and maintaining the peace of the empire. It is even affirmed, by most writers, that all those viceroys, governors, &c. are obliged, from time to time, to transmit to court a full and just account of their administration, and with it a note of all the miscarriages and mismanagements laid to their charge, to be examined by the superior tribunals; and, in case they be found to have concealed or palliated them, are liable to be severely punished. This was indeed practicable enough before the conquest, when the Chinese monarchs had, besides the inspectors over every court, some private ones in every province, who were to give the emperor an account of every fraud, bribery, and oppression, committed by any of those officers. But the Tartarian monarchs found afterwards, that those spies, or informers, had so grossly abused their trust, by making their reports rather according as they were bribed, than to the merit or demerit of those under their inspection, that they thought fit to set them wholly aside, and only oblige the persons in the administration to be their own accusers, by sending the above-mentioned transcript of all their good and bad actions. That this, however, is seldom practised, is very plain, from the common complaint of all those writers against the Inspectors of the provinces set aside. avarice, bribery and corruption, which reign through the whole empire, from the highest tribunals down to the lowest offices; insomuch, that he who can bribe highest is morally sure to carry his point, let his merit or demerit be what it will. It is therefore in vain, they tell us, f

Chinese laws abused.

(U) These inspectors, or, as the Chinese call them, ko-taus, are commonly men of such penetration, that nothing hardly escapes them; and therefore, much dreaded by the ministers of state, and other officers. Some of them have been intrepid enough to censure and accuse princes, and persons of the highest rank, and to run the risque not only of their places, but of their lives, rather than desert from what they thought justice and equity, and the good of the state, exacted from them (14).

a that the Chinese government and laws are the best calculated to make a people happy, above all others, if those that are at the head of affairs are such rapacious creatures, as to make all places, and even justice itself, venal; and if their laws, like those excellent ones of a certain country in Europe, are so little observed or regarded, that magistrates, and people, are suffered to act not only in contradiction, but open defiance, to them, and a circulation of bribery is left to run from the highest to the lowest rank.

BESIDES these tribunals, which do always reside at Pe-king, every province hath a supreme Provincial one, under its viceroy, or governor (W), and that hath several inferior ones under it, and a tribunals. certain number of inferior Mandarins, to assist that minister in the dispatch affairs. Next to the provincial ones, are those of the Fú's, or capital cities of each province, of which we spoke, in the first section of this chapter; and these are under a Mandarin, who is styled Chi-fú, under whom are the Chi-chews and Chi-yiens, or Mandarins of the cities of the second and third rank, with their respective inferior tribunals; and these are subordinate to each other, and all to the supreme or provincial one, which hath none above it, except that of Pe-king. And thus much may suffice for the civil; let us now take a short view of the military government ^a.

WE have already taken notice of the four tribunals subordinate to the fourth supreme one, Military go-king, styled U-fú; that is, the five classes, or troops of the military Mandarins; the first of which five courts is, that of the Mandarins of the rear-guard; the second, that of the left-wing; the third, that of the right; the fourth, that of the main body; and the fifth, that of the van-guard. Each of them hath a president, and two assistants, who are of the first order of Mandarins; and all of them are subordinate to a supreme tribunal of war, called Xong-chin-fú, whose president is one of the greatest nobles of the empire, and hath authority over them, and all the officers and soldiers of the court. He hath likewise a Mandarin, and two inspectors, to be a check over him: and his tribunal is subordinate to the fourth and sixth supreme ones, which prevents his abusing his extensive power.

ALL the military Mandarins are obliged to undergo the same examination as those of the Mandarins, Literati order; that is, as those must give proofs of their knowledge and learning, to be admitted to their respective degrees, so must these of their strength, courage, dexterity, and experience, in the art of war. The principal military Mandarin, answering to our general, hath a number of inferior ones under him, answering to ours lieutenant-generals, &c. and all of them have a train and insignia suitable to their rank, and are always attended by a company of officers under their command. These are obliged to exercise and review the soldiery often; Soldiers have but those exercises have nothing regular in them, consisting only in some disorderly marches, exercised. when they attend their Mandarins, or in forming of squadrons, marching, filing off, rallying, encountering each other, at the sound of their horns or trumpets, and in a dexterous using and handling their sabres, bows, muskets, cuirasses, helmets, &c. and keeping them clean, and in right order; and as the military life is neither laborious nor dangerous in time of peace, it is bestowed, as a favour, on those who can make most friends with the military Mandarins, How employ- their service being commonly confined to the places where they dwell, and have their families, ed, clothed, and paid. so that they may at proper times follow their own employments.

THE military Mandarins are computed to amount to 18,000, and the soldiery to above Number of 700,000, who are all dispersed thro' the several provinces, especially the frontier ones of the th.m. empire, and along the Chinese wall, and are stationed in the military cities, towns, fortresses, and castles, we have elsewhere described; and, being commonly well clothed and armed, How employ- make a very good appearance either in their marches or reviews; but come vastly short of those ed, clothed, and paid. of Europe in courage or discipline, and are easily put into disorder, and routed; and, as the country hath now been a considerable time free from foreign or domestic wars, they have had little employment, except in suppressing the highwaymen and banditti in the inland, and the pirates on the sea-coasts, and in guarding the frontier towns. Their pay is about five-pence and about a pint of rice per day, and the horse in proportion ^b.

(W) There is a difference of names, as well as dignity and power, between these governors; the one, who is called Fü-ywen, is only viceroy of one province; and the other, styled Tsong-tú, hath a government over two or three. Both are nominated by the emperor; and both are at the head of the supreme tribunal of the province, wherein all causes, civil and criminal, are decided. To them the imperial commands are transmitted, and by them dispersed through all the other cities and districts of the province. Only the Tsong-tú's dignity is reckoned more considerable, as it is more extensive; so that he cannot be advanced to any higher, except he be made a minister of state, or president of one of the supreme courts (15).

THEIR artillery, till the Jesuits taught them a better way of casting and using it, was very pitiful, and hardly worthy of that name (X); and though it be allowed, that they had the invention of gunpowder much earlier than the Europeans, they hardly used it for any thing but fireworks, in which they excel. This made them at first be much surpris'd and terrified at our European guns, and the havock they made both in their being fired, and their recoiling; infomuch that they fled from them in the greatest panic, and could hardly be persuaded to come near them again: but, since then, the good missionaries have not only reconciled them to those frightful engines of destruction, but taught them the way of casting and using of them, so that they are now as well understood by them as by us: especially as Father Verbieft, the emperor's chief mathematician, did, by his order, cast, in one year, 132, and, in a little time after, 320 more, after the best European manner; and soon after published a treatise on founding and using of cannon, and presented it to that monarch, with forty-four tables, or cuts, shewing the whole art, and the manner of using the instruments necessary for levelling them. For this singular piece of service, Father Verbieft was highly honoured by that monarch, and all the the military tribe of Mandarins, who were present at the trial of them, and surpris'd at the exactness with which they hit the mark; whilst the good father was severely lampooned for it in Spain and Italy, as a person who deserved to be doubly excommunicated, for furnishing an infidel prince with such destructive arms: however, Pope Innocent XI. did not suffer him to labour long under those censures; but, by a particular brief, highly applauded what he had done, as tending to promote the conversion of the Chinese; and exhorted him to go on in the same laudable track, promising him his apostolical blessing, and pontifical assistance and protection in it. Besides, those pieces appear to have been of a religious cast, and had been blessed in a solemn manner: for the good father had before erected an altar in the foundery, with a crucifix upon it; and, in his surplice and stole, paid his homage to it, with the same prostrations and ceremonies as the Chinese use to their images; and gave each gun the name of a he or she saint, which he caused to be engraven on their breech; which, we are told, was done to prevent the Chinese using any of their superstitious ceremonies about them, who commonly offer sacrifices to the spirit of the air, mountains, rivers, lakes, &c. according to the nature of the work they go about, or put the last hand to^c.

HAVING taken thus far a view of the civil and military government of the empire, there remains that we say a few words of that of the provinces, capital cities, and of the districts under them. We have already hinted, that every province hath a viceroy, or governor, who commonly resides at the metropolis of it, and is the supreme judge and magistrate of it, excepting only his being subordinate to the supreme tribunals of Pe-king. He sits as president of the provincial courts, and superintends all the governors, judges, and members of the inferior ones, as well as the governors of all the cities of the first, second, and third order, and all the inferior magistrates of every district. Every city, besides its own governor and tribunal, is divided into a certain number of wards, every one of which hath its own respective head, who is answerable to the governor for every misdemeanor that happens within his precinct, as the master of every family is to him for what is done within his own walls, whether by children, servants, or lodgers; and, in some cases, as of a tumult, robbery, murder, and the like, the houses on each side are so for what is committed in that one. Not only the gates of each city, but even of each ward, are shut up at nights, and kept by a sufficient guard, who watch over all that passes within their respective boundaries; seize on all disorderly persons, suspicious strangers, and all night-walkers, who can't give a good account of their errand, and bring them on the next morning to the governor, to be either punished or released: but, for this, we shall refer the reader to what hath been said in the first section^d. One thing, which we did not there take notice of, we shall add, concerning their extreme care of keeping every part of the city in the profoundest peace that is possible; viz. that they suffer none of their common prostitutes to live within the walls, but in some outskirts of the suburbs, because they are apt to cause disturbances. Some of the governors will oblige a certain number of them, as ten or more, to live together in one house, and under the care and government of a man, who shall be answerable for their behaviour. Some governors will even deny them the liberty

(X) All that we find mentioned of their old artillery, is only a few short and thick bombards, kept rather for shew than use, at the gates of Nang-king; but antient enough to shew, that they had some notion of cannon, tho' little or nothing of the European way of using them. We read likewise of some sort of patereroes, which they had in their vessels, of the use of which they knew little more than of that of their bombards.

The first they ever saw of the European fabricature were three handsome ones, which the Portuguese of Makau, or Macao, made a present of to the emperor, Anno 1621, together with proper artists to manage them. The first trial of them was made before some Mandarins, who were much surpris'd at the novelty; and much more at one of the pieces recoiling, and killing a Portuguese, and two Chinese, who did not get out of the way time enough. They were still more terrified at the havock which they saw them make among the Tartars, who came in swarms towards the great wall; infomuch that they fled from them in the greatest fright and confusion, and never dared come near them more (16).

of living within their districts, and severely punish as many as are found to do so after such a prohibition; so that they can, at the most, be said to be but barely tolerated^e.

EVERY province, besides its own viceroy, hath several orders of Mandarins, which are subordinate; and might be such an effectual check to him, that it would be impossible for him to be guilty of mal-administration without their knowledge and connivance: but the misfortune is, they find it so much their interest to wink at one another's crimes, that the people are fleeced and oppressed by them all in their turns. The viceroy and his Mandarins join in oppressing the people.

The first class of these Mandarins are the judges of the courts, who determine civil and criminal causes; the next attend the affairs of the treasury and revenue; and the third command over the militia. All these, according to the Chinese constitution, ought to remain in their offices no longer than three years; and are Some wise state maxims.

- b never to be natives of the province where they officiate, lest, if they be of mean descent, they should be despised; and if rich, they should be too well respected, or become too powerful, in it. This is esteemed one of their wise maxims in politics, in which they excel; to which we may add another, equally just and salutary, if strictly kept, viz. never to sell any office, but to confer them on persons merely out of regard to their merit, learning, and probity; and to allow them sufficient salaries, that they may be enabled to discharge their offices, and administer justice without fees or bribery.

THEIR palaces, and places of residence, are likewise provided for them at the charge of the government, to prevent their running into profusion of furniture, &c. notwithstanding all which wise precautions, those governors and Mandarins find means of amassing vast estates in those few years, and to conceal their extortions from the emperor; so that it plainly appears Eluded by them.

- c they all in general combine to conceal them from him, that they may more easily divide the spoil among themselves. Thus we are told the supreme tribunal at Pe-king extorts vast sums from the viceroys of the provinces, and these again from the Mandarins under them, who, by consequence, must fleece their inferior officers; and all of them join hands in oppressing the people, who dare neither resist nor complain, for fear of being ruined. Upon the whole, the Chinese appear to be little better than a nation of signal hypocrites, who boast of the equity and excellence of their laws, and stick at no violation of them; and, under the fairest outside, and pretence of justice and probity, indulge themselves in all manner of extortions, fraud and villainy: for we must not imagine this shameful depravity and corruption to be confined

- d to the placemen, and officers of the government, it being observed to run no less through all the inferior ranks, from the richest merchants and tradesmen to the lowest porter or mechanic, who, though they cannot oppress like the great ones, are commonly given to cheating and cozening all they deal with; insomuch that there is scarce any country in the east, where oppression, corruption, and all manner of fraud, is more universally practised, according to the unanimous report of all who have written of it. Extortion and fraud run thro' the whole nation.

THERE may be added another cause of this general corruption; viz. their constitution not allowing of hereditary nobility, or distinction of quality, but such as arises from their offices, and the dignities bestowed on them by the emperor; so that though a man be arrived at some

- e of the highest of them, yet his children have still their fortunes to make; and if they either want ability, or are given to pleasure, may, and do often, descend to the lowest rank and occupations: the preventing of which, by making some handsome provision for them, or getting them into some civil or military posts, by dint of presents, proves a new source of avarice and corruption; to say nothing of the figure, state, and retinue, which those ministers are obliged to keep up; all which, added to the exactions they labour under from those above them, help to keep them poor, craving, and extorting. Nobility not hereditary. Another cause of avarice and corruption.

EVEN the princes of the blood, who are alone intitled to the dignity of nobles by birth (except the family of the great Confucius, of which we shall speak by-and-by), are subjected to the same necessity of bribing the kolaws and inspectors, in order to get into, or preserve

- f themselves in, such high posts as the emperor is pleased to nominate them to; and, in order to keep up the grandeur of their rank, prove often as voracious as the Mandarins; and as for those who cannot obtain some such advantageous posts, they are often forced to conceal the only badge of their rank (which is a yellow girdle, and is common to all the imperial race), because they cannot appear in an equipage suitable to it: and yet it must be observed here, that, by these, are not meant the descendants of the former Chinese monarchs, whose race is quite extinct (Y), but those of the Tartarian emperors, who are not consequently above five generations

(Y) We shall see, in the historical part, how every dynasty endeavoured to extirpate those of the foregoing. We are told, that, at the time of the conquest, there were still above 3000 families of these princes of the dynasty of Ming, in the city of Kyang-cheu, several of whom were reduced to the lowest poverty: the greatest part of them destroyed by the pirates, who made themselves masters of Pe-king; and those who escaped were forced to lay aside their yellow girdle, change their names, and mix themselves with the people. It was but lately that one of them, who was reduced to be a servant of the missionaries, being discovered to be of the royal blood of Ming, was forced to flee, to avoid a worse fate from the Tartars, who were in search after rations backwards ; but who are, however, multiplied to some thousands in that short time ; a polygamy, as well as poverty, causing them to increase to such a degree, that their pensions and appenage are thereby continually lessened, for they are allowed neither lands nor estates ^f.

Their titles.

As for the family of Kong-fû-tse, or Confucius, above-mentioned, they are still to this day looked upon as the most respectable, or indeed the only, nobility, not only on account of the extraordinary merit of that excellent philosopher, but likewise on account of its great antiquity, it having been continued in a direct succession for above 2000 years, from one of his nephews, who is, on that account, styled Sbing-jin-ti-shi-el, or the nephew of the great sage. There has been always one of the family honoured with the title of Kong, or duke ; and the place of that philosopher's birth hath been always governed by a Mandarin of that family. Upon the whole, if we except the princes of the blood, and the Confucian family, the Chinese nation b may be rightly said to be divided only into three classes ; viz. the Mandarins, the Literati, and the plebeians ; which distinction seems to have been thus settled by the Tartarian emperors since the conquest, as the most effectual to keep their new dominions in greater subjection and dependence.

Another political maxim.

THERE is one more excellent piece of politics among those monarchs, worth taking notice of, and which we shall close this article with ; viz. their obliging the petty kings, their tributaries, the viceroys, Mandarins, and other great officers, to send their children to court, under pretence indeed of giving them a better education, but in reality to remain there, as hostages for their fathers good behaviour and loyalty, and to prevent their forgetting their duty to the emperor. With the same view he obliges those great ministers themselves, as well as the princes c his vassals, to reside at court during a certain time, to attend on the prince by turns ; during which time none of them dares, on any pretence, repair either to their respective governments, or to their own paternal estates, without his particular leave, under the severest penalties ; neither dare any of them dispense with this attendance, except by a special licence, without the the manifest hazard of exposing their families to the severest resentment of those jealous monarchs ^e ; and this we may also look upon as another source of the avarice and corruption of those great ministers ; who are not only obliged to appear themselves, but to maintain their families there, in the greatest splendor that their circumstances can possibly allow ; all which can never be done by their bare salary, if what most authors tell us be true, that the highest of them doth not amount to much above 2000 crowns a year ^h.

The splendor of the imperial court.

Fast retinue.

By what we have just now hinted of the numerous and splendid appearance of these grandees, the reader may easily guess at the magnificence of the imperial court ; and indeed, by all the accounts we have of it, nothing can be imagined more grand and superb, especially when that monarch makes his public appearance, as he commonly doth four times in a month, at which times he is accompanied by all those tributary kings, viceroys, Mandarins, and other officers in waiting, to the number of 4 or 5000. As often as he is called out of his palace by his imperial function of high-priest, and the only person fit to offer sacrifices to Tyen, or to perform any other religious rites, he is always attended by 8000 men, four elephants, a great number of trumpets, several hundreds of horsemen, with banners and other insignia, all dressed and adorned in the most pompous manner ; whilst he himself appears commonly on horseback, the harness covered with gold tissue, and glittering with the richest variety of precious stones. The umbrella that is carried over his head, and covers him and his horse, sparkles so with diamonds, that the eye can hardly bear the lustre of them, especially in a clear sunshine. One hundred large gilt lanterns with flambeaux are carried before it ; and, after him, follow all the tributary kings, princes of the blood, 200 Mandarins and ministers of the first rank, 2000 commanders of his army, 500 youth of quality, attended each by two footmen dressed in fine coronation silk, richly embroidered with gold, silver, &c. d version.

His retinue is still more numerous whenever he goes out of his capital upon any particular expedition, or to visit some places at a distance from it ; at which time his attendance looks more like a little army than a princely escorte. But the grandest of all is, when he goes out f to take the usual diversion of hunting, as he commonly doth in the province of Lyau-tong, without the great wall ⁱ, or in some forests on the frontiers of Tartary ; at which time he is attended with an army of 40,000 horse, stationed at proper distances along the road, 3000 Tartarian archers, and a party of lancers riding before and after him, besides his usual retinue of nobles, viceroys, courtiers, &c.

him (17) ; so that none are now styled princes of the blood, but those who are related to the present imperial family ; and, in favour of these, they have created five honorary titles, the highest of which, that of Kong, answers to our dukes, and the others to our marquises, earls, viscounts, &c. (18).

(17) Du Halde, ubi supra, p. 269.

a It is on these occasions that the Tartarian princes, his vassals or tributaries, to the number of thirty or forty, are obliged to come and pay their homage to him, in the most splendid equipages, and with a retinue suitable to their rank : for, though vassals, or tributary to him, they are still permitted to bear the title of Chams, or emperors, and strive to make the noblest appearance they can, and to outvie one another in the splendor of their train : all which still adds more lustre and magnificence to that of the Chinese monarch, and is an effectual means of keeping those princes more steady in their obedience ; because he commonly obliges them with some marks of his favour on all such occasions, either by bestowing some of his daughters on them, making them some considerable presents, or assisting them with some of his forces, to protect them from the western or Muscovite Tartars. Homage paid to him by his vassals.

b It is not easy to reckon what the imperial revenue amounts to, because a great part of it is paid in goods as well as in specie. Niewhoff computed it at about thirty-seven millions sterling per annum^k ; and Le Compte only at twenty-one or twenty-two millions^l ; others, as Magailan, Martini, and Navaretta, still differ from them, and from each other ; which shews there must be either some considerable fluctuation in it, or, which is more likely, too great a difficulty to come at an exact calculation of it. The last author that wrote upon it makes the whole to amount to about 200,000,000 of taels^m, each tael weighing an ounce of silver, worth 100 French sols, or somewhat above five of our shillings, which will be about equivalent to fifty millions sterling. That of grain, such as rice, wheat, and millet, is computed, communibus annis, at 40,155,490 sacks, each sack weighing 120 pounds ; the salt at c 1,315,937 loaves, each loaf weighing 50 pounds ; beans for his horses, 210,470 sacks ; trusses of hay and straw, 22,598,597 ; wrought silks and stuffs, 191,530 pounds weight, each pound of 20 ounces ; unwrought silk, 409,896 pounds ; callico, 367,480 pieces ; linen cloth, 560,280, besides vast quantities of velvet, satin, damask, and other silks ; china-ware, varnish, oil, oxen, sheep, hogs, deer, wild and tame fowl, fish, pot-herbs, meal, biscuits, butter, vinegar, fruits, spices, and other provisions, and several sorts of wines, &c. ; all which are annually brought into the palace by the imperial barks, amounting to 9999, or, according to others, 10,000 (Z), and employed by the emperor in gathering and bringing his revenue from every province to his capitalⁿ. All these provisions are levied on the subjects, as particular duties on their respective lands : for it appears from all our accounts of that empire, that lands are there enjoyed in property, and not at the prince's disposal, as in other parts of India ; and hence it comes that the tenants are here commonly very poor, because they farm the lands from the owners at the rate of half the crop, out of which the landlord pays the taxes ; and the tenant, out of his, pays the tillage and manure^o. Vast revenue. In goods. Tribute, how raised.

Another part of the revenue arises from the tribute laid on every male in the empire that is above 20, and under 60, years of age ; and is said to amount to an immense sum, though we are not told how great (A). The third is levied out of the mines and manufactures of the country : besides all which, the emperor hath power to raise new taxes on the people whenever the exigencies of state require it ; but, those already settled being commonly more than sufficient to answer all his expences, he is so far from making use of that power, that that there scarcely passes a year in which he doth not ease some one or more provinces of a great part of their tribute, if they happen to labour under any famine, or other public calamity^p.

As polygamy is allowed both in Tartary and China, the emperor hath commonly a good number of wives, though but one who is properly called empress, or select consort, who alone

(Z) Most authors tell us, that the former is the true number of those barges, which the Chinese prefer to the latter, as carrying a more pompous sound : for which reason they will not add one more to it (19). Whether the Chinese were ever guilty of so low a piece of pride, or whether it was not rather done out of a superstitious regard to the number 9 four times repeated, we will not affirm. Du Halde makes use of the round number 10,000 ; but whether to conceal their weakness in that point, or because the Tartars have since added another barge, out of contempt to the Chinese superstition or folly, we are not told.

(A) There have been reckoned formerly, we are told (20), above 58,000,000 of persons that paid this tribute ; and, at the poll taken in the emperor Kang-hi's reign, there were found 11,052,872 families, and 59,788,364 men able to bear arms, exclusive of the princes, officers civil and military, discharged soldiers, Literati, licentiates, doctors, Bonzas, and all males under 20, and above 60 ; all which must amount to an immense number, seeing the very Bonzas are computed at above 1,000,000, and the licentiates, or literary bachelors, at 90,000.

The whole land, and the number of families, being duly surveyed, it is easy to compute what each province, city, and district, is to pay yearly to the tax-gatherers ; but these, it seems, are not permitted to seize the goods of those who are slow in their payments, or even refuse it, which would ruin their families : the only course they take, is either bastonading or imprisonment, or quartering upon them some of the old men of each city, which are maintained by the emperor's charity, till they have consumed what is equivalent to their arrears (21).

is allowed to sit at table with him. Among those of the next order are reckoned nine of a second, and thirty of the third rank, and all of them styled wives. Next to them are those styled queens, but are in reality rather concubines; and of these he takes as great a number as he pleases, and keeps them in different apartments from the former, except he should take a particular fancy to any one of them, and bring her into the inward court (B). But, in general, he shews the most respect and favour to those who bring him most children, and especially to the mother of the first son; though they are all inferior to the imperial consort, and obliged to wait on her whilst she sits at table with him. However, with respect to their children, those of the lower rank stand as good a chance to succeed in the empire as those of the first, some of them having been raised to that dignity by the bare will and nomination of the emperor; for though he commonly bestows some high title on those women he takes to his bed, especially when they are the daughters or sisters of some Tartarian princes, yet doth it not appear that he ever endows her by any contract, or other engagement, as shall intitle her issue by him to the succession; no, not even the empress's consort, though she be at the head of all the rest (C); for that right of naming a successor he wholly reserves to himself.

the throne.*

As soon, therefore, as he hath once named one to it, whether elder or younger, all the rest readily submit; and live in palaces assigned to them, either in the capital, or some other cities, but without any government, and never remove from them without the emperor's leave. Their appenage is duly paid to them by the treasurer of the province where they reside, and live as private gentlemen; nor dare they ever complain of an injury being done to their birthright, though the person nominated to the succession, or upon the throne, be ever so much younger, which, in either case, would be interpreted as no less a crime than treason.

scribed.*

HAVING mentioned the various apartments, or rather palaces, of the imperial wives and concubines, it may be expected that we should subjoin a particular description of them here: but, as that would unavoidably carry us beyond our bounds, we shall content ourselves with referring our readers to what we have said on this head in the last section, when we were describing the metropolis of Pe-king^a; and only mention here that stately part of it called the hall of audience, where foreign ambassadors are admitted to the imperial presence, in order to give them a clear idea of that august ceremony.

THIS noble fabric stands in one of the inner courts of the palace, and in the center of a square solid basis, of an extraordinary bigness, the top of which is surrounded by a spacious balustrade, and over it another building somewhat less, and over that three more, all decreasing in size as they do in height, and all of them of white marble. On the uppermost of these is a large room of state, supported by four rows of pillars of a considerable height, and beautifully gilt and varnished, where the imperial throne is placed, and the roof covered with shining yellow tiles. Those vast bases, with their balustrades, which are disposed in form of an amphitheatre, make a magnificent appearance; and, with their varnish and gilding, quite dazzle the eye. Here the emperor, attended by a great number of his grandees, and prime ministers, in their robes, by the princes of the blood, tributary kings, &c. all prostrate on their faces before the throne, and each of them at a proper distance from it, according to their rank, gives audience to the ambassadors, who are conducted to the throne by some of the viceroys in waiting. (B) Martini relates a singular story of one of this last sort of ladies, named Pan, who, for her wit, beauty, and singular prudence, was become such a great favourite of the emperor Ching-hi, or Kang-hi, that he could no longer brook that she should lodge in outward and inferior palaces, allotted to those of her rank, but resolved to bring her into one of those more splendid ones of the inward court; but which she refused with a modesty peculiar to her, and in words to this effect: "I have learned from some of our ancient paintings, for I am ignorant of letters, that good emperors admitted none near their persons but the wisest and most faithful ministers; and that bad ones, on the contrary, delighted to have such women about them as debauched them into the greatest irregularities and crimes. You are now desirous to prefer me to your own imperial consort: but take care, lest, by such a step, you do not begin to tread in those of wicked monarchs. As for me, who have a sincere love and esteem for you, who am always proud of being commended by you, and the height of all whose wishes is, to see you excel daily more and more in all kinds of princely virtues, I cannot consent we should increase the number, you of bad emperors, and I of wicked women. You have a worthy empress at the head of your other wives, and it is her whom you ought to keep near your person, and not such a one as I, who am only a servant to you both." This signal instance of female modesty, our author adds, was highly applauded by the emperor; and much more so by the empress, who failed not to send her her thanks, as soon as she was apprised of it (21).

(C) It is also upon the same politic account that none of those wives, or other ladies, are allowed any share in their government and councils, though there have been instances of some of them being much fitter for it than those that sat at the helm; but this is a maxim which runs through most eastern countries, that that sex is excluded by nature from all government, either civil or even domestic; and for that reason it is that they call Europe the kingdom of ladies, in contempt; where, they have been told, they were suffered to succeed to the crown, and to be invested with the sovereign power (22).

a throne is raised about three or four feet from the ground, in the fashion of an altar, and covered with fables, on which the emperor sits cross-legged, after the manner of the Tartars. It is The throne described. placed against the farther wall, facing the eastern entrance; and opens with two folding-doors, curiously carved and painted. It is about three fathoms high, and as many in breadth; and before it are two ascents, with six steps each, adorned with rails beautifully wrought and gilt. The platform on which it was raised is likewise encompassed with a balustrade of curious workmanship, and either of beaten gold, or of silver deeply gilt.

THE hall itself is about thirty fathoms long, and ten broad; the sides and top curiously panelled, carved and varnished; and the floor covered with carpets representing landscapes and histories, with variety of figures and ornaments. As to what relates to the ceremony of receiving, and giving audience to, foreign ambassadors, the reader may see the most material part of it in the next note (D), as we have chiefly taken it from the relation which his excellency Mr. Izbrandts Ides, formerly ambassador to the emperor Shang-tu from the Czar of Muscovy, hath given us of his own*. That of Father Le Compte was indeed somewhat different from it; which may be supposed to have been more suitable to the character in which he appeared, or perhaps, as likely, to the mourning which the emperor and court were then in for the death of his mother, who therefore chose to be seen in that state, rather than in the usual splendor of a Chinese monarch†. However, either of those audiences sufficiently shews the politeness and magnificence of that court, as well as the vast respect it pays to its princes.

WE have already taken notice, that the Chinese laws had their original from the canonical books of the first and second rank, of which books we have given an account in a former part of this work‡. But, as their monarchs are the sole interpreters of them, so that no sentence can be valid, whether in civil or criminal cases, how conformable soever to those laws, till it hath been ratified and confirmed by them; and as all the edicts and declarations have the force of laws, and admit of no dispute or demur, under the severest penalties, so one may say that the sole legislative power is lodged in their breast, and wholly depends upon their will.

* Chap. 14, & seq.

‡ See before, Introd. p. 449, & seq.

(D) He was, he says, conducted to the palace by three Mandarins, in their robes of state, richly embroidered with gold on the breast and back, some with figures of dragons, others with lions, and a third sort with cranes and tygers. These brought him fifty horses for him and his retinue; and, being alighted at the gate of the outward court, he passed through five others, and came to the hall of audience. Here he found his majesty seated upon his throne, attended by a vast number of Mandarins, and delivered his credentials to him; and, after a short speech, was reconducted to his house with the same ceremony and attendance. The emperor was dressed in a dark-coloured damask waistcoat, a coat of deep-blue sattin, lined with ermines; he had a string of coral about his neck, and on his head a cap faced with sable, with a red silk tuff or knot, and some peacock-feathers hanging down behind, and boots or buskins of black velvet on his legs; but had neither gold nor jewels about him.

He was afterwards invited to an entertainment at court, to which he was conducted by the same attendance as before; and, after having crossed six courts, was introduced into the palace, where, soon after his entrance, the emperor seated himself on a high throne, attended by some persons who played very finely on the small flute, and a life-guard of twelve men with halberds gilt, and without any point, but adorned with leopards and tygers tails. As soon as the emperor was seated, the music ceased, and the halberdiers sat down cross-legged on each side of the throne. The viceroy, the emperor's uncle, and two other grandees, stood on each side of his majesty; and the ambassador was at first placed about eight yards distance from him, but was presently after ordered to come nearer to him. The viceroy, who received his majesty's command on his knees, conducted him, by the hand, four yards nearer to the throne, whilst his retinue were placed about ten or twelve yards behind him. Here the emperor sent again the viceroy to inquire after the czar's health; and returned his excellency's answer to him in the same kneeling posture.

The covering of the emperor's table, which was of yellow damask, being taken off, the ambassador, who had one spread for himself, was desired to fall to, as were also about 200 Mandarins more, who were seated two and two at their tables also. They all sat cross-legged upon carpets, and the ambassador was forced to submit to that uneasy posture. The entertainment consisted of cold meats and fruits: and, among the former, the emperor sent his excellency a cold goose, a pig, and a loin of mutton, all roasted. Three Jesuits being afterwards sent for to serve as interpreters, and having paid their respects to the throne on their knees, one of them was ordered to ask his excellency several questions concerning his journey, the length and manner of it; and, having communicated his answer to the emperor, the viceroy was again bid to bring him nearer to his throne; and, having led him five or six steps higher, set him at the table opposite to the imperial one, where, after many other questions, a golden cup filled with kumis (a Tartarian liquor, said to be distilled from mares milk) was handed to him by the viceroy; and, after his having drank some of it, his retinue, being ordered to advance five or six yards nearer, were treated likewise with it. Presently after that ceremony, the viceroy conducted him to his former place; where, after having sat about a quarter of an hour, the emperor arose; and, saluting him, retired to his own apartment; and then the Mandarins conducted his excellency to see a Chinese play of the heroic kind, and interlarded with a farce of two acts.

In his audience of leave, he observed a new kind of ceremony, which was used upon the emperor's being seated on his throne; viz. a herald calling aloud to the grandees then present to stand up, and bow themselves to the earth; which they did three times, the drums beating, musick playing, and bells ringing all the while. His excellency was afterwards brought up, and placed within nine or ten yards of the throne, between two Tartarian lords, and there made his compliments to the emperor; after which, he was reconducted to his own house with the usual ceremony, and in one of the emperor's chariots, drawn by an elephant (23).

(23) Izbrandts Ides Ambassy. c. 4, & seq.

Some of their excellent declarations.

Whether their power was antiently so extensive, we dare not say; the contrary seems rather a more probable, both from their history, and from the imperial collections of edicts of the several dynasties, since compiled by order of the emperor Kang-hi, with his judicious remarks at the end of almost every one, and written with the red pencil, that is, with his own hand, and translated into Latin by Father Hervieu, one of the missionaries in China. From both these it appears, that several of those antient emperors have repealed and annulled some of their old established laws; and substituted others in their stead, which they thought more beneficial to the commonwealth, though it must be also owned, that they seem rather, from the tenor of their declarations, to have recommended the doing of it to their supreme courts and councils, than to have done it by their sole authority: such, for instance, were some of the declarations of the emperor Ven-ti, in one of which, viz. against prosecuting those that criticised upon the then form of government, after having given his reasons against the law that condemned them to be prosecuted, he concludes in these words: No; I can never suffer the continuation of such a law, and therefore let it be repealed; and in another, which subjected the parents, children, and relations of a criminal, to the same punishment, which he calls a cruel and unjust one, he concludes with saying, such that law seems to me, of which I cannot see the good tendency: let it be maturely deliberated, whether it be not necessary to have it repealed. We shall give our readers the substance of two or three other such declarations in the margin (E), that they may see

(E) That against involving the innocent relations in the punishment of a criminal, runs in words to this effect: "Laws, being the rules of government, ought to be faultless; and should not only punish the guilty, but protect the innocent: yet I find, among our laws, one still in force, by which, when a man is criminal, his father, mother, wife, and children, are involved in his punishment, and the least punishment they have to dread is slavery. This law I can by no means approve of: it is a sure maxim, that laws, when perfectly just, are the surest means of keeping the people in their duty. When punishment falls only on the head of the guilty, all the world commends the judgment. The first duty of a magistrate is, to guide the people like a good shepherd, and to prevent their going astray. If our magistrates have not succeeded in this, and have still laws to judge by, which are not consistent with the strictest equity, those laws, though well designed at first, turn to the prejudice of the people, and favour of cruelty." Such is the law I have mentioned; and therefore the emperor Kang-hi's remark upon it is as follows:

These wise princes, the antient [Chinese] emperors, often descended from the majesty of their throne, to bewail and weep over the guilty. How unreasonable is it to include, in the punishment of a malefactor, his father, his mother, his wife, and children? Ven-ti was for the abolishing of that law, and therefore we may conclude him to have been a good prince.

Another declaration of the same emperor Ven-ti, for the promoting of agriculture, is to the following purport: "They who have the government of the people in their hands, ought to inspire them with all possible concern for whatever contributes to the good of the state: such, without doubt, is agriculture.

"For this reason I have been recommending it to them these ten years; yet I do not observe that they have sufficiently cultivated their new grounds, or caused a greater plenty of grain: on the contrary, I see hunger and want painted on the face of the poor. Surely either the magistrates, and subordinate officers, have not had a due regard to my ordinances on this head, or they are unfit for the rank they possess. Alas! if the magistrates, who are immediate witnesses of the people's misery, are regardless of it, what effectual remedy can I apply for their relief: this must be thought of. In the mean time I remit half of my revenue in grain for the current year."

The emperor Kang-hi's reflexion upon it is no less remarkably beautiful; and runs to this effect: Nothing can be more just than this declaration, or more admirably expressed; even to this day it is affecting, and what must it have been when it was first published?

The reader may see, by these two instances, in how amiable a manner they endeavoured to enforce the observance of their salutary edicts, and the repealing of such old laws as tended to the detriment, rather than the peace and safety, of their subjects; and in how different a style they recommended the one, and condemned the other, from what we usually observe, not only in most of the other eastern monarchs, but even among those in our western kingdoms, where their power is neither so extensive, nor their wealth or strength so great, to support them in their tyrannic government. The reader may see a much greater number of them in the above mentioned collection, all running in the same gentle and fatherly strain. We shall only single out one more, which, for its excellence in this way, may be termed an original in its kind. It is from the same admirable prince; and the occasion of it, the many constant prayers and supplications offered by his ministers on his behalf, whilst they neglected their duty towards his subjects. It is to this purport.

"I am now arrived at the 14th year of my reign; and the longer it continues, the more I am sensible of, and confounded at, my want of abilities: and though I have not hitherto omitted the yearly discharge of those ceremonies prescribed to Shang-ti, and to my ancestors; yet I am sensible, that, in those ceremonies, none of those antient and wise princes had any view to their own private interest, or offered up their petitions for what is commonly termed happiness. On the contrary, they set all considerations of blood or family-interest aside, to promote an able worthy man, though no way related to them, and preferred the wise counsel of another to their own natural inclinations. Nothing can be more commendable or wise than such a disinterestedness in great princes.

"At present I am given to understand, that many officers strive to outdo one another in their prayers for the good fortune, of whom? not of my people, but of my person. This is what cannot by any means be agreeable to me. Could I approve that officers unmindful of their duty, and unattentive to the welfare of my people, should be wholly taken up with promoting that of a prince who has so little merit as I have, I should think it no inconsiderable addition to my other failings. I therefore ordain, that my officers, instead of their pompous petitions for me, do give all possible application to a conscientious discharge of their duty."

This declaration, like most others, is subscribed, and much approved, by the wise emperor Kang-hi; and with this judicious observation, that it is a man's virtue, and not the offerings and prayers of other people, that draws down blessings from Heaven upon him: to which our author adds an observation of one of the famed Literati, named Tsing-ty, who flourished under the dynasty of Song: That the good emperor Ven-ti ascribed all the defects that happened in the state

- a see not only how much some of those excellent monarchs had the peace and welfare of their subjects at heart, but also how tender they were of wounding the antient constitution of the empire by too despotic a use of their power and authority; for one may plainly see, that it was chiefly owing to this strict observance of the fundamentals of their government, that the Chinese have been able to preserve it in such wealth and splendor during so long a series of ages; and still continue to do, even under a foreign yoke. It is no less visible likewise, that the present peace, wealth, and grandeur, which both they and the Tartars enjoy under this new sett of emperors, is no less owing to the tender regard which these have, as far as possible, shewn to the antient Chinese constitution: and one may plainly judge how much the late emperor Kang-li admired it, as well from the strict observance he paid to it, as from the judicious reflections he made on style. Condescending
- b the declarations above-mentioned. We may add, that he could not have fallen upon a more effectual means to endear the Chinese nation to him, and make his yoke sit easy upon them, than by causing those declarations of the best antient Chinese kings to be collected and published, with his sagacious animadversions and encomiums upon them; by which he seemed to give them a moral security, that he designed to make them the model of his own conduct and government". Accordingly we find, that he admitted none in his collection, but those which either proposed the repealing of such old laws as were manifestly hurtful to the subjects, or the enacting such new ones as were best calculated to promote their peace and welfare; as the reader may see by the heads of the most remarkable of them, which he will find in the next note (F).

to his own self; but with regard to happiness, he disdained it all, except where his subjects had their common share in it; in which he was a worthy imitator and successor of our antient monarchs (24).

(F) Besides the three singular ones above mentioned, the collection mentions these that follow:

4. A declaration of the same emperor Yen-ti, on occasion of an eclipse of the sun, in the days of Han; wherein he acknowledges that phenomenon to be a warning from Tien (heaven), both to him and his subjects, of some future calamity; and, as bad princes often draw them upon the people, he desires his ministers and subjects to examine with the utmost strictness into his conduct, and to acquaint him with what they find amiss in it, that he may, by his reformation, and good example, induce them to do the like, and thereby avert the threatening omen. One of the glosses upon it adds, that this is the first time that a Chinese emperor had, upon such an occasion, desired to be told of his faults; but that, since the days of Yen-ti, many of those monarchs had followed his example.

5. A declaration of the same, for exchanging some severe mutilations, inflicted on offenders, into some milder punishments. In this the good emperor bewails himself, that under the reign of Sbur, a prince of extraordinary wisdom, the executing delinquents in effigie was deemed sufficient to keep people within their duty; whereat, in his days, the most severe mutilations, such as cutting off the nose, hand, foot, branding in the forehead, could not deter men from the blackest crimes. However, he ordains the exchanging of these for such other punishments, which, though severe according to the nature of the fact, shall not fix an indelible brand, but rather prove a means of their amendment, and being restored to the common privileges of a subject.

6. Another of the same, charging all his ministers, from the highest to the lowest, to inquire after men of the most approved virtue, merit, learning, &c. and to present them to him; and, in the mean time, that those, who were in the highest posts, should assist in examining the four following essential points; viz. 1. His daily and personal faults. 2. The defects of the present administration. 3. The injustice of the magistrates. 4. The necessities of the people.

7. Another of the same, giving his reasons for putting an end to a bloody and expensive war, and making peace with Tan-yu a Tartarian prince, on the north of China, and which he concludes with these remarkable words: In this year, I can say I have acquitted myself of the first duty incumbent on a prince; which is, to establish peace in his family.

8. Another of the same, in which he exhorts his subjects to give him their advice in his administration, to send him people of virtue and experience, to assist him with their counsels, and to apply and speak to him with freedom. This declaration procured him a memorial from one of his head ministers, so much to his liking, that he issued out a

9th, to the same purpose with the former, but still more earnest and pressing, to the rest of his officers, to come and acquaint him with every defect in the administration, and to advise him how to remove them in the most effectual manner.

10. A declaration of the emperor Sun-ti, ordering persons remarkable for their filial piety to be presented to him, out of every government in his empire, in order to their being promoted by him according to their merit.

11. Another of the same, which grants an exemption from all attendance on public service to those who had lost their father or mother, grandfather or grandmother, till they had performed all the usual duties of mourning to such parents. What these duties are, will be seen in the sequel.

12. Another of the same, by which he dispensed, for the future, with a son's accusing his parents, or a wife her husband; but made it capital for a father or a husband to conceal certain crimes of his son, or of his wife.

13. A declaration of the emperor Ching ti to the great ministers of his empire, recommending to them the care of suppressing all unnecessary expences of equipages, clothes, entertainments, weddings, houses, furniture, gardens, ponds, &c. and forbidding all people to go beyond their rank in any of these.

14. A declaration of the emperor Ngay-ti, for the reformation of music, and suppressing that kind of it which inspired people with wantonness and effeminacy, and discharging his own band of musicians, by way of example to his subjects, and by which, the gloss observes, he saved the yearly salary of 440 persons. We shall go no farther with them; but only observe, that these excellent declarations from the throne commonly produced some good memorials, or discourses, on the subject they treated of; which were handled with such politeness, and strength of reasoning, that they seldom failed of the desired effect: they being chiefly written by some of the wisest and most experienced ministers of those monarchs, and by those confirmed, and deposited in their archives, for the benefit of those that were to come after (25).

Their constitution polished by degrees.

WE may farther observe under this head, from the tenor of several of those imperial declarations, that though the Chinese constitution be cried up as such an excellent model of government, yet it had originally, or at least antiently, several severe laws, that favoured rather of tyranny, than of a well-calculated polity between the prince and his subjects. Of this nature was that which condemned all the relations of a criminal to the same punishment with him; and another which hurried the condemned persons to execution, without allowing them a sufficient respite for farther inquiry; so that great numbers of guiltless persons had been unjustly put to death, whose innocence had manifestly appeared afterwards, when it was too late. The reader may see many others of the same nature in the list below, as likewise in that of those new ones since enacted, by which it plainly appear, that the Chinese government did not arrive to that mildness and excellency, but by degrees, and that it was chiefly owing to those wise and good princes, who made it their chief study to reform and improve it by their wholesome edicts, and laudable example.

Some cruelties still practised.

NEITHER can it be said that this reformation hath been so effectually and universally completed, as to answer the great character which some have given us of this government; witness the corruption and depravity which still reign amongst them; and the great power, or rather tyranny, which the viceroys, or governors, still exert against the subjects, in the fines and corporal punishments they inflict upon them: for though, as we hinted above, no criminal can be put to death, according to their laws, till the emperor hath confirmed the sentence, yet whether the reducing them to beggary by fines and confiscation, torture and imprisonments, or bastonading them till they expire under the blows, or become poor miserable cripples by it, as is commonly, and impudently, done by those merciless Mandarins, be not much more cruel than the worst death the law condemns any criminal to, and do not argue a defect in their constitution, more fit to be reformed than any of those mentioned in these declarations, will hardly admit of a question.

Various punishments; for treason;

THEIR punishments are either capital, as in cases of rebellion, murder, &c. corporal, as in lesser crimes, or pecuniary. Rebellion and treason, being esteemed the greatest of all crimes, are punished with the greatest rigour, viz. by cutting the criminal into 10,000 pieces, in the following manner: The executioner, having first tied him to a stake, tears the skin off his forehead and head, and lets it hang over his eyes, to prevent, as some tell us, his seeing how dreadfully the rest of his body is mangled; he next slashes the other parts with a kind of cutlance, till he hath cut almost all his flesh in pieces; and then abandons him to the cruelty of the gazing populace, who commonly dispatch him in the same butcherly manner. This punishment, however, is seldom executed to the last rigour, unless it be under some cruel princes; for, according to the law, it consists only in cutting the body of the criminal into several pieces, ripping up his belly, and taking out his entrails, and throwing the carcase into a river, or ditch, as is commonly done to great malefactors * (G).

THE next crime to rebellion, or treason, against the emperor, is that against the parents, which is punished with the same, if not greater, severity. In this case, if a father charges his son with it before a magistrate, no farther proof is required, and the criminal is immediately condemned and executed, though it be but for obstinate disobedience, or disrespect; but if it amounts to a higher guilt, such as mockery, insult, or lifting up a hand against them, especially striking them, the whole country is alarmed, and the appointing of his punishment reserved for the emperor himself. In this last case, the magistrates of the place are turned out with disgrace, and the whole neighbourhood is threatened with some severe punishment, for having given birth to a monster, and suffered it to grow by degrees to that pitch of wickedness, without informing their governors of it. The criminal is condemned to be cut, like a traitor or rebel, into 10,000 pieces, and afterwards burnt; his lands, house or houses, and the houses next to his, to be destroyed, and to remain so, as a monument against so detestable a crime (H).

Their great respect to them.

MURDER

(G) This punishment, as was hinted in the last note but one, used to be inflicted on all the near relations of the criminal, till the emperor Yen-ti caused that cruel law to be repealed: and it may, in the same manner, have been mitigated, with respect to the execution of the criminal, by that or some other monarch, though originally it was performed according to the letter, and as the name of the punishment implies; so that one may truly say of some of the antient laws of China, what the Greeks said of those of Draco the Athenian lawgiver, that they were written in blood (26), till they were afterwards mitigated by princes of a milder disposition.

(H) There is no duty which the Chinese laws so much require, or lay so great a stress on, as obedience to parents, whose authority reaches, in some cases, even beyond their funeral, as we shall shew in the sequel. Even the emperors are obliged by them to shew as deep a respect to them as the meanest of their subjects; and we read of one of them, who, having banished his own mother for entertaining a criminal conversation with one of his courtiers, was so importuned by his ministers and subjects with petitions for her recall, and with daily remonstrances against his breach of filial duty, in banishing her, that he was forced at length to comply,

- a MURDER is likewise punished with death, according to the nature of it. If a man kills his adversary in a duel, he is strangled, which is there reckoned the lesser punishment; but if by assassination, or with any aggravating circumstances, he is beheaded, which is reckoned the more dishonourable, because his head, the principal part of a man, is severed from the body, so that he doth not go out of the world with the same intire body with which he came into it: in either case, persons above the common rank are always carried to the place of execution either in a sedan, or a covered cart. The emperor, when he confirms any of these sentences of death, commonly subscribes the dead warrant according to the nature of the crime; as, when it is of an atrocious kind, with these words, As soon as this order is received by you, let him be executed without any delay: but when the crime is of a common nature, and hath nothing to aggravate it, he writes this sentence under it, Let the criminal be kept in prison till autumn, and then be executed; for there is a fixed day in that season, on which all criminals of this nature are to be put to death through the empire*.

- ADULTERY is so far from being esteemed a capital crime by the Chinese, that some fond parents, out of a tender regard for their daughters weakness, will contract with their future husbands, in consideration of some valuable present, to allow them the liberty of indulging themselves now-and-then with a gallant, without being called to an account for it. But, where no such precaution hath been taken before marriage, the husband hath power to inflict some corporal punishment on a wife whenever she transgresses, or else to divorce her from him; and, if the adulterer hath committed any violence in the fact, he may be sued and punished for it, either by a pecuniary or corporal punishment, according to the sentence of the Mandarin or judge before whom he is brought. However, the women here value themselves so much, at least outwardly, for their modesty and conjugal fidelity, and are besides kept so closely shut up by their husbands, and under so great a restraint, that cases of this nature very seldom happen.

- NEITHER is theft capitally punished, unless it be aggravated by some other circumstances. Those that are guilty of it, are either condemned to the bastinado, that is, to receive such a number of blows of a cudgel on their back or buttocks, lying with their faces downwards on the ground, as the magistrate, who presides, shall appoint. After which, if the offender be able, he is to kneel down before him, and thank him for his kind correction; though one blow would be sufficient to lame a man, if the executioner was not bribed, as we are told they frequently are. Even the Mandarins are liable to this punishment, which shews that it is not reckoned a very scandalous one: however, we are told, that there are some sort of sturdy fellows, who, for a sum of money, will let themselves out to receive it in the room of the offender†; which, if true, discovers either the weakness or corruption of the magistrate.

- WHEN the theft is of a higher nature, the offender is condemned to the Kan-ghe, or wooden ruff, which is a kind of portable pillory, consisting of two pieces of wood, hollowed in the middle, so as to fit the neck of the offender, and of such a breadth, that the wearer can neither see his own feet, nor put his hand to his mouth, so that he must be beholden to some other person for his food. It is made heavier or lighter, according to the nature of the crime, or the favour of the Mandarin: the lightest are about 40 or 50, and some of them even 200, pounds weight; and so troublesome and grievous to the person, that many of them, through pain, hunger, want of sleep, &c. die under it (I). The time of wearing it is though not till he had tried to deter them from applying to him in her behalf, not only by some severe edicts, but by putting to death several of those zealous intercessors: insomuch that his grantees entered into a combination not to let one day pass, without one of them preferring a petition to him in their turn, though sure to be cut off for it on the spot, till they had carried their point. Accordingly two of them came on different days, and were immediately put to death; and on the next came a third, who brought his horse and coffin with him, and left it at the gate of the palace; and, finding the emperor still more incensed at what he called his insolence, spoke to him to this effect: What shall we lose by our death, but the sight of a prince upon whom we cannot look but with horror and amazement? Since you will not hear us, we will go and seek your, and the empress your mother's, ancestors; they will hear our complaints: and you will probably, in the dark silence of the night, hear our and their ghosts reproach you for your injustice. This noble speech drew upon him the most cruel death that monarch could devise; which was, however, so far from deterring, that it spurred a number of other Mandarins to follow his example, and to come daily to die martyrs to the cause; till the emperor, wearied with sacrificing so many worthy lives, and fearing it might occasion some revolt, was at length obliged to recall her; so tenacious is the Chinese nation of their ancient laws with respect to this filial duty (27), that they would not suffer a monarch to shew a just resentment against a mother who had so shamefully sullied the honour of his family.

(I) We are told, however, that they find means to render this wooden ruff more supportable, some by procuring friends to walk before, behind, and on each side, and lending their shoulder to help to bear it. Some rest it on a table, or a bench, or upon four sticks of a proper length, to heave it from their shoulders; others get a chair, made with four pillars, to support it; and others lie on their bellies, and stare about on the spectators, as through the hole of a pillory: never-is likewise appointed by the Mandarin, and written, together with the nature of the crime, on a two labels, one of which is pasted before, and the other behind, the wooden collar, which is commonly between four and six inches thick. The place where the offender is condemned to wear it, is commonly at the gate of some temple, some public square, or such parts of the city as are most frequented. When the time is expired, he is brought back to the Mandarin; and, after a suitable reprimand and admonition, and a sound drubbing, which commonly begins and ends every such punishment, he is released from his burden, and set at liberty. Even women are sometimes, tho' not so frequently as men, liable to that punishment; particularly we read of a Bonzess, who was condemned to it by a Mandarin for incontinency (K), and to be expelled her convent.

the cheek.
Banishment.

THERE are certain enormities, for which the offenders are burnt on the forehead, or on the two cheeks, with a Chinese character, signifying the crime: for others, they condemn to banishment, which is often perpetual, if the place be any part of Tartary; and these are commonly condemned to receive a certain number of blows of the bastinado, according to the nature of their crime, before they set out. In some cases, they condemn the offender to tow or row in the imperial barks for a certain space, which seldom exceeds three years. Some other punishments they have for lesser offences, such as carrying a weight on their heads from six to ten or more pounds, according to the direction of the Mandarin who presides at the tribunal.

The torture;

THEY use two sorts of torture in China, to extort confession; the ordinary one, which is however very acute and painful, is a kind of engine, which they clap the hands or feet, or both, of the unhappy person in, which distorts the bones to such a degree, that that on the feet squeezes the ankle-bone quite flat: however, we are told, that they have some remedies to diminish, or even stupely, the exquisiteness of the pain; and others to restore their limbs in a few days, after having been so terribly distorted. The extraordinary torture is seldom used, except in cases of treason and rebellion, and in order to make the person confess his accomplices, after the fact hath been proved. This last is done by cutting slight gashes on the body, and stripping off the skin in narrow slips or fillets². These are the punishments most in vogue: some there have been, indeed, of a much more cruel nature, formerly inflicted by some of their tyrannic monarchs, one in particular not unlike in its effects, as well as barbarity, to that of Phalaris's bull (L); but those princes were not only detested during their lives, but their memory hath been ever odious to this day.

Prisons better kept than in Europe.

ONE thing must be said in praise of the Chinese, with respect to the prisons in which they confine their offenders; viz. that they are much more capacious, airy, and sweet, than the common goals in Europe, especially in England. They are generally large spacious courts, on whose four sides are the apartments of the criminals, raised upon wooden columns in the form of a gallery; and on the four corners are secured the more notorious rogues, in strong cells and fetters; and these are never let out in the day-time, as the others are, who are allowed the freedom of the court, and of conversing with each other. The women are confined in a separate court, where no man is admitted to come to them, or even to speak to them but through a grate, or the turning-box, by which their victuals, and other necessaries, d

theless, when they are of that monstrous weight as to exceed 100 pounds, and of a breadth and thickness proportionable, no way nor posture can make them supportable; and yet, if the person is in ever so great a danger of dying under it, none of the officers about him dare take it off, to give him ease, except the Mandarin, who ordered it to be put on, be well bribed, and order it off; and, if he dies under it, there can be no complaint made against him for his too severe sentence (28).

(K) These Bonzesses are a kind of nuns, who dedicate themselves to the worship and service of some of those temples or idols we have formerly described, and are obliged to abstain from all converse with men; and, on that account, are incloistered in large monasteries, like those of the Romish and Greek churches. The offender we mentioned above was one of them, but had been unfortunately got with child; upon which, being brought before the tribunal, the presiding Mandarin condemned her to wear the wooden collar, on which was pasted, as usual, a label, specifying her crime, with this addition, that if any man would marry her, she should be released from it, and the man receive from the Mandarin an ounce and half of silver, to defray the expences of the ceremony; that is, one third part to pay the musicians, and the rest to procure a wedding-feast. She soon found a man who went and demanded her, on those conditions, of the Mandarin; who paid him the money accordingly, and delivered her up to him, free from her shameful and more insupportable yoke (29).

(L) The Chinese records mention, among other such detested tyrants, the emperor Cheow, one of whose concubines, on whom he passionately doted, was the inventress of this new kind of punishment called Pau-lo. It was a brass tower, or column, twenty cubits high, and eight in diameter, and hollow in the middle, with three openings for putting in of fuel. To this they fastened the unhappy objects, making them embrace the pillar with their arms and legs. A great fire was afterwards kindled within it, which roasted, and soon after reduced them to ashes, in the presence of this monster of cruelty, who it seems took an unnatural delight in such dreadful spectacles (30).

a are conveyed to them. Both prisons are very well guarded, and kept at nights in profound silence. The centinels are relieved every hour; the rest of the guard are ordered to patrol Well guarded. all the night; so that all attempts of a rescue or escape prove not only vain, but dangerous. Every goal hath a Mandarin, who is trusted with the care of it, and is obliged to visit it frequently; and, if any prisoner is sick, to provide him with a physician, and proper remedies for his recovery; which is done at the emperor's charge. If any dies, the emperor must be acquainted with it (or, in the other provinces, the viceroy), who often sends a superior Mandarin thither, to examine whether the inferior one hath done his duty. And thus much may suffice for criminal causes.

THE civil ones are determined by proper tribunals. We took notice in a former section, Civil causes b that every city of the first, second, and third rank, had their proper courts and judges, the how judged. latter subordinate to the former, and all of them to that of the metropolis of the province, unto which a plaintiff or defendant might appeal; or even, passing by all the inferior ones, bring his cause to, if he thought he should not obtain justice in the inferior ones. In greater matters, a man may even appeal to the supreme tribunal of Pe-king; but in none of these cases Not managed is the appeal, or even the cause, brought to a court by lawyers, advocates, and attorneys; by lawyers or but every man is to be his own counsellor and manager, unless he gets perhaps some expert attorneys. person to draw up his plaint or case for him, in such a manner and form as custom requires; which being done, he is to bring it himself to the tribunal; and, being arrived at the second Laws suits gate, beats on a drum, and then falls on his knees, with his hands lifted up as high as his how carried head, and presents his plaint to the officer in waiting, who comes out to him at the sound of on. the drum. This last takes the paper from him, and carries it to the tribunal, where it is examined by the judges; and, if the suit proves to be of a frivolous or vexatious nature, or if the plaintiff cannot make good his allegations, he is commonly sent home with a sound drubbing of the bastonado: but if the plaint be just, and well supported, the defendant or accused is sent for by a proper officer of the court, and obliged to appear in person, and to make the best defence he can (M). In some cases the judges allow them a longer day; as when the defendant's witnesses are at some distance, or any circumstance happens, that requires a further examination; otherwise the controversy is decided upon the spot, according to the appearing merit of it. If either of the parties is dissatisfied with the sentence, he may d appeal to a superior court, and, from that, to a higher; and, whether they do, or not, the judge of the inferior is obliged to transmit an account of every such trial to the next superior court, to be there further examined, and be either confirmed or cashiered: for, if the sentence given appear unjust, the superior court is obliged not only to reverse it, and do justice to the injured person, but to punish the inferior judge, for not having done it, whether any appeal be lodged against him, or no. This, one would imagine, must be a most excellent way of administering justice to the subjects, and banishing fraud and corruption from those tribunals, by making the superior ones to have such a powerful check over the lower: but, as we have Tribunals cor- lately had occasion to observe, all this is mere formality and grimace; and there is such a rupted by fellow-feeling between all those tribunals, or rather the higher ones do so prey on the lower, bribery. e that a plaintiff will stand but a poor chance, let his cause be ever so just, if he doth not back it with such round bribes as may turn the scale on his side. Notwithstanding all these discouragements, we are told, that the people in some districts are so litigious, that they will Some of the mortgage their lands, houses, goods, and all they have, for the pleasure of going to law, people very and procuring a bastonado to be given to an antagonist; though it often happens that the litigious. defendant, by privately bribing the Mandarin with a higher sum, will divert the blows from his own to the plaintiff's back. Hence arise mortal discords and enmities among them, whilst those ministers of iniquity, more intent on their gain than their duty, or the peace and welfare of the subject, rather strive to blow up, than to suppress, the flame, in hopes of new f presents and gains, to satisfy their boundless avarice^a.

(M) This last circumstance of summoning the defendant is not mentioned by Magailan, or any other writer, nor in what manner he is to make his defence before the tribunal; which was an unpardonable oversight in them. However, we have ventured to insert thus much; as it is impossible for the judges to determine any cause regularly, without hearing both sides; it being unjust and illegal in any well-governed nation, especially such as that of the Chinese, to forejudge any man, before he be permitted to offer what he has to say in his own defence. This may likewise be concluded from some of the Chinese stories which Du Halde hath inserted in the history of that country, wherein mention is made of such kind of trials, and their manner of proceeding (31), which may be reasonably supposed to be founded on the laws and customs of the country.

Their genius.

Missionaries encouraged by the emperor.

progress.*

THE Chinese have doubtless been too much cried up by the missionaries for their learning, and as unjustly undervalued by other writers for their want of it; neither is it possible to reconcile what we are told, on the one hand, of their having carried some of their sciences to such a high degree from the times of their earliest monarchs, separate as they were from the rest of the world, with the small improvements they have since made to them during the space of near 4000 years; whilst the Europeans, who received theirs so recently from the Greeks and Romans, have so far outstripped not only them, but the Chinese, within the compass of two or three centuries. This may be clearly seen by what we have already observed of their maps of the world, and of the heavenly constellations, as well as from the imperfect apparatus of their famed observatory of Pe king^a. What indifferent astronomers, and worse geographers, they were when the first European missionaries came into those parts, is no less manifest, from the reception which they gave to those learned strangers. The progress they have since made under them in those sciences, plainly shews that their inferiority to the Europeans was not so much owing to want of genius and capacity, as to their being situate at so great a distance from them, and to their being debarred the benefit of travelling, and corresponding with other learned nations of the world; so that, all things considered, it ought to be rather a wonder that they had made so great a progress in them, with those slight assistances they had only from themselves, than that they came so far behind us in every point. And it appears no inconsiderable commendation of their understanding and capacity, that they so readily submitted to be taught by a people of whom they had scarcely heard before; and to be instructed in such a variety of branches of learning, which they were not only strangers to, but which were so very opposite to those which had, till then, passed for current among them. It is true, indeed, that the Jesuits took care to be well backed by the imperial authority and favour, before they ventured upon any thing of that kind; else the Literati, who, till then, had looked upon all kinds of science and knowledge to be centered in them, might have given them, in all likelihood, a quite contrary reception, for presuming to introduce a new kind of learning, which cast so disadvantageous a reflexion upon their old. And this is no other than what Father Verbiest intimates in some of his letters, that it was with great difficulty, and not without the emperor's interposition, that the generality of their learned submitted to their exchange^b.

HOWEVER that be, whether by compulsion, or their own liking, they soon found reason more than sufficient to acknowledge the superiority of the Europeans with respect to several branches of the mathematics, and other sciences; and to admire the surprising experiments which were shewn to them in optics, hydrostatics, pneumatics, statics, catoptrics, perspective, &c. as well as their various instruments for navigation, astronomy, mechanics, &c. their watches, clocks, chimes, organs, and other such curiosities, as were not only perfectly new to them, but were looked upon, if not as so many new and strange automata, such as the vulgar imagined them, yet as machines vastly exceeding human capacity and contrivance (A), till, by a longer continuance with them, they were let into both theory and practice;

^b Idem ibid.

(A) One of the most surprising experiments in optics, which they shewed to that monarch, was a pretty large semi-cylinder, of a very light kind of wood, in the middle of whose axis was placed a convex glass, which, being turned towards any object, represented it within the tube, in its natural figure. This was so much admired by that monarch, that he ordered a machine of the same nature to be made, and set up in his garden at Pe-king, by which he might see every thing that passed in the streets, and places adjacent, without being seen: which was accordingly done, to his no small satisfaction and wonder; but much more so of his empress, and other princesses of the court, who, being confined within the palace, could have no other way of beholding what was done abroad; on which account the object-glass was made of a larger compass, in order to take in a greater scope.

Father Grimaldi gave the monarch another instance of the wonderful effects of optics, which astonished all the grandees of the empire. He made, on the four walls of the Jesuits garden, a human figure, of the same length with the wall, which was fifty feet; and as he had strictly followed the rules, there was nothing to be seen on the front but hills and dales, forests, chaces, &c.; but, from a certain point of sight, one observed the figure of a man handsomely shaped, and well proportioned.

The magic lantern, catoptric instruments, telescopes, microscopes, and other glasses, which they presented to the emperor, and other grandees, did no less excite their admiration; particularly a tube in the form of an octagonal prism, which, being placed parallel to the horizon, exhibited eight different scenes in so lively a manner, that they were easily mistaken by the Chinese for the objects themselves.

Among other hydraulics, they presented that monarch with an engine of a new invention, which threw up a continual stream or cascade, and gave motion to a very regular clock, which exhibited the motions of the heavens. There, and a great variety of others in the static, pneumatic, and mechanic way, some curious barometers, thermometers, instruments for dis-

a practice; and confounded to find, that any nation so distant from, and till then unknown to, them, should have arrived to a height of knowledge so far surpassing their own. The emperor Kang-bi, in particular, was so charmed with every thing he saw and heard from them, ^{a great admirer of their learning.} that he seemed to grudge every moment he was absent from them, and continued their steadfast friend and benefactor so long as he lived. His example, and the singular favours and honours he shewed to those missionaries, soon encouraged the whole court, and the rest of the grandees, to seek their friendship and acquaintance, and to express an uncommon desire to be instructed in these new branches of European learning; so that in a little time the greatest part of the Literati and nobles became their disciples, admirers, and patrons; and, by reading the books which they wrote, hearing their lectures, and assisting at their experiments, became themselves almost as well acquainted with them as their masters ^b.

THIS hath been their case ever since; and tho' they have, as we have shewn in a former section, expelled all the missionaries out of the empire, yet they still take care to cultivate what they have learned from them, and to teach it in all their academies: but it will not be amiss, before we go farther, to give some idea of their learning, before it received the improvements above-mentioned. Astronomy was one of the sciences which they valued themselves most upon, as having been very intent, according to their accounts, in observing the motions of the heavens ever since the foundation of their monarchy; and having some severe laws to punish those who were entrusted with that employment by the state, for every neglect, and, in some cases, even with death. And if what we are told by the Jesuits be true, of the exactness with which they calculated eclipses from the earliest times, insomuch that, of the thirty-six mentioned by Confucius, there are but two false and two doubtful, and all the rest have been incontestably verified by some of the best astronomers of their society ^c, it must be owned that they excelled all other nations in that science: but we hope we have elsewhere given such reasons for our doubting of the truth of that assertion ^d, as will at least incline an unprejudiced reader to suspend his judgment about it. Those state astronomers might, in all probability, only record those early eclipses, together with the exact time when, and sign where, they happened, as they did all other celestial phænomena that came under their observations; and in process of time, when the way and method were found out of calculating them, those records might be made to pass for calculations or predictions (B). Father Gaubil, who hath greatly extolled their skill in astronomy, doth himself acknowledge, That he was not yet certain of their method of calculating; but only that they expressed in numbers the quality of those eclipses, the quantity eclipsed, the parts where visible, &c. He adds, that the figures covering the degrees of moisture and driness, prisms, clocks, watches with chimes, alarums, and other contrivances, which would barely serve for amusements to our learned in Europe, we only mention here, to shew how ignorant the Chinese nation was in those various branches of the mathematics; so that we need not wonder if such a great variety of new instruments, experiments, books, lectures, and demonstrations, in some measure abated their natural pride, and caused them to look upon the Europeans as superior to them at least in all those respects (1).

(B) There is, however, a singular passage in one of their antient books, called Shu-king, the sense of which, if rightly given us by the translator (2), will, if not quite explode what we have offered as a probable conjecture, at least prove, that they had the art of calculating eclipses much earlier than any other nation we know. It contains a charge against Hi and Ho, the two state astronomers, who, drowned in wine and debauchery, had neglected to give timely notice of an eclipse which happened on the first day of the moon, which was also the time of the autumnal equinox, at eight in the morning, not far from the constellation Fang (a star in the sign Scorpio). But, says that writer, Hi and Ho pretend they knew nothing of it. Our antient emperors severely punished those whose business it was to examine the celestial motions, and did not exactly foretel them. It is written in the laws, which they have left us, that if the celestial phænomenon be not truly set down in the kalendar, or hath not been predicted, such a neglect ought to be punished with death.

Now, if Fu, speaker of the above sentence, was really cotemporary with the emperors Tau and Shun, the eighth and ninth in descent from Fo-bi, as is there affirmed, it will evidently follow, that they had this art much earlier than some modern authors are willing to allow them, even though we should retrench some centuries from the pretended antiquity of Fo-bi; especially, if what Du Halde adds may be depended upon, that the above-mentioned eclipse hath been since verified by several eminent mathematicians among the Jesuits, and was such as could not be seen in any part of Europe or Asia, but in China (3).

But, if what we have formerly observed concerning the great uncertainty of the Chinese chronology (4) be allowed to be well founded, it will appear to be more probable, that this quotation out of the Shu-king might imply no more than that Hi and Ho neglected to make, and record, their due observations on this eclipse; they being, as the text says, drowned in their cups and debauchery when it happened; which is more likely to be the case, than that they should do so when they were compiling their kalendar for that year, if any thing like that was really done in those early days. Lastly, if those antient records have been destroyed, what could hinder those who pretend to have recovered, or revived them, from representing things in a more advantageous light, than ever they appeared in those protocols (5)?

were written above 100 years before our Saviour; but that the numbers are obscure, and understood, at present, but by few Chinese.

The certainty of the Chinese records.

BUT whether those early eclipses were really calculated, or only observed, and recorded, by those antient astronomers, nothing can give us a more irrefragable proof of the exactness, and consequently of the authenticity, of their annals and records: and we may add farther, that the various testimonies alleged in favour of their early skill in, and cultivation of, astronomy, are, notwithstanding all the difficulties alleged against them, sufficient to convince the most incredulous, that it manifestly bears a much older date than any other nation can pretend to. But we shall not here anticipate some curious hints and observations, which have been lately communicated to us, by some of our learned correspondents, upon this subject, and which, we flatter ourselves, will strike a much greater light upon these dark and controverted points; but which, we think, will be best deferred, till we come to speak of the origin, chronology, and antiquity, of the Chinese nation, which they more properly regard.

Motions and aspects of the planets.

THE same Father Gaubil further assures us, that they had curious diagrams of the positions of the heavenly bodies, computed above 120 years before Christ, exhibiting the number and extent of the constellations, what stars answered to their solstices and equinoxes, the declinations of the stars, with the distance of the tropics and the poles. They were acquainted with the motions of the sun and moon from west to east, and likewise of the planets and fixed stars, though they did not determine the motions of the latter till 400 years after Christ. They likewise had a pretty exact knowledge of the solar and lunar months; and gave nearly the same revolutions to Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, and Mercury, as we do, though they had no way of accounting for their seeming retrogradations and stations. Some suppose the heavens and planets to revolve about the earth; and others, though few in comparison, about the sun: nor is there any thing to be seen like this last system, in their astronomical calculations, but only in the writings of some private persons^c. Thus far that learned Jesuit.

servatories.

WE are told by others, of their antient observatory at Nang-king, in which were large globes, armillary spheres, quadrants, astrolabes, &c. not unlike those of that of Pe-king, which we have elsewhere described^f, and which Father Ricci, who viewed them some time after the year 1599, when he first came into China, says, looked as fine and beautiful as any d he had seen in Europe, though they had been exposed above 200 years to all the injuries of the weather (C); but, as to their use and exactness, they stood, like the others, in great need

song.

of improvement, or rather were set aside, to make way for a better sett. They had another observatory at Tong-song, a city of the third rank, in the province of Ho-nan (of which we have likewise given an account, in a former section^e), and which the Chinese pretend to have been built by Chew-kong, one of the most expert mathematicians their nation ever had, and who is said to have flourished 1200 years before Ptolemy was born, and to have spent whole

nights in observing the rising, motions, and figures, of the constellations. Among their other observations, upon record, of eclipses, notable conjunctions, &c. we meet with some relating to the transit of comets; but it doth not appear that they had any right notion of those bodies, their motions, orbits, nature, periods, &c. but looked upon them as some portending meteors, such as they interpreted every phænomenon they could not account for: and as for the rest of their astronomical observations, they were no more exact, till they received their farther improvements from Schaal, Verbiest, and other missionaries, appointed by the emperor Kang-hi to reform, or rather to new-model, their old kalendars; for these, notwithstanding the pains which the Chinese astronomers pretended to have taken, if they really did so, to regulate them according to the canons formerly compiled by Father Ricci, were yet found so defective, at the beginning of that monarch's reign, as to stand in need of fresh correction, and some farther amendments.

mended by the Jesuits.

WE shall add another remark, which will much lessen the credit of the Chinese nation, with regard to their great application to, and boasted skill in, astronomy, though they had attained to a greater degree of it than they really appear to have done; which is, that their excessive fondness for that science was owing to a superstitious infatuation for astrology. They believed, and do so to this day, that every star or constellation, and every planet, hath a astrology.

(C) It is not easy to reconcile what these good fathers tell us, of globes, armillary spheres, and other instruments, which necessarily suppose their having a right notion of the figure of the earth, with what they tell us elsewhere, of their supposing it to be flat, and their country in the very center of it, and all the other kingdoms and countries planted about it as so many diminutive ministers attending on their overgrown empire, as, it seems, all their maps did represent it, till the Jesuits gave them a juster notion of it. The reader may see what we have said on this head in the first section (6).

- a particular influence on all sublunary things, either good or bad, according to their nature, or various configurations; and that it was possible to foretel a vast number, if not all events, by calculating before-hand their motions, transits through every sign, and their various aspects to each other; infomuch, that, like the generality of our almanack-makers, they point out the lucky and unlucky days in each yearly ephemeris, and pretend to foretel wars, famines, sickness, droughts, good or bad seasons, and a vast number of other such trash: and it Their astrological tribunal; was, in all probability, to prevent the many frauds and abuses that were committed by those pretended astrologers, and to have those planetary calculations more exact, and the predictions from them more sure and regular, that there was an astrological tribunal erected; which is one of the most considerable in the empire, and subordinate only to that of the rites; whose business it is to present to the emperor, every forty-five days, a complete scheme its office. of the heavenly motions, and aspects, for the next forty-five days: and to set down the alterations of the air, according to the various seasons; together with their predictions relating to diseases, drought, plenty, or scarcity; the days on which there will be winds, rain, hail, thunder, snow, &c.; and to give a particular account of the eclipses that are to happen within that space; together with their duration, the day and hour when, the place of heaven where, the number of digits obscured, and the effects they suppose it will produce, according to the signs they happen in, and the configuration of the heavenly bodies at that time. These accounts must be presented to the emperor some months before the eclipse happens, in order to have them conveyed, by proper officers, into every one of the fifteen provinces, exactly calculated according to the longitude and latitude of each of them, and there to be published, in a most solemn manner, and with such strange ceremonies, as shew their great fondness for astrology and superstition, rather than a true and well-founded skill in astronomy; as the reader may see by those few we have inserted in the following note (D).

THEIR geometry is still more superficial; and their method of solving of problems is Geometry. rather by induction than any settled principles, they having neither theory nor practice, in any tolerable degree; they are indeed more exact in measuring, their method being both easy and exact. But what they most excell in, according to Du Halde, is their arithmetic, in Excell in arithmetic. which are found all the rules for adding, subtracting, multiplying, and dividing, exactly laid down in their books; not indeed by arithmetical characters, like ours, from 1 to 9, which they know not the use of, but by the help of an instrument, which they call Swan-pan, which the reader will find described in a former part of this work*, it being affirmed to have been invented by a learned ko-lau, ever since the reign of Wbang-ti, their third emperor, and to have continued in use ever since. By this instrument, we are told, they are able to dispatch any arithmetical operation, with more surprising ease, quickness, and exactness, than the best master in that art can do in Europe, either by counters or figures^b. How far that method will extend beyond the four general rules above-mentioned, whether to decimals, fractions, fellowship, &c. we are not told; yet, considering what a trading nation they are, and that they have no other way of reckoning but this, one would suppose, that it must take in all those branches. Some notion they seem to have of algebra, by the use they are said to make of some of its problems, in their geometry^c; but in this, as well as other parts of the mathematics, they are still very imperfect, much less were they furnished with any such excellent helps as our tables of sines and tangents, logarithms, &c. so very necessary and

(D) The ceremony of it is as follows. First, there is affixed, to all public places, some days before-hand, a scheme of the eclipse, the time when, duration, and other particulars, above-related. The Mandarins, having likewise had previous notice, are to appear on the day it happens, dressed in their formalities, at the astronomical tribunal, and to have tables set before them, on which the whole process is delineated, in order to observe the exact time of its beginning and ending, and other particulars, compare them with the scheme, which lies before them, and to communicate to each other their remarks upon the whole transaction.

As soon as they perceive that the luminary begins to be darkened, they fall upon their knees, and beat their heads against the ground; while the drums and kettle-drums make a fearful noise along the streets of the city, accompanied with the shouts of the people; pursuant to an old notion they have had, from the earliest times, that the noise succoured those two useful planets, and frighted the dragon away, whose horrid claw, they imagine, hath got hold of the luminary, in order to devour it, and is the cause of the defect of its light. For though the wiser sort are, by this time, sensible enough, that eclipses are natural effects, yet can they not divest themselves of the old prejudice, that they commonly portend some sinister events to their nation; and, for that reason, the same ceremony is observed throughout the whole empire, in hopes to avert the omen.

Whilst the Mandarins, and other officers, continue thus prostrate, all the time the eclipse lasts, there are other persons employed in observing and examining, with the utmost carefulness, the beginning, length, end, and other circumstances, of it, and comparing it with the scheme delivered to them. These observations are afterwards to be brought, written with their own hand, and sealed with their own seal, to the emperor, who compares them with those he himself hath made on it, with equal attention, in his own palace (?).

expeditious, and exact, in all astronomical calculations; except the missionaries above-mentioned have thought fit to instruct them in the use of them: but that is what we can hardly suppose any of them ever did, the Chinese, in general, being naturally averse to every kind of abstruse learning, and incapable of too close application; and these they could not be taught, without being made previously acquainted with the European arithmetic; which, besides its novelty, would have appeared to them an insurmountable task: and this, joined to their reluctance to be beholden to strangers for any branch of learning, could be but a small encouragement to the Jesuits to force so sure and expeditious a one upon them, the concealing of which would still secure them a visible superiority over them.

Navigation
and shipping.

THEY continue still very unskilled in the art of navigation, though they pretend to have had it from the earliest times, and to have sailed, some thousand years ago, over all the Indian seas, as far as the Cape of Good Hope, and that without the help of the compass; which, though they boast themselves to be the first inventors of, yet they did not discover till a long time after.

Whether they ever sailed to the Cape of Good Hope.

THE learned Huetius, in his treatise of the navigation of the antients, hath endeavoured to confirm this, from a passage in what he calls the Annals of the City of Ormuz; in which it is affirmed, that 400 Chinese vessels have been observed to come into the Persic gulf, and to lade and unlade a prodigious quantity and variety of the richest merchandizes. The misfortune is, that that learned prelate doth not give us any account of those annals, nor about what time such a prodigious number of vessels were seen in that gulf. Neither doth it appear, from any of the Chinese records, or in any of what is styled their classic books, if we may believe the celebrated Jesuit Parrenin *. From which he conjectures, that the word Ta-lan-chan, which the Chinese give now to the cape above-mentioned, and signifies no more than the mountain of high waves, might have been formerly given to some of those which they met with in their sailing to Batavia, Siam, &c). and many such there are, doubtless, along those seas) and to have been since appropriated to that far distant one, out of a fond ambition of being thought to have extended their naval commerce so far beyond whatever they did, or indeed could possibly do, considering the unsuitness of their trading vessels, and their imperfect skill in the art of navigation.

built.

THEIR shipping, indeed, as it is at present, and hath been ever since the coming of the Europeans, appear altogether unfit for such long and dangerous voyages; and though they have them of all bulks and sizes, yet the very best of them seem only designed for those seas which surround their country, and the rest for sailing on their lakes, rivers, and canals. The former are properly no other than flat-bottomed vessels, with two masts, and not above eighty or ninety feet in length. The forepart is not made with a beak, but rises up somewhat like two wings, or horns, and makes but a very odd figure; and the stern is open in the middle, to receive the rudder, and shelter it from the beating of the waves. This rudder, which is about five or six feet broad, may be easily raised or lowered, by means of a cable fastened to it from the stern.

Sails.

THESE ships have neither mizzen-mast, bowsprit, nor scuttles, but only a main and fore-mast, to which they sometimes add a small top-mast, of no great use. Their sails of mats, made of bamboo, divided into leaves, like a pocket-book, which fold and unfold in the same manner as a skreen, and are jointed together by a pole, made also of bamboo. On the top is a piece of wood, serving for a sail-yard, and at the bottom a sort of plank, above a foot broad, and four or five inches thick, which keeps the sail steady, when they hoist it up or down. In a word, these ships are only made to sail on those seas, and would be of little use in the hands of any but *Chinese*s, who know how to manage them; and though they take in and retain more wind, on account of the stiffness of their sails, yet they lose that advantage in other respects, by being built so differently from ours.

chors.

THEIR anchors are made of a hard and heavy sort of wood, which they call Tye-mu, or iron-wood, which, they say, is not so apt to bend as those made of iron: however, they take care to tip both flukes with that metal. Their ships are caulked, not with pitch and tar, as ours, but with a kind of gum, which is so good, that a well or two at the bottom of the hold is sufficient to keep the vessel dry; for, hitherto, they know nothing of the use of the pump, but draw the water out with buckets. Their ships have neither master nor pilot on board, but are left to the management of those that steer them, who are commonly pretty good pilots in coasting, though indifferent ones in the main sea, and would be still more so, were they to take any long voyages (E).

WE

* Lettres edifiant. vol. xxvi. p. 78, & seq.

(E) Their method, it seems, is to lay the head of the ship upon the rhumb on which they propose to sail, and hold on their course, without giving themselves any trouble about the deviation of the vessel; which is done by the help of a silken thread, which divides the surface of the card into two equal parts, from north to south. This may be performed two ways; viz. either by putting the rhumb parallel to the keel, and then turning the vessel a We have already spoken of the 10,000 imperial barks, which carry the tribute and provisions from all the provinces to the city of Pe-king, and are, by far, the finest and largest, and of equal breadth from head to stern. The next class is that of those which are kept by the emperor, to convey the viceroys, governors, and Mandarins, to their respective governments, of which he hath likewise a great number, and of them finely gilt, carved, and adorned without, and furnished with most commodious and handsome apartments within. Next to various sorts them, are those which belong properly to the princes of the blood, to the nobles, grandees, of them Literati, and, last of all, those that belong to merchants and tradesmen. All of them are built, adorned, and furnished, more or less sumptuously, according to the rank of the owners, yet so, that those of the lowest order are still very beautiful and convenient, and in such number, as to make a very noble shew on their canals and rivers, and especially in their most considerable cities, for concourse, where they appear in such vast quantities, as to extend themselves for some miles together, in exact rows, three or four deep, on those rivers and canals. But those which belong to the princes and nobles appear quite magnificent, and more like castles on the water, being divided into a variety of sumptuous apartments, for state and convenience. Their windows and doors, which are made like grates, have oyster-Windows. shells, or some fine linen or silk spread over with fine white wax, instead of glasses, to let the light through: and even those which are employed, to the number of 365, to carry the emperor's fish from some distant provinces to Pe-king, together with some of the finest silks, brocades, and other rich merchandizes, for the court, are all painted with a fine vermilion, c curiously gilt and carved.

ALL kinds of vessels in general, that sail upon those canals, rivers, lakes, &c. (F) are under the best regulation; and all are obliged to strike to those which belong to the emperor, and the rest to each other, according to their rank: and as the whole country abounds with lakes, rivers, and especially artificial canals, so one may behold there, with pleasure, an infinite variety of vessels sailing on them, some for diversion or grandeur, others for commerce and carriage, all swarming with people busily taken up with their various employments.

WE shall close this article with a word of their floating villages, and their rafts on the Floating vil- rivers and canals. The former of these are flat-bottomed barges, neatly built, with little lages. houses upon them, in rows, some larger, some smaller, in which live several families, who d carry on some sort of business or manufacture, and seldom go on shore, except to buy or sell, vessel (supposing they design to sail north-east), till the needle becomes parallel to the string; or, which answers to the same, by putting the thread parallel to the keel, they make the needle point to the north-west. However, the main difficulty is to keep the vessel steady on its rhumb, which is next to impossible, considering the smallness of their rudder, and the stretching and wabbling of the ropes to which it is fastened.

Their compass is still more defective, being only a box, the rims of which are divided into twenty-four equal parts, and make the different points or winds. This box they place upon a bed of sand, or something of that soft nature, not so much to keep the needle steady from the agitation of the ship, which is ever jogging it out of its equilibrium, as to hold the pastil with which they perfume them every moment: for such is their superstition, in this respect, as not only to regale the winds with such perfumes, but even to offer vicinals to them, by way of sacrifice. The needle of the largest compass is not above three inches long, and hath at one end something like a flower-de-luce, and on the other a kind of trident: but for these, we are told, they are beholden to the Japanese; for they are brought to them from Nanga-saki.

This account of their method of sailing, vessels, tackle, &c. which we have extracted out of the observations which five Jesuit missionaries made, on their passage from Siam to China, in a vessel belonging to Canon, anno 1687 (7), will suffice to give our readers an idea of the rest, and serve to convince them, that if the Chinese were such antient sailors, and the real inventors of the compass, they have reaped but small advantages from them, and made but very poor improvements in both.

These needies, whether they were brought from Japan, as the last quoted authors affirm, or made in China, as Du Halde, and some of his fraternity, seem to intimate, do not receive their virtue, if we may believe what another of the same order tells, upon the authority of one of their famed Chinese books, from the loadstone, though they have it there in great plenty; but from a strange mixture of orpiment, cinabar, sandrak, and filings of steel, all reduced into a fine powder, and made into a kind of paste, by a sufficient quantity of blood drawn from the comb of a white cock. This paste, in which the needles are to be put, and closely rolled in paper, is to be kept seven days and nights over a clear and constant charcoal fire; after which they being taken out and worn three days longer, next to a man's skin, will be found fit for use, and point directly to the north; and, what is still more surprising, without being liable to those frequent variations with those that are touched with the loadstone (*).

Our author doth not seem indeed willing to think such an odd mixture, and much less with such a process, likely to produce such extraordinary effects. Nevertheless, from the Chinese being ignorant or insensible of the variation of their needle, so much complained of by other mariners, he seems to conclude it probable, that those which are in use among them have that peculiar quality, above those which are touched with the loadstone, whatever be the means by which it is conveyed into them.

(F) To these we may add a kind of gallies, in great use amongst them, not only along the coasts, and between the islands, but also on the rivers, canals, and lakes. These are likewise flat-bottomed, and about as long as our merchantmen of between 300 and 400 tons, and draw not above two feet water; and, as their oars do not reach to the opposite side of the ship, as ours do, but are placed on the outside, in a position almost parallel to the body of the bark, each oar is easily moved, with few hands, and the vessel made to go very swiftly.

Timber floats. but live wholly in those vessels. The other, viz. the rafts or floats on the rivers, do mostly belong to the salt and timber-merchants, who are commonly the richest in China. These, instead of barks to carry their goods, make use of those rafts; which are made in the following manner. After the timber, which they cut down in the woods and forests of the province of Se-chwen, is brought to the river Kyang, they take what is necessary to make a raft four or five feet high, and ten or more long; then boring holes at each end of the pieces of wood, run through them twisted osiers, by which they fasten the rest of the timber together, so as to form a raft of any length, to float upon the river, some of which will extend half a league, or more. The several parts of the raft, being thus put together, are easily moved any way, like the links of a chain, and four or five of the foremost men guide it with their poles or oars; while others, placed at proper distances along the sides, help to conduct it. These men build upon them little huts, covered with mats, or boards, from space to space, and there keep their moveables, dress their victuals, and take their rest. At every city they touch at, they sell their houses along with the timber. In this easy manner do those floats perform their course upon those lakes and rivers, the longest of which is reckoned above 600 leagues, when they carry their wood to Pe-king^k. And thus much will suffice for their skill in navigation.

Defective in other arts and sciences.

SHOULD we carry our inquiry higher, with relation to their skill in other arts and sciences, we shall still find them more defective. They know but little of natural philosophy, that is well founded, but what they learned from the Europeans. Some of their greatest virtuoso's appeared quite astonished at some common experiments the Jesuits shewed them; such as, causing hot water to freeze before a large fire, the petrifying or making of artificial stone only with two different liquids, the effects of the aurum fulminans, and others of the like nature; and owned, that nothing less than ocular demonstration could have convinced them of the possibility of them. Much more were they surprised, at least inwardly, to have those effects clearly explained to them, from natural principles, and that by strangers, born at such a vast distance from them, who had, till then, imagined all kinds of learning confined within the limits of their own empire*.

As to moral philosophy, though they have more good books written on that subject than on any other, and think themselves to excel all other nations in it, yet a little acquaintance with their writings will easily convince an unprejudiced reader, how short they come not only of ours, but likewise of some of the best heathen philosophers. The whole of it is reducible under the two following heads; viz. the relative duties of parents and children, and of princes and their subjects. They make no distinction between morality and politics, between the art of living and governing well. In these, says Du Halde, their sages, who are very numerous and voluminous, have endeavoured to excel, not so much in high flights of eloquence and rhetorical style, as in adapting their reasoning and persuasives to the meanest capacities, in order to make mankind wiser and better by their writings.

They have neither logic nor rhetoric.

Logic and rhetoric one would have reasonably expected to have been in no small perfection among a people who value themselves so much, and have been so highly cried up, for their just way of reasoning, and polite method of speaking and writing; nevertheless, what talents they have in that way appear to be intirely natural to them, since they have not one rule to teach them how to argue closely and regularly, nor for speaking or writing politely and elegantly, but trust wholly to the light of their reason, and the justness of comparing their ideas together in the one, and in the clear and succinct arrangement of their periods, lively and energetic expressions, bold metaphors and allusions, in the other. To this last, however, they add commonly the wise maxims and sentences of their sages; which being in highest repute among them, and couched in such a concise and mystic style, as to contain a great deal of reasoning, and variety of thoughts, in few words, commonly make a much stronger impression than the boldest figures of our artificial rhetoric, or at least will not fail of silencing, if they do not altogether convince, an antagonist^l.

Physic.

PHYSIC, they pretend to be as antient as their good emperor Whang-ti, or Hoang-ti, the third in succession from Fo-hi their founder. This good prince, they say, observing that mankind, being tormented by the rigour of the seasons from without, and by their passions and intemperance from within, did seldom live their full time, ordered three eminent persons of his court to examine the nature and œconomy of the blood-vessels; after which, he appointed proper medicines for every disease^m: these were chiefly of the vegetable kind, to which they have made some few improvements since, hardly worth mentioning; such as introducing some of the minerals into use, together with sweating, cauterising, and sometimes (though very seldom) phlebotomy. As to purging, vomiting, and clysters, they have but a a mean opinion of their efficacy, if there be not, perhaps, something in them that offends their modesty, and makes them averse to them. However, as their skill in anatomy, natural philosophy, physics, &c. which are the foundation of that noble science, is so very small, we cannot expect them to have made any great proficiency in it.

THEY pretend, indeed, to an extraordinary knowledge in pulses, and to discover not only the nature and degree of a patient's distemper, but likewise how long it will last, and whether it will prove mortal, by the sole feeling of his pulse; and, if we may believe the missionaries, their skill in this way is surprising, though not so sure, but that they are sometimes mistaken. The misfortune is, that they are more expert at discovering the distemper, than happy at prescribing proper remedies for it; though this seeming defect may probably enough be owing to avarice, that they may keep their patient the longer under their hand, and ply him with a greater quantity of medicines: for they have no apothecaries among them; but every physician prepares his own prescriptions, which they commonly administer in pills or bolus's, and seldom in draughts.

IN most sorts of pains and aches, which they attribute commonly to some malignant winds, they apply burning-hot needles, or irons shaped like small buttons, and cauterise and torment their patients, upon the slightest occasion; and in violent cholics, which are caused by indigestion, and attended with vomiting, &c. they will even apply a hot iron plate to the soles of the feet. But those who treat their patients in a less butcherly manner, will rather have recourse to cordials, which are extracted from alexipharmic herbs and roots.

THEY are seldom afflicted with gout, sciatica's, stone, or other chronic diseases, which is commonly attributed to their frequent drinking of tea; besides which, their country abounds with great variety of excellent herbs and roots, and among the latter, those called Jin-seng, or Gen-seng, and China, or Pao root, of which we shall speak under another head, and which are esteemed excellent sudorifics, and correctors of the blood. To conclude, every man is permitted to practise physic; no degrees or qualifications being required, but a good assurance, and a great pretence to astrology; without a sufficient skill in which, a man would be thought a fool or a knave, that should set up for a physician; so that, upon the whole, they are no better than quacksⁿ.

TO what we have hinted above of their ignorance of physic, let us add their extreme aversion to anatomy, at least to that part of it which is called dissecting; and which is so rooted into them, that no kind of benefit that can be obtained from it, hath ever been able to reconcile them to it, or make them look upon it in any other light than as a most inhuman practice. To suffer the body of a dead parent, or near relation, to be opened, to know the distemper he died of, would be looked upon amongst them as a most horrid sacrilege; and to dissect a human body, though executed for some heinous crime, is cried down as a piece of injustice done to the criminal, to which the law had not condemned him. Much more unjust do they deem it to cut and mangle any other dead body which dies a natural death. If, say they, the very apprehension of being treated in such a butcherly manner, after one's decease, would make a man miserable all his life, how much more grievous must it be to the soul, to behold the horrid operation performed? Is it therefore just or reasonable to suffer such a cruel practice, merely for the sake of gaining a little more skill in the art of curing diseases, and lengthening life a few years, which could scarcely be justified, could it enable those inhuman manglers to render men immortal? Thus they reason, or rather exclaim, against the anatomizing of human bodies: and it is much to be questioned, whether the principle upon which they argue hath not saved more lives among them, than ever anatomy did among us*. However, this may serve, at present, to shew our readers what kind of surgeons, as well as physicians, the Chinese are glad to take up with. We may have occasion, in the sequel, to say something more on that subject, when we come to speak of their diseases, and their manner of curing of them. All we shall further observe here, is, that, according to the generality of authors, who have written of this nation, the circulation of the blood hath been known amongst them from time immemorial; though, for want of a tolerable skill in anatomy, they neither know how it is performed, nor how to make those improvements from it, which they might otherwise do, in their common practice of physic†.

MUSIC and poetry, though seemingly adapted to the airy genius of the Chinese nation, are to this day very crude and irregular. The former, they pretend to have been brought to its highest perfection, and to have been in the highest esteem among them, long before Confucius's time, who was himself a great admirer and master of it. But their books which treated of that art having been since lost, it is dwindled into a mere uncouth jingle of Musical instruments, very uncouth. sounds, without harmony, contrast, or variety of parts, and, at the best, is but like our common airs, and consequently not deserving the name of music. They know nothing of the use of notes, but learn all their tunes by the ear (G). Their instruments are still more uncouth; some like bells, others like drums, of several sizes and makes; one somewhat like our trumpet; and a few of them like our viols, and other stringed instruments; two or three kinds of flutes; and one of them composed of about twelve or fourteen pipes, of different lengths, made of cane, and not unlike in sound to the open flute of our organs, except that it is blown with the mouth, and not above fifteen or eighteen inches in length, and about three or four in diameter, the pipes being stuck, circular-wise, into a socket, which serves for the sounding-board, and receives the wind by a mouth-piece. They now seldom use either vocal or instrumental music, except in plays, feasts, marriages, funerals, and other such solemnities: and the very best of it never yet could appear tolerable to any of our Europeans, except it be played by a very good hand, or sung by a very good voice^a.

Poetry, very imperfect.

THEIR poetry is still more difficult to describe to those who have no knowledge of their language, and consequently cannot be easily made to comprehend in what the beauty, elegance, cadence, and harmony, of it consist. Those who know that their language is chiefly composed of monosyllables, will be still more at a loss to conceive the possibility of reducing it into any regular and harmonious verse: and it must be confessed, that the best of their performances in this kind come infinitely short of ours, their poetry consisting chiefly in a kind of relative proportion, which one verse bears to another, both in rhyme and the tone of the feet; which last is what distinguishes the variety of significations which every such word hath. Neither are their compositions of that length, much less of that sublimity of thought, variety of imagery, boldness of metaphors, &c. as ours are, but rather resemble our sonnets, madrigals, or epigrams, whose beauty chiefly consists in varying the length of the verses, the choice of such words as are to be pronounced in a musical tone, and, we may add, that carry some quaint or witty idea with them, or some pathetic passions and allusions, that serve to enliven the style. They have another sort of poetry, without rhyme, which consists in a continued antithesis, or opposition of the thoughts that form the piece; so that if the first thought relates to the spring, the next shall relate to autumn; if the one speaks of fire, the other shall mention water; and so on. Which kind rather requires patience, than skill or genius; though one meets, even in some of these, something of the poetic enthusiasm, and now-and-then some noble metaphor, which gives an elegance to the contrast^b.

Another kind of it.

Plays and novels.

THE last thing we shall speak of under this head, is their dramatic pieces and novels; neither of which have indeed any other excellency in them above those of Europe, except that they are generally calculated to instruct and reform, to recommend virtue, and expose vice, to inculcate the necessary reward of the one, and punishment of the other: whereas ours, at least those of this last century past, seem rather designed to captivate and inflame the passions, by dealing so much in love-affairs, intrigues, and other immoral scenes and characters, as commonly produce a quite contrary effect. In other respects, their dramatic performances, which are mostly of the tragi-comic kind, interlarded perhaps with a short farce, have little of the sublime or heroic, and have a manifest defect running through them all, which shews the poverty of their genius; viz. that, instead of surprising their audience in some imperceptible way, and as it were undesignedly, with the character of the persons who compose the drama, they oblige every actor to declare it, at his first appearance on the stage, in some such words as these: I am the emperor or king of * * *, and a declared enemy to all tyranny and cruelty; I am the great general * * *, or prime minister of king * * *, and a steadfast friend, or irreconcilable enemy, to such and such, meaning some other character in the play. The reader may see some few instances of their genius, in the dramatic and novel kind,

^b Ibid. ibid.

(G) The Jesuits first taught them the use of notes, when being invited, by the Emperor Kang-hi, to a Chinese concert, in which an air composed by that emperor was to be played, Father Peirera took out his pocket-book, and having pricked down the whole tune, whilst the musicians were playing it, repeated it from end to end, without missing one note, to the no small surprize of the audience, and much more of the performers, who had been at such pains to make themselves masters of it.

The emperor being made acquainted with the secret and having, with pleasure, heard some musical performances after the European manner, and beheld the method by which each performer took his part out of their books, was so taken with it, that he ordered a musical academy to be erected, composed of the most skilful persons in that art, and committed the care of it to his third son, a prince of uncommon genius. These began with reading all the authors that had written on the subject, and reducing all the instruments to the ancient standard, except where that was found defective, or capable of some improvements from those of Europe. Which being done, they compiled a book, in four volumes, intitled, The true Doctrine of Li-hi, written by the emperor's order; and to them added a fifth, containing the elements of European music, composed by Father Peirera, above-mentioned (g).

a in *Du Halde*¹, by which he may form an idea of the rest, without our enlarging any farther upon them.

As to their history, if we may rely upon what both the Chinese, and the generality of writers, say of it, no nation ever took more care to preserve and transmit a faithful and succinct one of their empire, from the very foundation of it, and to record the annals of their good and wicked monarchs with greater impartiality, and free from that flattery and sycophancy which those of other empires are commonly fraught with (H). This was their practice, not only at the imperial court, but in every kingdom under its dependency, and in every province of the empire; insomuch that not only every government, but every city belonging to it, hath been obliged, from time immemorial, to publish an account of every considerable transaction which happened within its district. This account extends itself to the situation, boundaries, climate, soil, and the most remarkable places in it; the genius, commerce, and number, of its inhabitants; the persons who have been most distinguished for their valour, learning, probity, &c. not excepting those of the female sex who have signalized themselves for their chastity, conjugal, parental, or filial, piety; nor even the monstrous births (I), and other prodigies, that have happened at any time; all which, if they could but be stripped of the marvellous and fabulous, for which those historians betray but too great a fondness, would doubtless be of great service to compile and enrich the history of their nation².

But though we should allow that they have been thus careful in preserving their records for a great number of ages, yet, with respect to those of their earliest times, we have sufficiently shewn in a former part of this work, how little dependence can be had either on the ancient Chinese records, or on what we find written concerning those early monarchs, by persons who lived so long after all those ancient and venerable writings had been designedly destroyed by some of their tyrannic princes³. We may indeed more safely rely on those which are of a more recent date, and after the time of their great Confucius, when they began to be more regularly kept and digested after his model: but as to that, we shall refer our readers to what hath been already said of it in the Antient History above-quoted, and to what we shall have farther occasion to add in a subsequent section.

THE last thing we have to speak of, under this head, is their language, which doth the more properly belong to it, as the thorough knowledge of it is one main branch of the Chinese learning, and such a one as cannot be attained to without great study and application; but, once acquired, is the most sure and direct road to the highest preferments and dignities in the government. What the ancient language of the Chinese was, its primitive roots, and affinity to the Hebrew, and other ancient tongues, we have in some measure shewn in a former part of this work⁴: neither shall we here enter into the controversy about which of them is the most ancient or primitive language, which is a subject too copious to be discussed as it ought to be, in a work like this; but only observe in general, that it is not without good grounds that several very learned men have given it the preference above all the ancient ones, that of the Mosaic books not excepted, as carrying a much greater variety of such characteristics as one would reasonably expect to find in an original or primitive tongue⁵. The paucity

(H) Their method for doing it effectually is admirable, and deserves an universal imitation. There is a set number of doctors, of known probity, whose business is to observe all the words and actions of the emperor, and, unknown to one another, to set them down in a loose sheet of paper, which is afterwards to be put through a slit into a chest made for that purpose. In that paper they relate, with great freedom and sincerity, every thing that hath been said or done by him, whether well or ill. For instance, on such a day the emperor forgot his dignity, and gave too great a loose to his passion. On such a day, unmindful of every thing but his resentment, he unjustly condemned such a person, or disannulled an act of the tribunal, without a cause. In such a year, day, &c. he gave such a singular mark of his paternal affection for his subjects; undertook a war for the defence of his people; or put an end to an expensive one to ease his subjects, or for the honour of the empire; was congratulated by his whole court, &c. for such an action, law, or speech, and appeared with an air full of modesty and humility, in the midst of the praises and applauses of his people.

The chest, wherein these papers are carefully preserved, is never opened, either while the prince is living, or any of his family upon the throne: but, when the crown passes into another house, or branch of the royal family, then all these memoirs are carefully collected, examined, and compared, in order to discover the truth; and, from them, the history of that monarch is compiled (10).

(I) There is hardly a prodigy, or the most absurd and incredible story, that they will not insert in their local records. Thus, in those of the city of Fu-chow, they relate, that a woman was brought-to-bed of a serpent, and suckled it; in another place, that a sow brought forth a little elephant. Stories of apparitions, hobgoblins, &c. often occur, especially where the Bonzas have had a hand in the repelling, expelling, or suppressing, them; sometimes also some rich persons of both sexes will, by presents, or some kind of bribery, to the governors, get themselves recorded in those annals for some remarkable piece of merit; tho' none can obtain that honour, unless he be found deserving of it: and, to prevent any abuses of that nature, all the Mandarins of every city assemble once in 40 years, to examine those records, in order to expunge whatever part of them they disapprove of (11).

of its radical words (which to this day exceed not 330), and the simplicity of their sounds, of which we shall speak in the sequel, cannot but be allowed to be every way answerable to the best notions we can frame of those earliest times, wherein mankind could have but very few ideas, and such as could be easily conveyed by the simplest words or sounds.

Their few radical words multiplied to a vast number of meanings, according to the increase of their ideas.

ON the other hand, their chusing to split those original words into such a vast variety of significations, according as their ideas gradually multiplied, rather than coin new ones for every new idea, must needs appear to every unprejudiced person a manifest proof of their tenacious fondness, or perhaps we should rather say respect, for their mother-tongue; especially if he considers how much easier it would have been for them to have coined new words for all such new ideas, than to express them by the mere difference of sound or accent of their old ones; but that is a point we have neither time nor room to enlarge upon. It must be easy to every reader to guess to what a prodigious height the introduction of arts and sciences must in time have multiplied the variety of sounds and accents, and consequently of their characters or hieroglyphics: and accordingly some authors make them to amount to no fewer than from 60 to 80,000, a number too great for any one, especially a stranger, to attain in so small a space of time as three or four years, as some of the Jesuit missionaries pretend to have done, unless we suppose there is either some alphabet, or some other equivalent expeditious way of coming to the knowledge of such a variety of combinations than they have been pleased to acquaint us with.

WE, and other nations, who make use of an alphabet, and combine our letters lengthwise, which seems the easiest and most natural way, and clog them with so inconsiderable a number of accents, plainly see what time it requires, even with all these advantages, for a youth to become so far a master of his spelling-book, as readily to catch every such combination, and form it into a character or word; for that, we take for granted, every reader is sensible to be the case: for, as soon as he is once become a tolerable proficient in reading, he no longer joins letters into syllables, and these into words, but takes at one glance of the eye the whole word, be it short, or ever so long, as the Chinese do one of their compound characters; so that, unless he chance to meet with some irregularity in the word, as when it is wrong spelt, the letters misplaced, inverted, and the like, which recalls his alphabet to his mind, he runs over every one of them, as over so many intire characters, and the exotic words elephant, hieroglyphic, Constantinople, &c. offer themselves, under that notion, with the same ease and speed as his own native monosyllables ox, sheep, bread, wood, &c. But if this easy method of ours doth yet require some years to be attained in any tolerable perfection, what must it be supposed to do in an European who attempts to acquire the same readiness in the Chinese characters, which, besides their being combined in a quite different manner, are clogged with such a vast variety of accents of so many different imports, as to multiply the number of those characters to above 60,000, unless there be some particular, some fundamental clue, equivalent to our alphabet, to facilitate the learning of them?

Their three languages at present in use.

The Mandarin, in its use.

ESPECIALLY if, to what hath been mentioned already, we add, that there are, properly speaking, three sorts of languages in China; viz. that of the common people, which is only used by them, and in compositions of the lowest class, as being by far the rudest of the three, and splitting itself into a great variety of dialects and pronunciations. The next is that which is called the language of the Mandarins and Literati, and is used by all the politer part, and higher rank, of the Chinese. In this second sort, which is properly rather a refinement, or more polished dialect, of the former, are written an infinite variety of histories, novels, and other compositions of the like nature, in a style no way inferior to our best writings either for clearness, elegance, purity, or politeness. This is the language which was formerly used at court, and hath been since propagated among the more polite and neighbouring provinces to it: and hence it is that it is best spoken in those that are next to that of Kyang-nan; but it was with no small difficulty, and by very slow degrees, that it was afterwards propagated thro' the rest of the empire, for the conveniency of the government.

The written language.

The paucity of its primitive words.

THE third is that which may be properly styled the language of the learned, or of books, that is, of those that are not written in the same familiar style as that of the two former, but in such a one as is vastly superior to them in sublimity, majesty, and brevity. This last is now no longer used in common discourse, but is only written; and runs with such a noble flowing harmony, when read by those that are masters of it, that the nicest ear may hear it with delight, notwithstanding its surprising conciseness, and the variety of accents in which it is to be pronounced. But as the knowledge of this third sort is only a kind of dead one, and chiefly known by the learned of the highest rank, we shall only add, to what we have said of its singular conciseness, that each thought is generally expressed in about four or six characters, and without any pointing; so that the learned are left to judge where the sense concludes, by the mere nature of the diction, and yet they are seldom, if ever, mistaken in that particular.

BUT to return to the Mandarin or polite language: it hath this peculiar property, to be the most concise, and barren of words, and the most copious and extensive in sense, of any either antient or modern, in the whole world. The number of its words doth not amount, a as was lately hinted, to above 330, all monosyllables, indeclinable, and for the most part ending with a vowel, or with an n or ng; and yet contains such a variety of meanings, according to the accent or tone they are pronounced in, as to serve in all exigencies, and to be extremely copious and significant. Again, the compounding of those monosyllables multiplies their primitive signification into a vast variety of new ones; all which doth so enrich it, that they are never at a loss how to express themselves, not only in all exigencies relating to human life, but in all their various arts and sciences, in the most proper and intelligible manner. We can give a more pregnant proof of the almost infinite variety of ideas which are conveyed by the few monosyllables above mentioned, than the dictionary which was compiled by order of the late emperor Kang-hi, which, though printed in a small character, yet amounted to 95 volumes, most of them very thick; and yet was found so short of comprehending the whole language, that they thought it necessary to add a supplement to it of 24 volumes more. As there is therefore no language in the world that would not be exhausted in less than half the number of those volumes, so there can be none so copious as the Chinese, or that can boast to have existed so many thousand years in the same state in which it continues to this day.

b We have still a more pregnant proof of the richness of this language, from the number of inflexions by which they alter the signification of original words. These are chiefly five; the first of which consists in speaking it in a plain even tone: the second, in raising it a note or two higher; the third in giving it a very acute sound or pronunciation; the fourth, a swift descent from the acute to the grave accent, or from a higher to a lower note; the fifth and last, in descending still lower. There are still some other accents, so peculiar to their nation, that it would be impossible to give any idea of them to an European, and which yet serve to the same end. But, from these five, our readers may easily judge of the whole; for if we can, by the combination of 24 letters, form some myriads of words, what must be the result of their 330 original words, when multiplied by all those inflexions?

c It would be an useless task to carry our inquiries farther into the genius, grammar, and other peculiarities, of this language (K), which the curious may see in those authors who have written upon it *ex professo, or to dwell longer on the difficulty of learning it, especially to strangers, from the various significations which the words acquire by that variety of accents, as well as from the difficulty of rightly distinguishing them. To give an instance of it; the word Chu, or Shu, pronounced in the higher note, and lengthening the vowel u, signifies a master, or lord; in a lower tone, a hog; pronounced short, it signifies a kitchen; and with a strong masculine tone, a pillar, or column. According to the same variation of accents, the word Po, tho' so short a monosyllable, hath no less than eleven different significations; in the one it signifies a glass, in another to boil, in a third to fan or winnow corn, in others it means to break, to split, to water, to prepare, an old woman, a slave, a liberal man, a prudent person, and a little. Very near the same thing may be said of all their other primitive words, and the great difficulty a reader will find to investigate their variety of significations, from any rules hitherto given us, and much greater still to comprehend the different sounds, fix the various meanings from the several ways of spelling, by which the missionaries, and other European writers, have endeavoured to express them; so that, after the most curious and intense application in consulting all the grammars and lexicons of the Chinese tongue, and observing the vast difference in which those authors spell the very same word; and what pains some of the latter sort, particularly Father Du Halde, and his English interpreter, have taken to fix some more certain rules for writing that language in our European characters, and how short they themselves own they have come of the mark†; it will not be a wonder if, after all these pains, they do not set down at the foot of the account LABOUR LOST.

(K) From the scantling we have given above, our readers will easily guess how difficult and endless such a task would be, and what a deal of time and pains it must take to come even at a tolerable knowledge of such a copious and intricate language. Magailan doth indeed suppose, that an European might easily learn it in a few months, and with more ease than the Greek or Latin, because all the words that compose it might be learned in a day. He might as well have affirmed, that music might be learned in an hour, as Le Compte justly observes, because the few notes of it may be learned in less than a minute (12).

The primitive words may be indeed easily learned; but the difference of accents, tones, modulations, and other changes of their voice, by which their great variety of significations is conveyed to the mind, is not only a work which requires the greatest study and application, but likewise a very retentive memory; and even with all these a man may still miscarry, whose ear hath not been accustomed from his infancy to distinguish that great variety of sounds, and who hath not framed his voice to a right modulation of them; seeing the least deviation from it will give the word another and perhaps a quite opposite sense. The same may be said of a good number of their consonants, especially the compound ones, as ts-ng; and of their gutturals, which have a quite different sound from that we are used to give them; and can never be perfectly attained, except people begin to learn them when they are young.

Great variety
of dialects, and pronuncia-tions.

FOR it is not only the vulgar Cbinese (which hath as many different dialects and pronuncia-tions as there are cities and villages) that is thus hard to be attained, but the same difficulty runs, though not in the same degree, through the Mandarin or polite language, which is most universally spoken through the empire; for not only every province, but every city and town, and it can hardly be otherwise, pronounces it in some different way; which, considering that this chiefly fixes the various significations of the same word, makes it quite unintelligible to all the rest, except such as, by travel or conversation, have accustomed themselves to that variety;
so that it often happens that a man, who hath perfectly learned the pronunciation of one province, will find himself as it were in a strange country as soon as he passes into another, and will be forced to rack his brain to understand what is said to him, or to make himself understood: and though the Cbinese of one province may, by custom, observation, or some kind of rote, be able to understand those of another, the case will be found quite otherwise with a stranger, who, after he hath spent three or four years in learning it, and can make shift to stammer it in such a manner as to be tolerably well understood by those that are used to his jargon, will be forced, after all, to have an interpreter, whenever he happens to be among those he never saw before. We will only add, that, besides the various ways in which each province sounds the vowels and consonants, and the different accents or tones in which they pronounce the words, they observe several degrees of lenity and rapidity in speaking them, to express their proper signification, which may easily escape the nicest ear, that hath not been early accustomed to them; for want of due attention even on which nice particular, either in the speaker or hearer, men will, instead of understanding each other, either be playing at cross-purposes, or be forced to be ever repeating what they have said or heard: so that, upon the whole, the Cbinese language can never be learned to any tolerable degree, except it be done from one's very infancy^z.

Writing.

THEIR writing is still more difficult and intricate, because, as we lately hinted, they write not with letters, or an alphabet, as most other nations do, but by characters signifying a syllable or whole word, and which, though chiefly composed of six principal strokes, such as the reader will find described in the margin (L), yet may be, and are, combined into such a prodigious variety, as exceeds the capacity of most men to learn in a whole life, though natives, and men of letters; and it is to this vast multitude of characters, and the difficulty of learning their several combinations, that most writers impute the small progress and improvements which the Cbinese nation hath made in the sciences, there being so great a part of their time spent in learning to read and write their own language.

Why still more intricate.

Ancient hieroglyphics,

ANTIENTLY they only used hieroglyphics, and rather painted than wrote: a round circle signified the sun, a crescent the moon, a square the earth or a house, a crooked line bending in and out, a river; a triangular figure, a mountain, a group of trees, a forest, &c. which might be easily done, when the number of ideas was contained within a small compass, and

^z DU HALDE, & al. sup. citat.

(L) As our writing-masters tell us, that most of the letters of our alphabet are composed of the j and o; so the Cbinese pretend, that all their characters are, properly speaking, formed of the six following strokes (13):

but how, and by what rules, these are combined together, to compose such an infinite variety of characters, we are not told; and whoever will be at the pains of analysing any large quantity of their characters, will soon discover a great variety of their members, which are by no means reducible to the six above mentioned, though he should allow himself the liberty of altering their position all manner of ways, as a transverse into an upright, or even turning them upside-down, or about to all points of the compass. This pretended rule seems therefore to us rather an amusement, calculated by the superior class of the Literati, or doctors of the first rank, merely to conceal the true mystery of combining them, not only from the vulgar and strangers, but from the lower classes of their learned, or rather perhaps to discourage them from attempting the discovery of it, by putting them upon a wrong scent, which, they well know, will soon make them despair of ever coming at it.

Were we to allow ourselves the liberty of following the conjecture of a few learned men in some of our foreign academies, which, though hitherto unsuccessful in unravelling the whole mystery, yet have dived so far into it, as to give one very strong hopes that the foundation is just; and may in time, by proper helps and application, and a genius suitable to the task, be set in so clear a light, as to put it beyond all possibility of doubting; we should tell our readers, which is no more than we believe, and are in a great measure convinced of by our own experience, that all this infinite variety of characters is as reducible to a regular alphabet, as our infinite variety of words is; only with this difference, that whereas we dispose our vowels and consonants in one way, that is, one after another, in the same order as they are sounded, and with the accents over the letters, they, on the contrary, place the consonants in the most conspicuous part of the character, and the vowels, accents, and other critical prints or marks, on the top and bottom, and on either side, according to some certain rules prefixed and agreed among them. All this may the more easily be done in their language, by reason of the shortness of their words, which seldom exceed two consonants and two vowels, and perhaps an accent or two, either tonical or grammatical.

It would even be easy to shew, that the mercantile part must have some more expeditious way to read and write those characters, which barely relate to their profession, their religion, and morality, than that tedious and intricate way we have been speaking of; because we are told, they are commonly instructed in them from their infancy, down even to the children of the meanest mechanics; and they contract thereby such a habit, or even delight, in reading, that one shall hardly see any of them, when their hands are off from their business, without a book before them (14).

a confined to things tangible, visible, &c.; but when they began to multiply, and extend to such objects as could not be represented by drawing, they were obliged to have recourse to these characters, of which we have given an account in a former part of this work^a; and which, whether proper hieroglyphics, or not, are combined in such a regular manner, as to answer to all the vast variety of terms used by them, both in all exigencies of life, and in all their arts and sciences; but the manner of joining and combining the several original strokes which compose it, and run through the whole, is a mystery known only to the highest class of the learned.

THESE characters have been since multiplied to such a degree, as to amount to 25,000, according to some; to 30,000 or 40,000, according to others; and by some of the latter writers even to 80,000; though there are but few of their Literati who understand half of them, and he is reckoned a very learned man amongst them who is master of 15,000 or 20,000; because the greater number of them a man knows, the greater quantity and variety of books he is able to read. By this, if it be really the case, one may guess what length of time it must take to learn such a prodigious number of them, to distinguish when they are or are not compounded, and to remember their respective significations and shapes; if what we lately hinted do not make it more than probable, that their highest ranks of Literati are possessed of a more expeditious way of attaining this kind of learning, which they yet may design- edly conceal from the rest, to prevent the too great increase of competitors to the highest pre- ferments in the state; and to reserve to themselves and families the shortest and easiest way to wealth, honour, and grandeur; and, what they seem to affect above all the rest, to the distinguishing prerogative of wearing long nails (M). And this may probably account for the small number of those eminent Literati in comparison of the rest, who attain their know- ledge in the learned books by the mere drudgery of labour and study; though even in this last case, it must be owned, that those who can advance so far as to be able to read about 10 or 15,000 characters, may still be learned enough to express themselves clearly in their own language, and to be able to read a sufficient number of books to pass for men of learning, and be intitled to some considerable posts in the government (N).

BESIDES the characters above-mentioned, they have a very antient sort still in use among them, tho' chiefly in titles, inscriptions, seals, and devices, and in some old books, which, for that reason, the learned are obliged to understand. They have also a common running- hand for deeds, bonds, acts of justice, &c. And, lastly, they make use of a letter or pecu- liar character for dispatch of business; but which requires a more than ordinary study and application, on account of the great variety of strokes, abbreviations, ligatures, and other singularities, which make it difficult to learn^b.

THEIR style in writing, especially among those of higher rank, is grave, concise, abstruse, and allegorical; and sometimes so obscure, that it requires a perfect knowledge of the cha- racters, as well as a deep attention to them, to avoid making frequent mistakes in reading them. Their allegories are bold, and often sublime; but that which gives the greatest orna- ment to their style, is the frequent interspersing it with sentences out of the canonical books. Next to that they value themselves extremely for writing neatly, drawing their characters truly and beautifully, for that they prefer to fine painting; and even the unlearned will pay an uncommon regard for a scrap of paper on which the characters are finely written, though they know not what it contains.

THEIR way of writing those characters (contrary to most other nations) is from the top to the bottom. They begin their first line on the right side, and so go regularly on to the left. They observe the same rule with respect to the order of their pages; so that the farthest of them towards the right is always the first. They use pencils instead of pens, which they hold, not obliquely, but upright, and scarcely suffer their hand to touch the paper. Their ink is a compound of lamp-black, made of some sorts of burnt woods, or oil, and mixed with a kind

(M) It is esteemed a characteristic and prerogative of a profound scholar, or a man of deep learning, among the Chinese, to wear their nails of a considerable length; in such that some of their most eminent doctors will have them as long as their fingers.

(N) To ease the learners as much as they think proper in this difficult task, these doctors have compiled some sorts of lexicons and vocabularies, in which that vast variety of characters is ranked in several classes, pretty much in the same method as the Hebrew ones do all their words under their respective roots. Thus, for instance, every thing that relates to heaven, earth, mountain, man, horse, &c. is to be looked for under the character of heaven, earth, mountain, man, horse, &c. These vocabularies are more or less extensive, that is, comprehend a greater or lesser number of cha- racters, as suits best with the exigence of the learner. Some of them containing only about 8000, others 10,000, or more; but the most complete is that which they call the Hay-pyen, in which they may find any of those which are wanting in the lesser ones (15).

of gum-water, which gives it a consistency; after which it is cast in of long square cakes, a for use, after having first mixed with it some quantity of musk, or other perfume, to take off the disagreeable smell of the lamp-black, which is also more or less send, according to the nature of the oil or combustible of which it is made. When ink hath been preserved a considerable time, it is then seldom used for writing; but becomes, according to them, an effectual remedy against the bloody-flux, and convulsions in children. They look upon it as an excellent alcali, and sweetener of the blood, by absorbing the sharp juices of it. The dose is commonly about two drachms of it to a grown person, in a glass of water or wine.

THEIR paper, which has been commonly supposed amongst us to be made of silk, by reason of its thinness, and beautiful white shining colour, is made of the inward bark of the bamboo, and several other trees (O). They have several sorts of it; which, with their various ways of making, whitening, silvering, and preserving, it, the reader may see at large in Du Halde, and other authors^c. It is so thin and transparent, that it will not bear being written but on one side; and, when they are obliged to write on both sides, they generally double the leaves, and join them together with a fine glue, which is scarcely discernible; the paper being so smooth and even, and the glue so thin and clear, that it still looks like a single leaf. And this is the method they use also with respect to their bound books, whether written or printed, as well as with the prints or cuts that are interleaved with them. The invention of paper in China, according to their account of it, is reckoned to be almost as old as our Christian æra, or within about fifty years of it^d: before that time, they rather engraved, than wrote, with an iron tool, upon thin planks of some hard wood, or of bamboo, which were consequently more lasting than any parchment. At least all their canonical, and other valuable antient books, were couched upon such hard and durable materials, and not upon paper made of the bark of trees, as some late writers have absurdly imagined, and even ventured to affirm[†]. In process of time, they came to write with the hair pencil upon white sattin; and, after the invention of printing, upon some sort of paper, but such as was far enough from being so friable and brittle as hath been pretended; especially that which is brought thither from Korea, and is very near of the same toughness as vellum; though, had that which they used for printing been less durable, the planks would have still remained the same.

THE art of printing hath been in use in China from time immemorial, but in a very different manner from that which we use in Europe; though it is not improbable that the celebrated John Fust, or Faust, of Mentz, took the first hints of his discovery from them, his first essays being exactly after the Chinese manner, by wooden planks, and with the same kind of ink, and only on one side of the paper or parchment^e, till his son-in-law Peter Scheffer invented the fusile or metal types, and, with them, a new sort of ink made of varnish, or boiled oil, the same which hath been in use ever since; but this improvement would be absolutely impracticable among the Chinese, on account of the vast number of characters they use, which would require cases of some hundreds of yards in length to contain even one bare half of them. Their method is, whenever they want any thing to be printed, to have the copy well and exactly transcribed by a good writing-master: after which, every page is glued very smoothly on a separate block of some hard wood, like those we use here for wooden cuts; so that the engraver hath nothing to do but follow the exact strokes of his copy, by cutting down with a sharp-pointed knife all the wood that lies under the white of the paper, and leaving all the black strokes untouched, which by that means become embossed, and prominent enough to receive the ink upon them. In this way of printing, which requires as many blocks as the book contains pages, there can be no long time spent in correcting the proofs, seeing the graver works by the strokes of the copy itself; and cannot possibly err, if the manuscript be exact. There are several other advantages in it, which ours hath not; one is, that those planks, when engraved, may serve for as many editions as the work will

(O) That which is most in use among them, is called Ku-chi, from the Chu-ku, or Ku-chu, tree, from whose inner rind it is taken; which tree in figure nearly resembles our mulberry, but, by its fruit, is rather a kind of fig-tree.

Their herbals prescribe a method of cultivating this useful plant, so as to produce the greater quantity of bark, and in the perfection that is required for making this sort of paper; which is as follows. At the vernal equinox, take the kernel of the tree, and having washed it, mix it with the seed of the Sesamou (which is what the Portuguese call Gergelino), and scatter them together, at random, upon the ground. The Gergelino will sprout out with the first shoots of the Chu-ku; but you must take care not to cut it in the autumn, nor in the winter, but stay till the next spring, and then set fire to the field. That very year you will see the plants of the Chu-ku increase considerably; and at the end of three years it will be fit to cut, and make paper of (16).

a bear, and at any distance of time, without the necessity of a new composition, or other labour, than perhaps retouching the faces of the characters when they are battered by long use. Another is, that they only print the sheets as they are bespoke; so that they are in no danger of losing by over-printing themselves, as is too commonly the case in Europe. A third is, when a book is become scarce, and not easily to be got, one may go to the printer, and get a single one printed with ease, cheapness, and expedition; there being no more required than the looking out the blocks, and bringing them to the press. The last advantage we shall mention is, that they can print books in any other language in the same way, and with all the ornaments of initial letters, head and tail-pieces, &c. and, provided the copy be but exact, and finely written, it may be not only fairly and exactly cut, but even receive some improvements from the engraver. The only inconvenience it hath, besides that of being printed only on one side, is, that it requires a vast deal of room to keep those blocks in, and such as, were books to be printed with them in such vast quantities as they are in Europe, no printer could possibly find stowage for; so that, all things duly weighed, our European method is vastly preferable to it (P).

We have already taken notice of their folding or doubling the paper, as its transparency will not admit of its being printed on both sides, without confounding the characters. Hence, in the binding of their books, they take care to have the fold at the edge, or outward margin, and the opening at the back, at which they join one leaf to the other; and, in order to direct the binder how to place the sheets, so as to answer each other exactly, there is a black line drawn upon the folds of the sheets, which runs through the whole number of them, and serves to the same purpose as the register or point-holes which are made in our printed sheets, which not only direct the pressmen how to place them exactly at the reiteration, but likewise the binder how to fold them up exactly, and according to their form. Their books are commonly covered with a kind of grey paste-board, or, if for the curious, with a fine satin, or flowered silk. Some of the richer sort are covered with red brocade, interspersed with gold and silver flowers, and appear neat enough to the eye, though none of them either so convenient or beautiful as ours^f.

(P) We are told, however (17), that they have since fallen into a way of printing by separate types, not indeed of metal as ours are, but of wood; and, by the help of them, correct and alter their Present State of China, which is printed at Pe-king every three months. Our author adds, on the authority of common report, that the same thing is done at Nan-king and Su-chew, where they print little books as neatly and correctly as those that are engraven by the best hands. If that be true, which we much question, it can never be done with so little difficulty as he pretends: for, if we should allow those books to require no more of those characters than 1000, and we can hardly suppose that any of them can contain less than 1000 different words (that, especially, called The Present State of China, one would rather suppose to require at least double that number); a case, containing 1000 boxes, cannot be so easily reached, nor every character so readily found out by a compositor, as he imagines. To which we may add, that separate wooden types, should we suppose them to be even a quarter of an inch square, will be apt in time to twist and warp with the weather, and much more by the dampness of the Chinese ink, which is not made of oil boiled into a varnish, as that which our printers use, which neither their wooden blocks or types, nor their soft paper, could admit of; but it is of a watery nature, like that we write with, except that it is mixed with a small quantity of glue, to give it a consistence: so that, by the frequent swelling and warping of the wood, it would be in some measure impossible to keep the lines strait and perpendicular; or, though the form be kept ever so closely locked up, to prevent some of those characters starting up above their level, or even quite out from the rest, which would soon shew them the necessity of exchanging them for fusile or metal ones; for this, we are told by the writers above-quoted, of the origin of printing in Europe, happened to the first discoverers and improvers of that art, whose frequent miscarriages with those wooden types put them upon excogitating the more solid metal ones (18).

Of the agriculture, silk manufacture, china-ware, japan, varnish, and other inferior arts, of the Chinese.

AMONG their other inferior arts, we shall begin with that of agriculture, not only as the most antient and beneficial among, but as best understood, encouraged, and improved, by, them, beyond any other nation in the whole world. We have already given, in a former part of this work^g, some account of the vast encouragement and improvement which it received from Shin-nong, their very second emperor, their history furnishes us with many other such signal examples, particularly that of their seventh monarch Yau, who, according to them, began to reign 2357 years before Christ, and who preferred a worthy husband.

man, named Shun, to his own son, to succeed him in the empire. Shun, and his successor Yu, who was chosen after the same manner, not only promoted husbandry with uncommon zeal, but the latter wrote several books on that subject, taught them how to drain the low lands, to till, dung, and water them, in the easiest and most frugal manner. Their examples were followed by so many of their successors, that it inspired the subjects with an extraordinary esteem and fondness for all kinds of agriculture, and made them readily submit to the greatest fatigues and hardships of it, not so much from a regard to the emoluments accruing from it, as from a kind of sacred veneration they had conceived for those antient and royal promoters and encouragers of it.

its honour.*

*Persons promoted for their application to

HENCE, as is currently believed, took birth that grand and solemn festival which is celebrated every year in all the cities in China, in the day of the sun's ingress into the 15th degree of Aquarius, which is with them the beginning of the spring (Q), as well as that other ceremony performed by every new emperor, in the rural way, of which we have given an account in a former section^h. One further encouragement some of their wise monarchs have given to husbandry, is worth observing; viz. that every governor of each city is obliged to send an account every year of the person who signalizes himself most by his industry and application in this way, who is thereupon raised to the dignity of a Mandarin of the eighth order, and intitled to the dress, insignia, and other honours, belonging to that rankⁱ; and so intent are those at the helm upon this point, that, upon the arrival of the deputies of the governors at court, the emperor never fails of asking them in what condition the fields appeared to them; and, when a dearth happens in any of the provinces, either through a long drought, a swarm of locusts, &c. those monarchs commonly remit to them a great part, if not the whole tribute of grain of that year, as we have formerly seen by some of their declarations from the throne^k.

soil.*

Every spot improved.

It must be owned, that the soil, for the most part, as well as the happy temperature of their climate, doth richly deserve, as well as amply reward, their care: and though in so vast a tract of ground, there must be, of course, a great variety of soil, some more and others less fertile, yet such hath been the indefatigable industry of the Chinese nation, that every spot hath been improved, and made to produce some of the conveniencies of life, from the highest barren mountains down to the fertile vallies and plains; insomuch, that there is scarcely a province which doth not yield a sufficient maintenance for its numerous inhabitants, and some of them, especially towards the southern parts, almost double what will suffice them. So careful are they of procuring every kind of manure (R), that may enrich their land, that they will purchase it at a high rate; and so fearful of losing a foot of their ground, that one shall not see either a hedge, ditch, or even tree, in their corn lands. They will even deprive themselves of the pleasure of planting flower-gardens, fine walks, and other such useless gratifications, as they style them, for the sake of making them productive of what is more for the public good. We have already taken notice, in our description of the several provinces of China, that the southern ones produced a double crop of grain every year, besides

(Q) The ceremony of this festival is as follows: The governor, or chief Mandarin, of every city, is carried out of his palace in a chair of state, preceded by banners, torches, and musical instruments. He is crowned with flowers, and, in that solemn manner, moves towards the eastern gate of the city, as it were to meet the spring, attended with several litters painted and adorned with variety of curious silk tapestry, exhibiting the portraiture of illustrious persons, who had practised husbandry, and other histories on that subject. The streets are covered with tapestry, and, at proper distances, adorned with triumphal arches, lamps, and other illuminations.

Among other figures carried in the procession, there is a cow of earthen ware, with gilt horns, and of such a monstrous size, that forty men can hardly carry her. Behind the cow follows a young child with one foot shod, and the other bare, whom they style The genius of labour and industry, and who strikes the cow continually with a rod, as if to make it go forward. Behind him follow all the husbandmen playing upon some instruments, and attended by companies of masked comedians, acting some kind of rural plays. In this manner they proceed to the governor's palace, where they strip the cow of all her ornaments; and, drawing out a great number of lesser ones made of the same clay, out of her belly, present them to the multitude, together with the fragments of the great one, which they break into small pieces. The ceremony ends with a short speech, which the Mandarin makes to the people, in which he recommends husbandry to them, as one of the most conducive things to the welfare of the state (19).

(R) Of this they have great variety, such as dung of all sorts, none excepted, which they take care to temper with a proportionable quantity of water, to prevent its burning up the young plants. Hair of all kinds, as human, hogs, horses, &c. is found to give strength to their lands, especially to those sown with rice, and lime mixed with water, to destroy worms, insects, and weeds, and to give a cherishing warmth to the ground. They have a great many other ways of manuring and cultivating their lands, which we have no room to expatiate upon; and can only add, that if those who wrote on the subject of agriculture among them, had been more versed in physics and natural philosophy, they might have still made much greater improvements in that so useful and necessary art.

a a vast variety of the finest fruits, herbs, &c. Those that are situate more towards the north and west, though not so fertile, yet yield plenty of wheat, barley, millet of various sorts, tobacco, peas that are always green, and a kind of black and yellow sort, which they give to their horses instead of oats.

NOTHING can be more fruitful than their low-lands, which are intersected with such a vast number of canals, as constantly furnish them not only with a sufficient supply of water, but also with other manure, which is brought thither in barges: and in these low-lands it is that the best rice grows, and in the greatest plenty; because that grain thrives best in watery grounds (S). But their industry and skill is still more visible in their high-lands; first, by the great number of them which they have levelled, where their labour and number of hands could compass it to any advantage; secondly, by flattening and levelling the very summits of many of their high mountains, and cultivating them so, as to bear variety of grain, pulse, fruit-trees, and timber, according as their nature and situation would allow; and thirdly, by levelling the declivity of those mountains into as many flat stages, or terraces, as they could bear. By which means, the waters, whether of rain, dew, or snow, or those which come down from the top, have a commodious descent, and proper time to soak into the ground, and nourish the seed sown, instead of rooting and washing it down, as they do in other countries, by the violence of their course along their natural declivity. And it is no small delight to travel through vallies, or plains, of several leagues in length, surrounded with these hills and mountains, cut from the bottom to the top into terraces, three or four feet wide, and rising one above another, to the number of twenty or thirty, and covered over with corn, pulse, fruit, and with an almost constant verdure. It must indeed be owned, that the substance of these mountains is nothing so hard as that of rocky ones, but rather of so soft and porous a nature, that they may be easily cut with axes, and other instruments, some of them above 100 feet deep; and the salts and moisture which transpire through those pores, prove a constant and excellent manure for those artificial grounds. Neither do the husbandmen so far depend either on the rains and dews, or on the springs that flow from the higher parts, but whenever the latter are wanting, or the former happen to fail, they have an excellent way of conveying a sufficient quantity of water to the very top, by means of large pipes made of bamboo, and which is forced up thither by some water-work below. Even in those provinces where their mountains are of a more stubborn and rocky nature, one shall hardly see any of them that are not all over covered either with fruit or timber-trees, of some use or other to the public¹.

BESIDES the great plenty of corn, grain, and pulse, of all sorts, which almost every part of this country produces, it hath likewise a sufficient quantity of pasture-ground, whereon to breed a vast quantity of cattle of all sorts, great and small, of the tame kind; whilst their spacious woods and forests supply them with as great plenty and variety of wild ones, such as buffalo's, wild boars, deer of several kinds, elephants, (T) &c. amongst the useful ones;

(S) It is observed, that the rice which grows in dry and higher lands, neither yields so plentiful a crop, nor is so well tasted, but is commonly harsh and hard, and requires more boiling, than that which is sown in low and moist ground. In the latter, they commonly sow that grain at first without any order; but, as soon as it is grown up a root, or a foot and half high, they pluck it up by the foot, and make it into a kind of small sheaves, which they plant by a line, chequer-ways; without which method, the stalk, which is long and slender, could never support the weight of the ear, especially against winds and rain.

But before they thus transplant it, they take care to level and smooth the ground, by plowing it three or four times, always up to the ankles in water, and breaking the clods with the heads of their mattocks. This done, they smooth the surface, by means of a wooden machine, drawn by a buffalo, which is guided by a man who stands upright on the machine, to the end that the water, in which the rice naturally grows, may be every-where of an equal height; insomuch, that those rice-grounds appear more like a vast garden covered with water, than an open field. When the ear is come to its fullness, the water is drained from the ground, that the heat of the sun may bring it to its full ripeness (20).

(T) This noble and useful creature is mostly bred in the provinces of Yun-nan and Quang-si, where there are herds of wild ones; though other parts have them likewise, in smaller quantities, which, when once well tamed, become very serviceable to them. It is too well known to need a description, either of its shape, strength, and other amiable qualities, especially its singular docility. The Chinese pay a kind of veneration to it, and attribute such a number of virtues to almost every part of them, after their death, as we should be loth to warrant; such as, that the eye, infused in woman's milk, and a drop let fall into a sore eye, is an effectual cure; that a little bone, which runs across the breast, being reduced to ashes, and drank in some wine, renders the body more active, supports it above water, and assists it in swimming; with many others of the like nature (21).

Their woods do likewise breed some rhinoceroses, variety of baboons, monkeys, and other creatures, which are kept rather for sight than use; particularly the province of Se-chuen produces one sort, which they call Sin-sin, which is of the ape kind, but is reported to be as tall as a middle-sized man, and to bear a greater resemblance to mankind than any other apes, both for the facility with which it walks on its hind-feet, ones; leopards, tygers, bears, wolves, foxes, and a variety of others not known to us, among those of the destructive kind; but which afford the Cbinese the diversion of hunting, as well as the commerce and profit of their furs, which are commonly very fine, and valuable.

THESE, and a good number of others we shall name under this head, may, by some readers, perhaps, be thought improperly brought in; but as it is no inconsiderable branch of good husbandry to promote the increase of all useful and profitable creatures of the animal as well as of the vegetable kind, and to destroy or suppress the growth of those of the contrary sort in both, and to adapt, as much as possible, the nature of their lands, so as to answer those two main ends, we hope it will not appear quite irregular, upon second thoughts, if we exhibit to them, at one view, the Cbinese management in both, first with respect to the animal, and next to the vegetable, part of the creatures which their country produces.

Tygers.

Musk-cat, and roebuck.

AMONG those of the wild and destructive kind, with which their woods and forests abound, we do not hear of any lions; but tygers are here not only in great quantities, but esteemed as so much the more dangerous, as they fall out for their prey in large droves, and are exceeding quick and fierce. But they have plenty of others of a more valuable kind; particularly their musk-cat, a profitable creature, which carries that noble perfume in a bladder under its navel. They have likewise a sort of roebuck, which they call Hyang-chang-tse, or odoriferous roebuck, the male of which hath a bag of very odoriferous kind of musk. This creature, which breeds mostly on the northern ridge of mountains beyond Pe-king, is first hunted, then killed; immediately after which, they cut off the bag above-mentioned, and tie it very hard, that it may lose none of its effluvia. The flesh is also good to eat; but the bag is esteemed of more value than the rest of the carcase: and to this, as well as the other, or real musk, they ascribe sundry noble qualities; such as, purifying the air, killing several sorts of insects which breed in the stomach; and especially that of the roebuck hath a virtue of stupefying of serpents; which creature, though large, they are affirmed to live upon, and to receive their odoriferous quality from (U).

BUT the most delightful of the whole quadruped kind, is a small stag, which is bred in the province of Yun-nan, and no-where else; but is bought far and near, and at a high rate, by the princes and nobles, merely to be kept for sight in their gardens. These are exactly shaped like the common sort, but their size scarcely exceeds that of our ordinary dogs, on which account they are esteemed as curiosities. But they have a great variety of stags of different kinds in the other provinces, some of which are reckoned as extraordinary for their largeness, they being little inferior to the small horses of the provinces of Se-chwen and Yun-nan.

Birds.

The fine Kin-
ki.

BIRDS and fowl, both of the wild and tame kind, are here in greater plenty and variety than we have room to describe; such as eagles, cranes, storks, hawks, falcons, pelicans, birds of paradise, peacocks, pheasants, partridges, turkeys, geese, ducks, swans, cocks and hens, and a vast variety of water-fowl on their lakes, rivers, and canals, where they swarm in vast droves; and such as are fit to eat are sold at so low a price, that one would hardly think it worth the people's while to kill them. Among the tame and curious sort, they have a variety of beautiful parrots, no way inferior, either in plumage, colours, or facility of talking, to any that are brought from America. But the most surprising and delightful of all the flying kind, is the little bird called Kin-ki, or golden-ben, which is commonly found in the provinces of Yun-nan, Sben-si, and Se-chwen.

THIS admirable creature, which hath nothing that resembles, much less that comes up to, the exquisite fineness of its shape, the beauty, lustre, and variety, of its plumage, the com-and performs several other actions. There is still, no doubt, a much greater variety of strange creatures, which, they tell us, are found in the mountains and forests of this great empire, than our Europeans have been able, as yet, to discover; but many of which have such an air of fable, that they hardly deserve mentioning, much less belief: such is that which they relate of the horse tyger, said to differ only from a horse in its having claws like a tyger, and scales all over its body, and in its leaving the river in the spring, to prey upon man and beast. This monster, the missionaries, who travelled through most territories where it is said to breed, never could see or hear of, though the people were very fond of shewing and entertaining them with every curious thing that was to be seen in that province (Hu-quang); and therefore justly looked upon it as a fabulous one. But, leaving those monsters to their books, where they are only to be found, those woods and forests breed two wild kind of mules, one sort of which, fit only to be eaten, is very fleet, and can never be tamed; but the other may, and is chiefly used for the servants of the Mandarins to ride on. Camels, dromedaries, horses, oxen, and buffalo's, are likewise in great use among them, the former for land-carriage, and the latter to plough and plain their lands: but that which they feed most on is the hog-kind, of which they breed the greatest quantities, both in the upper and low-lands.

(U) This, we are told, is so certain, that the people who hunt after these roebucks have no other way of defending themselves against the bite of those overgrown serpents, but by carrying about them some of that musk, which never fails of stupefying them to such a degree, that they cannot come near enough to hurt them (22).

a plete mixture and arrangement of light and shade, both in its wings and tail, and the fine plume that crowns its head, was, without doubt, called the golden hen on that account. But what renders it still more valuable among the epicures, is the delicate taste of its flesh, which, we are told, greatly excels that of pheasants; for which it is thought by our authorⁿ, of all the birds in the east, the most deserving to be brought into Europe.

THERE is still, if we may believe the Chinese geographers, and those European writers who have followed them upon trust, another still more surprising, if not for the exquisiteness of its taste, yet at least for that of the colours of its feathers, the fine redness of its bill, and the shortness of its life, which exceeds not that of the flower Tung-wba, from which it takes its name of Tung-wba-fung, and upon which it is said to breed, and to take its beautiful likeness from the flower we have had occasion formerly to describe^o. The misfortune is, that the bird is no-where to be found, but in the books of the Chinese geographers; and that in all the province of Se-chwen, and even in the territory of the city of Ching-tu-fu, where that flower blows in vast quantities, and where that bird is said to breed, the inhabitants, we are since told, know nothing of it^p: so that it is now much questioned whether it be not as fabulous a one as that which the same geographers call the Fong-wbang, and which, by their noble description of it, is supposed the same which we call the phoenix, if any such bird there be. For our later authors assure us, there is no such bird to be seen or heard of, either in the mountains or cities said to be called by its name, in the province of Shen-si, nor in any others, either in China or Tartary, where those writers pretend it is to be found. There is, indeed, a most noble one bred in that province, and in some parts of Tartary, called the Hay-tsing, which is a kind of falcon, not inferior to the finest of ours, but excels them in bigness and strength, and, for its beauty and courage, may be called the king of the birds of prey; but it is very scarce, and in such esteem, that as soon as it is caught, it must be forthwith brought to Pe-king, and presented to the emperor, who commits it to the care of his own falconers^q.

The flower bird;

and, like the phoenix, supposed fabulous.

A noble falcon.

Fruits peculiar to the country.

Chinese not so curious in them.

Some of a better sort than ours.

CHINA seems to be designed by nature to produce not only all the fruits which grow in other parts of the world, but likewise several excellent ones peculiar to its soil and climate; so that, if they have not so great a plenty and variety of the former as they might, it is rather owing to their neglect of cultivating them; for, generally speaking, they grow naturally almost in every province, and many of the more delicate kind in the southern parts to a greater perfection than any in Europe. Apples, pears, plums, quinces, apricots, peaches, figs, pomegranates, mulberries, nectarines, grapes, oranges, limons, citrons, melons, to say nothing of walnuts, chesnuts, pine-apples, and others in common with us in Europe, grow almost every-where in great plenty: the only difference is, that they are not so curious as we are in cultivating and improving them, but rather content themselves with having three or four different sorts of apples, seven or eight sorts of pears, peaches, &c.; and as for their cherries, they are hardly worth eating. The only fruits that exceed ours are their pomegranates, a fine sort of muscadine grapes of exquisite taste and flavour, and their Tse-tse, called by the Portuguese Macau, which is a kind of fig, the description of which may be seen in the margin (W). As for the rest, they hardly exceed ours; and some of them, for want of improvement, are much inferior to them, such as, their apricots, peaches, cherries, &c. which, in some provinces, are rather unwholesome, and, if not eaten with caution, will cause dysenteries and the bloody-flux.

OLIVES are here in great plenty and variety, and which, though different from ours, Olives have a very fine taste; but whether out of dislike, or that they do not think it worth their while, they extract no oil from them (X).

(W) It grows upon a stately tree, not unlike our middling walnuts, the leaves of which are of a fine green, till about autumn, when they change into an agreeable red. The fruit is about the bigness of a middling apple, and grows yellow as it ripens; but, when dried, becomes mealy and sweet like a fig; for which reason the Portuguese give it the name of Macau, or fig. There are several sorts of them, some having a ruddier, thinner, and more transparent rind; whilst others, to be brought to that fine colour and flavour, must be laid to ripen in straw; but all are agreeable to the sight, and good to eat. They will grow almost every-where, but in greater plenty in the province of Yun-nan, and all along the sides of the Whang-ho, or yellow river (23).

(X) Their books treat of ten sorts of olives, the best kind of which is that called by them Quang-lan, which is large, and of a fine taste: and it is probable, that if the Chinese had the art of preparing them as they are in Europe, they might all have as good a taste: though in one thing they are more careful than we, in gathering them, viz. not to beat them down with long poles, which are apt to bruise them, and hurt the branches; but to make a hole in the body of the tree, and putting some salt into it, stop it up close, by which they will in a few days drop off of themselves (24).

(23) Vid. Du Halde, vol. i. p. 8,

(24) Ibid.

The Li chi.

AMONG those fruits which grow in the southern provinces, and are of an excellent taste and nature, but unknown to us, the Li-chi is most esteemed. It is shaped like a date, and hath an oblong stone, like that. The fruit is full of moisture, of an excellent taste and flavour when full-ripe; but shrivels, and grows blackish, like our prunes, by keeping. Next to that is the Long-yen, or dragon's eye, which is round, yellowish, and the pulp white, and a little acid. Both these are esteemed very wholesome, especially the latter, which, they say, never hurts, if one eats ever so much of it, but is rather taken to create than to satisfy the appetite.

THEY have likewise some singular as well as useful trees, particularly that which they style the pepper-tree, which bears a sort of grain like a pea, but of too hot a nature to be eaten; but the husk, which is less pungent, is used by the common people instead of it. The pea-tree, which produces a sort of pea, which, for figure, colour, pod, and taste, is much like our common pea, only a little more rank. This last tree is very tall and large, and grows in most provinces of China. The tallow-tree is no less common and profitable; whose fruit is contained in a rind, which, when ripe, opens in the middle like our chestnut, and yields two or three kernels of the bigness of a common hazel-nut, the pulp of which hath the properties of tallow, and, being melted with a small quantity of common oil and wax, is made into candles, and used all over the empire (Y). Their wax tree is so called from the wax that is produced on it by a kind of little worm which runs up, and fastens to its leaves, and quite covers them with combs. This wax is hard, shining, and considerably dearer than that of common bees; though this last they likewise have there, and in much greater quantities. When these worms are once used to the trees of any district, they never leave them, unless something extraordinary drives them away; and when that happens, they never return to them, so that new ones must be procured from those merchants who deal in them.

THE Chu-tze, or what we call in Europe the bamboo or bambu, grows here in vast quantities, and of an extraordinary height; and, being hollow within, is used, the larger sort for water-pipes, and the smaller for telescopes, and other tubes, and the pulp within is made into paper. The Nau-mu is a tall strait sort of a tree, whose wood is incorruptible like the cedar, though its shape, leaves, &c. differ from it. It is commonly used to make pillars, doors, windows, &c. or ornaments for their palaces, temples, and large buildings; but it is in other respects much inferior to the Tze-tau, or rose-wood, which is of a reddish-black, streaked, and full of fine veins, which one would believe to be painted by some artist. The niture, ornaments, and other joinery, made of it, are much esteemed all over the empire, and sell at a greater price than those which are varnished or japanned. We omit a great variety of other valuable and curious trees, such as the cedar, ebony, sanders, pines, oaks, &c. which we have not room to describe.

BUT that which is justly esteemed the most profitable among the Chinese, and hath most excited the envy of the Europeans, is their Tsi-shu, or varnish-tree, from which they extract that gum with which they make their fine giran-varnish, or japan (Z), which keeps such an infinite number of hands employed in most provinces of the empire, and furnishes it with such a prodigious variety of chests, cabinets, boxes, and other household ornaments, so beautifully painted and varnished, and sent abroad into most parts of the world. The next to that in usefulness is the Tong-shu, or oil-tree, from which a liquor or oil is drawn, not much differing from the varnish above mentioned, and used almost to the same end, but chiefly in larger work, such as pillars, cornices, galleries, triumphal arches, fine floors, and the like, for which that is not quite so fit. This oil, when boiled into a consistency, not only preserves the wood over which it is laid, but gives it a fine lustre, and, like the varnish, may be mixed with any colour to great advantage.

(Y) Their way of separating the tallow from the fruit is, by pounding the shell and kernel together, and boiling them in water, upon which, when cold, an oil rises, which condenses like tallow, and is skimmed off. To ten pounds of that, they mix three of linseed-oil, and some wax, to give it a hardness, and prevent its sticking to one's fingers.

The candles are like the segment of a cone, the broader part of which is lighted, and the other goes into the socket of the candlestick. They burn well; and, when put out, give no ill smell, because the wick is made of rush; but would give a much clearer light, and sweeter smell in burning, if care was taken to defecate the oil that is mixed with the tallow, and a cotton wick used instead of a rush, which is apt to burn to a coal, and break short, and can only be snuffed with a keen pair of scissars. Those who are curious mix vermilion, and other colours, with them (25).

(Z) This gum, or liquor, distils only off the tree drop by drop, like that of the turpentine-tree, but may be made to yield a greater quantity by incision; but then the tree is observed to perish much sooner by it.

It is likewise found either in the boiling into a consistency, or even pouring it off cold from one vessel to another, as well as in the spreading it for varnish, to emit such poisonous effluvia, as prove detrimental to those that deal much with it; and from the ill effects of which they have as yet no other way to preserve themselves, than by avoiding as much as possible the sucking them in with their breath.

(25) Du Halde, vol. i. p. 9. 35—94, & seq. & 219. Vid. & Martini Atlas sub voc. Kin-wha, in provinc. Che-kyang, Le Compte, & al.

B THE last of the tree-kind, worth our particular notice, is what they call Tie-li-mu, or iron-wood. Iron-wood. wood, from its extreme hardness, and of which they commonly make their anchors, as hath been formerly hinted. It is indeed very remarkable for its strength, and durable firmness, beyond any other wood; the tree is as tall and spreading as our large oaks, though the trunk doth not come up to their thickness, and the wood is of a much deeper brown, as well as more weighty and tough^a.

THEY have no less a variety of shrubs, which we have not room to particularize in a Shrubs. work like this: but shall content ourselves with singling out those that are most worth notice: at the head of which we may justly place that famed and most profitable one which they call Cha; and corruptly, in some maritime provinces, Tba, or Tcha; from which the Euro- peans have given it the name of Tea, or Te. The profit which the Chinese make of this Tea. plant, since it is become of such universal use in Europe, is immense; and the virtues which both they, and some of our European writers, have ascribed to it, are very extraordinary, Its virtues. if true^r. The reader may see a larger account of them in Father Le Compte, and others of his society, than we dare vouch for; neither is it possible for us to judge of them from that which is brought to us from thence; and which we are assured, by good hands, is so adulterated, and mixed with other leaves, which, though they bear a resemblance to it, may Adulterated. have quite different qualities, that we need not wonder if it comes so vastly short of that which they use upon the spot. We may add, that, since such vast exports have been made of it, they are neither so curious in cultivating, nor in curing of it, as they were formerly; and that which is so, they take care not to let go abroad in its purity, but either keep it for their own use, or mix it with some of a worse sort. What other frauds, and abominable tricks, Frauds com- are used in it by our retailers, after it is thus brought to us, are too sadly known and felt to mitted with it. need mentioning here; all which, put together, have so debased and corrupted that leaf, that it is impossible for us to find in it the tenth part of the good qualities which are ascribed to it; or indeed not to experience many ill effects from the use of it, which it would be wholly free from, could we have it in its purity and perfection, as the Hollanders have theirs from Japan, and be more careful and prudent in the use of it (A).

IT is certain that no nation takes more care in cultivating their tea than the Japaners, nor The Dutch use is more honest in selling it pure and uncorrupt; neither do any people drink it more plenti- it to advan- fully than the Dutch, yet so far are they from feeling those inconveniencies from it which most tage. of ours do, that they reap the greatest benefit from it; and indeed, considering the dampness of their climate, and their high and gross way of feeding, it is to be questioned whether they could be so healthy, and free from diseases, as they are, without such a fine diluter, and purifier of the blood. But then it must be owned, on the other hand, that the good effects Its good quali- they receive from it are in part owing to their drinking it in its genuine purity, and without ties when ge- those correctives mentioned under the last note; so that, without running too far into panegyric in favour of that plant, we may safely affirm, that tea, duly cultivated and cured, and drank moderately, both as to quantity and strength (B), and especially either with- out, or at least with only a small quantity of, sugar, and without any additional correc- tives, is a singular diluter, and purifier of the blood, a strengthener of the brain and stomach, a promoter of digestion and circulation, of perspiration, and other secretions, a

(A) It is indeed rather a wonder, all things rightly weighed, that it is not attended with more dangerous effects, considering that most people among us help to corrupt and adulterate it still more, in their constant use of it, either by the immoderate quantity of sugar they drink, and the pretended correctives they mix, with it, such as chemical drops, saffron, spirituous liquors, &c. to say nothing of their irregular and indiscriminate use of it, without regard to particular tempers and constitutions; and, by some, both stronger, and in large quantities than even the Chinese do their pure and genuine sort.

Hence we may reasonably infer, that those flatulencies, indigestions, vapours, colics, lowness of spirits, diabetes, and other disasters, which commonly attend it, may be no less owing to our indiscretion in using it, than to the cheats that are practised in it. See the next note.

(B) It is plain that neither the Chinese, Japaners, nor any other eastern nation, drink it either so strong, or in such quantities, nor so hot, as we do in England; but use it rather as their common drink, and without any sugar, or other sweetener. They commonly keep, especially in large families, a boiler, or some other vessel, over a fire; and, whenever they are thirsty or faint, they put a few leaves of it in a basin, and pour the hot water upon it, and, as soon as it is cool enough to drink, swallow it down, and go about their business; so that the custom of sitting so long at the tea-table, as we do, is unknown unto them, and is only an idle, luxurious refinement (or rather abuse), we have made upon their way of using it.

We are likewise assured, that the discovery of that infusion was originally owing to the brackishness of their water, especially in the lower provinces, where they were not only very unpleasant, but unwholesome to drink; till after a multitude of experiments tried, in order to correct them, they stumbled upon this shrub, which not only answered the end, but was found to have several other qualities to recommend the use of it, such as those which we have particularly mentioned above; upon which it gradually became in great esteem and vogue all over the empire (27).

(27) Martini, Le Compte, Nieuhoff, Kämpfer, Du Halde, & al.

cleanser of the reins and urethra, and a great preservative against chronic diseases, as well as an effectual, though slow, remedy against them. The Chinese make no scruple to give it in great quantities in high fevers, colics, and other acute distempers. Neither are those rare virtues confined to its native soil, but extend their efficacy to any other country or climate, where it is used, particularly in England, France, and Holland. And thus much may suffice concerning the genuine virtues of that plant, could we have it as genuinely conveyed to us.

Great variety,
whence.

THERE is now a great variety of teas in China, which, as it still increased in the great exports of it, hath obliged the natives to propagate the growth of it in several parts, where the soil or climate was more or less agreeable to that shrub; for most of their difference is owing to that, they being originally derived from, and are in all other respects, the same plant. Hence proceeds that difference of taste, flavour, colour, and other qualities, we find in them; some being very rough to the taste and stomach, and others as smooth; some exhaling an extraordinary fragranc^y, and others having scarce any smell; some being found more balsamic, others more stomachic, diuretic, &c. than others: and hence also that variety of names they are called by, either from their different qualities, or the places they grow in. Thus the Songlo, which is a most elegant sort of green, and much esteemed and drank by the richer sort, hath its name from a mountain in the province of Kyang-nan, which is quite covered with it; and the Vu-i, or, as we call it, Bohea, from the mountain of Vu-i-shan, in the province of Fo-kyen, where it grows in great quantities, and is excellent in its kind (C).

And of names.
Songlo and Vu-i, or Bo-hea, their virtues.

THIS last is the most universally, and we may add justly, esteemed, not only for its fine taste and flavour, but much more for its medicinal and other excellent qualities, particularly that of its rectifying the blood, recovering decayed constitutions, and being so friendly and agreeable to the weakest stomachs. Hence it is that they give it in large quantities to sick people, valetudinarians, and in all cases of an inward decay; whilst those that are in health forbear to drink of it in the winter, as being apt to open the pores too much, and to bring colds and coughs upon them; but in summer indulge themselves with it in large quantities, in order to supply those liquids, which are exhausted by perspiration, with its cherishing and balsamic juices, to which they mostly ascribe that fat corpulency which is so common and admired amongst them.

same shrub with the green.

WHETHER this and the green tea were originally different plants, or whether the same, only differently cultivated, is a question that hath for a long time exercised the talents of the curious, and is not as yet thoroughly agreed on. The Chinese could easily resolve it, if they pleased; but are too shy of the Europeans, to give them any the least light into it; so that we are wholly left to resolve it from the best observation we can make upon them. According to which, the former hypothesis seems the most probable, from the manifest difference not only of their colour, taste, flavour, &c. but much more from their different effects; the one being rough, and grating to the palate and stomach, even to the degree of an emetic, if taken too strong; the other smooth, pleasant, and healing, and in no case offensive to it: the one a stomachic, and strong diuretic; the other rather a sweetener and purger of the blood by gentle perspiration, and nourishing and enriching it by its balsamic quality: yet, after all, the latter notion hath at length prevailed; and this difference of their effects has been, with no small probability, supposed to proceed from the different times in which the leaf is gathered, viz. that of the bohea about a month or five weeks earlier, whilst the plant is in its full flow, and the leaves full of its juice; whereas the green, by being left so much longer on the tree, and that sweet juice either dried up or inspissated by the warmth of the sun, changes its colour into a fine green, and contracts that bitterness and roughness which we find it to have. What seems to confirm this hypothesis is, that the cultivating the bohea in the above-mentioned manner seems to be a discovery and improvement of a century or two's standing, before which they knew nothing of it: at least it is plain, from the account which Mr. Ten Rhine, who resided some time in Japan, and was physician to the emperor about a century and half ago, hath given of it, that it was not then known in Japan (D), though improvement.

(C) So say Le Compte, Du Halde, and others; but some are more inclined to think it hath its name from the dark-brown colour it bears, in which it differs from all other sorts, both in the leaf, and in its infusion. Nor is it a wonder that the mountain above-mentioned should produce such plenty of it, and of a better sort than common, seeing it is covered, we are told, with temples and monasteries, and inhabited by Bonzas, who are fond of that excellent infusion, and, having so much time on their hands, may spend some part of it in cultivating; and bringing it to that perfection; unless we should rather chuse to suppose them to have been the inventors of this new way of cultivating; concerning which, see the next note.

(D) That learned botanist tells us expressly, at the end of his description of that plant, that though he had heard of a certain sort of black or brown tea in use among the Chinese, yet he never saw any; only he had observed, that the coarser the leaves of the tea were, the more yellowish or reddish infusion they gave, and the more disagreeable to the palate, as well as to the eye; by which it is plain he speaks only of the coarser sort of green (28).

though it hath been since introduced and cultivated there to a much greater perfection than any we ever had from Cbina; so that it is supposed that this discovery, being then but recent, had not yet reached Japan when that celebrated botanist wrote his account of the tea of that country, which mentions no other but the various sorts of green*. We shall only add, that as none of their antient herbals speak of the Yu-i, or Bohea, and some of the natives speak of it as a more modern discovery, there is reason to think it an improvement on that old sort; but whether found out by study or chance, we can no-where find. But it is agreed, that the different degrees of its goodness and fineness are owing to the earliness of the season in which it is gathered (E).

b THE Chinese not only use the infusion of it by way of common or diet drink, but take it also in powder, either in water, or mixed with other ingredients, and made into a bolus or electuary. Their physical books ascribe almost as many virtues to it as our quacks do to their pretended panaceas. They prescribe it against the tenesmus and hæmorrhages, against coliciveness, pains of the head or heart, lowness of spirits, itching of the small-pox, imposthumes in the head, reins, bladder, &c. stoppage of the menses, against coughs phthisic, and other rheumatic defluxions and aches, and a number of other diseases; and, to conclude with one of their most singular prescriptions, they tell you that the Yu-cha, or finest tea, powdered, and mixed with an equal quantity of alum, and taken in a glass of water, is a remedy against all sorts of poisons†.

c TEA is propagated chiefly by sowing; for that which grows wild and spontaneous is both raking, and hath such a disagreeable taste, that none but the poorer sort, who have not the nicest palates, care to use it. The time of sowing it is in the second moon of the year; at which time, having prepared their ground, they throw nine or ten seeds into a hole, from which sometimes only one or two, and sometimes more, shrubs will spring; which, at a proper season, are transplanted into another ground, which is also prepared by proper manuring. The plant is cultivated with great care; and that which grows on the lightest ground, and hath the greatest share of the south sun, is reckoned the finest, and thrives best. The shrub or plant hath been variously described by authors, some raising it to the height of a tall tree, and others lowering it beneath the degree of a common shrub. The truth is, that, if it be left to run up to its full height, some of them will shoot up above that of our tallest alderbs, and, by that means, quite degenerate: but the Chinese take care to prevent it, by stinting them to that of six or seven feet. They commonly transplant them in regular rows upon little hills, and about three or four feet from each other. When they have once taken deep root, they will grow in spite of rain, snow, or any weather.

* WILLIEM. TEN RHEIN. excerpt. de Observat. suis Japonic. de frutice Tchia, ad fin. et al. ab eo citat. in hort. Malabaric. † See DU HALDE, vol. ii. p. 223.

It is plain, moreover, to every curious observer, that there is no difference of shape between the leaves of the green and bohea, except that the latter is somewhat more roundish; but whether the reason of that be, as some suppose, its being gathered so much earlier, and before it hath expanded itself to its full length, we dare not affirm, though we think it far from improbable. We are indeed told by some travellers who have been in Cbina, and pretend to have been particularly curious in examining this point, that they had seen plantations of both sorts, and apart from each other, and never observed any thing like both sorts of leaves being gathered from the same tree, and at different times. But admitting there were nothing like that done now, it will not follow that it was not so formerly, and by way of trial, in order to discover the difference of their virtues; and that being afterwards fully satisfied, that those leaves, which were gathered earlier, had a more smooth and balsamic taste and virtue, they might not, by way of improvement, examine which trees, or what climate and grounds, produced the best bohea and which the best green, and so appropriate them accordingly, and dispose them into different plantations; only observing the old method of stripping those of the former so much the earlier in the year, as they do to this day. See the next note.

(E) This we have confirmed by several hands, particularly from the account which Mr. Cunningham, physician to the English at Chusan, sent of it to the Royal Society; wherein he tells them, that the finest, or that which is called the first bud, is gathered in March;

the Bing, or Imperial, in April or May; the Songlo, or Green, in May or June. To this in a great measure agrees Father Du Halde (29); who adds only, that that called the Imperial, or Mau-cha, is the leaf gathered from the shrubs newly planted, or, as the Chinese style it, the first points of the leaves: but this sort is so scarce and precious, that it is seldom used but in presents, or sent to the emperor.

The same almost may be said of the flower of tea, which bears an excessive price, and is only used by the richer sort, and that chiefly on particular occasions, as feasts, marriages, grand entertainments, &c. This last is indeed best when mixed with the finest leaves, otherwise it hardly colours the water, and rather gives a fragrance than a taste to it; and that is the reason why the Mau-cha, or Imperial, is preferred to it at court.

All that need be farther observed on this head is, that what Mr. Cunningham, and others, call the first, or earliest bud, is indeed the finest of the bohea kind; but that there are a great many degrees below it of fineness or coarseness in the leaves, according as they are more or less blown and spread, and according to the part of the tree from which they are gathered; for, during all the time of their being on the tree, the leaves on the top are always the smallest and finest, and consequently the dearest, and grow proportionably larger and coarser the nearer they come to the bottom. The same may be said of the trees, that the older they are, the coarser their leaves (30).

THEY have several ways of curing and drying the leaves, when stript, in order to make them fit for use, which we cannot dwell upon. The bohea is at first dried in the shade; after which, the leaves are again expanded by the steam of hot water, and exposed to the warm sun, or, if that fails, over a slow fire, in copper or earthen pans well glazed, till the heat hath crisped and contracted them into the small compass they come to us in. But those of the green sort being commonly less juicy, are dried up and crisped in the same manner as soon as gathered. As for other niceties relating to their management of that shrub, and its leaves, we must refer our readers to the more copious account given of them by the authors often quoted.

The tea-root is commonly large and well-spread; but, if we may believe Nieuhoff, is only fit for burning, though the Chinese ascribe some great virtues to it.

Leaves.

THE tree commonly bears leaves from the top to the bottom; but the nearer to the top, the finer. The leaf is oblong, and sharp at the end, and indented round like those of our rose or sweetbrier; and the flower not unlike that of the latter, only hath more leaves; or, according to others, is like that of the double jessamin, with six upper and six under leaves. The fruit or apple is of the bigness of a small pippin, but more finely flavoured; and hath a spicy taste, not unlike that of a clove. The seed is blackish, round, and of the bigness of a small hazel when green, or of a large pea when dry. When put into one's mouth, it yields at first a sweet, but, being kept longer in it, a bitterish, taste. The Chinese extract an oil out of it, which they, especially in the province of Fo-kyen, use as a kind of sauce to their victuals. They likewise have a way of pickling the fine green tea-leaves, after they have been infused, and eat them with their meat.

Cotton shrub, how propagated.

THE next beneficial shrub is that which produces the cotton, the manufacture of which into such variety of stuffs is one of the most considerable, next to that of silk and china-ware. The seed is commonly sown on the very same day that the husbandmen have got in their harvest; nothing more being required than to tear a little the surface of the ground with an iron rake. After the rain or dew hath sufficiently moistened it, there shoots up gradually the shrub, till it is got about two feet high, the flowers of which appear about the middle of August: they are commonly of a yellow colour, and sometimes more upon the red, and are succeeded by a button or pod of the bigness of a nut. This pod, which opens in three places about forty days after the first appearance of the flower, discovers three or four bags of cotton, exceedingly white, and of the same form as the cod of a silkworm. To the fibres of the cotton are fastened the seeds, which are to serve for the next year, and from which they must be separated by a kind of wheel, or engine, which the reader will see described in the margin (F); after which, the cotton is carded and spun for use.

plant.

It would be an endless task to describe the other uncommon roots, shrubs, trees, plants, flowers, and other vegetables, with which this country abounds; and we hope our readers will be satisfied with our having mentioned the most remarkable for their beauty, usefulness, or singularity, either in the geographical description of those provinces, where they are mostly to be found, or under this general head of the Chinese agriculture; we shall therefore close this article with a short account of two or three more excellent plants and roots that are in the highest esteem among them and us, for their singular virtues. We might here begin with that most celebrated plant called by them Jin-seng, Gen-seng, or Gem-sen, that is, human plant, which is the most admired, and in greatest request, all over the empire. But as the best of it is only to be found in eastern Tartary, and that which grows in the province of Se-chwen, which, though the nearest to it in all China, is not in any case comparable to it, we shall refer our readers, for the further display, growth, and wonderful qualities of it, to what hath been said in our natural history of what we may call its native soil†; and only observe here, that it is cried up by the Chinese doctors and botanists as the greatest cordial of all the vegetable sort, and as a kind of panpharmacon against all sorts of distempers, especially of the venereal kind.

Tang-que and
rhubarb.

THEIR roots of Tang-que and Hu-bun are also in great use and esteem among them, for their singular virtue of recovering decayed constitutions, prolonging life, and even changing the white hair, caused by old-age, into a youthful black. Their rhubarb and China root are also said to be there excellent in their kind; the misfortune is, that it is next to impossible to get them genuine from the natives, who make no scruple to put the Europeans off with counterfeits;

(F) It consists of two rollers, about a foot long, and an inch thick, the one of wood, and the other of iron, which turn each other by means of a foot-wheel. They are so closely joined together, that, in the turning of them, nothing can pass between but the cotton, which the hand applies to them; whilst the seeds, meeting with a stop, break off from it, and fall into a proper receptacle (31).

(31) Du Halde, vol. ii. p. 319, & seq.

particularly with respect to the latter, instead of which they sell them another sort, not unlike it in shape and colour, but which is neither so weighty, large, nor by far so efficacious when tried * ; and indeed it is the universal complaint of all who have been conversant with them, that they are the greatest cheats in all the east, and make no conscience to corrupt and adulterate every thing they sell or exchange with other nations.

HOWEVER, from what we have said under this head, of the richness of their soil, and their various admirable ways of cultivating and improving every spot of it to the best advantage, ^{China, though so fertile, is yet poor.} their invincible industry, religious attachment to agriculture, and the singular encouragement it meets with from the throne, and from all the grandees of the empire, there can be no doubt but China is, what all the writers of it have affirmed it to be, the most fruitful, rich, and populous, of all the eastern countries, and produces the greatest plenty and variety of every thing that is necessary and useful for food, raiment, physic, and delight : especially if we add to the above account their extensive trade, their many curious and valuable manufactures, rich mines, vast number of lakes, rivers, and canals, which not only furnish them with the greatest plenty and variety of fish, but with the most commodious and effectual means of extending their commerce through every province ; of all which we shall speak in the subsequent articles : so that, all these advantages considered, one might reasonably infer, that the Chinese nation must be one of the happiest under the cope of heaven ; and such it hath been indeed represented by many writers, who had, one would think, all the opportunity they could desire to be well acquainted with it.

AND yet, notwithstanding all this great fertility, industry, and abundance, one may venture to affirm, though it may appear a kind of paradox, that the most rich and flourishing empire of the world is really poor ; and that the land, though fertile and extensive, is so far from sufficient to support its numerous inhabitants, that they would require rather one as large again to be able to live comfortably, and to lay up a convenient quantity of provisions against the years of dearth, which often happen, either through excessive drought, and other untimely seasons ; and much more still at some particular ones, when they are infested with such infinite numbers of grasshoppers as cover the face of the earth, and in a little space not only devour every fruit, leaf, and blade, but even the small wood of the branches, and fibres of the roots, through several parts of the country in one season ; the dire effects of which are sadly felt some years after.

IN such calamitous cases, as well as in times of pestilential diseases, which, notwithstanding the goodness of the air and climate, often rage, and lay waste whole provinces, the common people suffer such dreadful hardships, as often drive them into the most shocking extremes, ^{The misery of the meaner sort.} such as exposing their children, selling their daughters for slaves ; and sometimes even into more violent methods, as robbing, plundering, and, if not timely prevented by the government, into open rebellion. At such times as these it is, if ever, that not only the court, but the most tyrannic and oppressive governors, set all their hands on work to supply their wants from other provinces, or even foreign countries, to prevent the worse effects of their fury and despair. We may add, that, even in their most plenteous seasons, the poorer sort are so terribly oppressed by those in power, as we have had occasion to shew under a former head, that, in spite of ^{Sad way of living.} all their industry and hard labour, they are forced to fare very hard, and are glad to be able to support themselves and families not only on the very refuse of every kind of provisions, but on cats and dogs, though they die of age or sickness, rats, mice, and other vermin, and with the garbage of any flesh, fish, or fowl, they can purchase ; for all these are sold, as well as the more dainty meats, both at the markets, and along the streets * : so that, upon the whole, the great and the rich alone can be said to feel the blessing of the boasted abundance we read of in every description of that opulent empire. And so much may serve for their agriculture.

THE next thing that helps to enrich them is their trade, which is no less encouraged by the government. Even the foreign, which was formerly shut up by their jealous monarchs, hath ^{Foreign trade :} been afterwards laid open by the Tartars since the conquest ; so that they now trade with Japan, Manilla, Siam, Batavia, and other parts of the East-Indies ; and carry thither such of their commodities as best sell there, and bring home others that are wanted at home (G), by which ^{and vast gain.} they

(G) Those which they commonly export to Japan are the roots of Jin seng, china, rhubarb, and other medicinal roots and plants, Arka bark, buffalo and other hides, and sugar, which last they make almost 1000 per cent. by ; silks of all sorts and colours, especially black ; eagle, sandal, and other odoriferous woods, which are burnt before their idols, and some sorts of European clothes.

For these they bring back pearls, of which they likewise make a prodigious gain ; red copper, either in bars or wrought, which, being of a fine ductile nature, and beautiful colour, is in great request in China ; fabrics and cutlasses of an excellent temper ; some of their porcelain and japan-work, which vastly exceeds that of China, and is there sold at a high rate to the nobles and rich, especially the latter, a small cabinet of which, not above two feet high, and broad in proportion, will sell there for 100 pialtres. They likewise bring great quantities of Japan gold, which is esteemed the finest in all the east, and a sort of compound metal called they seldom clear less than 200 per cent.; but by some of their merchandizes, especially their medicinal drugs, sometimes 1000 per cent. Their traffic with the Europeans is another considerable branch. These have indeed scarce any port open to them, except that of Quang-tong, and that only at certain times of the year: neither are they suffered to sail up quite to that city, but are forced to cast anchor at Whang-pu, a place about four leagues short of it, where the river is so crouded with trading vessels for miles together, that it looks like a city on the water.

Manufactures.

That of silk,

THIS trade was once very advantageous to the Europeans, who brought thither clothes, swords, clocks, striking and other watches, looking-glasses, diamonds, crystal, telescopes, and other mathematical instruments, and sold them at a vast rate; but our company hath since so well supplied, if not rather overstocked, them with those commodities, that the trade is greatly dwindled, and is hardly worth carrying on in any thing but silver, and exchanging it for gold (H); which, we are told, is commonly sold more or less dear, according to the time of the year, it being much cheaper in March, April, and May, than from June to January, because this last is the season when there is the greatest number of vessels in the port, or road to Quang-tong. Other commodities brought from thence are too well known to need any farther mention; and all that needs to be added to it is, that the Chinese are such arrant cheats, that they think it neither crime nor shame to over-reach those they deal with, no not even those of their own nation and neighbourhood (I); so that one cannot be too watchful over them.

BUT what they chiefly depend upon is their home traffic, in which we may look upon every province as a separate state or kingdom, some of which abound with certain commodities, or provisions, which others want; and, to communicate which to all the rest, the best methods have been invented, both by land and water-carriage, that each country will admit of. Thus the provinces of Hu-quang and Kyang-si, which abound with rice, supply those that want it; Che-kyang furnishes the finest silks; Kyang-nan the finest ink, varnish, and all sorts of curious works; Yun-nan, Shen-si, and Shan-si, yield plenty of iron, copper, and other metals, horses, mules, furs, &c.; Fo-kyen the best sugar and tea; and Se-chwen the greatest variety of medicinal and other plants, &c.; all which are not only conveyed from one province to another, either by their rivers and canals, or by land-carriage; but, when brought to the place of sale, are commonly dispatched in a few days. The very Mandarins encourage it; and have a share in the gain, by putting their money into the hands of the merchants, to be improved in the way of trade. In a word, there is hardly a family, how poor soever, that will not put itself in some way of it; and, with a small stock, hardly amounting to a crown, degrees, enlarge their stock, or fall into some more profitable branch, and live more at their ease. Thus every town and village, but much more their great cities, swarm with industrious hands all the day long, and all the year round: there being no intermission from any business, except on the two first days of the first moon, which are commonly spent in diversion.

THE next branch of their wealth arises from their manufactures, of which they have great variety. We shall only speak of some of the most considerable, such as their silk and cotton, their porcelain and japan-ware, or varnish.

WE begin with the silk, the invention of which the Chinese records attribute to one of the wives of the emperor Whang-ti; since which, many other empresses have been recorded for the singular care they took to encourage it, by breeding the silk-worms, spinning the silk, and delivering it to the proper workmen and women, to be woven (K). Their example could

Tombac, or Tombaga, to which they attribute many virtues, and make into rings, and other wearing trinkets, for that end. The only one we dare vouch for is, that, being worn next to the skin a few hours, it will stop the most violent bleeding. However, they make a much greater gain by carrying most of the commodities above-mentioned, the gold excepted, to Batavia, and other parts of the East-Indies (32).

(H) Most of the gold that is bought at Quang-tong is brought thither from other parts, especially from Japan and Cochin-China; the latter of which is chiefly sold by the king of that country. Some indeed is sold there by his subjects privately; but is not so fine by a great deal, and must be refined at Quang-tong (33): and is there divided, as all other gold is, into alloys, from 90 to 100 carats, in the same manner as we do in Europe.

(I) They commonly go upon this principle, that every buyer being willing to purchase at as cheap a rate as he can, or even for nothing, if that could be done, the seller hath no less a right to sell as dear as he can, and to make use of any art or method to raise the price of his own ware: whence they infer, that it is not the latter that deceives, but the former who deceives himself, he being under no compulsion to give the price that is asked; so that whatever extraordinary gain the seller makes of his chapman's simplicity, is looked upon as the fruit and reward of his own industry.

(K) We are told, that there was a spacious orchard assigned within the precinct of the palace, and planted with mulberry-trees, the leaves of which are the proper food of that valuable insect; and that in memory of it, as well as to excite the rest by her own example, the

(32) Du Halde, vol. ii. p. 319, & seq. vol. i. p. 334. Vid. & Le Compte. & aut. sup. citat.

- a not fail of exciting the rest of their sex to put their hands to such a profitable as well as Much easier delightful work, by which they were intitled, among other advantages, to exchange their old ragged drefs, which was chiefly that of the skins of animals, for the more easy and elegant one of this new and valuable commodity; so that in a little time the manufacture became in a manner universal, and by degrees split itself into the great and beautiful variety in which the Chinese once excelled most other nations; though it must be here observed, that some provinces vastly exceed others in the goodness, beauty, and workmanship, of it; particularly that of Che-kyang, which, as we have already observed, bears the bell above all the rest for richness, softness, and for producing the greatest quantities of it. But, upon the whole, that manufacture hath been Become the so well cultivated among them from time immemorial, that not only the princes, grandees, common wear, b Literati, and other persons of distinction, but their domestics, the merchants, tradesmen, and mechanics, can afford to clothe themselves with it; none, except those of the meanest sort, and the peasants, who commonly wear a blue cotton, appearing in any other but a silken drefs. The quantities they send abroad of it are no less prodigious; and must, one would think, have long since in some measure exhausted them, were there not an infinite multitude of hands employed in it; so that it is not without reason that China is styled the silk country.
NEITHER are they to be less admired for their surprising ingenuity, diligence, and skill, in Their skill and the management of every branch of it, the elegant contrivance of their looms, and other ingenuity in it instruments for spinning and weaving it in that beautiful variety of colours, patterns, &c. and their great care and skill in breeding, hatching, nourishing, and propagating, of their worms, c providing against, and curing them, of sundry distempers they are liable to, as well as in their excellent way of cultivating their mulberry-trees to the best advantage for their nourishment; the preparing their different apartments, suitably to the various stages they go through, from the time of their being hatched to that of their spinning, and laying their eggs (L); and a great variety of other niceties relating to them, which we have not room to dwell upon, but which those who are curious in such things, may read a particular account of in the author last-quoted^a.

THAT of cotton is another very profitable manufacture, though it doth not branch out into Cotton manu- such great variety as the silken one. We have already shewn how they sow and propagate facture their cotton; and, as to the various cloths they make of it, as muslins, calicoes, &c. their
d excellent way of dyeing and printing them, they are so well known to us, that we need not expatiate longer upon them.

THE Tse-ki, or, as we style it, porcelain or china-ware, manufacture, is of so old a date China-ware, among them, that their records mention nothing either of its inventor or discovery. There is where made a great variety of it made in several provinces of the empire; but that which is the finest, and doth alone deserve the name of Tse-ki (M), is made no-where but in the town of King-te-ching, empres went once a year, attended with the queens, and other ladies of the court, to this orchard; and there, with her own hands, gathered the leaves of three branches, which some of the maids of honour beat down to her. They add, that the finest pieces of silk, which were wrought under her eye, were devoted to the ceremony of the grand sacrifice offered to Ssang-ti (34).

(L) The Chinese have not contented themselves with studying the best methods of improving this curious and useful manufacture, but have written some treatises upon it for public use. Among them was a famed author, who became afterwards one of the first ministers of the empire; and was so thorough a master of that subject, that his experience, and wise observations on the best method of propagating and nourishing that useful insect, have proved of excellent benefit to his nation ever since.

He tells them, among other things, that the apartments appropriated for breeding them up ought to be agreeably situated, if possible, upon a rising ground, and near some rivulets, because the eggs must be often washed, and running water agrees best with them. Their lodging ought to be at a distance from dunghills, sinks, and other nauseous smells, from cattle, and all kind of noise; for that the least disagreeable smell or noise; even the barking of a dog, is apt to cause strange disorders in that tender brood, especially when newly hatched.

The rooms should be square, close, and warm, the door as near to the south as can be, but never to the north; and with a window on every side, to let in the fresh air, as often as occasion requires. These windows, which are mostly kept shut, are of white transparent paper; behind which are moveable mats, so placed, as to shut out or admit the light, as their condition requires. Gnats and flies, which are apt to sit upon the silk case, and to make blemishes on it, as well as render it difficult in the winding, must be kept out of their tenements, or, if possible, the worms should have done their work before the air is infected with them. There is a great number of other such curious remarks in that author, for which we refer our readers to Du Halde's extract of him; but which shew, that the Chinese are much more nice and curious in the management of their silk-worms than our European nations commonly are, who never give themselves any thought about these seeming niceties, so that we need not wonder if their productions come so far short of the Chinese.

(M) We need not tell our readers, that the name of porcelain is unknown to the Chinese, and most likely of Portuguese extract. The antient books that treat of it, have not so much as a name for it, but styled it the precious jewel of Jau-chew (which is the district to which King-te-ching belongs); or else the fine china-ware which is of a lovely shining white, and a clear sky-blue, and comes from King-te-ching. And it is indeed by those two qualities that this sort is known and distinguished Strange accounts about it. King-te-ching, in the province of Kyang-fi, which town is above three miles in length, and contains upwards of a million of souls, mostly employed in that single branch. The Chinese were always so very shy of letting the Europeans get any light into any of their affairs, those especially of the giran, or japan-varnish; and this of the china-ware, that we have been led by European writers into several strange and absurd notions, relating either to the materials of which it was made, such as egg-shells, according to some; the shells of some sorts of fishes, according to others; or the length of time they took up in preparing and perfecting, viz. 30, 40, or even 100 years, merely as their fancy suggested it to them, till we had at length a more perfect account of all those particulars from an eye-witness, of judgment and probity (N), who communicated the whole secret, and its process, to his brethren in Europe.

A finer sort made in Saxony.

WHETHER that which hath been since made in Saxony, and so much exceeds the Chinese, especially in the beauty of the colours, and fineness of the painting, be made after the same manner, and whether the first discoverer of it took the hint from the Jesuit's account, we know not; but as that commodity is now so far outdone in Germany, and is likely to be imitated by ours, and some other European nations, with good success, it will of course excuse us from dwelling longer on the Chinese way of working, making, glazing, painting, and baking it; the process of which, though curious, is too long and complicated for a work like this, and may be best seen in those two pieces which the Jesuit above-mentioned sent of it, and which are published among the Lettres edifiantes of the missionaries, or in the extract which Father Du Halde hath given us of them in his description of the Chinese empire ^b.

ALL that may be farther observable about it is, that though the notions of the earth being so long in preparing, to make it fit for the work, or of the china-ware, when made, receiving an additional beauty by lying long buried in the earth, seem quite confuted from our author's observations on their present way of fabricating it; to which we might add, by way of corroborating them, the new method found out in Saxony, which is pretty nearly answerable to it; yet it is not unlikely that the Chinese had formerly some such longer process in bringing it to its highest beauty, but which they thought fit afterwards to set aside, or dispense with, as incompatible with the great call they had for that commodity from Europe, and which now seemed to require a more expeditious way of management, though at the loss of a great deal of its beauty and goodness. What inclines us to think so, is the visible difference there is between the old and new china in both those respects, and the great value which the Chinese themselves set upon the former above the latter; insomuch that some of them have found means to counterfeit it in such a manner as not to be easily discovered by any but a connoisseur. We might add that that much finer sort which is made in Japan, and of which we shall speak in a subsequent chapter, is, by the confession of the very Japaners, affirmed to owe its excellence not so much to the goodness of the materials, and manner of working, as to the length of the process in preparing the earth for the work; but we shall say the less of that, as we are in such a fair way of being supplied with that beautiful commodity much nearer, and, in time, at a much cheaper rate.

The old counterfeited.

Their varnish, or japan.

THE last manufacture worth notice is that of their varnish, or, as we style it in Europe, gyran, or japan-work, which, though it be vastly inferior to that made in Japan, is yet thought valuable enough to be bought at a great price, and sent abroad in great quantities, especially into Europe. We have already spoken of the liquor or gum which gives it that beautiful lustre; as well as of the poisonous quality of its effluvia, which so sadly affect the heads and limbs of those who work at it: but this doth not hinder its keeping a prodigious number of hands still employed in it, in almost every part of the empire, though not with equal beauty and goodness in some as in others. The very best of all is made at Whey-chew, in the province of Kyang-nan; and the next to it at Nan-king, the capital of that province; in both which, it from all others that are made in China, none of which come up to it either for colour, lustre, or fineness.

We are farther told of several attempts having been made of making it in other places, by carrying the materials and workmen thither; particularly at Fo-kyen and Can-ton, on account of the great trade which the Europeans carried on at A-moi, or A-moy; but without any success. Even the late emperor Kang-hi, who was very curious in all things of this nature, caused some of the workmen, and all proper materials, to be brought to Pe-king; where, having tried their utmost to succeed under that monarch's eye, at least to all appearance, the project miscarried afresh; so that the town of King-te-ching is still the only place which supplies the whole country with that fine ware (35).

(N) This person was Father D'Entrecolles, a Jesuit, who had a church at King-te-ching, and a good number of converts who either worked at, or were great dealers in it; so that he had all the opportunity that could be desired of inquiring into every branch of that manufacture, as well as into the records of that town about the invention of it, concerning which, he tells us, he could find no satisfactory account (36).

a seems, the workmen have a better art in laying the varnish smooth, and with a beautiful and lasting gloss. But the place where the greatest quantity of it is wrought, though neither so very good at beautiful or serviceable, is at Kan-ton, where the Europeans bespeak and have it wrought in Kan-ton. great quantities, and according to their own directions (O).

THERE are two sorts of varnish used in China, the one so transparent as to discover all the beauties of the wood underneath; and yet so solid, as to look like a piece of glass laid over it; and at the same time, by soaking into the pores of it, preserves it from corrupting. This sort, however, will bear gilding, or being painted upon, without losing any of its gloss; but is mostly used upon some sorts of curious woods, which are so beautifully veined and variegated, that it looks like the work of art. We have very little of this sort brought into Europe. The transparent sort.

b THE other, which is better known to us, is laid on with a body in very thin grounds, as mentioned under the last note, and that commonly on a kind of mastic, or pasteboard, made up of paper, flax, lime, and some other materials, well beaten together, and glued on upon the wood, and with a very smooth surface; and on that it is that they lay first their oil, and then their varnish, which is mostly of the black kind, though they may make it of other colours, and then paint and gild it in the manner we see it in those cabinets, tables, and other trinkets, that come over to us. And though the best of that sort, which is made in China, be vastly inferior in beauty, colour, and hardness, to that which comes from Japan; yet, when rightly made, it will preserve its native gloss and lustre a considerable time, except some disaster happens to it (P). The more solid.

c WE shall conclude this article of their trade and manufactures with a short account of their Chinese coin, which is one main spring and support of them. They have but two current metals in all China, viz. silver and copper; gold being on the same footing there as precious stones with us; and purchased, like other valuable merchandizes, according to its weight and fineness. Silver, though used in payment, is not coined, but cut into pieces, smaller or larger, as occasion requires; so that its value is rated according to its weight and goodness, and not from the prince's image. This makes it, however, very inconvenient to the traders, who must be ever cutting and weighing it (Q); and, which is still worse, be trying it on the touchstone, because it is often below the common standard; in which case, a proportion must be given in the weight, to make up that defect. Nevertheless, the Chinese chuse to have it in that manner rather than coined, as ours is, because, as they say, it would make every province swarm with clippers and coiners, and force the dealers to have still recourse to their scales and touchstone. And as, in the frequent cutting it, it can hardly be avoided but some small particles of the metal will fall on the ground, so there are numbers of poor people taken up with gathering and washing the dirt that is thrown out of the shops into the streets, and who commonly find enough among it to subsist by. The only expeditious way they have to pay any sum in silver, is, to keep by them a variety of plates of that metal, beaten, either thinner or thicker, according to the present exigence (besides the ingots, which are reserved for larger sums), and which, by long use, they can cut to a very great nicety, and hardly exceed a grain either above or under the weight they design it for. Silver not coined; but cut, and weighed.

d have it in that manner rather than coined, as ours is, because, as they say, it would make every province swarm with clippers and coiners, and force the dealers to have still recourse to their scales and touchstone. And as, in the frequent cutting it, it can hardly be avoided but some small particles of the metal will fall on the ground, so there are numbers of poor people taken up with gathering and washing the dirt that is thrown out of the shops into the streets, and who commonly find enough among it to subsist by. e THE only coin, therefore, properly so called, in use among them, or which they have had from time immemorial, is of copper, and of a very inconsiderable value, on account of its Copper the only coin.

(O) And this is the main cause of its being so inferior to that which is made in other places; for the workmen being obliged to stay till the Europeans are come, in order to receive those directions, they can neither take that due time in laying their grounds so thin and smooth, nor in giving them time to dry, as that sort of work requires: for the beauty and lastingness of it consist chiefly in that there should be no fewer than nine or ten such grounds laid, the thinner the better, and at least the space of three or four days, or even more in damp weather, allowed between every one, that the last may be thoroughly dried before a new one is laid on. Another considerable interval of time is likewise required between the last layer and the polishing, painting, and gilding; all which would, if duly observed, require a whole summer, and more: but, as they have not a sufficient time allowed them for it, they content themselves with dispatching it at any rate, so it doth but please the purchaser's eye. And hence it is that they neither keep their gloss nor colour so long or so fine, were their materials in other respects equally good, and the workmen as dexterous, here, as at any other place.

(P) It is observed that the spilling of any hot liquor upon that sort of work will deaden its lustre, because it will make the varnish grow dull, and turn yellow. The means of restoring it to its pristine shining black, says a Chinese author, is, to expose it a whole night to a white frost, or, which is still better, to hold it some time in the sun (37).

(Q) The scales, or rather stilliards, with which they weigh their silver or gold, and which they commonly carry about them in a neat japan case, consist of a little round plate, an ebony or ivory beam, and a weight. The beam, which is divided into minute parts on three sides, is suspended by fine silken strings at one of the ends, in three different points, that they may more easily weigh their pieces. These kind of stilliards are so exceedingly exact for weighing any money, or small pieces of silver, that from fifteen, or even twenty crowns, down to the twelfth part of a penny, and less, may be weighed in them with so great a nicety, that the 1000th part of a crown will turn the scale (38).

coarseness, as well as smallness, it scarcely amounting to the third part of one of our farthings. It is of a round figure, with some Chinese characters on each side, and a square hole in the middle, through which they may be strung to any number, but commonly an hundred or a thousand in one string; which last is equivalent to a Chinese crown, and somewhat above one of ours; and in this last every hundred is divided by a string, which hangs at the last piece, for the greater dispatch of telling them. They have, it seems, no other name for what we call money, than the old one of Tsyen, which properly signifies the water of a fountain that runs without ceasing, by which they expressed the continual circulation of it from one hand to another; which word they still retain with respect to both metals, calling the one Tong-tsyen, or copper-money (R), and In-tsyen, or silver-money; which last name they give at Kan ton also to the piastres, French and English crowns, which are pretty current and common in that trading city ^c.

Chinese
weights.
Pound, how divided and subdivided.

In order to have some notion of the Chinese money, whether antient or modern, it must be observed, that their pound, or Lyang, weighs sixteen ounces, but is divided into only ten parts, called Tsyen, this into ten Fwen, which are equivalent to ten French sols, or about seven-pence English; the Fwen into ten Fi of silver. The beam of the Chinese scale carries these divisions no farther; and yet, with respect to gold or silver of a considerable weight, the division is more minute, and almost extends to imperceptible parts; for which reason it is scarce possible to convey a just idea of them in our language. They divide the Li into ten W'ba, the W'ba into ten Se, the Se into ten Fu, the Fu into ten Chin, which last signifies a grain of dust; this again into ten Tay, the Tay into ten Myau, the Myau into ten Mo, the Mo into ten Tsun, and the Tsun into ten Sun. But even when one understands all these divisions, it will be still impossible to ascertain the value of the antient coins, though the weight is marked upon them, yet some of them passed for much more than their intrinsic value came to. There were times in which the scarcity of species obliged their monarchs to raise the value of the small copper pieces so excessively high, that one of them was worth ten of the same sort current in former times, which hath occasioned very great tumults among the people; because the merchants raised the price of their goods in proportion. This scarcity of copper coin (which was occasioned either by some violent irruption of foreigners, who came and loaded their barks with it, and carried it away, or through the cautiousness of the people, who buried it in time of war, and died, perhaps, without discovering where it lay hid), hath been so terribly felt, that, at one time, an emperor hath caused near 1400 temples of Fo to be demolished, and all the images and copper work to be cast into coin; and, at other times, the people have been expressly forbid the use of any vessels, or other utensils, of copper, and obliged to deliver up those they had to the mint. And thus much shall suffice for their coins and commerce. ^b

(R) This coin, inconsiderable as it is, and not stamped, but only cast, though formerly coined in two-and twenty places of the empire, was nevertheless forbidden since, by an imperial edict, to be cast anywhere but at the court; so that none of the petty kings under that monarch dare attempt it. Their laws make it even capital to counterfeit it; though Father D'Entrecolles says, that some of their monarchs have contented themselves with punishing such offenders with the loss of their hand, or with banishment (39).

The Chinese have, however, had, in the antient times, a great variety of coins of gold and silver, and in a great variety of forms, all which are now only to be seen in the cabinets of the curious, and more particularly in that of the late emperor Kang-hi, who caused a noble collection to be made of all that could be found of that kind in the empire, and to be deposited there among his other rarities. The reader may see the most curious and remarkable in the plate given us by Du Halde, as they were taken by Father D'Entrecolles out of the imperial collection above-mentioned (40).

Besides those of gold, silver, and copper, they have had some of baser metals current in China, to say nothing of others of clay stamped with some name, or characters, and baked, shells, stamped paper, &c.; and what is most observable is, that none of them were ever stamped with the head of the prince; it being deemed there an indignity to the imperial majesty, to have his image pass through the hands of tradesmen, dealers, and the dregs of the people.

Of the character, genius, manners, customs, marriages, burials, feasts, and festivals, of the Chinese; with an account of the natural and artificial rarities of that country.

the Chinese.

WE have had frequent occasion to shew, how much the Chinese nation valued itself, above all others, not only in point of antiquity, but likewise of wisdom, learning, politeness, and other valuable qualities, in comparison of whom, they look upon the rest of mankind as so many rude savages, monsters, or, at best, as creatures in human shape; but either quite destitute, or, at best, endowed with a very little share, of reason; on which

^a which account, they made it a very constant maxim among them, never to entertain any commerce with foreigners, but just as much as should be thought necessary to procure their homage and service. This was the high notion they had of themselves, and were brought up in^a; which was still farther confirmed, by the singular deference which the Tartars, Persians, Indians, and other neighbouring nations, paid to them, in point of wisdom and learning; intomuch, that when Xaverius came to preach Christianity among the Japanese, a people not inferior to them in sense and politeness, their objection against it was, that so wise a nation as the Chinese had not embraced it.

BUT, abating this overgrown conceit of themselves, of which they were soon cured, after they became more conversant with the Europeans, it must be owned, that they were once^b endowed with many shining qualities, though they have so far degenerated from them of late; that they must have been a wise, prudent, and politic nation; that they had true and just ideas of government; that their fundamental laws were excellently well calculated for the public good: and that the people were no less endowed with a sincere regard for, and a natural disposition to observe, them. And hence it was, that, whatever strange revolutions have happened among them, during such a series of ages which their monarchy hath continued, they commonly proved of short duration; and, as soon as they came to be ever so little at their own disposal, they returned to their own form of government again: and one may see, to this very day, in spite of all the changes, corruption, and degeneracy, which hath been introduced since their last conquest, some plain footsteps of their pristine virtue, and veneration for their antient laws and form of government. And though the far greater part of them do now content themselves with the bare outward shew of probity, public spirit, justice, generosity^c, &c. yet one cannot forbear concluding, that there was a time when those noble qualities were the distinguishing character of the Chinese nation; and that those princes and great men, who enacted such excellent laws, left behind them such wise maxims of government, and encouraged such a noble system of morality, both by their precepts and example, were every way qualified to reign over such faithful subjects.

THE Chinese are naturally ingenious, lively, and industrious, and those of the lower rank laborious to excess. They have no great genius for speculative sciences, as we have formerly observed, but a surprising one for almost all sorts of inferior ones, as well as for mechanics, either for use or diversion. They are quick and witty, but affect a gravity with it; outwardly affable and civil to, but jealous and mistrustful of, strangers, especially such as they suspect of coming to pry into their manufactures, some of whom they have made no scruple to poison, upon the bare suspicion of it; but, where only traffick and gain are in view, they are exceedingly watchful to observe the tempers and inclinations of their chapmen, and keep up the fairest correspondence with them, in order to over-reach them: so that whether a stranger trusts to his own judgment, or to the probity of the Chinese dealer, or employs a Chinese factor, he is, for the most part, in danger of being cheated, and laughed at, unless he be exceeding careful whom he deals with; for there are still many instances among them, not only of honest and fair dealing, and open and generous usage, but even of fidelity, incapable of being corrupted. They are exceedingly apt to resent affronts and injuries, though they do not, as we do, retaliate them by duels, fighting, or other public hostilities, but will rather seem patient under them, even to insensibility, till they have a favourable opportunity of indulging their revenge to the highest degree. Both nobles and artificers are extremely given to gaming, and will spend whole days or weeks at it; and the latter will lose vast sums at it, and sometimes all they are worth, even to their wives and children, when they meet with a bad run of fortune^e (A).

In other cases, they are very good œconomists, and observe great frugality in their houses, and way of living, from which they seldom depart, but upon some great occasions; such as their national festivals, their birth-days, weddings, burials, &c. at which times they strive to

(A) All sorts of gaming are forbidden by the Chinese laws; and even that of chefs, though so much admired by the whole nation, is yet highly censured by their Literati, as taking up too much of that time which ought to be better employed; and yet they are so very fond both of that and many others which are in vogue among them, that they will even venture their whole estate upon the chance of a game, or even upon a single card, or cast of a die. Upon this account, as well as the fear of the laws, they are very careful to indulge this passion with as much privacy as possible; though they might easily be prevented from it, if the Mandarins and magistrates, who are equally guilty of it, did not wink at it in their inferiors (42). And, it is not improbable, that these being so often hurt by it, is one main cause of their being so given to cheating in all their mercantile dealings.

outdo each other, in the splendidence of their tables, furniture, and the various methods of a entertaining their guests (B), in which they frequently run to excess, and beyond what their circumstances will admit of. Among the variety of sumptuous dishes which commonly adorn their tables at such times, dogs flesh, differently dressed, seldom fails of being one, whatever plenty of other flesh, venison, fish, fowl, &c. there be besides. Yet, even in these feasts, they affect a more than common gravity and silence, and will drink but sparingly of wine, and other strong liquors, even when the cups are put briskly round by the master of the feast, but will only take a small quantity at the bottom of the cup, as if they feared being overtaken with, or betrayed into, some indecorum by it: but they are soon relieved from their gravity and fears, by the diversions above-mentioned, which commonly succeed the third or fourth round. b

Way of eating.

THEY neither use spoons, knives, nor forks, at their tables; but every guest comes furnished with two small and long ivory or ebony sticks, with which they help themselves, with wonderful nicety and ease, to every thing that is set before them, without touching it with their hands:
and this makes napkins to be likewise needless at their tables, every dish of meat, fish, &c.
being commonly cut into small bits, before it is served ^d.

New year's festival.

THE public or national festivals are various, and regularly observed all over the empire; particularly, the two first days of the year, which are celebrated with feasting, music, dancing, playing, comedies, and other diversions, and with sending of presents to their friends and patrons. This solemn time, which, among the great ones, lasts from the end of the twelfth moon of the last to about the twentieth of the first moon of the new year, is properly their c vacation; during which, all business ceases, all their tribunals are shut up, the posts suspended throughout the whole empire, and the generality of the people spend their time in rejoicing, and all sorts of diversions (C).

That of the lanthorns.

BUT the most solemn and pompous part of this festivity, begins on the fifteenth day of the same first moon, and is, by the Chinese, styled the feast of the lanthorns. It is commonly ushered in at court, and the capital of Pe-king, pretty late on the preceding night, by the ringing of a vast large bell; the first sound of which is no sooner heard, than it is accompanied by whole volleys of cannon, from the palace and city ramparts, the beating of large kettle-drums, the sound of trumpets, and a great variety of other instruments. The same notice is d given in all other parts of the empire, especially the great cities, about the same time, and much in the same way, the cannon excepted. Immediately upon which, they every-where kindle such vast numbers of fires, hang up such infinite numbers of lanthorns, and play off such variety of fire-works, some representing castles, towers, ships, dragons, elephants, horses, fishes, and other creatures, that the whole atmosphere seems to be in a flame. They have likewise a very dexterous way of intermixing their lanthorns with those fire-works, so as to represent horses, and other animals, in full career, birds flying, ships sailing, armies fighting, princes marching with their whole retinue, and a great variety of other such surprising scenes; whilst the ears of the spectators are entertained with the best music their country affords, and with the joyful acclamations of the people; all which are answered by the trumpets, bells, and other instruments, of every temple and monastery. e

Fire-works, and other illuminations.

^d De his, vide MAGAILLAN, LE COMPTE, MARTINI, NIEUHOFF, DU HALDE, & al.

(B) All these kinds of festivals are commonly accompanied not only with variety of music and dancing, such as it is, but with tumblers, rope-dancers, jugglers, posture-masters, and other such diversions, which are there exhibited, by a parcel of strollers hired for that purpose, and are surprisingly dexterous at their respective parts. Those of the middle sort will add some short farce, or dramatic performance, to the rest; and those of rank, a regular play, with all its proper decorations, interludes of music, dancing, &c.; there being almost every-where a sufficient number of those strollers to be found, who are ready to act any play which the company shall call for.

These players are a kind of vagabonds, that wander from place to place, where they are most likely to be hired; and are always paid by the master of the feast, among those of the higher rank; but among those of the lower class, by the voluntary contribution of the guests. They commonly go in companies, of both sexes, and have a kind of head over them, who either keeps them in pay, or distributes their hire among them, according to the parts they act. These men, in their rambles, make it their business to buy (and often to steal) all the handsome girls they can get from the poor people, whom they afterwards either debauch themselves, or prostitute for some small sum, in order to harden and fit them for their business (43).

(C) This festivity, or vacation, which lasts about three weeks (44), or a month (45), is styled, by the Chinese, the shutting up of the seals; because, at the beginning of it, they do, with great ceremony, shut up the little coffers wherein the seals of each tribunal are kept. But the greatest rejoicing is on the last days of the old year, when they take their leave of it, with great solemnity; and the inferior Mandarins pay their homage to their superior, the children to their parents, servants to their masters; and every family concludes the day with a sumptuous supper.

- a Mr. Isbrandtz Ides, who was present at one of these feasts *, says, that the noise at Pe-king, Fast rejoicings, which continued the same till the next day at noon, was as great as if an army of 100,000 men had been all that time in a close and fierce engagement. And Father Le Compte, who was likewise an eye-witness of this grand solemnity, at the time he was there, says, that the number of lanthorns, commonly lighted at these illuminations, through the whole empire, was computed to amount to at least 200,000,000. During the festival, the shops are closely shut up; all business is suspended; the streets crowded with processions of numberless idols, carried about in great pomp, the monks and priests attending them, with their censers, songs, and musical instruments; the very women, of all ranks, who at other times are not suffered to appear in public, are then permitted to ride through the streets of Pe-king; those of common rank upon asses, adorned with ribands and other trinkets; and those of quality in their two-wheeled chaises, covered on every side but the front, and either singing, or gently touching some musical instrument, or even smoking a pipe, and attended with a maid-servant riding behind them, and playing likewise on some musical instrument. Some of these lanthorns are so vastly rich and beautiful, that the price of them amounts to 1500 or 2000 crowns, and even beyond; and not a house but hath some sort of them, the best they can afford, burning, both before and within it (D). In a word, the Chinese are so ambitious of making the most magnificent figure on this festival, that they will retrench from their common expences the year round, that they may do something extraordinary at this time; and, abating the masquerading, will allow themselves in all the extravagancies of a Venetian carnival †. But what the cause of all this joy, or the origin of this grand festival is, they either do not care to tell us, or probably know nothing of it themselves (E). We shall, however, in the sequel of this chapter, find a proper place for offering a conjecture of ours, concerning the origin, and extraordinary rejoicings, of that famed festival, which, we hope, when weighed with other concurring circumstances, may, though new, appear to give a more probable account of it than any we have hitherto met with, either from the natives or strangers.

(D) These lanthorns are adorned with beautiful carving, gilding, and japanning, and have about six or eight panes of thin blue silk, made transparent by a fine varnish, and painted with figures of trees, men, horses, birds, &c. so skilfully disposed, as to receive, as it were, life, from the great number of lamps, or candles, burning within them. Others are made of blue transparent horn, through which are seen sundry kinds of creatures, painted to the life, and seeming to move, through the motion of the flame within, and representing a variety of scenes, to entertain the spectators. The common sorts of them are about four or five feet high, and have their tops adorned with curious streamers, waving in the wind; but those of the noblest sort are above twenty feet in diameter, and illuminated with lamps and wax candles, the sides of which represent to the eye various figures of men and women, in different characters, or exhibiting some theatrical representations, with gestures suitable to their parts. These are moved by wires, by people placed underneath, like our puppets, or, according to one of their own authors, are acted by living persons (45). They have likewise bonfires, and other fire-works, in all the parts of the cities, towns, and villages; and the whole nation seems to run mad with joy for they know not what. See the next note.

(E) Whether they are really ignorant of the occasion of this festival, or designedly conceal it from strangers, it is certain, none of our authors, who have spoken of it, nor even Kao, a Chinese native, have given any satisfactory account of it. Some tell us, it was instituted in memory of one of their monarchs, who had caused a magnificent palace to be built, which he illuminated with a prodigious number of these lanthorns, that the day might not be distinguished from the night. Others, that it was in remembrance of a great Mandarin, whose favourite daughter drowned herself; and that he having governed them with uncommon humanity, the country, in gratitude, flocked to him with lanthorns, to help him to find her out, though without success; in memory of which, they instituted this ceremony, which, in time, spread itself through the whole empire.

Lastly, as their records mention, that the Empress Ta-kya, wife of the Emperor Chow (both of them of a tyrannic disposition), had, either through fear of a rebellious attempt, or for some other motive, accustomed herself to have the imperial palace illuminated with a prodigious number of candles, to supply the absence of the sun, and to prevent any surprise by night, some infer from thence that this festival was instituted, by the people, after her death, in memory of their deliverance from that cruel tyranny.

But, as none of these carry any tolerable probability, may we not rather think, that the origin of its institution is either forgot, or, which is more probable, is concealed from strangers, out of some superstitious whim? For, we are told, that, with respect to that of the new year, they are, in some parts of China, so cautious of having a stranger, or even some of their nearest relations, at their own houses, at that time, lest they should catch all the good luck, which, they suppose, attends the moment of its entrance, from the family, that they will not admit any one to share in the festivity of that day with them, nor join in the common rejoicing of the season, till the next and following ones (46). However, by the uncommon magnificence and profusion which reigns through the whole empire, and the universal joy that appears in every look, and the strange sorts of diversions which are in vogue, during the feast, one would be apt to suppose, that so solemn, so joyful, and so universal a festival, owed its origin to some extraordinary event, or blessing, which they either are careful to conceal, or have lost the remembrance of; or, at least, that they expect, from their magnificent way of celebrating it, some great and public blessing will fall on the whole realm, and that those who bestowed the most cost on it, or behaved most frantically, were to have the greatest share of it (47).

The two festivals of Confucius ;

Feastings on birth-days.

Wedding ceremony.

The bride's reception.

THE next in rank and solemnity, are the two grand festivals instituted in honour of their famous Confucius, and are celebrated, the one in the spring, and the other in autumn. The public honours paid to that great philosopher, used formerly to be performed before his statue, set up in the great hall dedicated to his memory ; till their new conqueror Kang-hi, deeming it, we are told, a kind of idolatry, and fearing, or pretending to fear, lest his new subjects should, in time, offer the same worship, and prayers, to him, forbade the ceremony to be performed before his statue ; instead of which, he ordered a large label, or board, to be erected over a table, with his name and titles written, or engraven, upon it, with some beautiful leaf-work, and other ornaments, carved or painted about it. The ceremony is now performed, by kneeling before the inscription, and prostrating the body nine times before it, till the head touches the ground : after which, the usual offerings are made to it, of wine, victuals, fruits, &c. in the same manner the great families do to their deceased friends, at their mourning feasts ; of which, we shall speak in the sequel. The same exchange was likewise ordered to be made in all their schools, colleges, and other places, where that great man's picture was formerly set up, and where nothing but his name is now to be seen^f. We have formerly taken notice of some other festivals, in which the emperors bore the greatest share in the sacrifices, and other ceremonies performed at them, and need not enlarge upon their other public ones, which are inconsiderable, in comparison of those we have now given an account of.

THE private ones are either on their birth-days, marriages, or funeral obsequies, all which they strive to celebrate in the grandest manner that their circumstances can afford. They always observe their birth-days with such feastings, dancing, music, and other diversions, as we have already described, to which the guests join their good wishes of long life and prosperity ; and some of them add either a panegyric, or copy of verses, on the person. The whole day is spent in civil treats, mutual congratulations, and mirth, even among those of the lowest rank. The same rejoicings and feastings are observed at the birth of a son, especially the first ; and, in both cases, the guests commonly accompany their congratulatory compliments with some real presents, suitable to their circumstances ; the greatest princes not thinking it beneath their dignity to have such kind of substantial honours paid to them.

THEIR marriages are celebrated with no less pomp. The married couple are commonly brought together, without any previous acquaintance with each other, the bargain being struck by their parents, or by some go-between, and afterwards ratified, by presents sent by both sides. The bride brings no dowry with her, but is rather purchased by her spouse, who, besides the price he pays for her, commonly spends, in the marriage ceremony, double and treble the presents she brings along with her, especially among those of a higher rank (F). The young couple are never suffered to see each other, till the marriage-contract is signed and sealed, by the parents or friends, and the presents be exchanged on both sides : but, as soon as that is over, the bride is sent home to her bridegroom's house, in a kind of pompous cavalcade, and with a numerous attendance^g of friends and servants ; some on horseback, some on foot ; some carrying the insignia of the family, others playing on variety of instruments ; a third sort carry torches, flambeaux, even at noon-day, and burning odorous perfumes ; whilst a fourth bear the presents she brings along with her. The bride, if of quality, is carried in a stately sedan, covered all round with a large and rich canopy of state, borne by a dozen or more lusty fellows, in the livery of the family, and guarded by some relations on horseback. The whole retinue appear in the most splendid dresses ; and in this manner they march from her father's house, to that of her spouse ; who is there ready, with a vast number of his own relations, all likewise richly dressed, to receive her. The sedan, in which she is brought, is closely shut up on all sides, the door of it is locked, and a faithful servant is intrusted with the key of it, which he is to deliver to none but the bridegroom, who waits at the door, to introduce her into an outer court. Here she is no sooner set down, than he unlocks the chair, with some eagerness ; and is then a judge (if he never saw her

(F) The laws of the country making it an indispensable duty for every man to marry, and many of the poorer sort not having it in their power to purchase wives, the government gives them leave, in such cases, to go to the foundling hospitals, and beg one ; which favour is seldom denied, if the man have any tolerable character for probity and industry. This method not only saves a poor man the charges of buying, but contributes to make the wife more obsequious and obliging.

These hospitals do likewise furnish the richer sort with children, when their wives prove unfruitful ; and this is done either clandestinely, and then the good wife pretends to be pregnant, and, in proper time, to be delivered ; and this is oftener with than without the consent of the husband. The other is done by publicly adopting the children so bought ; but as this cannot be done without the leave of the government, nor that be obtained without great expence, the former way is the more frequently chosen (48).

a before, which is commonly the case) of his good or bad fortune (G). If he likes her, he hands her out of the chair, and conducts her into the great hall, where they make four low bows to Tyen; after which, she doth the same to her husband's relations: and is then put into the hands of the ladies invited to the ceremony, who lead her into a stately apartment, and spend the remainder of the day with her, in feasting, dancing, and other diversions; whilst the bridegroom doth the same, with his male relations, in another. The feasting lasts more or less, according to the circumstances of the persons; and, when once ended, she is from that time secluded not only from the company, but even from the sight, of all men but her husband; except, perhaps, the father, or some near relation, and that only on some extraordinary occasion; unless they have contracted before-hand with him, for the liberty of entertaining a gallant now-and-then, which, we are told, is sometimes done, by an indulgent parent, and agreed to by the no less indulgent spouse, though seldom, if ever, without some valuable consideration ^a.

THE Chinese laws allow but one wife to a man; but they are permitted to have several concubines, who are brought into his house, without any other ceremony, than a promissory note of the sum agreed upon, and of using her well; but the lawful wife is generally mistress over them, as well as over all the servants in the house; and the children of the concubines are deemed to belong to her, and have an equal right to inherit. She alone bears the title of mother, and, after her decease, is honoured with the parental mourning of three years. Both the man and the woman may marry again, after the death of either; in which case, the husband is no longer confined within his own rank, but may take any woman he pleases, or even one of his concubines, to be his wife; and this second wedlock is attended with but few ceremonies. As for widows, especially those that have had children, they become their own mistresses, and may marry, if they please; but that, among those of high rank, is reckoned disreputable, though she had lived but one day, or even a few hours, with her husband. But with those of the middle rank, the case is quite otherwise, though frequently less in their favour, through the avarice of the deceased's relations (H).

UPON the whole, it must be owned, that the marriage state is but an uncomfortable one to the Chinese women, of any rank, enslaved and immured by their jealous husbands; in some cases, liable to be sold, with all their children; in others, to be divorced from them; and when widows, condemned to observe a long and severe mourning, and then either to live a single life, or to be sold to the highest bidder; without one good law in their favour, except that which permits them to marry again, if the husband absents himself from his home above three years (I). The Chinese women are generally very handsome, sprightly, and

(G) It sometimes happens, that a man, when he receives his wife, and finds her beauty not answerable to the character given him of it, or the idea he conceived of her, will immediately lock her up again, and, in the same sedan, send her back to her parents, choosing rather to forfeit the money he gave for her, than to take her home. But this, of late, is not often the case, the female relations of the bridegroom taking all the proper precautions, not only to see and converse, but to view, and examine her, when she is in the bath, and be satisfied, that she is free from any such defects, as might render her disagreeable to him. On the other hand, her parents take care to oblige him, by the marriage contract, neither to send her back, nor to divorce, or use her ill. The laws likewise oblige both sides to have a due regard to an equality of age, and rank; but this last is often overlooked, through dint of money.

The common people observe less ceremony in this case; and the man may have some opportunities to see the woman, before he engages; and, when the marriage is agreed on, the bride is sent to her husband, in the handsomest manner that their circumstances will allow, especially with music, torches, and some retinue of her friends, and is conveyed thither in a close sedan. The ceremony of her reception is much the same with that of the great ones, abating the magnificence (49).

(H) These are often forced by the husband's relations, especially if it be one that hath had no children, to marry some other man, in order to have the money given for her, or some part of it, refunded to the family. The bargain is often agreed with the new husband, without her knowledge; and if she has a daughter still unweaned, she goes along with her to him. Neither can she avoid the oppression, unless she can procure the above sum to be repaid, or turn bonzefs, or nun, which few care to do. The poor widow being thus sold, whether with or without her knowledge or consent, is immediately clapt into a close sedan, and conveyed to the purchaser, under an escort of some trusty persons, and frequently long before her mourning is over, which is expressly against the law. But if this outrage hath been complained of to the Mandarin, and he be found to have connived at, instead of remedying it, he is liable to be severely punished (50).

(I) In this case, she is obliged to apply to the Mandarins, who, after due examination of it, will license her to take another husband; for, without this formality, she would be severely punished, if she ventured to do so.

With relation to men selling their wives, the law is, that a woman that elopes from her husband may, after conviction, and receiving the correction appointed by the law, be sold by him to whom he pleases; but without such a conviction, both the buyer and the seller would be liable to be punished; and yet, we are told, that some men have sold, or even played away, their wives and children.

The cases in which divorce is allowed, are; 1. Adultery; but which seldom happens, by reason of and amorous; and employ themselves at home, either with their own children, or in some a sorts of curious works, as painting, japanning, embroidering, &c. Those of distinction seldom stir abroad, and when they do, they are commonly carried in a low close chair, or a covered two-wheeled chaise (K), and are, consequently, never to be seen ¹. We shall describe their drefs in a more proper place.

Funerals, and deep mourning.

Singular regard to dead parents.

Length of their mourning.

THE last pompous solemnity we shall mention, as celebrated by private families, is that of their funeral obsequies, which, among people almost of all ranks, doth, by far, still exceed whatever is observed by them upon any other occasions. And such is the singular regard which the Chinese pay to the memory of their deceased friends, especially to that of their parents, and near relations, that they think they can never sufficiently express it, either by the cost they bestow on their funerals and anniversaries, or by the deepest tokens of grief for b their loss. According to their antients laws, the common term of mourning for a parent was three whole years (L); and though it hath been since reduced, in some cases, to twenty-seven months, yet do they not abate, in any other respect, of their antient austerity on such occasions, but spend that whole time in acts of the most pungent grief.

A CHILD that hath lost a parent, is neither permitted, nor will, upon the greatest exigency, indulge himself in the use of a bed, during the space of 100 days, but chooses to lie all that time upon the bare earth, lamenting, in the bitterest terms, his inexpressible loss. They are not to converse with any body during a whole year; and, which is still harder, must abstain from all connubial intercourse with their wives and concubines, under very severe penalties: for should any of them be found to have been got with child during that time, c both they, and much more the husband, would infallibly be condemned to some heavy punishment. In the matrimonial state, the wife is obliged to mourn, in the same deep manner, three whole years, or at least two years and a quarter, if not of high rank; and the husband a whole year for a dead wife; which last is also the common term, more or less, of mourning for other relations, according to the degrees of their proximity.

*Anniversary obsequies,
 whence.*

NEITHER is this filial regard confined to the stated time of three years, but is still continued with annual obsequies performed at his grave, with something near the same mournful ceremonies; to which we may add, that if a man die before he hath married all his children, the eldest son is obliged to take that care upon him; and, being then invested with a paternal authority over them, is esteemed as the representative or substitute of the deceased. Nor d are these funeral obsequies continued to parents only, but to grandfathers, &c. up to the head of the family, for whom they keep anniversary solemnities, visit their tombs, in the same mourning guise, and offer upon them the usual presents of wine, victuals, &c. as if they were still alive (M).

NOR need we be surpris'd at this extraordinary duty to their ancestors, if we recollect what was formerly hinted, on another occasion, that they are brought up with a belief that their

 HALDE, & al.

their being so closely kept. 2. Antipathy, or contrariety of tempers. 3. Excess of jealousy, disobedience, or indiscretion. 4. Barrenness. 5. Some contagious distemper. Yet these divorces, we are told, seldom happen among those of higher rank; it being only among the common people that instances of it are to be met with (51).

(K) These sedans are of two sorts: those belonging to the quality are borne on two, or more, men's shoulders; and those of the inferior rank have only one pole, put through a ring on the top, and rather resemble a large cage, carried between two men, much in the same manner as our draymen carry a barrel of ale, the hindmost holding it with both his hands, to prevent it from jogging to and fro.

Both sorts are made so very low, that the person, who sits cross-legged on a cushion at the bottom, doth almost reach the top with her head. Those of the lower sort, which are commonly of japanned wood, have either some small holes, or oblong narrow slits, not only to let in the air, but give them that are in it a glimpse of what passes in the streets through which they are conveyed; but those of the better sort are covered over with such rich silks, as not only shut out the light, but even the fresh air.

Both sorts, as well as the two wheeled chaises, are only used in the cities, or for some short jaunts out of them; but in longer journies, the quality commonly convey their wives and female retinue in coaches and litters; and all likewise shut up close on all sides (52).

(L) This term of three years mourning for a parent, was ordered to express their gratitude for their parents care during the three years of their helpless infancy, wherein they stood in need of their assistance:
 and it is so carefully observed, that if any of the emperor's ministers, of what rank soever, loses a father, or mother, he must lay down his office during all that time, and dedicate it to mourning, unless the emperor should, for some extraordinary reason, dispense with it, which is rarely done; nor can he resume his post, till the three years are fully expired (53).

(M) This extraordinary regard was founded on a wise Chinese maxim, that monarchs ought to have the tenderness of a parent over their subjects, and fathers the authority of kings over their children; and, when young persons behold what veneration is paid by their parents to their own progenitors, it cannot fail of inspiring them with a deep sense of obedience and submission to them: and, as their sages have justly observed, this submission naturally preserves peace in families; this produces tranquility in cities, prevents insurrections in provinces, and secures peace and good order through the whole empire.

a souls are still present, though invisible to them, and behold all their actions, and either approve or condemn, reward or punish them; which notion is of excellent use, to deter them from vice, and excite them to virtuous deeds. Neither do their greatest monarchs think themselves, on any account, more dispensed from this filial duty, than the meanest of their subjects, but rather strive to outdo them in it; insomuch, that we read of some of them who have refused to attend on any thing but that, even at a time when their dominions have been invaded by a foreign power (N). Monarchs; not exempt from them.

THE funeral rites are performed, among the rich, with much the same pomp and magnificence (if not rather greater) as their marriages, and with the addition of a vast number of Bonzas, and other priests, who adorn the sumptuous cavalcade, some singing, in a mournful tone, the encomiums of the deceased, others playing on a great variety of instruments; some carry the tables, on which are deposited the offerings of wine, victuals, &c. to be set on the tomb, others the perfumes to be burnt upon it, and one of them precedes the bier, bearing the table, or label, on which are written the names of the deceased, and those of his progenitors. The corpse, which is dressed in the best cloaths, is carried in a stately coffin (O), covered over with white damask, or some other rich silk, which is the colour that is used by all the Chinese in their mournings; over it are the insignia of the family; the whole carried by twenty or more lusty men clad in mourning, and covered with a vast stately canopy, which is likewise borne by a great number of men in the same mourning dress. The relations of the deceased, both men and women, follow next, according to their nearness to him, all clad in white sackcloth, girt about with a coarse rope, with straw wrapped about their feet, and rags about their heads; only the women relations, such as the wife, concubines, daughters, and other female kindred of the deceased, are carried in close sedans, or chairs, covered over with white curtains. Funeral rites.

IN this manner they proceed from the deceased's house to the burying-place; which must be without the walls of the city, and at a distance from any towns, or inhabited places (unless they chuse to keep the bodies in their own houses, inclosed in such coffins as we described in the last note); but, generally speaking, these sepulchral places are on some mountain, or eminence, about two or three miles from any city, and are inclosed with pine, cypress, and other trees, and some with a wall. The tombs are raised like little houses, but are differently shaped in different provinces. Those of the Mandarins, and princes of the blood, are of a magnificent structure, about twelve feet high, and eight or ten in diameter; and near them stands a table of white polished marble, of a considerable length and breadth, on which are set a perfuming pot, two vases, and two candlesticks, all of the same stone, and curiously wrought. On each side are placed, in several rows, a great many figures of officers, eunuchs, soldiers, lions, saddle-horses, camels, tortoises, and other animals, in different attitudes of grief and veneration. As for the meaner sort, they content themselves with raising a small kind of pyramid of mould or earth over the coffin. Burying-places.

THEY seldom bury many persons in one grave, and are exceedingly curious and careful about the bodies of their deceased friends. They would deem it an unheard-of cruelty to have them opened, and the heart and entrails taken out, as is done among us; and they would look with horror on our charnel-houses, and see the bones of different persons promiscuously laid one upon another. And this makes them so fond of those coffins lately described, Regard for the bodies.

(N) The Chinese annals record many instances of this filial duty, and particularly, in the singular piety of Yen-kong, king of Tsing, who, being forced to travel out of his father's dominions, to avoid the snares of an ambitious mother-in-law, and being there informed of his father's death, and of the loss of his kingdom, gave this extraordinary answer to a prince, who offered him his assistance and soldiers to recover it: "That, being become, as it were, a dead man, since his retreat and exile, he no longer esteemed any thing but virtue, and piety towards his parents; that this was his treasure: and that he chose rather to lose his kingdom, of which he was already dispossessed, than to be wanting in those last duties, which did not permit him to take arms, at a time destined for grief, and the funeral honours which were due to his father (54)."

(O) These coffins, about which the Chinese are so solicitous, that they will have them made in their life-time, and some sons will mortgage themselves, to procure one of them for a parent, are commonly made of planks about half a foot thick, and of a lasting sort, some of them of precious wood, and are so well pitched within, and japanned without, that no bad smell can perpire through them. Those of the richer sort are finely carved and gilt, and cost from 300 to 1000 crowns.

Before the corpse is laid in them, they commonly throw a little lime at the bottom; and, after it is laid, clap on a pillow, or a good deal of cotton, to keep the head steady, and stuff every vacuity with cotton and lime, to soak up any moisture that comes from the body.

We took notice above, that some, out of a more than common regard for their parents; chuse to keep their dead bodies at home; and this they will do at least during the whole three years of mourning, during which their seat in the day-time is a stool covered with white serge, and at night they lie down near the coffin, on a bare matt made of reeds. They deprive themselves, during the whole time, of all dainty meats, wines, conversation, and other comforts; and if they are obliged, on some urgent occasion, to stir out of their houses, or to go out of town, which few will do till a certain time of the mourning be over, they are commonly carried in a close chair covered with white serge or cloth (55).

which some will purchase not only at a great price, perhaps from 50 to 100 crowns, but even with their last penny, and keep them in their houses 10 or 20 years before-hand, and esteem them as the best piece of furniture they are masters of.

Feast given at the burying-place.

Woful mourning.

Hall of the ancestors.

WHEN the procession is arrived at the burying-place, the servants of the deceased, while the funeral ceremony is performing, are busied in preparing an entertainment for the company, which is set on tables, and in a kind of halls reared for that purpose. Some of the relations will partake of them, whilst others will chuse to keep close to the sons and daughters of the deceased, and join with them in their loud cries and woful complaints, than which nothing can be imagined more lugubrious and solemn; except that to an European, who is not used to them, they appear too formal and regular to inspire him with the same sentiments of grief. The burying-places of the grandees have commonly several such halls or apartments reared up, in which many of the near relations will stay a month or two, to repeat their mournful ceremonies every day with the sons of the deceased. They are not contented to celebrate their annual obsequies at their tombs; but every family hath a hall, which is called the hall of the ancestors, at which all the several branches of the family are obliged to repair on certain times in the year. These branches, which in some families have sometimes amounted to between 80 and 90, or to 7000 or 8000 persons, meet at the ceremony promiscuously, no distinction being then made between a great Mandarin and a mean mechanic; and, if any preference is given, it is to the oldest, whether rich or poor. Only the richer fort commonly prepare a sumptuous entertainment, to which the whole family is invited as soon as the ceremony is ended.

ONE thing more we may observe under this head of filial duty to the deceased: that many of the Chinese will not let the dead corpse be carried out the common doors, lest their grief should be renewed every time they passed through it, but cause a new one to be made for that purpose, which is immediately closed up after the funeral is over.

Mourning for an emperor.

The funeral of Kang-hi's mother.

WHEN an emperor dies, the whole empire goes into mourning, and the same respect is paid to his mother or grandmother. When the mother of the late Kang-bi died, a deep and universal mourning was observed fifty whole days, during which all the tribunals were shut up, and no kind of state-affairs mentioned to the emperor. The Mandarins spent the whole time at the palace, and in all outward expressions of grief; and several of them passed whole nights in the open air, tho' then very cold; and even the emperor's sons slept in the palace without pulling off their clothes. All the Mandarins, clad in white, and stripped of their red ornaments, which colour is then forbidden, went on horseback, with a very small retinue, to pay their mournful respects before her image, three days successively; after which, the corpse was carried with suitable pomp to the place where it was to lie in state (P). This was a stately palace out of the city, and all built of new mats, with courts, halls, and other apartments, for the corpse to remain in, till it was thence conveyed to the imperial burying-place.

Education of children.

Parents punished for neglect of it.

THIS extraordinary regard for their deceased parents is not only owing to the laws which give the living ones so great an authority over their children, but likewise to their excellent way of educating them: for even here the laws have taken such care to oblige them to it, under severe penalties, that if any of them happens to commit some crime, or great misdemeanor, and absconds himself from punishment, the father is commonly made to bear it for him, at least for not having done his duty towards him. There are several excellent treatises likewise written on the subject of education, by some of their learned doctors, with proper directions to parents and schoolmasters how to bring them up in the most effectual manner in the love of virtue, and aversion to vice, which, they say, ought to be the chief object of all their care; and, next to that, to train them up to learning, if capable of it, or to industry in some other calling; in doing which, those doctors advise the use of mild and gentle means, preferably to sharp and severe ones, considering that youth is averse to constraint, and easily discouraged by roughness. Instructions and reprimands, they say, should come like vernal winds and rains, which gently promote the growth of plants; and not like hasty showers or storms, which root them up, or wash them away. They have likewise old

(P) We are told, however, that the emperor would not follow what he miscalled the Chinese superstition of causing new gates to be broke open, but ordered the corpse to be carried through the public ones of the palace. He shewed the same contempt for some of the antient customs of his own nation, particularly with respect to four young ladies who had waited on his mother, and had taken their attire, and prepared themselves, according to the usage of the Tartars, to accompany her into the other world, by sacrificing their lives before her corpse, which that monarch would not suffer them to do. He likewise abolished another custom, till then in use among them, of burning rich furniture, and even the domestics of great men, with their bodies on the funeral pile (56).

- a story-books, some in prose, others in verse, but in a singular style, fit for children, and written in commendation of virtue, obedience to parents, honesty, industry, &c. The education of the boys, as well as of the girls, is intrusted to the wife, till the former are fit to be sent to school, and the latter come to be married: but all this, however, under the eye and direction of the father, who commonly reserves to himself the power of using severity, when other milder exhortations and encouragements prove ineffectual; and, after the father's death, the eldest son takes the authority over as many of the family as are still unmarried. And as, among those of the middle and lower rank, there will happen now-and-then some wranglings and quarrels, through the indulgence or indolence of the master of the family, the magistrates are obliged to look carefully to the good order and œconomy of it; and, in case of neglect, are themselves liable to be punished, as well as the offenders within-doors (Q).
- b THE Chinese are generally very grave, formal, and ceremonious, with each other, as well as towards strangers. Their salutation to an equal is by laying one hand to the breast, and bowing the head; to a superior, or more venerable person, they lay both hands to the breast, and bow the whole body as low as they can; and, to a Mandarin, they fall down on their knees, and touch the ground with their forehead. In saluting a superior either in his own house, or in any other place, the person bends one knee to him, and continues in that posture till he takes him up by the hand, which is commonly done immediately. But it is unusual and uncivil to salute a magistrate in public, unless one be summoned before, or have some particular application to make to, him. The rest, it seems, must only stand with their arms across, and their eyes fixed to the ground; for it is an affront to look them in the face. In their visits they use a great deal of ceremony in their gestures, though they are very laconic in their compliments. They are no less curious in seating their visitors according to their several ranks; and in the style in which they receive the honour of the visit, never speaking in the first person, I or me, but Your servant; and, to a person of distinction, Your humble, poor, or unworthy slave; and, instead of You to the person they speak to, they say, My lord; as, Let my lord permit his humble servant to, &c.; Let my lord accept of such a thing from his servant, or poor slave. If a present be the product of his own native place or province, and the country be ever so celebrated for it, as some of them are for their manufactures, others for their fruits, &c. the style must still run in the same strain with relation to that; as, Let my lord permit his servant to offer him such a thing, which his poor city or province affords: but if the present come from the country of the person to whom it is presented, then it must be, for which your noble city, or province, is so justly famed. The same humble style is observed between the scholars and their masters, to whom they never use the words I or you, but Your servant, or Your scholar, did so, or read so; and, Our master or doctor says or ordered, &c.^k Now, tho' this of speaking may appear to some of our readers extravagant, and mere grimace, yet, to those who are ever so little versed in that of the antient eastern languages, it will appear quite natural and uniform with them, and to be the very same as is still in use amongst most of the eastern nations at this time; so that it would be not only uncouth and absurd, but to a great degree uncivil and affronting, to express one's self in any other. Nay, the same method of speaking is still in some degree preserved by the politer part among several European nations, particularly the Spaniards and Germans. To which we may add, that it is the very style of the antient patriarchs, and of all the Hebrews before the captivity of Babylon, and even since, till they came to corrupt it by adopting the idioms of the Greeks and Romans; and how much and justly that style is admired by all the learned for its humility and simplicity, we have formerly shewn in the antient history of the Jews^l.
- c THE Chinese are no less formal in their visits, whether between inferiors and superiors, disciples and masters, which are indispensable at particular seasons, or between relations and friends (R); and as tea is the common liquor the Chinese treat their visitors with, they are no less

(Q) Thus we are told of a Mandarin, who, going through a street, heard a mother-in-law crying out, and cursing her son and daughter-in-law; and, having inquired into the occasion of the quarrel, made a report of it to the emperor, who ordered the son and daughter-in-law to be chastised, his father to lose his head, and the magistrate his place (57).

(R) It is among them a stated rule not to visit any person without sending a Tye-tse, or visiting bill, by the porter, to the person. This Tye-tse is commonly a sheet of red paper, slightly embellished with flowers of gold, and folded up like a screen; on one of whose folds is written the person's name, with some respectful addition, according to the person to be visited. They write, for instance, The tender and sincere friend of your lordship, and the perpetual disciple of your doctrine, presents himself in that quality to pay his duty and his homage to you down to the ground. If the visited be a familiar acquaintance, the style abates somewhat of that humble strain, and a white paper will serve; and the same sort must be sent in if the person is in mourning (58).

If the visit be made from a person of distinction to another, and the latter hath not time or inclination to receive it, he sends him a civil message by a servant, signifying, that he need not give himself the trouble to alight; and then it is esteemed as a real visit, and

Reception of the visitors. less ceremonious and nice in the manner of presenting, receiving, and returning, the cup ; a every dish that is thus drank being attended with the same bowing and cringing, compliments and thanks, even though the cup is commonly tendered by a servant. The same are observed when the visited treats his visiter with a pipe of tobacco ; those that are used in the reception and dismissal would appear still more troublesome and irksome to our Europeans, there being so much formality used on both sides at every door they go in or out at, at their sitting and rising, as if the ceremonial passed with us between some great ambassador and the first minister of state : and yet the Chinese will by no means dispense with them, unless it be on ordinary visits between familiar friends or near relations ; and even in these we should think them rather too punctilious ; but in formal visits, especially among the great, the least omission on either side would be looked upon and resented as an affront to the other ; and on this account they make it a part of their education and study ; and there are books printed among them ; which settle all those points of civility in so clear and easy an order, according to every rank, that none can well be ignorant of them. As for strangers, though the same exactness be not absolutely required from them, yet the nearer they come up to it, the better they will be received. Even the foreign ambassadors are allowed forty days before they appear in public ; during which they procure masters of ceremonies to instruct them in all the formalities belonging to their character ; and if they should chance to miss in any of them, for want of having been rightly instructed, the master is liable to be severely punished for his neglect^m, by the tribunal of rites, before whom they are obliged to perform and go thro' every part of that tedious exercise, not once or twice, but till the members of that court pronounce them perfect in every one of them. b

Books of civility,

Ambassadors taught by masters of ceremonies.

Reception of strangers by those of the lower rank ;

among the mercantile part.

Even those of the middle and lower rank tie themselves to such formalities as we should think not only useless, but ridiculous and troublesome. Thus, for instance, when a person hath been visiting, or entertained at a house, and is ready to mount his horse, in order to go home, the very ceremony of parting will take up near half an hour. The master of the house comes out to see him on horseback ; whilst he, on his side, protests that he will rather see the world turned upside down, than mount before him ; at length, with much intreating and protestations on both sides, the master retires out of sight till his guest is mounted, and then appears again, and wishes him well home. This produces a fresh volley of compliments on both sides ; the one will not go into his doors till he is gone quite out of sight ; and the other vows he will not move one step till he hath seen him in his house. He complies again to his guest, and steps in ; and, as soon as the other hath moved a few paces, comes out, and halloos a fresh adieu after him, which he must in civility tack about to return with fresh bows and cringes : and, if the person live at a good distance from him, he will not let him go very far before he sends a servant after him, to wish him a good journey, with new compliments, and wishes of seeing him again soon. This latter kind of civilities are most in d is accordingly repaid, either on the next, or in few days after. If the visit be received, the visiter is permitted to pass through the two first courts, and as far as the hall, where the visited comes to receive him. Here the formalities begin, which are to be suited to the rank of both persons, and as they are set down in the Chinese ceremonial, where one finds the number of bows that must be made, the titles to be given, the mutual genuflexions, the several turns to be made either to the right or left (for the place of honour is different in different places), the silent gestures by which the master of the house invites his visiter at the hall-door, and says only the words Tsin, tsin, Go in, go in ; to which the other is to answer, Pu-can, I dare not ; the salutation which the former makes to the chair on which the latter is to be seated, which he must also dust with a blow or two of his long sleeve, or with the skirt of his garment.

As soon as the parties are seated, the visiter, in a most grave and succinct manner, is to declare the occasion of his coming ; to which the other, after a certain number of bows, gives an answer. Care must be taken to sit upright in the chair, and not loll on either side, or lean against the back. The feet must be placed exactly even, the legs upright, and the hands must be laid on each knee. The eye must not be permitted to stare about, but be fixed towards the ground. After a very short conversation, a servant comes, and brings as many dishes of tea as there are persons ; which must be taken, drank out, and returned, with the stated formality of bowing and cringing. The conversation being over, the visiter or visitors, and visited, have again a number of bows and ceremonies to interchange, till the former come to their chairs, where they are renewed, till each person is got into his ; and then a few more mutual bows pass, till the porters have got the chair on their shoulders, and then a general adieu concludes the ceremony.

Those that pass between the superiors and inferiors of quality, as between a Mandarin, a kolaw, or a prince of the blood, are still more clogged with punctilios and formalities, and much more still those which are observed between a foreign ambassador and the imperial ministers : but we have dwelt long enough on that subject (58). Only one thing we must not forget to observe, that the Chinese, like other eastern nations, are so far from uncovering their heads in token of respect, that it is looked upon as an affront for any to stand bareheaded before their betters ; and it was on this account that the missionaries were dispensed by the pope from uncovering the head in their churches (59).

a vogue among the mercantile part, who are always most obsequious and obliging to those they get most by, or can best cheat or over-reach".

THE Chinese vary very much in their shape, air, and complexion; and it is hardly possible to be otherwise in a country of such vast extent, and different climates; so that it is not difficult to distinguish a southern from a northern one, who live thirty or more degrees asunder; the latter being as fair and smooth as any Europeans, and the former brown and swarthy like the Tangierines and Morocos of Africa; and, with respect to these, it must be farther observed, that though they generally are inclined to the brown and sun-burnt complexions, yet there are degrees of it; not only as they draw nearer to the southern verge of the empire, but as they are, by their rank or occupation, more or less exposed to the scorching beams of a vertical sun: for, even in those hot and sultry climates, one shall see among the gentry, especially among the female sex, who seldom stir out, persons of a good complexion, and not much inferior in clearness of skin to those who live in the more northern ones; though the generality of the rest be pretty deeply tanned, especially those who travel much by land or water, or work at the kilns, and other labours that expose them to the sun; and who, during the hot months, have hardly any covering on their bodies, but a thin pair of breeches, like the waiters at our bagnios, or the guides at the bath^o.

THE men are no admirers of a fine slender shape, but affect rather a fat kind of corpulency, rather squat than tall. Their faces are mostly broad, their eyes and hair black, beards thin and long, their noses short and flat. If a man be of a middle size, or somewhat above it, have a large forehead, little eyes and mouth, flat nose and long ears, a long beard, fat brawny limbs, prominent belly, and a big voice, he is looked upon as a complete handsome man, and so far fit to be made a Mandarin or magistrate. The women are commonly of a middle size, genteely shaped, slender and strait, but have no taste for a small waist, and a protuberance of the breasts and hips, but rather study to carry an uniformity of bulk from the neck downwards. They have generally handsome faces; their noses are short, their eyes black, small, well-cut, and in all likelihood would have a vivid complexion, did not they not deem it a sign of boldness, and strive to conceal it by rubbing their faces with a white kind of powder or paint, to make them look of a pale and languid, or, as they esteem it, a modest, bashful hue, though at the expence of their skin, which is in time much impaired and wrinkled by it^p.

BUT their greatest beauty consists in the smallness of their feet, though this is likewise to the great disfigurement of their legs, which become thereby swollen and large, and all of a bigness from top to bottom. Neither is that the only damage they receive from this artful piece of beauty, which is imposed upon them in their infancy, by binding them so close from the time they are born, as to stint their further growth; for they plainly appear to feel no small constraint from it, by the slowness and uneasiness of their gait, and their liableness to trip; so that they may be said rather to waddle than walk, and that only upon their heels; for their shoes are made so, that the sole never touches the ground; which is in some measure the same as walking on stilts, and must be as painful to them as it is disagreeable to strangers. Yet such is the power of education and custom, that they not only readily submit to those inconveniencies, but contribute to them by the constant care they take of swathing and pinching, and striving to make them still less, merely for the pride they take in shewing them, as they walk, to those few domestics and acquaintance who are admitted into their apartment: for we have already observed, that they are seldom permitted to stir out of it, or to be seen in it by any but female servants; and the apartments wherein they are immured are generally in the most retired part of the house; but yet, such is the common vanity of their sex, that they will spend several hours in the morning in dressing and adorning themselves.

WHAT might be the rise of this odd custom can only be guessed at, the Chinese themselves pretending to be ignorant of it; unless it were to keep that sex in subjection. But it is more likely to have been introduced to keep them more closely confined at home, that, if their modesty could not allay their inclination of gadding abroad, the pain and uneasiness of going might the more easily reconcile them to their confinement.

THEIR dress is very decent, comely, and agreeable to the singular modesty of their looks. Their head-dress usually consists in several curls of the hair interspersed with here and there tufts of gold and silver flowers, or fine feathers, on each side, which fall down beautifully to their shoulders. The rest is made up behind in a kind of roll, and fastened by a bodkin. In the northern provinces they wear a gawse, or thin silk, over their hair; and in cold weather they wrap up their heads in a kind of cornet, or hood. The young ladies of quality commonly wear a kind of crown made of pasteboard, and covered with some fine silk, the fore-part of which rises in a point above the forehead, and is covered with diamonds, pearls, and other rich ornaments. The top of the head is adorned with natural or artificial flowers, ^a intermixed with bodkins with jewels at the end : but those who are advanced in years seldom wear any thing but a piece of superfine silk wound several times about their heads (S).

Vests. ^b THEIR bodies are covered with a fine vest, long enough to reach to the ground, and tied about the middle with a girdle. The elderly women chuse theirs of black, or deep purple ; but the young ones, of red, blue, or green, according to their fancy. Their hands are ^c always concealed within their wide long sleeves, which would trail on the ground, if they did not take care to hold them up ; and whatever is offered to them, is taken with their hands wrapped up in them. They never shew their necks or breasts, but conceal both, either by the closeness of their vest, or by some very short cloak, which is wrapped about the neck and shoulders. Over the vest they wear a loose gown with very wide sleeves, which would ^b likewise drag to the ground, if not held up : so that, upon the whole, their dress is not only very decent, but the best contrived to conceal their bodies in the modestest manner.

Dress of the men. THAT of the men is no less suited to the gravity and modesty they seem to affect (T). Their heads are covered with a kind of cap, which hardly reaches down to their ears ; and their faces are screened from the sun by a fan, which they always carry with them. They shave their heads all over, except one lock behind, which they either leave to hang down, or make up into a roll, and tuck up under their caps or hats ; these are commonly made in the form of a bell. Those they wear in summer are of a fine mat, lined with sattin, and adorned on the outside with a tuft of red silk, or hair, hanging down to the rim, which either covers it all over, or else waves in the wind by its excessive lightness, and appears ^c very beautiful at a distance. The top of the hat hath a large button, fastened to it, of amber, crystal, or some other shining material, neatly wrought and polished. The emperor, princes of the blood, Mandarins, Literati, Priests, Bonzas, &c. have their hats differently shaped and ornamented, according to their respective ranks ; all which, as well as their different sorts of dresses, it were superfluous to describe. As for the poor people, they go with their heads quite bare, or at best have only a slight small cap, not unlike the crown of one of our hats, but not half so deep.

Vests. THE men's vests are long enough to reach to the ground, and so wide as to fold over the breast ; and are fastened on the left side by four or five buttons of gold, silver, or baser metal, as they can best afford it. The sleeves are wide, and long enough to come down ^e to the fingers ends ; and the sash, or girdle, that ties the garment to the body, is commonly of silk, curiously wrought, and hangs down to the knees. They go with their necks bare in summer ; but cover them in cold weather either with a sattin cape sewed to the vest, or with a tippet of sable, or other skin, four or five fingers broad. Over their vest they wear a short loose coat or gown of blue, green, or some other colour, with sleeves that come down no farther than the bending of the arm. When they receive visits, they throw a third loose raiment over the other two, and each of the three are of a different colour. Under them both men and women wear a kind of shirt, or rather waistcoat, of white taffety, which wraps over the breast, and is tied or laced on the right side, and with narrow sleeves. Both sexes likewise wear drawers of the same fine silk : but in winter, the shirt is of linen, and the ^d breeches are wider, like trowsers, and reach down below the calf of the leg ; and these last are made of coarse sattin quilted with cotton or raw silk. The legs are covered with a kind of boot of the same quilted silk, about half an inch thick ; and the foot is made to go into a slipper. These are commonly of coarse blue or purple sattin, flowered with white, with a very thick sole stitched with packthread, and covered over with a white coarse kind of sha-

Shirts and drawers of both sexes.

Shoes and stockings.

(S) Some of the ladies will adorn their heads, we are told, with the figure of a Fong-ahang, a fabulous bird, formerly mentioned (60), and made either of copper, or silver gilt, as they can afford it. Its wings are gently spread over the fore-part of their head-dress, and embrace the upper part of the temples. Its long spreading tail makes a sort of plume on the top of the head ; the body is placed over the forehead, the neck and beak hanging down upon the nose. The neck being joined to the body by a secret hinge, the head easily plays up and down, and vibrates at every motion of the head, the bird being fixed on it by the feet, which are fastened in the hair. Some of the first quality will wear an ornament made of several of these birds, which, interwoven together, surround their heads in the form of a crown (61).

(T) They pretend to such a high degree of modesty, as to condemn our European dress, as exposing too much the lineaments of the body ; whereas they strive to conceal even their arms, legs, and thighs, by their long gowns, wide breeches and sleeves, and ill-shaped stockens, or boots. They likewise seemed much offended at many of our pictures, as immodest, and even those which we should rank amongst the most modest ; as where the drapery is so nicely disposed by the skilful artist, as to discover the true shape of each limb or part.

But, for all their specious pretences, all this modesty is commonly set aside at home, with respect to the mens dress, during the hot months ; for then they seldom wear any thing about them but a thin pair of breeches, whether masters or servants : and in most cities, especially in the southern parts, their carmen, and other labouring people, and more especially their watermen, work naked all the hot weather, or at most have only a napkin tied round their middle. And, as to pictures and statues, it is plain they have long since abated much of their boasted modesty, since we see many of them brought thence in as indecent and vile attitudes as any that are done in Italy ; and some of these as exactly imitated as their imperfect skill in painting would permit them to do.

a green silk or cloth, without any heel, and with the foot turning up. They wear hanging at their girdles a pouch, in which they carry their pipe, which is of brais, their tobacco, handkerchief, and the two sticks they eat with. When they travel in bad weather, their caps, upper coats, and vests, are crufted over with a sort of oil, which turns green when dry, and defends them from the rain. In winter the quality wear rich furs, and the inferior sort lamb and other skins, or quilted cotton. Every Mandarin hath upon his clothes some emblem of his dignity, embroidered before and behind. That of the civil magistrates is usually a bird; and that of the military Mandarins, and officers, either a dragon, lion, tyger, or some fierce creature. All these wear also broad swords hanging on their left side^a, with the point forwards.

b THE womens shoes, the longest of which among the ladies are not much above half a span long, are likewise of silk finely embroidered, commonly by themselves, and with a round heel about an inch high, and of equal bigness from top to bottom. Their stockens seem (as far we can gather from their pictures, and there is hardly any possibility of coming at a nearer examination of the premises) to be a kind of appendage to their drawers, if not of a piece with them, and to hang loose about their legs, down below the ankles, where they are gathered up with some ribbon, below which hang about the feet some four or five inches in breadth of the same silk, like a kind of furbelow, or ruffle of a shirt-sleeve, in order, as may be supposed, to hide the protuberant deformity of the leg; and thus much may serve for the present dress of both sexes. It will not be amiss, however, to observe under this head, that this which we have been describing above is not the original dress of the Chinese, which had been, according to their account, the only one that had been worn by them from the foundation of their monarchy to their conquest by the Tartars; but rather that which the conqueror forced them, not without great difficulty, to exchange for their antient one, in order to enure them the more effectually to the yoke, by abolishing all distinction of dress between his Tartarian subjects and them, as will be further seen in the sequel. Forced to change their old dress for this.

WE have already mentioned their luxury in their festivals, in which they indulge themselves in all the variety they can afford. In their common diet they are less profuse and nice; and not only eat of all manner of flesh, fish, and fowl, as we do, but even cats, dogs, rats, serpents, grasshoppers, and other vermin. Horse-flesh, however, is one of the dainties the most esteemed; and, next to it, that of dogs; but of all of them they eat very sparingly, and commonly boiled with a good deal of rice, or some pot-herbs, and made into broths or soups, after the manner of the French and Spaniards; but, like them, they live mostly upon rice, pulse, millet, herbs, roots, and other garden-stuff, and variety of fruits in their season. The flesh, fowl, or fish, whether boiled, roasted, or broiled, is commonly brought to the table ready-seasoned, and carved into small bits; so that neither salt, pepper, or other condiments, are seen upon it, any more than knives forks, spoons, or napkins; they using only two small sticks to feed themselves with, as hath been lately hinted, without touching the meat with their hands. They commonly use high chairs and tables at their meals, contrary to all other eastern nations, who sit cross-legged on the ground, and either use no table but the floor, or at most have them about a foot high from it. At their entertainments every guest hath a neat little japan table set before him, on which are served the several dishes designed for him, either in bowls of the same japanned stuff, or of china, or coarser earth, according to the circumstances of the person who gives it. Their diet and dainties.

THE most delicious food of all, with which the rich entertain their guests, are, the stags pizzles, birds nests, and bears paws, of which the reader may see an account in the margin (U). Upon the whole, their cooks are surprisngly expert in the variety of dishes they Stags pizzles; and birds nests.

(U) The former of them they dry in the sun in summer, and roll them in pepper and nutmeg; and, when they are to be dressed, they soak them in rice-water, to make them soft, and afterwards boil them in the gravy of a kid, well seasoned with spices; and this they esteem as one of their finest dishes.

The birds nests are such as are commonly found on the sides of the rocks along the coasts of Java, Cochinchina, Tong-king, &c. where they are built by birds, which, in their plumage, resemble our swallows, and are supposed to make them with little fishes they catch at sea, and so fasten to the rock by some viscous juice which distils from their backs. They have been also observed to take some of the scum that floats on the surface of the sea, and to cement the parts of their nests, as swallows do theirs with mud. This matter, though white and soft whilst it is fresh, contracts a transparent solidity, and greenish kind of hue, when dried. As soon as the young ones have quitted their nests, the neighbouring people are very eager to get them down; and sometimes load whole barges with them, and sell them at a good price. These nests resemble the rind of a large candied citron, in shape as well as in size, and, mixed with other meats, give them an agreeable relish.

The bears paws, especially the hindmost ones, which are esteemed by far the finest, are stripped of their skin, and dried with spice, and so preserved for use, much in the same way as the stag's pizzle (62).

make of one sort of flesh, fish, fowl, pulse, grain, &c. and the variety of colours, taste, and flavour, they give them; and the Mandarins are no less fond of those, not only which are the most nourishing to the body, but which are the most apt to create an appetite to venery, and a suitable vigour for procreation^a; on which account they eat most of their dishes very hot with spice. Their bread is commonly made of rice; and, though they have plenty of wheat in several provinces, yet they seldom make any but a sort of flat cakes, of a tolerable taste, and these are sometimes mixed with particular herbs apt to create an appetite; but they use little art in grinding their corn or rice, that being commonly done over a flat stone placed horizontally, by rolling a stone cylinder over it, which, by its weight, forces the grain out of its several husks. This must be done at several times, in order to bring it to its purity and whiteness. The first throws off its outward skin, which is as coarse as that of our barley; the next is of a reddish hue, and is taken off in the same manner, and after a second soaking; and so the third and fourth, which are of a finer and paler colour and texture; after which, you have the rice in its perfection: but the poor people content themselves with stripping it of its first, or at most of its second coat. The cakes or loaves they make of it are commonly baked either in a kind of Balneo Mariæ, or else in a vessel which contains the fire in the centre, and casts so great a heat, as to bake them in less than a quarter of an hour.

Corn-mills

Common drink.

Made wines;

made of rice, corn, &c.

The vast consumption of them winking at.

THEIR usual liquor at their meals is tea, which they drink hot. The common rule is, contrary to ours, to eat cold, and to drink hot; let the weather be ever so sultry, or themselves ever so thirsty, they will patiently stay till they can get it made boiling hot, before they will drink it. Wine, we have formerly observed^b, they do not make of grapes, though they have plenty of them, especially in the southern provinces, and of an excellent kind. This circumstance is commonly urged to prove, that Noah, the first planter of the vine, could not be the founder of the Chinese nation; whereas a more probable one could hardly be brought for his being so, and for his forbidding the use of juice of the vine, on account of the disaster which happened to him on his drinking too plentifully of it: but we shall have occasion to discuss that curious point in a more proper place. In the mean time, though the Chinese have been all along very strict in their forbearance of the juice of the grape, till their late conquest by the Tartars, they had, from time immemorial, substituted for it other liquors, equally strong, intoxicating, and pernicious, both brewed and distilled, either from rice, wheat, and other grain, or expressed from several kinds of fruits, or made of the liquor which distils from the palm, and other such trees, when tapped at a proper season; all which they have always indulged themselves in the free use of, especially the two former; which encourages such a vast consumption of those two kinds of grain, that it is justly looked upon as a chief cause of those dreadful dearths and famines which so frequently happen in the empire. There are indeed some severe laws against the brewing and distilling of corn and rice, beyond a stated quantity in every district, which, if duly executed, would effectually prevent their immoderate and destructive consumption; but the Mandarins, and those under them, bribed partly by the distillers, and induced partly by their fondness for those liquors, readily wink at it, and suffer that complicated abuse to spread still farther its pernicious effects (W).

(W) This enormous consumption of corn and rice by brewers and distillers, which deprives the labouring sort in some measure of their daily bread, even in time of plenty, and starves so many myriads to death in time of scarcity, is attended with several other destructive effects, which chiefly affect the rich and wealthy, and in some sort doubly retaliates upon them the misfortunes which they occasion among the poor.

We are told by a considerable eye-witness, that the Chinese have contracted (how long is not easy to guess) such a pernicious fondness for those liquors which are distilled from rice, and other grain, that from the highest Mandarins down to the wealthy merchants and tradesmen, they seldom fail of indulging themselves in a large dose of it, just before they go to bed, by way of opiate; and, what is still worse, few of them drink it before they have previously set it on fire, and burnt it so long as to make it as warm as they can possibly get it down; by which means their throat, or œsophagus, becomes in time so contracted, that they can swallow nothing either liquid or solid, but pine and die for want of nourishment; a misfortune which our author assures us † frequently happens amongst them. Another disaster which these private night doses often occasion, is, that the persons who take them being generally fatigued with the business of the day, and the chambers in which they sleep built very low, and the furniture very light, and easily inflammable, the blaze of the spirituous liquor is apt to get up to the ceiling, or take hold of the curtains, and set the whole place on fire before they are aware of it; the flame of which soon communicates itself to the rest of the house, and thence frequently to a great part of the city; so that some hundreds, and sometimes thousands, of houses, are reduced to ashes, before it can be quenched*.

As for the rice of which their wine is made, though it be different from that which is commonly eaten, and of a coarser nature, it is nevertheless in great request, on account of the liquor drawn from it.

This is done by several ways, every country or city having its own peculiar method; but the most common is, by soaking the rice in good soft and fresh water (or, where that cannot be got, by correcting it a THOSE liquors, which are made of rice in particular, are in the greatest vogue, and are Distilled li- among the grandes, especially those which come from some particular parts of the empire; such as that which is made at Pu-si-byen, in the province of Kyang-nan, and owes its excellence to the goodness of the water; and that of the city of Shau-king, which is esteemed still much wholesomer, and is mostly used at court. Some other strong liquors they likewise make by distillation, such as we have hinted at in the last note; and some others, which the reader may find in the next (X).

THE only two liquors, which we find mentioned by our seamen, as most to their taste (for Hock-shue as to tea, they usually leave that sort of beverage to the natives), are what we style the Hock- and Sam-shue.
b shue and Sam-shue. The former of these is of a deep-brown colour, but very clear and strong, said to be brewed from wheat, and tastes more like mum than beer. The other is said to be distilled from rice, and is either of a pale or reddish hue, and is by several travellers called wine. But neither of these, for aught appears, are used any-where but on the coasts and sea-port towns, no mention being made of any such being drank in the inland parts.

CHINA, as we have already hinted in the geography of it, is for the most part the finest Fine roads for country in the world for travelling; the roads being of a spacious breadth, that is, between travelling and 20 and 30 yards wide, and reaching from one end of the empire to the other; the moun- commerce.
tainous parts being either levelled, lowered, or cut through, or having large galleries along their steep declivity, built of timber, dreadful indeed to strangers to go over*; but so familiar to the natives, that they ride over them without any fear; and others, lastly, having c strong and stately bridges, built from one mountain to another, some of which we have elsewhere described. To these if we add the surprising contiguity of their cities and towns, especially along the high roads; so that one is no sooner got out of one, but one comes within sight, if not into the very suburbs, of another; the great number of their navigable rivers, and the infinite multitude of their canals for water-carriage, and continual bridges over them for those who ride, or travel on foot; the wooden towers about 30 feet high, and at the distance of a mile and half from each other, upon which are written, in large characters, the names of the towns to which the roads lead, and their distances from each other, as exactly measured at the public charge; the forts, or redoubts of earth, cast up at proper
d distances, and guarded either by the soldiery or militia, to keep as much as possible the roads clear from robbers, to forward the dispatches sent by the government, and to examine with the utmost care every traveller that goes by (Y); and, lastly, the vast crouds of people that frequent, or rather croud, those roads; it must be granted, that no country on the whole globe hath made better and more effectual provision for the ease and security of travelling and commerce, as well as for the delight of all that are concerned in either.

THEIR way of travelling is various, according to the different provinces, and the various Way of tra- businesses of people. In general they use horses, mules, camels, and, in some countries, velling.

with some other ingredients), about 20 or 30 days, and afterwards boiling it till it be dissolved; upon which it will appear covered with a light froth, like that of our new wines, occasioned by the ferment of the liquor beneath it. This last they pour off clear into vessels well glazed; and of the lees that remain, they draw off a spirit not unlike our brandy, or rather stronger, and more easily set on fire (63).

(X) They distil, we are told, a strong sort of spirit from mutton-flesh, which the late emperor Kang-hi drank sometimes. But this is drank by few except the Tartars, on account of its strong and disagreeable taste, and intoxicating quality.

Some other liquors are made in different provinces, both by brewing and distillation, which it were needless to particularize. We have mentioned one sort of the latter, with which his excellency Mr. Izbrandts Ides, ambassador from Muscovy, was treated (64); and we may conclude this head with observing, that intoxicating liquors are commonly used by the Chinese and Tartars, though not in such quantities, and destructive variety, as they are among us; and much less by those of the female sex, who seldom taste any thing stronger than tea, unless in some particular diseases, in which they are indulged with some sort of cordials, made so rather by spices and warm drugs, than by any brewed or distilled liquors (65).

(Y) These forts, which are situate on eminences, and seen at a great distance, by the imperial flag set up on the top, are garrisoned by a certain number either of the militia, or of regular troops, under some proper officers; and these are not only to prevent any robberies being committed on the highway, by patrolling about the length of their limits, or any other disorders happening from the vast multitudes of travellers and carriages, but to stop and examine every one that goes armed, except they produce a pass and licence for it; so that the utmost care and caution is every-where taken to keep the roads safe and free, and the traffick from one part of the empire to the other easy and uninterrupted: and hence it is that there are so few robberies committed any-where, except in the woody and mountainous parts, where they go in large gangs, notwithstanding the great multitudes of necessitous people that swarm every-where (66), and the rich booties that are always to be met with on the roads: but this last may be one main reason of it, they being so continually thronged with travellers, that it would be very difficult to meet with an opportunity of robbing them (67).

Goods carried by ticket-porters.

employ ticket-porters to carry their goods from city to city, which they do by slings, two to a burden; or, if too heavy for two, they will join two more; and these carry it with two poles on their shoulders, with such surprising quickness, that most of them will travel with their load at the rate of five miles an hour. These are numerous in every city; and have a master over them, who is answerable for them; and who, being applied to by the merchants, distributes their several loads among them: he gives them at the same time a ticket, which they must deliver up, with the goods, to the proper persons, at their journey's end, and bring another from them to him. These are chiefly employed for the carriage of goods which may be damaged by being conveyed in waggons or barges; or where these cannot be had, and sometimes for expedition; they ridding double the ground that any waggon can do.

Coaches and chariots.

In travelling, the richer sort have their coaches and chariots, though we are not told of what kind these last are; and may be only calashes, or chaises with two wheels, such as are in use among the Tartars; and litters for the sick, carried either by lusty fellows, or, which is more common, by mules or camels. The Tartars here usually ride on horseback, in towns, as well as on the roads, and are generally good horsemen: their saddles are much like those in use among the Turks; and, like them, they ride very short, and with their knees almost as high as the top of the saddle; so that, upon any rencounter either with an enemy or robber, they raise themselves quite upright upon their stirrups, to give the greater force to the intended blow. The quality, both Chinese and Tartars, chuse to travel in the night all the summer, not only for the conveniency of the coolness, but in several parts to be free from the tygers, and other wild beasts, which they keep off by lighted torches, and other artificial fires, they carry with them; and which are so contrived, that neither wind nor rain can put them out, but will rather make them burn the fiercer. But when they travel with a great retinue, and well armed, as the Mandarins commonly do, that precaution becomes needless.

The rich travel by night.

Bad inns.

Roads very dusty.

THESE, as hath been formerly observed^y, have their inns at proper distances, for their reception and conveniency, and kept at the charge of the government. But it is far otherwise with other travellers; for though the common inns be in great plenty in all the high roads, yet they meet but with wretched accommodations in them, unless they bring them along with them (YY); and this is one of the two main inconveniencies of travelling in China: the other is, the prodigious dustiness of the roads, which, though kept in the best order imaginable, yet in dry weather, especially when the wind blows hard, such clouds of dust are raised, as quite darken the sky, and stifle the travellers. Nor is this to be wondered at, considering the vast and constant crouds of people, horses, waggons, &c. which are continually passing backwards and forwards; so that they are obliged, at those dry seasons, to go with their faces covered with a thin veil, and with glasses before their eyes, to prevent being stifled or blinded by the clouds of light dust, through which they must make their way. In other respects, a man cannot wish for a better country to travel in, either for speed, safety, convenience, or delight^z.

BUT what adds still more to the pleasure of it, is the vast and almost constant variety of curious objects, with which the eye is delightfully entertained almost all the way; and this naturally brings us to the two last things with which we were to conclude this section, viz. the natural and artificial rarities of the country. Of the first sort we have already mentioned several, as they came in course, either in the geography, or natural history.

Cataracts.

THOSE of the most remarkable kind, not yet taken notice of, are, 1. Their volcanos, many of which are not inferior, either in the height of the mountains out of which they issue, the dreadfulness of their flames and smoak, and the torrents of sulphur, and other minerals, which they vomit up, to those famous ones of Italy we have formerly spoken of^a, or those in America, of which an account will be given in its proper place. 2. The great number of

(YY) The generality of those public inns, except here and there one upon the great roads, are wretchedly built, and worse furnished. They are commonly of mud, without pavement or boards; and those who do not bring their bedding with them, must take up with a mat, and lie in their own clothes: but the poorer sort of travellers are so used to this way of accommodation, that they will lie quite naked on them, wrapped about only with a single coverlid lined with linen. The greatest part of their inns are so ill covered, that one may see the light through the thatch and rafters, and perhaps feel the rain or snow through them.

Their provisions are not much better; and it is a chance if a traveller can get a bit of meat or fish to eat, or any tolerable liquor to drink, excepting in some places, where one meets with wild fowl or fish very cheap; but even there you must take up perhaps with their way of dressing it, which may prove as disagreeable. The inns in the great cities are somewhat better, being built with brick, and large and handsome, and commonly afford better provisions and conveniencies. In the northern provinces one meets with what they call Kanfis, which are large alcoves of brick, built the whole length of the room, with stoves underneath, and mats made of reeds on the top, whereon a man may lay his bed if he hath one (68).

a cataracts and cascades, of an extraordinary height and breadth, and no less dreadful and loud, particularly that near the city of Hoai-gan, or Hoay-min-gham, in the province of Kyang-nan, which falls into the canal of that city, near the river Hoay, with such violence, that it is with great labour and cost that they prevent its dreadful effects^b.

THERE are many such cataracts in other rivers, particularly in the Whang-ho, or Yellow River, formerly mentioned, and so called from its extraordinary rapidity, and the vast quantity of mud it sweeps along with it. Le Compte tells us of another, which is always red like blood, probably from much the same reason; and of a third, in the province of Se-chwen, which hath a surprising lustre in the night season, occasioned by the vast number of precious stones that glitter through its waves, and for which the natives give it the name of the Pearl River. We read of a fourth near Fo-ming, which turns blue in harvest, at which time the inhabitants on each side are used to dye that colour; and of a fifth, near Pan-gau, whose waters are too light to bear up any timber; of a sixth, near Ching-tyen, affirmed to be sweet-scented; of a seventh in the province of Fo-kyen, whose waters are of a greenish hue, and are said to turn iron into copper. We omit mentioning several others, remarkable for some medicinal or other virtues, which we have no room to dwell upon; but the most surprising of all is, that which rises yearly on the 18th day of the eighth month, with such a prodigious high tide, before the city of Hang-chew, that multitudes of people flock thither from all parts to behold that surprising phenomenon, which neither theirs, nor any of our philosophers, could ever yet account for. We might add some others, which are no less famed for their gold sand, particularly one which on that account is styled the Golden River[†].

THEY have likewise extraordinary springs and fountains, some of which ebb and flow; others rise, some hot and some cold, at a small distance from each other. Nieuboff mentions a strange one near the city of Jung-chan, which issues into two branches out of a stone cut into the resemblance of a man's nose, one of the nostrils of which throws out hot, and the other cold water. Some others, still more surprising, the reader may see in the margin (Z), for which we have not quite so good an authority. They likewise abound with mineral and medicinal springs, either for drinking or bathing; and some of them so intensely hot, that the people can boil their victuals in a kind of Balneo Mariæ in them, in a very little time. Some other sorts of water are noted for petrifying every thing that is thrown into them, particularly those of a lake, or river, in the island of Hay-nan, which will petrify fishes, lobsters, &c. and spoken of in a former section^c. Other lakes are said to turn copper into, or at least give it the resemblance of, iron. Some others which will bring on storms of rain and thunder, upon the flinging a stone, or any heavy thing, into them; particularly a famed one said to be in the bowels of a prodigious high mountain, full of deep and dreadful caverns, and into which if a stone be cast, it will give a loud roaring report, like a great clap of thunder, and raise a thick mist, which in a little time will dissolve itself into water again. These, and many more of the like nature, which some of our missionaries have in all probability taken from the Chinese books, not altogether to be relied on, because not confirmed by more modern experienced authors, we leave to the choice of our readers either to believe, or not, but which, if true, would afford no small delight to a curious traveller to take a view of in his way.

WE omit here their many rich mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, copper, iron, and other metals and minerals, and of a great variety of precious and other curious stones (among which some mention the asbestos, or incombustible stone, so famed among the ancients, and as absurdly exploded by some of the moderns, as the product of some of their mines); their various quarries of porphyry and marble, some of them so beautifully veined with figures of men, horses, trees, cities, mountains, &c. as if done with a pencil; and many others of the mineral and vegetable kind, besides some among the quadruped and volatile sort^d. But there is one sort of fish among them, which, for its surprising beauty and nature, may be reckoned one of the greatest rarities belonging to the watry element, which deserves a particular notice, and with which we shall close this head.

(Z) Of this nature is that which the Chinese tell you is to be seen at Kan-ton, and is looked upon by them as miraculous; and, if what they say of it be true, is little less than such, it being affirmed to cast out of the same opening hot and cold water, which afterwards separate from each other. Much of the same wonderful nature is that in the province of Quang-fi, one half of whose waters run clear, and the other muddy; and, if mixed together, will separate again immediately.

The last we shall mention is that in the city of Kyng-cheng, in the province of Shen-fi, which is no less surprising, it being about five feet in depth, and the water on the top cold; but at the bottom so hot, that it scalds any thing that reaches it (69). These, and many other such, being rather taken from the Chinese books, than attested by any European eye-witnesses, shall suffice for a sample of the natives' fondness for such kind of preternatural rarities.

*The golden and silver fish.
Their beauty

THIS beautiful creature, which for its colour, the Chinese style Kin-yu, or Golden fish, is a commonly about the length of one's finger, and proportionably thick. The male is of a beautiful red from the head to above half way of his body; and the remaining part, together with the tail, is spangled with golden spots exceeding our finest gilding. The female is white; the tail, and some parts of the body, having the perfect resemblance of silver. The tail of neither kind is smooth or flat, like that of other fish; but forms a sort of tuft, thick and long, which adds much to the beauty and fine shape of that little creature. They commonly swim on the surface of the water; and shew such a surprising agility in their motion, that it gives an exquisite brightness and variety to it: and it is on that account that they are so admired by the richer sort, that they keep them, in all their pleasure-houses, in little ponds made for the purpose, or else in basons more deep than wide, and adorn the courts, and other parts of their houses, with them, where they afford a singular diversion by their play, they being exceeding tame and active, and, as one would imagine, knew their masters, and those that feed them, by the readiness with which they come up at their approach. The misfortune is, that they are of so tender a nature, that the least inclemency of weather is apt to injure them; and the extremity of heat or cold, strong smells, loud noises, especially of thunder, or the report of cannon, will go near to destroy them (A). Those therefore, who have the care of them, always provide them with a shelter at the bottom of their little pond, which is commonly made with an earthen pan full of holes, and turned upside down, into which they retreat when the sun, weather, or any thing else, discommodes them. Care is also taken to shift their water three or four times a week; and in such a manner, as that the vessel may be always kept full; and to throw some sort of weeds on the surface of it, to shade them from the sun.

Length.*

THEIR common food is the little imperceptible worms that are bred in the water, or the little earthy particles which are mixed with it; but the owners will now-and then throw some little bits of paste, or, what is still more agreeable to them, some wafers, which, being soaked in the water, are greedily swallowed down by, and are the properest food for, those little creatures. They breed exceedingly fast in hot countries, provided their spawn be carefully skimmed off the surface of the water, where it swims (which they would otherwise devour), and be put into particular vessels, to be hatched by the sun. The vessel must likewise be sheltered from wind, rain, and cold, till they are hatched: at which time the young fry appear first of a black colour, which some of them still retain; but the greatest part change by degrees to red or white, to gold or silver, according to their kind, which displays itself first at the tail, and thence spreads itself more or less towards the middle of their body; and, when grown to an inch in length, may be safely removed into their native reservoirs, there to be admired as a wonder of nature.

THEIR artificial rarities are various and numerous, and much more frequent, and entertaining to travellers. We shall single out some of the most curious and remarkable amongst them; such as, 1. Their famed long wall, which is the first and noblest structure of all, and offers itself to a stranger at the very first entrance into that empire by land; 2. Variety of artificial mountains, bridges, and causeways; 3. Some of their stately temples; 4. Colossal statues; 5. Their high and sumptuous towers in several of their great cities; 6. Their stately triumphal arches; 7. Some of their large bells, especially those of Pe-king and Kanton, which excel all the rest.

WE begin with their celebrated wall, which is justly esteemed the most stupendous work of that, or any other kind, that the world can boast of; it being in length, according to Magaillan's computation, 405 leagues, exclusive of its windings; and, by Le Compte, 500 French leagues, or near 1500 miles, with the windings; and fortified all the way, at proper

* LE COMPTE, DU HALDE, & al.

(A) This is the account which Father Le Compte gives of them; to which Du Halde adds, that the best way of preserving them in the winter is, to give them no food all that time; and that they will live three or four months, that is, while the cold weather lasts, under the ice, without any other sustenance than what the water underneath affords them, even in the large open ponds. As for those that are taken into the houses, and kept in china vessels closely covered, it is certain they live without any other food; and yet when the spring comes on, at which time they are again removed into their usual basons, they will move and swim with as much agility and briskness as they did the year before. The nobility and richer sort are so fond of them all over the kingdom, that they make it one of their chief pleasures to feed them; and will give three or four crowns apiece for those that are the most beautifully coloured and shaped; there being persons everywhere who make it their chief business to breed, and sell them to them. As for those which are bred up in large ponds, they become somewhat larger and hardier; and are only preserved there for their spawn, which, when hatched in the manner above-mentioned, raises them to that beauty, and variety of colours, which make them fit for those of the better rank. The way they have to call those which breed in ponds to the top of the water, is by the noise of a clapper, which the persons who feed them commonly use for that end (70).

a distances, with strong high towers, to the number of 3000 (B), which, before the conquest of China, used to be guarded by a million of soldiers: but, since then, they only keep garri-^{Antient garri- sons.} sons in those places which are most easy of access, viz. at Fwen-fu, Tay-tong-fu, Ning-kia, Ya lin, Siang-chew, Siang-ning, and So-chew; besides which, the mountains within the wall are reckoned sufficient to defend China against the Tartars^{Extant.}: however, as it was originally intended to cover the three northern provinces of Pe-che-li, Shan-si, and Shen-si, from any attack from that quarter, it begins at the latter of them, which lies on the north-west of China, in about 38 degrees of latitude, and is carried on, over mountains and vallies, rivers and deep marshes, first to the north-east, as far as the 42d degree of latitude, then south-easterly to the 39th, and terminates at the Whang-ho, or Yellow Sea, at the 40th degree, where stands the famous gate called Shang-hay-quan, and from which it divides the province of Pe-che-li within from that of Lyau-tong without; and thence, westward, the other two provinces from Tartary. But though the distances from one end of this wall to the other be hardly above 700 or 800 miles, in a direct line from west to east, yet, if we take in also the various windings north and south, and the many ascents and descents over the high hills and dales which are between, we can hardly allow less than twice that number to the whole length of the wall^{Vast windings.}.

THIS stupendous fabric was built, according to some, by the emperor Chi-ho-ham-ti; and, according to others, by Sbi-whang-ti, or, as others call him, Sbing-shi-whang, 215 years before Christ^{By whom built.}; and is built here and there on such high rocks and mountains, as seem altogether inaccessible; and in other parts over wide and rapid rivers, and such marshes and sandy hollows, as one would judge incapable of admitting a sufficient foundation to support such a prodigious weight. The height of it varies according to the ground; but is no-where less than 20, nor higher than 30 feet; and the breadth about 15 feet, or wide enough for five or six people to ride abreast (C), and extraordinarily well paved all the way. It is continued from one end to the other without any interruption, except at the entrance of the Whang-ho into the Chinese empire, and near the city of Se-chwen, in the province of Pe-che-li, where, instead of it, the country is guarded by high and inaccessible mountains; but is continuous every-where else: and though other rivers flow likewise from Tartary into the Chinese territories, and some of them run in and out of them more than once, they all run under stately high arches made in walls; and so strongly built, that their current, though rapid, hath not hitherto caused the least breach or detriment in them. The same may be said of the wall itself, and its stout high towers, so far as both are built with brick and stone, though both have lain exposed to all winds and weathers almost 2000 years: but as to the western part of it, which, as we shewed in a former note [B], is built of earth, it is gone to decay in many places, and hath been several times repaired by the government. The former,

(3) That is according to some, at every two bow-shot; but more absurdly, according to others, every mile or two miles; for in neither case could they amount to 3000; so that, if the wall was 1500 miles, and these towers equidistant from each other, there could be but half a mile space between each of them.

The truth is, some have magnified that work at a strange rate; and, from their nearness to each other in some parts, have perhaps inferred the number of these towers according to the extent of the wall; whereas they might stand at much greater distance in other parts that were more difficult of access; for they have committed much the same error, with respect to strength, materials, height, and thickness, of the wall itself, judging it to be every-where the same as they saw it in the neighbouring parts of Pe-king, where it is built of stone and brick strongly cemented, and very high, stout, and solid; whereas those who have since taken a more accurate view of it (71), assure us, that it runs at most but about 600 miles in that manner, that is, from the Whang ho, or Yellow Sea, to the province of Shan-si, where it hath several other faces besides, which form double, and sometimes treble, inclosures for the security of the most considerable passes; but, from the entrance into that province, to its very end in the west, it is all built of earth, or is rather a kind of mud rampart, not only very defective in many places, insomuch that they were obliged to build, at every four leagues distance, strong forts on the inside, to defend them, but the far greater part of the towers belonging to it were of earth; those that were of brick or stone being but few in comparison of them.

(C) So says Father Regis, who was employed by the emperor to make the maps of the empire, and had been often on the top of it; though Isbrandts Ides, and others, make it wide enough for eight horsemen to ride abreast upon it; so that when Le Compté tells us it is but four, or at most five, feet in thickness (72), it is plain it must be some error of the printer, or of his translator, and that he must have meant at least yards, if not toises, which are equivalent to two of our yards.

Some tell us, that its height is every-where alike, whether on the top of the highest mountains, or at the bottom of them, and in the plains, that is, four fathoms, or twenty-four feet, according to some; and thirty feet, according to others; which disagreement itself would be sufficient to convince us of the contrary, did not the reason of the thing, and the known economy of the Chinese nation, persuade us that they would hardly have bestowed equal cost and labour every-where alike, merely for the sake of observing an uniformity in the work; for that would rather expose their folly than wisdom, for which they so highly value themselves.

however, is only cased on the outside with brick or stone, and the space between them filled ^a with some strong mortar, sand, and other rubbish; but so strongly cemented, as to be of equal hardness with the rest.

The first bulwark founded in the sea.

Eastern gate.

All finished in five years.

Artificial mountains, whether really such.

THE bulwark, at which this noble wall begins, at the east end is a large pile of stone raised in the sea, upon a foundation laid on a number of ships sunk into it by a stupendous weight of iron, and huge stones with which they were laden, in order to secure the superstructure from sinking. The work is well terraced and cased with brick and stone; and the architect was obliged, under pain of death, to cement them so strongly together, that a nail should not be driven between them: which cement runs through the whole work. This bulwark stands in near the same latitude with Pe-king, and at a small distance westward from it is to be seen the first gate called Sbang-hay-quang, of an extraordinary height and strength. ^b The other gates are built much in the same manner: and every one of them is defended by a stout fort built on the Chinese side. Upon the whole, it is a stupendous work; and, considering the height of some of the mountains on which it runs, and the marshy, dry, sandy, and barren grounds, on which other parts are built, one cannot but admire how it could be carried on to that height and thickness, and such a vast length, considering that in many places the bricks, and stones, mortar, and all other necessities for the work, must have been brought thither from a great distance, and with incredible cost and labour: and what adds still more to the wonder, if we may believe their records, is, that the whole was finished in five years time ^c. They add, that the emperor obliged every third man out of each province of his empire, who was of an age fit for the work, to help to complete it; so that he lived to see his dominions fenced on every side, and severed in some measure from the rest of the world by the strongest barriers; viz. on the north by this new and extraordinary rampart: on the west by high and inaccessible mountains, and vast sandy deserts; and by the wide ocean on the south and east.

THE next sort of artificial curiosities of China, that we read of, is their mountains fabricated into various shapes of men, horses, birds, &c. which, if really such, must be works of immense labour as well as time; and being to all appearance, designed merely to please the sight, and to set the spectators a gazing, can serve no other end than exposing the ill taste of the Chinese, for bestowing so much of either upon such fantastic and unnatural oddities. But this seems to us too opposite to their natural prudence and œconomy, to be easily credited; ^d and though we are told, that their notion of them, especially among the superstitious vulgar, is, that they are the work of demons, and the result of a deep insight into magic; which seems to intimate, as if they bore so near a resemblance to those creatures, as could hardly be given to them by human art; yet, till we have better authority than we have of their doing so, we shall look upon them rather as the effect of chance, assisted by a strong fancy, to supply what is wanting to complete the pretended resemblance. However that be, we think ourselves obliged to give our readers one instance at least of them, that we may not be blamed for omitting what other authors have spoken of with so much admiration, and that shall be one of the most remarkable of all the rest; viz. the famed mountain of the five horses heads; and so called from its five summits, which are said, at a distance, to bear a near resemblance to them. ^e It must be owned, that none of them pretend to have gone near enough to know whether that seeming likeness was wrought by dint of labour of the chissel and mallet, nor whether it appeared the same at any point of sight, or only at that which they viewed them from: so that the only wonder seems to be in the number of heads; for, as to other mountains that are said to bear a resemblance of a bird, horse, dog, or any other single animal, those who have but travelled over the Alps or Pyrenees, will find enough of such cragged rocks on the tops of those mountains, which a warm imagination will easily conceive to bear a near resemblance to those, or a variety of other creatures; and where, did superstition and priestcraft reign so much as they do in China, the people might be made to believe them to have been the work of demons, or of some famous conjurers. ^f

Noble causeways cut thro' them.

Not but there are other mountains in China, fabricated in such a manner as must appear the work of art, and to have required immense labour; at least we read of some that are perforated quite through in many places, and seem rather a parcel of irregular rocks, or small mountains, cast up at random one upon another, and have on the top either a temple, monastery, or some other curious building; of others that are filled with large spacious caverns; a third sort that have roads cut through them of a considerable length; some close on the top, and others cut open quite up to it. There is one, in particular, in the province of Fo-kyen, and near the city of Hing-wba-fu, or, as others call it, Hingoa, which is cut between two mountains, of a considerable height, and nicely paved the length of twelve miles, and shaded on each side by trees planted at proper distances all the way ^g; but indeed most of the roads round that city are paved in the same manner with square stones, and a planted with shady trees, the towns and villages about it standing so thick, that they seem to be but one continued town¹; and it must be owned, that the Chinese are not wanting in any cost or labour to make their causeways and roads as easy and pleasant for travellers as they possibly can^m; and this makes them build so many fine stately bridges, not only over their rivers and canals, but even from one mountain to another, which is a third sort of their artificial rarities.

We have already described several of them in the geographic part; but, as it would be endless to speak even of the most curious of them throughout the country (for the other sort are without number), we shall content ourselves with describing two or three of the most celebrated, to give our readers an idea of the excellent taste of the nation in these kinds of work also. That called Lu ko-kyau, seven or eight miles westward of Pe-king; was one of the finest that ever was seen, before part of it was broken down by a land-flood. It was built all of white marble, curiously wrought and polished. It had seventy pillars on each side, divided by cartridges of fine marble beautifully carved with flowers, foliages, birds, beasts, and variety of other ornaments. On each side of the entrance on the bridge, at the east end, stood two lions, of an extraordinary size, on two curious pedestals likewise of marble, with several other smaller lions in different attitudes; some climbing on the backs of the great ones, others leaping off, others crawling between their legs.

At the other end of the bridge stood likewise two other curious pedestals, on which were carved two children with the same skill, and all the rest of the work was answerable to itⁿ. Father Gerbillon mentions two more of the same kind, of fine marble, and exactly like each other in their fabricature, ornaments, &c.; on one side of the city of Cha-ho, 50 li's from Pe-king, and the other on the other side of that place; their length was 60 geometric paces, and their breadth between six and seven, and the pavement and parapets were of huge blocks of the same stone^o. This sort of bridges is the most common in the empire, and of which we may say that the Chinese spare neither for length, breadth, beauty, nor strength, in the building of them; some of them consisting of upwards of 100 lofty arches, and are above 160 fathom in length, as is that of the city of Fu-chew, or, as others call it, Ox-u, capital of the province of Fo-kyen, which is built across the bay, all of fine white stone^p (D).

They have a second sort, which are built upon barges, some of which are of a very great length. One of these, in particular, built over the river Kyang, at the place where the Kan falls into it, consists of 130 barges strongly chained to one another, yet so as to be parted; and to open a way in any part of it, to let the vessels pass which continually sail up and down the river. There are great numbers of this sort likewise all over the flat countries, they being much more convenient in those parts where the traffick is chiefly carried on by water.

There is still a third sort, more surprising than the two former, which are built some over rivers, and others over a valley, and join two mountains together. Of this sort, we read of one which consists of but one intire arch, which is reckoned 400 cubits long, and 500 in height, and is, by travellers, styled Pons volans, or the flying bridge^q. That which was formerly built over several high hills, on the road to Hang-chong-fu, in the province of Sben-fi, is still more stupendous. We are told, that 100,000 men were employed in it, to level some of the hills, and to build arches from mountain to mountain, supporting them with pillars, of a monstrous height and thickness, where the intervening valley proved too wide. There are several of these bridges that form part of the road above-mentioned; and some of them of such height, that one cannot look downwards without terror; for which reason, they are all well railed on each side, for the security of passengers^r. And thus much may suffice for this third sort of artificial rarities^s.

(D) There is one still more stupendous at the city of Saven-chew-fu, which is built over the point of an arm of the sea, which otherwise must be crossed in a bark, and very often not without danger. It is 2520 Chinese feet in length, and 20 in breadth, and is supported by 252 huge piers, 126 on each side. All the stones of it are of a greyish colour, and of the same length and thickness, as well those which cross from pier to pier, as those which are laid across, and join them to each other (73). The greatest wonder is how they could cut or place stones, of such enormous weight as these are, high enough for large vessels to pass underneath.

As for the more common sort of bridges, their way of building them is more easily understood, and appears to be this: As soon as they had finished the sides of the arch next to the land, or, if of more arches than one, the piers that stand between them, they proceeded to lay on the stones, which are commonly not above four or five feet long, and half a foot broad, alternately upright and cross-wise, so that the key stones lay always horizontally. The top of the arch is usually no thicker than that of these stones; and because the bridges, especially those which have but one arch, are sometimes 40 or 50 feet between the piers, and consequently much higher than the causeway; the ascent on both sides is by easy flat steps, not above three inches thick, which makes it somewhat inconvenient for horses and carriages to go up and down them (74); and might be easily obviated, by making the ascent and descent more even; but, in other respects, they are generally well contrived.

The famed one at Nan-king.

THE next kind of curiosity that entertains the travellers, is their beautiful triumphal arches, which are to be seen, in great numbers, not only in all their cities, but on the mountains and eminences along the roads. These were originally erected in memory of their heroes, whether princes, generals, philosophers, or ministers of state, who had signalized themselves for some great actions, or some eminent services, done to the public. The number of those that have been erected to such heroes is computed to amount to above 1100, amongst which, there are near 200 of exquisite beauty and grandeur. There is, besides, a small number of others, no less noble and beautiful, erected to several of their illustrious women, whose wisdom and virtue have intitled them to the same glorious monuments, as well as to a place in the Chinese history, and in the works of their most famous poets (E).

THESE monumental structures consist mostly of one, or, at most, three arches, the middle of which is lofty and spacious, and the other two on each side of it are of a smaller size and beauty. Some of them are of wood, except the marble pedestal; others are of stone, and others partly stone, and partly wood. Some of them are wrought with exquisite skill, especially those of the oldest standing; while most of those of a more modern date are so clumsy, and ill-designed, as to deserve scarcely any attention (F). Their height is commonly between twenty and twenty-five feet, few above; the whole variegated with figures of men, antics, birds, beasts, &c. in various attitudes, festoons, and other ornaments, indifferently carved; the reliefs of some of which are so bold, that they seem to be separated from the work. Upon the whole, though they are but slightly built, yet, when placed to advantage, as in a narrow street, where two streets cross each other, or in the center of a square, and if in the country, at a due distance from the road, and a right point of sight, afford no disagreeable prospect to the beholders.

To these, we might add their burying-places, and the noble buildings reared on those of great men, which, at a distance, appear like towns, being mostly built on some conspicuous eminences along the road, and yield a very pleasant prospect; but of these we have already spoken, on another occasion.

BUT, of all their artificial curiosities, their fine stately towers are the most delightful to strangers, though built in a stile peculiar to this country, and unlike any thing of that kind among us. These are mostly to be met with in their great cities, and are every where built much in the same form; so that the describing one or two of the most beautiful, will suffice to give our readers an idea of the rest (G). There are two of these without the walls of Nan-king, the most beautiful of which, styled the porcelain tower, because it is lined all over the inside with china tiles, delightfully painted, is the most admired by all travellers, for its height, symmetry, and variety of carving, gilding, and other ornaments. It is of an octagonal form, nine storeys, or 200 feet, high, and forty feet in diameter; so that every side is fifteen feet in length. The whole is built on a large basis of brick, strongly cemented, which forms a stately perron, or

(E) The male worthies recorded in their history, including those who have been famed for their virtue and piety, as well as for valour, learning, &c. amount to about 3636; and the number of the females, whether virgins, wives, or widows, who are recorded for their chastity, piety, or any other eminent virtues, either on those monumental arches, or in the Chinese annals, to about 208 (75).

(F) The ornamental part of those antient arches is so curiously wrought, the festoons and flowers so neatly cut, and the birds and other animals carved in such lively attitudes, that Father Le Compte looked upon them as Chinese master-pieces of that kind; and indeed they appear so wonderfully detached from each other, as if they were only joined to, or run into, each other, by small cordons, and without the least confusion; which sufficiently shews the superior skill of their antient workmen; whereas in those of later date, the sculpture is sparing, looks coarse, heavy, and without any piercing, or variety, to enliven it. Which is a plain indication of their genius having been, in a great measure, cramped and debased, since their late conquest, seeing that few of those antient monuments are of much more than 300 years standing (76).

However, it must be owned, that, excepting the beautiful neatness of the carving above-mentioned, their best architecture, of any kind, comes vastly short of ours, both as to the proportion and disposition of the parts. They have neither cornices nor chapiters; and that which bears some kind of likeness to our friezes, is of such a height, that it rather shocks the eye of those who are unaccustomed to it; though it is so much the more agreeable to the Chinese taste, as it affords more space for the ornaments which adorn the inscriptions engraven on them (77).

(G) These stately structures, which, we are told, are to be met with at every metropolis of a province, and in some other of their cities, some within, and others without, the walls, are chiefly designed as ornaments, they being seen at a great distance by travellers, and, from their top galleries, affording a beautiful prospect of all the country round. Their height is commonly from seven to nine, though, Du Halde assures us, there are some twelve and thirteen, storeys high, every storey being commonly between eight and nine feet high, and the lowermost about twelve. But, as they are also built for strength, as well as shew, some of them having stood considerably above three centuries, there is a prodigious deal of timber, as well as work, in them; which yet, as Le Compte rightly observes, rather betrays the ignorance of the Chinese architects, who have not yet discovered that lovely simplicity, wherein the strength and beauty of our European buildings consist (78).

- a flight of nine or ten steps, likewise of an octagonal figure, by which you ascend to the first storey; and this perron is surrounded with a balustrade of unpolished marble on the outside. The first ^{its height,} storey, or, as it is called, the hall, is the highest of all, but hath no windows, nor any light but ^{apert. &c.} what comes in at three spacious gates, which open into it. The wall is said to be about twelve feet thick, and eight and a half high, and cased with porcelain, but of the coarser sort, and not a little damaged by dust and rain. From this you ascend to the second, and thence to all the other storeys, which are all of equal height, by a narrow, and very inconvenient, staircase, the steps of which are ten inches high, and very narrow. Every storey hath eight large windows, one at every front. They all lessen, as they mount one over the other, so as to form, in the whole, a kind of cone, or sugar-loaf; and between each of them is a penthouse, or shed, which projects some yards from the wall all around, and lessens in the same proportion the higher they go. These divide the storeys from each other without, as the timber and the floorings do within: and each room is adorned with paintings, and other ornaments, after the Chinese stile, both on the sides, and on the cieling, whilst the outside is embellished with variety of work in bas-relievo, niches, and imagery, in the same taste (H); all which make an agreeable kind of ^{Cupola and} inlaid work, very beautiful at a distance, though both that and the painting and gildings are ^{ball.} somewhat impaired by the wind and rain. But the most beautiful part of the whole fabric is a kind of cupola, which arises thirty feet higher than the uppermost storey, and is supported by a thick mast, fixed at the bottom of the floor of the eighth storey. This piece seems to be inclosed in a large iron-hoop, all the way, and which winds round it like a spiral line, or screw, at the distance of several feet; so that the whole looks like a hollow kind of cone, pierced through, and rising in the air, and supporting on the top a golden ball, of an extraordinary bigness. Such is the structure of that famed tower, which, whether of brick, marble, or whatever other material, is looked upon, by Le Compte, and other authors, as the best contrived, most solid, and magnificent work in all the East^w.

NIEUHOFF adds two circumstances concerning it; viz. that the ball, or pine-apple, on the top, is reported by the Chinese to be of massy gold; and the other, that the tower hath stood ^{When, and by} 700 years; and was erected by the Tartars, as a monument of their having made themselves ^{whom built.} masters of the Chinese empire; whereas Le Compte affirms it to have been, in his time, of no more than 300 years standing, and to have been built, together with the temple of gratitude, by the Emperor Yong-lo; to which Du Halde seems to subscribe^x.

Most of these sorts of towers have, either in the uppermost penthouse, or gallery, and others in every one of them, and at every angle, small bells, hanging at some distance, by ^{Bells hanging} chains, or wires, which are easily moved by every blast of wind, and make an uncommon ^{on the angles} sort of tinkling; which is, nevertheless, agreeable enough to the Chinese taste. Of this nature ^{without.} is that we have elsewhere described, which stands near a stately temple built on a very high mountain^y. But the greatest delight which these kinds of structures afford, is from the vast charming prospect one hath from their upper storeys, or galleries, of all the country round about, which is commonly bespangled with great variety of houses of pleasure, orchards, gardens, sepulchral monuments, and such agreeable objects, far and near.

THEIR temples are no less stately and curious. They have a prodigious number of them, ^{Stately tem-} both in their cities and towns, and in the country at a great distance from them. The most ^{ples,} celebrated of which are mostly built on barren mountains; to which, however, the industry of ^{built in soft-} the natives hath given beauties which were denied them by nature; such as, canals, cut at a ^{tary places.} great expence, to convey the water from the adjacent heights, into proper reservoirs, for the use of the Bonzas, and their votaries; gardens and groves for their use and diversions, and deep grottos cut into the rock, to shelter them from the excessive heat: all which do not a little contribute to render those solitudes delightful. These structures, which, whether large or small, are built much after the same manner, consist partly of fine porticos, paved with large square polished stones, and partly of halls and pavilions, which are reared on the corners of the courts, and have a communication with each other, by galleries, adorned with statues either of stone or brass. The roofs of these buildings shine with beautiful japanned tiles, of green or yellow, ^{Their painted} and are embellished at the corners with dragons of the same colour, which project a great way ^{roofs, &c} forward. The rest of those buildings are built of timber, and most of them have some such high tower as those we have been speaking of in the last paragraph. We read of some of these temples that are of a prodigious length and breadth, and have statues in them of a Colossian magnitude (I), to which the Bonzas, who have their apartments round about, offer their wine,

(H) This outside appears to be of some sort of wrought marble, or polished stone, gilt over; but Le Compte rather imagines it to be of brick, cast in proper moulds in the manner of our plaster-work; the Chinese being, it seems, surprisingly skilful in stamping all sorts of figures on their bricks; the earth of which being much finer, and better tempered, than ours, is much fitter to take any impression from the mould (79).

wine, rice, and other provisions, which are brought thither by their stupid votaries, whenever a they come to consult them about their temporal affairs. Fire-works.

Most of their cities have some large bells set up in their high towers, by which they give notice of the different watches of the night; and those which have no bells do it by large drums. The first watch is notified by a single stroke, which is repeated at certain short distances of time, Le Compte says, every moment, till the second watch begins, which they notify by two strokes; the third by three, and so on. Some of their bells are of a monstrous bigness and weight; but the largest of all are those of Nan-king and Pe-king. Le Compte tells us of seven they have in the latter of those cities, that weigh 120,000 pounds, which is near five times the weight of that of Erford in Saxony, which, Kercher says, weighs but 25,400 pounds, and is, by him, supposed to be the largest in Europe; though he ought, at least, to have excepted that monstrous one of the city of Moscow, whose height is said to be nineteen feet, diameter twenty-three, compass sixty-nine, thickness two, and weight 366,000 pounds, and of which we shall have occasion to speak, in a more proper place. Those seven of Pe-king we are now speaking of, are twelve feet high, besides the ear by which they hang, which is three feet more, thirteen in diameter, and forty in circumference. But, if we may believe Father Le Compte, all the Chinese bells are vastly inferior to ours in sound, their clappers being made of a hard wood, which they call iron-wood, of which we have elsewhere spoken²; their metal is moreover very coarse, and full of knots, and their shape ill-contrived, they being almost as wide at the top as they are at the bottom, and their thickness gradually lessening from the bottom upwards. So that, upon the whole, they are mere unwieldy masses of metal, without musical tone, or any thing worth notice, but their huge, dull, heavy sound, and monstrous weight^b (K).

THE last artificial curiosity we shall mention, and close this section with, is their surprising fire-works, in which they may be justly said to exceed all other nations. We have already taken notice, that this was the chief use they made of gunpowder, which they had among them many centuries before it was found out in Europe; and that they were wont to exhibit these fire-works at their solemn festivals, and other grand occasions, and in a great variety of figures and representations. What increases the wonder, is, they give all that imagery not d proportion, in which stands the statue of a virgin 106½ feet high. The Chinese superstition makes them generally more profuse in these kinds of structures than in any thing else: they build them, for the most part, very lofty and spacious, and embellish them with great variety of idols, before which hang an infinite number of lamps burning with costly perfumes. The rest are also embellished with all the other ornaments of painting, carving, gilding, &c. They reckon no less than 480 of those structures of the first rank; and those of the inferior sort are almost without number, especially if we join to them those that are built not to their gods, but to their great men, of which they reckon above 700, which are very grand, and some even magnificent, besides the triumphal arches and sepulchral monuments, already spoken of. But, as this latter sort of temples were chiefly built by the antient nobility, in honour of their families and ancestors, and those illustrious families have since dwindled away, great numbers of those fine structures have likewise gone into decay and ruin (80).

(K) Those who have read Father Magaillan's account of that which is in the imperial palace of Pe-king, who affirms, that its sound is so clear, delightful, and harmonious, that it seems rather to proceed from some musical instrument, will, doubtless, be surprised at what we have said above of all their bells in general, on the authority of other missionaries, who pretend to have had as good an ear as he: and, it is not improbable, that what Le Compte objects as one of their defects, viz. their wooden clappers, might be the main cause of that sweetness and harmony which his brother Jesuit admired; because, the more these abate of the loudness of the sound, the more they are found to add, in proportion, to the harmonious sweetness; it having pretty near the same effect upon the bell, or rather the ear, as its being rung at a distance.

Le Compte adds, that those he saw were almost in the form of a cylinder, except that they swelled about the middle, where the circumference was equal to the bottom; and that the lower brim was six inches and a half thick, but the top only two, which he could as easily measure; because they had some holes bored through that part to increase, as he supposed, their sound (81). So that, upon the whole, nothing can be more different than the Chinese and European way of bell-sounding, whether theirs or ours be allowed to exceed the others in sweetness and harmony.

But, after all, we much question whether their boring holes on the top of theirs be not done with the same design that they prefer wooden to iron clappers, viz. to sweeten and ennoble the sound, rather than increase its loudness; and whether their casting them so much thicker at the bottom than at the top does not very much contribute to that solemn melodiousness of their tone, which Father Magaillan so much admired, but which his brother Jesuit injudiciously miscalled a dull heavy noise, because it did not answer to the loudness of those of the same size, which he had heard in Europe. That a metal hammer, or clapper, will be heard at a much greater distance than one made of ever so hard wood, is what every one will readily grant; but which of the two will give the most melodious and agreeable sound, at a nearer approach, we shall readily leave to the reader to conjecture. All that needs be added on this head, is, that the Chinese have a custom of giving particular names to those large bells, not, indeed, those of the saints, as those of the church of Rome do, but of a more trivial import: thus, of the seven above-mentioned at Pe-king, one is called the Hanger, another the Flyer, a third the Eater, a fourth the Sleeper, and so on (82).

a only its true form and shape, but natural colour. Thus Magaïllan relates; that he saw one of them, with no small delight and surprize, which represented a vine-arbour, that burned without consuming, the root, branches, leaves, and grapes, of which, burned, but by slow degrees, and all in their true shape and colour^c; the grapes were red, the leaves green, and the stem and branches so curiously imitated nature, as to have deceived any spectator. And, since the late peace hath occasioned so great a variety of them in several parts of Europe, our readers will not, perhaps, be displeased, if we give them a short description of one, which the late emperor Kang-hi caused to be played off, for the diversion of his court, from the account of those missionaries who belonged to his train, and were present at it.

It began by setting fire to half a dozen cylinders, which were planted in the earth, and b spouted flames into the air, and, at the height of twelve feet, fell down again, in a kind of golden or firey rain. This was followed by a sort of bomb-cart, supported by two stakes, or pillars, from whence proceeded a shower of fire, intermixed with many lanthorns, which had sentences written on them, in large characters, of the colour of burning sulphur, and half a dozen of branched candlesticks, in form of pillars, consisting of several rings of light, one above another, which cast a whitish or silver-coloured flame, and, in a moment, turned night into day. At length the emperor, with his own hand, set fire to the whole machine, which, in an instant, appeared all in a blaze, and, being eighty feet long, and forty in breadth, displayed a very great variety of objects, and other curious scenes. The flame having soon caught hold of several poles and paper figures, placed on all sides, a prodigious c quantity of squibs flew up into the air, and a multitude of branches and lanthorns, such as we have elsewhere described, were lighted all over the place. The show lasted about half an hour longer; and, from time to time, there appeared, in one part or other, flames of a bluish or violet colour, in the form of bunches of grapes hanging on a vine-arbour; which, joined to the brightness of the lights, that shone like so many blazing stars, yielded a most delightful prospect to the spectators^d.

Of some remarkable diseases which reign among the Chinese, and their manner of curing them; their boasted skill in pulses, phlebotomy, cupping, cauterising, inoculating, and treating the small-pox; and method of extracting of the camphire from the tree of that name.

d I T were an endless task to go through the bare mention of the various diseases, which must be supposed to reign in so vast and extensive an empire, and through such a great difference of climates and countries, or of their methods of curing them, which differ more or less in every province, and almost in every precinct, notwithstanding the vast multitudes of books which have been published among them upon that ample subject. We have already had occasion to hint what wretched physicians and surgeons the generality of their practitioners of either of those useful branches are, for want of better skill in anatomy and natural history^e. They might, indeed, have made a much greater progress in both, since the coming of the Europeans among them, if they could have overcome their natural reluctance to every kind of foreign learning, as well as their extreme aversion to the dissecting of human bodies, for the sake, as they style them, of a few poultry discoveries in the animal œconomy, which may be more surely and copiously attained by experience and observation, by a thorough knowledge and understanding of, and due attention to, the pulse, and other symptoms and prognostics leading to them; in all which branches, they pretend a knowledge far exceeding that of all nations of the world.

In this persuasion, they are contented to go on in their old beaten tract; and how much soever our theory may exceed theirs, it will be well if their practice, upon examination, doth not prove more safe and agreeable than ours, whilst they draw the main part of their medicinal assistance from the long experienced virtues of the vegetable kind, from gentle purgatives, emollients, alteratives, and other salubrious remedies, calculated to strengthen, rather than fatigue and weaken, the stomach, to assist and invigorate nature, rather than to storm and endanger it: and, it must be owned, that they have some very expert practitioners in this excellent way, as well as the greatest plenty and variety of medicinal plants and roots, exactly suited for that purpose, of any nation in the world. They are, indeed, seldom, if ever, troubled with rheumatisms, gout, stone and gravel, and other chronic diseases, which

Their physical compositions clogged and difficult. seem to require a stronger regimen; and this is partly owing to their constant use of those noble diluters and purifiers of the blood, their green and bohea tea, and partly to their frequent chewing of ghin-seng, rhubarb, and other physical roots^b. But, were they so, we much question whether they would not still prefer their gentle, though slow, method of curing them, to those of a quicker, but more violent nature. The misfortune is, that their very best and most approved physical books do commonly clog every receipt and remedy with such mixtures of roots, leaves, seeds, gums, &c. prescribe so many rules and punctilios, in the choice, weight, quantity, and preparation, of them, as make the process difficult and tedious; so that the far greater part of their very practitioners are quite discouraged from following of them, though the whole stress of their success, according to their authors, seems to depend upon a scrupulous observation of every rule, and minute circumstance, and chuse rather at all hazards to follow their own experience; which they may the more safely do, as their medicines are all of the gentle kind.

Pretended skill in pulses. Various sorts of them, and manner of feeling them. NEXT to the knowledge, and due mixture and preparation, of their materia medica, they likewise challenge a superior skill in the pulse above all other nations; and pretend to judge exactly of the kind and degree of every disease, what part of the body, either inward or outward, is affected, whether it be curable, or no; and, if the latter, how many days, weeks, or years, the patient may linger under it. They make a particular difference between the pulse of a man, and of a woman; between that of persons of tall or short stature, corpulent or lean; between that of youth, middle, and old age; between that of one season of the year and another, especially spring and autumn, summer and winter. This variety of pulses they distinguish by sundry odd names, as well as those which are caused by the nature of the distemper; that is, not by the obvious ones of quick and slow, weak and strong, and the like, but by such canting ones, if our authors have rightly translated, as are only understood by themselves. Thus they style one sort the superficial, another the sliding, the four, the tremulous, the rolling, the scattered, the leaping, swimming, ebullient, and many others of the like sense and import. They do not content themselves with applying their fingers to the wrist, without distinction of right and left, between which they suppose another material difference, but move them from one part of the body to another, according as they find them more or less affected with the disease: if it be the heart or liver, they feel the wrist of the left; if the stomach or reins, that of the right. They dwell a considerable time upon it, and at different times, in order to discover, as near as possible, every irregularity in the pulsations, before they venture to give their judgment, or administer any medicine to the patient^c.

Rules for judging rightly of them. THEY likewise pretend to fix the right number of times the pulse ought to beat, between every respiration, in a person that is in full health, viz. four, or, at most, five times; if above that, they infer some disorder to be in the body, greater or less, according to the number of beats; if six, it denotes only some slight indisposition; if seven or eight, they judge the distemper proportionably dangerous; and, if above that number, mortal.

Astrology the basis of their physic. Times for bleeding, purging, &c. marked in their almanac. THEY observe a multitude of other formal ceremonies, and punctilious niceties, both in the discovering the root, seat, and degree, of a distemper, as well as exact a great number of others from their patients, which it would be tedious to mention; especially as there is so much reason to question their so much boasted skill in botany and the pulse, and whether the tenth part of their theory or practice be really founded, as they pretend, upon reason and experience^d; especially when we consider, that the basis of both is laid chiefly on a thorough knowledge in astrology; and that, according to them, there is no part of the body, no species of the vegetable, mineral, or animal kind, but what are under the influence of some planet, sign, or constellation, whose nature, virtues, places, periodical times, and other such whimsical circumstances, must be diligently consulted, before any vegetable can be gathered, or any medicine applied with any success: insomuch that their almanac-makers were obliged to mark out the proper days and times for bleeding, purging, sweating, &c. as well as for planting, sowing, reaping, journeying, and other such superstitious fooleries, till that care was turned over by the emperor Kang-hi to some of the learned Jesuits, who, on that very account, declined the task (A), till that monarch had consented to their leaving all the astrological

(A) They excused themselves, we are told, to the emperor, from having any hand in these almanacs, though much better qualified for it than the Chinese, not only on account of the ridiculousness of the astrological rules and observations of good and bad, lucky and unlucky days, which were always carefully inserted in them, but likewise because such kind of superstitions, which were inconsistent with their religion, might be imputed to them. To this the emperor replied, That is not what I desire of you, and you shall be excused from that part; neither do I give any more credit to those ridiculous whimsies, than you: I require nothing of you but what regards the kalendar, and hath relation to astronomy.

After such a declaration, they had nothing more to object, and were obliged to comply; but as they foresaw,

a astrological trash out of them^e; which yet doth not hinder others from still supplying that supposed defect.

WE have formerly observed, that the circulation of the blood was known to them long before the coming of the Europeans among them^f. Their old physical books make frequent mention of it, though without pretending to account how it is performed; nevertheless they are very sparing of the use of phlebotomy, unless in cases of absolute necessity; and even then they take care to make but a very little orifice, and let but a very small quantity of blood at a time, seldom above the quantity of half a porringer. Those who have no lancets, will make their incision with any other sharp tool, or even with a broken piece of china. They apply no bandage or linen over it, but only sprinkle the orifice with a few grains of salt. They use, in some particular cases, another way of bleeding, which may be called acupuncture, or pricking several holes on the part affected with a large needle: but, as this curious invention was brought to them from Japan, we shall defer the farther description of it till we come to speak of that empire, where that operation is performed in much greater perfection.

THE Chinese in general attribute the greater parts of their colics, aches, and other distempers, to the malignity of some stagnated and corrupted winds which breed in the body, and which they endeavour to draw away by topical application, such as the acupuncture last mentioned, cupping, or, if those fail, by cauterising the part affected. There is one distemper very common and dangerous among the lower class of people, occasioned, as is supposed, by the badness of their diet; which at first seizes the stomach and bowels, and causes intolerable gripings and vomitings, and other inward pains and convulsions; and, if not timely removed, throws the patient into a profound lethargy, or atrophy. In this case, their common method is, to apply a red-hot iron bullet near enough to the soles of the feet to raise a blister. If the patient becomes sensible of the pain, they withdraw the bullet, and he commonly recovers soon after; but if he continues senseless, they apply it closer and closer, till the flesh is burnt up to the very bone.

THE use of clysters might prove of excellent service to them in several of their colicky ailments, but that was wholly unknown to them. The Portuguese of Macao tried to introduce it among them, but without success; the Chinese being, on the one hand, too averse to all European novelties to admit of it, and, on the other, affecting too great a degree of modesty to give it any better name than that of the barbarian remedy, which is that which it goes by all over their country.

THERE is hardly any nation in the world, among which one may see a greater number of purblind and quite blind folks, or a greater variety of distempers of the eyes. This is commonly attributed to the quantity of rice consumed among them at their daily meals. Whether that grain, which in other respects is so friendly and nourishing to the body, have any such pernicious effect upon that curious and most valuable part of it, or whether it be not rather owing to some other cause hitherto unknown, and particularly to their drinking so much of it distilled and burnt, which may probably affect the eyes, as much as it is found to do the throat and swallow^g, we will not pretend to determine.

AMONG the great variety of disorders in the eyes, we shall single out a very extraordinary one, which is very little, if at all, known in Europe, but is very common all over China; the natives give it the name of Ki-mung-yen, which, in their language, implies, according to our author^h, a darkness in the eyes, like that which is natural to fowl and poultry, by which they pretend to explain the cause, but doth by no means come up to it, this last being only a heaviness of the eye-lids, occasioned by the absence of the sun's rays; whereas the distemper we are speaking of, and which Etmullerus calls *Nyctalopia*ⁱ, doth not consist in a bare dimness of sight morning and evening, but in an almost total darkness during the whole night, not to be removed by any artificial light, whilst the patient enjoys a perfect sight all the rest of the day. In the night, the flame of a wax-candle, brought near him, appears like a large and dim globe of fire, without enabling him to discover any other object either near or distant: in the day-time he sees every thing as distinctly as those who enjoy a perfect sight. We shall not trouble our readers with the various conjectures of the learned con-saw, that the Chinese would not be contented with such maimed productions from the observatory, and that the pretended defect would be supplied from other hands, they took particular care to protest against, and condemn, such superstitious fooleries; because human actions could in no respect depend on the influence of the stars, but only on the wisdom by which they were conducted. Which precaution the emperor highly commended, as well as the manner in which they expressed themselves (1).

cerning this periodical succession of light and darkness, but only subjoin the method of cure which the Chinese doctors make use of, and which, from the instances which our author gives us, appears to us to be effectual; the receipt of which is as follows:

How cured.

TAKE the gall of a black-headed ewe or wether, cut it from the liver, not with an iron, but a sharp bamboe knife; strip it of its nerves, pellicles, and filaments, and sprinkle it over with salt-petre; wrap up the whole close in a leaf of Nenubar, and stew it over a slow fire in a proportionable quantity of water: let the patient keep stirring it all the time, holding a sheet spread over his head, to keep in the steam from evaporating, but that it may be all received by him at the nose and eyes; which will cause the latter to run, and by that means discharge the morbid matter, and complete the cure. Some advise the drinking of the liquor in which the gall is stewed; and others pretend that the patient will be cured without it, and even though the ewe's or wether's head were of any other colour than black; but all agree that the fumigation is the chief cause of the cure^k.

Inoculation of the small-pox.

THE reader may see in the author last quoted, and in Du Halde, several curious extracts out of the Chinese physical and botanic books^l, for which we have not room in a work of this extensive nature, and which, at the best, would prove agreeable but to few of our readers; we shall therefore content ourselves with selecting two of the most curious and remarkable ones out of them; viz. their method of inoculating, or, according to their own more significant term, Tchung-teou (B), of sowing the small-pox; and the description of the famous camphire-tree, the method of extracting and purifying its gum, together with the various virtues they attribute both to that, and to the wood itself.

Known in China, and probably discovered there.

THAT the Chinese had the art of inoculating the small-pox, in order to prevent the dreadful havoc which that distemper made among them, long enough before we knew any thing of it in Europe, or in all probability the Armenians at Constantinople, from whom we first received it, is evident from their physical books which treat of that distemper, and of the properest methods of communicating and curing it, and vindicate and recommend it as a most safe and beneficial discovery.

By whom, and where.

THIS last circumstance, joined to the great vogue which it hath gained throughout the empire, may be looked upon as a strong presumption that the Chinese were the first authors of it (C), it being quite contrary to the maxims and practice of that politic nation to admit, at least with such zeal and readiness, any new arts or inventions, how promising and useful soever, much less so uncertain and dangerous a one as this must appear at first, which come to them by the hands of strangers. Accordingly their books tell us, that the first discoverer of this new method flourished in the province of Kyang-nan, near the frontiers of Kyang-fi; and that it began to grow in vogue about the latter end of the dynasty of Ming, or about 120 or 130 years ago.

Its great success in Tartary.

BUT that which gave it the greatest reputation and authority, was the great services it did afterwards in Tartary, about the year 1724, whither the emperor sent some of the most expert proficients to exercise it upon the children of his Tartarian subjects, among whom the ^k DENTRECOLLES, ubi sup.

(B) The verb Tchung, we are told, properly signifies to sow, and teou, or teso, is the name they give to the small-pox, and to a small eating pea they have among them; so that it is probable this name might at first be given to that distemper on account of the likeness of the pustules it raises on the skin to the colour and figure of that small pulse, there being no difference either in the writing or pronouncing of that word.

The term sowing, which they use instead of grafting and inoculating, may likewise be in all probability taken from their method of communicating it, which is not by injection of the pus, as ours is, but by blowing some small quantity of the powder of a dried pustule into the nostrils of the patients. The first hint of it, it is supposed, was taken from the violent itching in that part, which was observed to be the forerunner of that distemper in children; from which they rightly inferred, that the place where the first seeds or symptoms of it appeared might be the properest place for sowing them in other persons, and the most likely to convey it with ease and speed into the rest of the body (3).

(C) Some of our English writers, who received the first news of this new method from Constantinople, and other parts of the Othman empire, where it was practised only by a few Armenians about the 17th century, have imagined that they had brought it from some of the countries adjacent to the Caspian sea; which conjecture, if true, might incline one to believe, that the Chinese might likewise receive it from those parts by the means of the same Armenian caravans which have trafficked into that empire a considerable number of years: but if we take in the account which the Chinese themselves give of it, it will be much more probable that both the Armenians, and those countries thro' which they travelled, had it originally from them.

But it is hardly credible that those Tartarian nations about the Caspian should have the least notion of so valuable a secret, who knew not so much as how to fence against that distemper, and were wont, upon the first appearance of it, to flee from it as from the most dreadful pestilence, abandoning their nearest relations, when once infected with it. Add to this, that if the discovery of it had been brought by the caravans of those parts into the Chinese empire, the province of Shen-fi, which is contiguous to it, must have had it before that of Kyang-nan, which is situate on the south-west of it, and is that where the Chinese assure us the author of the discovery then lived; so that, every thing duly weighed, we may venture to agree with that author (4) in giving the credit of that useful discovery to the Chinese nation.

(3) Dentrecolles in Lettres edifiantes, vol. xx. p. 306, & seq.

(4) Ibid. p. 312, & seq.

a small-pox was looked upon as the worst of all pestilential diseases; insomuch that whenever any of them, whether old or young, were attacked with it, every-body, even his nearest relations, fled from him, and left him to take his chance, either to die of it, or, which seldom happened, to overcome it by the help of a strong constitution.

ANOTHER motive which induced that excellent monarch to take this precaution, was the dreadful havock which it made among not only his grantees, and other officers, who brought from thence the usual tributes and presents to him, but likewise among the merchants who came thither to traffick, as soon as they arrived at Pe-king, which is seldom free from that distemper; so that few of them escaped being seized with, and most of them of being killed by, it. Encouraged by the emperor.

b THOSE physicians, according to his orders, soon went and dispersed themselves into several parts of Tartary; where they, by their prudent care and management, had such surprising success, that they returned some years after laden with the most valuable commodities of that country, and became immensely rich, and in high esteem at that prince's court, who, we may be confident, did not fail of encouraging so useful and beneficial a discovery. But it is time now to give our readers an account of their method of proceeding in it, as it was, not without great difficulty and secrecy, communicated to our author by some of those physicians then attending the court^m (D).

PROVIDE yourself with a good quantity of the dried scales which fall off the breast or back of a young healthy child, between one and seven years old, especially if he be gone thro' the small-pox in thirteen days, and the pustules appear to have been full and clear; preserve those scales in a china vessel closely stopped with wax, by which means they will keep good a whole year; whereas leaving them exposed to the least air would spoil them in a few days: let the child, on whom you design to inoculate the small-pox, be at least a year old, and in full health, and his body be rightly and duly prepared by proper medicines. If the scales you have for use be small, take four of them; if large, only two; and put between them about a grain of musk, and wrap up the whole in some fine cotton, in the form of a tent, which you must thrust into the left nostril, if it be a boy; and in the right, if a girl; taking previous care that the future of the child's cranium be well closed, and that the body be not inclined to a looseness, or any ailment which is contrary to the operation. If, after all these cautions, the pustules do not appear in three days after the fever hath begun to shew itself, then one may safely promise one's self that eight or nine in ten will go through it with safety, and do well after it; but if they put forth on the second day after the fever, it is a question whether one half of them, and if on the first day, whether any of them, will outlive it. Their method of proceeding in it.

THUS far the first physicians; from whose account, though short, one may still see what wise precautions they take in every step of their progress. As to the mixture of the musk with the scales which are put into the nose, it may perhaps appear to us a trifling nicety; and some authors tell us, that they use no other ceremony than that of blowing the powdered scales into the child's nostril through a funnel or corner; but this can be at best but a slovenly way, and used only among the poor vulgar; for, besides its carrying such a great force with it, as may cause the nose to run, and discharge the morbidiferous powder, if we consider that the use of those high perfumes is in great vogue amongst them, and enter into a great number of their physical compositions, it is not without mature deliberation that they apply the musk in this present case, not only as it is a strengthener of the brain, heart, and stomach, and consequently a promoter of the intended secretions; but as it may, by its balsamic quality, correct the acrimony of the fermentative virus, as well as the nauseousness of the effluvia which arise from the morbid scales. Musk, why added to the scales.

f THE other two doctors are somewhat diffuse and intricate, especially the last, which might be designedly done, either to display his skill and accuracy, or more probably to perplex a process which he reluctantly communicated to a stranger, and to prevent his reaping any advantage from it. However, as neither of them differs from the first in any of the material points above-mentioned, we shall readily subjoin whatever we meet with in the two latter, that may serve as a supplement or improvement of the former. And, Some further improvements in their process.

(D) There were three of those physicians who were prevailed upon to give him each an account of his method; the first of whom, though the most concise, hath given as explicit and satisfactory a one as our readers would care to read. The other two differing in no essential part of the process, but having only added some further minute directions and receipts towards preparing the patients, and promoting the process of the operation; but which consist only of some compositions of plants, and other drugs, most of them unknown, and of little or no use to us in the like cases; for these reasons, and to avoid needless repetitions, we shall only add such material directions out of the two last, as the first had omitted in his; and refer those of our readers, who are desirous to be more fully acquainted with the Chinese practice, to the author himself (5).

(5) Dentrecolles, ubi sup. p. 320—361.

for it.

FIRST, As to the proper time for performing the operation, they exclude extreme hot or cold weather, when the animal spirits are either dispersed and exhausted, or else too clogged and stagnated; and recommend the spring and autumn as the fittest season, when they are free, and in full vigour. Upon the same account they commonly chuse serene and clear before rainy and foul weather; for we must remember, that it is not subject to such sudden changes in those countries as it is with us.

The scales, whence to be taken.

SECONDLY, With respect to the scales to be used in the sowing of the distemper, they prefer those that come off the back or stomach before those of any other part of the body, especially the forehead and feet: and as those that are recently gathered are apt to convey too great an acrimony into the blood, they usually correct that defect by holding them some time in a thin gawse over the steam of hot water, in which have been infused some slices of liquorice and scorzonera root: but those scales which have been kept above a month have no need of this corrective, and may be safely used without it.

The patient
how to be treated.

THIRDLY, With regard to the treating of the patient, they prescribe the same regimen which is commonly used in the natural small-pox; only the last of the above receipts adds the administering to the decumbent about two or three scales pulverised in half a pint of the broth called Chinma, to be drank on the second day after the insertion.

If the pustules do not appear on the fourth or fifth day, the morbidic tents must be taken out, and recourse be had to the dose prescribed to be taken before the insertion, by way of preparative, the composition of which the reader will find in the margin (E); and which, the third physician assures us, will as effectually preserve the patient from ever having the distemper, as if the inoculation had had its due effect; especially if the same be repeated on the fourth, fifth, eighth, and ninth, moons after his decumbiture.

to help the secretion.

THIS, by what our author could learn, is all the purgative they use by way of preparing their patients, if the gentleness of its operation may admit of that name. Emetics, bleeding, and other more forcing remedies, they carefully avoid, lest they should debilitate rather than assist nature, and obstruct the secretion and excretion; instead of which, when they find the fever to continue, and no pustules appear, some of them mix a small quantity of opium with their other medicines, which helps to reunite the spirits, and assists them in throwing out the morbidic virus. Thus far their method of sowing or inoculating the small-pox; which, whether more easy and safe than that of conveying the morbidiferous pus by incision or puncture, as is practised by the Greeks in Turky, and by our surgeons in England, we will not take upon us to determine; much less whether it ought to have the preference before the natural one. If our reader should be desirous to know what account the Chinese books give of the latter, we can only tell them, that they seem unanimously to agree, that every child brings the morbidic poison with him from the womb; but whether it receives it from the father or mother, they are not agreed; neither can they give any tolerable account why or how it displays itself in such various shapes, produces such different effects, and at such different and distant periods of life^m.

tree described.

THE last thing we proposed to mention, under this head of physic, was the famed camphire-tree, their method of extracting and purifying its gum, and the virtues they ascribe to it, as well as to the wood which bears it. This noble tree, so famed for its largeness and prodigious height, is called by the Chinese Tchang, and the camphire which is extracted from it Tchang-nao. The account we have of it, and of the Chinese way of extracting and sublimating its excellent gum being taken from an old Chinese book, which the emperor Kang-hi caused to be reprinted, with the observations of some of the most learned and curious virtuosi and literati of the empire, carries its own authority with it, and confutes several erroneous notions we had of that process here in Europe (F); for which reason we hope our readers

(E) Take of red, green, and black peas, and sliced liquorice, of each one ounce; let them all be finely pounded and sifted, and put into the hollow of a piece of pilled bamboe, leaving the knot at the two ends; and let them be stopped very close with two pieces of fir-wood, covered all over with wax. Suspend the said stick, in the winter, in the soil of a Mao-cang, or house-of-office, during the space of a month or two. When taken out, cleanse the outside thoroughly, and dry the powder in the shade: and add to every ounce of it three Mas, or three tenth parts of an ounce, of the flower Moet-tse, a kind of wild apricot, which blows only in winter, and bears no fruit, well dried by a fire, and powdered. The dose is from one half to a whole Mas, or from half an ounce to an ounce, in proportion to the child's age; the whole diluted in a decoction of the stalks of a Su-kooa, or kind of oblong wild gourd, which are said to have a diuretic, carminative, and refreshing quality.

Some Chinese books give us, however, a more cleanly, short, and easy way, of preparing this medicine, by boiling all the above-mentioned ingredients in an earthen vessel, till the whole becomes of a moderate thickness, and giving it in a double quantity; but whether or no it will have the same virtue, we will not warrant; only our missionary assures us, that the red peas expel all peccant matter from the heart, the black from the reins, and the green from the stomach (6).

(F) Amongst these we may reckon that of the famous M. Lenery, who affirmed the camphire to dilute a readers will not be displeased to have a more clear and authentic account of it than they have hitherto met with, as it hath been communicated to these European parts by the same ingenious missionary, from whom we had the curious process of the Chinese inoculation, mentioned in the preceding article †.

THE tree itself is of such a monstrous size, that some of them rise to above 300 feet; its thickness is proportionable to it, insomuch that 20 men can hardly embrace its trunk. The branches spread a considerable way; and the wood, which is very hard and durable, is of singular use for the construction of large ships, as well as for other more curious pieces of joinery, by reason of the beauty and glossiness of its surface, and the great variety of its veins. Their texture is so tenacious and close, that it is very common to see many of them above b 300 years old.

THEY neither yield their fine gum by distillation nor by incision; an operation so easy, and well known among the Chinese, that, if it could be got by that way, they would readily adopt, as they do with regard to the fir and other resinous trees, preferably to that tedious and difficult one which they are obliged to take to extract it from this; and which is as follows: They take some of the newest branches, and saw them across in thin slips of about an inch in thickness; and these they chop again into small square bits, and soak them three days and three nights in well-water, by which time they are sufficiently macerated to be set a boiling on a moderate fire. They stir them all the while with a fir stick, till they have yielded their gummy juice, which is easily known by its sticking like a white jelly to the fir-stick: they then strain the whole, taking special care that none of the faeces, or other filth, be intermixed with it; and pour it gently into an earthen vessel well varnished, in which they let it stand and cool a whole night, and on the morrow is found the camphire coagulated into a mass or cake.

THIS mass is afterward purified or sublimated in the following manner: They take a basin or flatish vessel of red copper, and put into it a layer of the pulverised earth of some old mud wall, and over that one of the mass; they add a second, third, and fourth, layer of each, and cover the whole, first with a fresh layer of the leaves of the plant Po, or penny-royal, and this with another copper basin of the same bigness, turned upside-down upon the first; and so strongly cemented together, that none of the effluvia can evaporate through the joining, which would otherwise mar the whole process. The first basin being thus filled, and closely covered, is set on a moderate fire, which must be neither too fierce nor too slack, and care be taken that the cement be not cracked by the heat, or any accident; and, after having been a sufficient time on the coals, which is mostly gained by experience, it is taken off, and left to cool; and, upon parting the two basins, the camphire will be found incrustated and sublimated, sticking on the top and sides of the uppermost one. If the same experiment be repeated in the same manner twice or three times, each operation will yield a fresh quantity of the same odoriferous gum. These must likewise be put between two earthen vessels, well closed together with cement, or with wet paper, to stop all evaporations; and be set upon a moderate fire, in order to make it fit for use; and, when taken off and cooled, the camphire will be found in its utmost perfection, and ready for all uses.

It is not unlikely, continues our Jesuit, that some expert European chemist, who could procure a quantity of those recent branches, might find out a more easy and expeditious way of extracting this valuable gum from it, and sublimating it to the same degree of perfection; and yet it is no less plain, that the Chinese are neither ignorant of, nor averse to, a shorter way, seeing they can sublimate even mercury between two well luted common crucibles; so that they must be supposed to have some grounds for keeping up to this more laborious process, in order to have it in its true purity and perfection; though, from the notion of Lemery, and others, of its being brought crude and foul from thence into Holland, one may easily conclude, that they do by it as they do by their tea, and other commodities; and either extract it in a more slovenly way, or adulterate it with some heterogeneous mixture; the cakes of it, which are brought from thence by the Dutch, or perhaps rather by the Batavian natives, who commonly trade thither, appearing as if they were cast in the lid of a porridge-pot. However, it is plain they make sufficient quantities of the purer sort for their own use, since it bears no higher a price at Pe-king than about 2 d. per ounce, and is still cheaper in the distant provinces, from whence they fetch it. There is moreover a double advantage in extracting it in the tedious manner above-mentioned; the one is, that it may from the trunk and the larger branches of the tree; and that of Etmuller, and others after him, who pretend that it is drawn from the tree by incision (7), and that it is brought crude from thence by the Dutch; all which is plainly confuted by the more curious account given us by the Chinese book above-mentioned, as the reader will see by what follows.

be done at all seasons of the year, whereas there could be but one season for doing it by inci-sion; the other, that the lopping off the branches doth not hurt the tree like the wounding of it^o.

camphire.*

THE virtues the Chinese book above-mentioned attributes to the camphire are various. It is of an acid and warm nature, and in no case prejudicial or hurtful; it helps to carry off the phlegm and slime from the stomach and bowels; it purifies the blood from filth, and rectifies the disorders which are caused by cold and dampness; it eases the most violent colics, and cholera morbus, loathings and flatulencies in the stomach; it cures the itch, scabs, and other cuticular ailments; fixes loose teeth, and cleanses rotten ones: and is an excellent preservative, as well as an effectual remedy, against bodily vermin. The wood of it is likewise affirmed to have all the virtues of the gum, though in a much inferior degree, the decoction of it being successfully used against all the above-mentioned disorders; and, if taken in a large quantity, works as a gentle emetic, and cleanses the stomach and bowels from peccant humours. Lastly, and to name no more, shoes, the soles of which are made of this wood, cure the feet from excessive sweating, and are a great strengthener of them. And thus much may suffice for the virtues of this tree, and its excellent gum; though the Chinese, it must be owned, is universally allowed to be greatly inferior to that which comes from the island of Borneo^p.

Complete treatise of anatomy translated into the Tartarian tongue.

To conclude this article, one may safely say, that the whole skill of the Chinese practitioners in physic, among whom the Lamas are reckoned some of the best, consists chiefly in the knowledge of a certain number of plants and drugs, and the possession of some approved receipts, transmitted as an inheritance from father to son, and preserved with the utmost secrecy in their families; and which, if misapplied through inadvertency or ignorance, which is often the case, and fail of the promised success, those pretenders are never at a loss for some specious excuse, by throwing the blame either on the weather, the irregularity of the patients, or the carelessness of those who attend them: whereas the emperor Kang-bi had been so well convinced, that most of their miscarriages were owing to their want of skill in anatomy, that he ordered one of the best European treatises on that subject to be translated into the Tartarian language, and adorned with all the variety of cuts that were necessary for such a work, which were those of the famed Bartolinus; all which was executed with the utmost care, under the direction of Father Parrenin, and highly admired at court. When the work was completed, that prince, recollecting that he had seen, among other of his rarities, a statue of about three feet high, cast in copper, on which were, as he imagined, all the veins and arteries delineated in their proper places, he ordered it to be brought out, and compared with those of the treatise. To their great surprize, they found those lines all parallel to each other, and almost all of the same length, without any the least resemblance either to veins or arteries, or answering to their true situation and number. The statue having at length been examined by two of the expertest physicians belonging to the palace, they soon found that those lines were traced on the figure with no other view than to point out the places that were proper to let blood at, by the operation lately mentioned, called acupuncture, or by the help of coarse needles, in cases of rheumatism, gout, sciatica, &c. Upon which the emperor told them, that he remembered that there had been a dissection of a human body under the foregoing dynasty of Ming, which was the first, if not the only one, that had ever been made in China: Though, added he, I should not be against their being often repeated on the bodies of criminals, for the sake of the advantages that may be reaped from it, provided it were done privately, and only in the presence of physicians and surgeons; it being but just that those wretches, who have done so much mischief to the public in their life-time, should be doomed to make some useful amends for it after their death^q. But the difficulty is, how to induce the Chinese to think in the same just manner.

The emperor's judgment on the dissection of criminals.

Of the origin, antiquity, and chronology, of the Chinese nation.

Origin and antiquity of the Chinese.

WE have already, in some of the foregoing sections*, had occasion to inform our readers, that, with regard to the account we gave of the origin, antiquity, and first peopling, of the Chinese nation, we contented ourselves with following the most received opinion, which supposes them, as well as the Tartars, to be descended from Magog, Meshech, and Tubal^a; and accordingly laid before our readers a series of the most material arguments

* See before, p. 557, and Introd. p. 491, & seq.

a which have hitherto been urged against the hypothesis of the late learned Shuckford, of Noah being the same with the Chinese Fo-bi, the founder of that monarchy^b. These we endeavoured to set in the strongest light, not so much as our real opinion, as with a view of exciting thereby some of our ingenious correspondents, whom we know to be on the contrary side of the question, to communicate their thoughts to us on that curious and so much controverted subject, in hopes of receiving some farther light from their discoveries, which might either corroborate or explode the general opinion of the learned. Our hopes have not been frustrated; and we dare flatter ourselves, that the many judicious hints we have since received from a certain quarter have now enabled us to resume the argument in favour of Dr. Shuckford's system, not only in a manner almost intirely new, but backed with such fresh and authentic proofs as will, we doubt not, appear to every unbiaſſed reader more than equivalent to any thing that hath hitherto been objected against it, and on that account justly to deserve a place in a work like this; that, by a fair comparison between them, every one may be enabled to embrace that side of the question which appears to him to carry the greater weight. And this we judge the more incumbent upon us, as the greater part of the authorities we shall produce are such as have not hitherto appeared in public, at least in the clear light in which they will be found in the following pages, and which we are not without hopes may afford matter for greater improvement among such as are best versed in those remote antiquities: for though we readily own, that the ingenious Dr. Shuckford's hypothesis, on the foot he hath proposed it, and from the method he hath undertaken to prove it, appears still clogged with such seeming insurmountable difficulties, as might easily determine a hasty reader to reject it in the lump (for which reason we shall follow it no farther than we can plane the way before it); yet if those seeming difficulties can be clearly removed, and such new proofs be brought, as will make it appear not only extremely probable and rational, but (which is the most important, though difficult, point to carry) easily reconciled with, and by some authentic fact shewn to be quite consistent with, our Hebrew, as well as with the ancient Chinese chronology; it is to be hoped that the mutual evidence which these two will be found to reflect on each other will easily outweigh all that can be urged against it, either on account of the newness or singularity of it: and much more so, if, by their mutual help and agreement, we shall be enabled to fix the Chinese chronology, from the very foundation of its monarchy, upon a surer basis than hath been hitherto attempted, or thought upon. But as this last is the most important point of all, and fittest to precede immediately the history of the Chinese monarchs, we shall defer it till then; whilst we now go on with the other topics, by which we intend to shew the great probability of Noah being the same with Fo-bi, and the founder of the Chinese monarchy.

THIS hypothesis (for we will not yet venture to call it by a stronger name) hath been in a great measure already confirmed by various learned pens, by a much greater number of arguments than our designed brevity will permit us to insist on; for which reason we shall confine ourselves to such only as either carry the greatest weight, or as have not been urged in favour of it by any another. We begin with the former; which are as follow:

e 1. THE affinity or analogy of the names of Noah and Fo-bi; together with other particulars of their history, too trite and well known to need a longer detail here, as some of the most material will come in more properly in the sequel.

2. NOAH and Fo-bi being contemporary; a point which hath been partly proved by Dr. Shuckford^c, but will be more fully so under our last head.

3. SEVERAL remarkable particulars which the Chinese history records of Fo-bi, and do in a great measure agree with those which Moses hath related of Noah, are another strong presumption of their being the same person (A).

4. A FOURTH argument is the vast and almost universal opposition which is found between the Chinese, and all other the descendants of Noah; particularly with regard to their religion, laws, government, learning, arts, customs, &c. and more especially still with respect to their

^b Connection, part 1. p. 99, & seq.

^c Ibid. part 1. p. 102.

(A) Thus Fo-bi is affirmed by the Chinese to have had no father; and Noah, all whose ancestors perished by the flood, being the first patriarch of the postdiluvian world, stands there as if he had no father, no mention being made of any in the Chinese annals. 2. Fo-bi's mother is said to have been impregnated by the rainbow; a conceit most probably arising from its being given by God as a pledge to Noah and his posterity (1); and agreeable enough to the imperfect notion which the Chinese retained of that phenomenon. 3. Fo-bi is said to have carefully bred up seven sorts of creatures, which he used to sacrifice to the supreme Spirit of heaven and earth. Noah is affirmed by Moses to have taken into the ark of every clean beast, and fowl of the air, by sevens, and to have offered them up a burnt-offering unto the Lord (2). Lastly, The Chinese derive the name of Fo-bi from his oblations (3); and Moses gives Noah his name on account of the grant which God made to him in consequence of his offering (4).

language^d; from all which it is justly concluded, that they must have been a different a people from those who were dispersed soon after the building of the tower of Babel, among whom there still remained a sufficient conformity in all the above-mentioned respects to help one to trace them to their common original: for if all the difficulties that are raised against the possibility of Noah's leading a colony into China, and founding a monarchy there^c, long before his death, can be effectually removed, as we hope they will in the sequel, what can be more rationally inferred from this surprising difference between the Chinese and all other nations, than that the good old patriarch, finding his authority too small to deter the greatest part of his descendants, grown by that time too numerous and untractable to be deterred from their detestable design of fortifying themselves against the power of Heaven (B), wisely separated himself from them; and, taking as many with him as abhorred that impious con- b spiracy, led them far enough eastwards to be out of the danger of being involved in the punishment which he had cause to fear would quickly fall on those rebellious miscreants; till, by slow and gradual migrations, he at length reached some of the northern provinces of China? This supposition, which we shall endeavour to back in the sequel with much stronger proofs, will then easily account not only for the vast difference between the Chinese and the rest of the world, but likewise for the singular contempt they have ever had for all other nations; their interdicting all commerce and intercourse with them; their shutting up the entrance into their dominions against all strangers, unless by way of embassy; and their forbidding their natives to go into foreign countries, without the emperor's permission, lest their religion, laws, and customs, should become corrupted by such intermixtures. Now, if the c impious conspiracy above-mentioned be allowed a sufficient cause for Noah's separating himself and small colony from the rest of his rebellious offspring (and a more rational and laudable one cannot well be imagined); then it will be no longer a wonder that the religion, laws, government, &c. which he established in his new monarchy, which were, without all doubt, the same which he received from the antediluvian patriarchs, should be in all respects so opposite to those of a mutinous crew, whom the Divine Providence had thrown into a state of confusion and anarchy; and, being dispersed over different parts of the world, and split into various governments, rather sought how to enlarge their dominions by fraud and force, than how to settle the old patriarchal religion and government among them; for this plainly d appears to have been the case of all the monarchies which were formed after the general dispersion at Babel, whilst the empire of China alone, by their close adherence to, and improvements on, the old patriarchal maxims of religion and government, lived in plenty and security, promoted all the useful arts and sciences, and rather strove to cultivate their own territories to the best advantage, than to enlarge them at the expence of their own peace and happiness. As to the difference of their language, it must of course be expected to have been still greater, if we suppose Noah and his colony to have separated themselves from the rest before the confusion at Babel. Accordingly we find so little affinity between the Chinese and those e tongues that were formed just before the dispersion, that it is justly, and on all accounts, allowed to carry the marks of an undoubted priority to them; so that nothing can be more extravagant than to search for any of the roots of the latter out of the former, seeing the more it differs from all the rest, especially as it bears such visible marks of a primitive one, the fairer it bids for being that of Noah, and of the antediluvian world.

5. For, if this prodigious difference between the Chinese and all other nations be such a strong argument of their being originally a distinct people from them, as hath been fully proved by the generality of Chinese writers, and other learned pens; and if no properer time or occasion can be probably assigned for this separation, than the conspiracy above-mentioned at the tower of Babel^f, what other part can we reasonably suppose the good old patriarch to have acted in such a juncture, than first to use all his rhetoric and authority to dissuade and deter them from it; and, when he found it prove ineffectual, to abandon those wretches f to their destiny, and save himself, and his small number of adherents, from it, by leading them into some of the remotest climates from those cursed plains, and settling them in some

(B) It must be observed, that some commentators and bold critics have given themselves some pains, not only to palliate, but even to commend that action as a very laudable one, and as intending no more than the building a kind of metropolis, which might be as the centre of their future empire, and a citadel which might be strong enough for its defence (5). It plainly appears, however, from the whole tenor of the Mosaic account, particularly from his introducing the Divine Providence as expressly descending from heaven to view and blast their enterprise, that it must have been of a more malignant nature, and calculated to defend themselves against a second deluge. But of this we shall find a proper occasion to speak more fully in the sequel.

a more peaceful abode, where they might quietly enjoy the fruits of their piety, and the benefit of his farther instructions? This will at once sufficiently account for the vast difference above-mentioned between his own colony and the rest of his offspring, that is, for the primitive simplicity and purity preserved in the former, and the excessive depravity of the latter; and likewise for Moses's surprising silence concerning the remainder of the good old patriarch's life, whose name is not so much as mentioned by Moses, in the sequel of his history, except where he acquaints us with the year in which he died; which seems plainly to imply, that he wholly withdrew himself from the rest of his descendants: for, had he continued still among any of them after the general dispersion, is it credible that the inspired historian would have let him sink so soon into utter oblivion, whilst he is so particular in his account of the migrations and settlements of his three sons, and their numerous descendants? But there may be still assigned a more powerful reason why Moses concealed this remarkable particular from the Jewish nation, if not rather for God's concealing it from him; viz. to prevent any intercourse between those two nations, which might in time not only degenerate into a superstitious veneration for the sepulchre of that patriarch (for this seems to be the very motive why the Divine Providence took such care to have that of the Jewish lawgiver altogether unknown)†; but much more still to prevent their contracting such a fondness and admiration for the purity and simplicity of the Chinese worship, as might inspire them with some strong and invincible dislike against the great number of rites and ceremonies which he, for very wise ends, was going to impose upon them.

c VI. ANOTHER proof that China must have been peopled by some such early colony as we are speaking of, is, that it plainly appears to have been not only inhabited, but very populous, much sooner than it can be supposed to have been by any other of Noah's descendants after the general dispersion: had any of these, whether Tubal, Meshech, or any other, been the first peoplers of the Chinese empire, as they are allowed to have been of the north-eastern parts of Tartary, considering the length and difficulty of the way, and the slowness of their migrations, which were chiefly occasioned through want of room in proportion to their gradual multiplying, not only the kingdoms most contiguous to Shinaar, as Babylon, Persia, &c. but a great number of countries to the eastward of it, must be supposed to have swarmed with inhabitants before they could have reached, or at least before they could have tolerably peopled, any of the Chinese provinces; for this plainly appears to have been the case of the north-eastern Tartary, which we have formerly shewn was thinly peopled even so late as the time of Madye's expedition into *Asia. But that this was not by any means that of China, Their early armies against Ninus. against the prodigious armies of Ninus and Semiramis: for though we should, as we justly may, suppose the accounts of it to have been greatly exaggerated by antient historians; yet, as we have no reason to think them more so on one side than on the other, we may still safely conclude both the invaders and invaded to have been upon a par; and that the latter were strong and numerous enough to repel the forces of the former, whether or no they were really so many as they have been represented. Nothing, therefore, can so fully account for those remote eastern parts being so well inhabited and populous at such early times, as the supposition of some such colony, whether under Noah, or any other chief, separating themselves from the rest, either before or about the time of the dispersion, and marching still directly eastward, till they settled themselves there in about a century or two after.

How much more than probable such a supposition is, will be made to appear more fully still under several of the subsequent heads: at present we shall content ourselves with observing what double advantages such a colony, how small soever in its first beginning (C), must have

† See Deuter. xxxiv. 6. See also Ant. Hist. vol. i. part 2, p. 543, (I) & (K).
P. 491, & seq. * D. SICUL. l. ii. JUSTIN. l. i.

* See before, Introd.

(C) By that expression the reader may observe, that we purposely avoid entering into a too nice disquisition, whether Noah had any sons after the flood; and, if he had, whether they only, or any number of his other descendants, accompanied him eastward.

As to the first, though Moses makes no mention of any, probably for the reason already given, yet the Chinese records give him a numerous issue; in which they agree with the Pseudo-Berosus, who makes them to amount to thirty, whom he styles Titanes, a word which implies no more than easterlings, or people settled in the eastern parts of the world; it being derived, as we have formerly shewn, from the old Celtic Ti, and tan, which, in that language, signifies the house of fire†; a very proper and significant expression for the sun, from whence that of Titanoi, or Titanes, was commonly given to those people who were seated nearest to the sun-rising.

As to the second point, we think it highly probable, that not only Noah's postdiluvian sons, but a much greater number of his other descendants, chose to follow him into the east, rather than join in the impious design of their brethren: but let the number of his followers have been ever so small, yet the 200 years, which, we shall shew in the sequel, he and they took up in travelling from Shinaar to China, were more than sufficient to enable him to bring thither a numerous and powerful colony enough to found his new empire upon; considering the then great increase of mankind, their longevity, health, vigour, and other advantages they enjoyed above the rest of the dispersed tribes, from whom they separated themselves.

had over all the other people of the dispersion, with regard to its growth, in number, strength, and opulence; for, as they were united into one body, and under one head, their strength, and capacity of promoting the welfare of the whole, was greater in proportion than that of the rest of mankind, who were soon split into so many governments, as mult of course greatly diminish their power. 2. They lived in peace and plenty, in a rich and fruitful country, and under an excellent climate and government; and so could propagate and multiply much faster than those, who, besides their being less happily situated, were ever warring against and depopulating one another.

The dispute about the two Ararats of no consequence in this case.

VII. FROM what hath been hitherto said of Noah's separating himself from the rest of his descendants, either a little before, or soon after, the confusion of Babel, the reader may easily conclude of how little import the much disputed point, whether the Ararat of Armenia, or that of India, be that on which the ark rested, is to our present argument. The latter, which is that of Dr. Shuckford, makes indeed that patriarch's migration into China much easier and shorter; but the former, which is the most commonly received, is far enough from making it appear so impracticable and absurd as is pretended by those on the opposite side: for, if he and his descendants could travel from the Armenian Ararat to the plain of Shinaar in about 70 years (D), by which time they were grown numerous and stubborn enough to form that conspiracy, where can be the impossibility, or even unlikelihood, of their reaching to the frontiers of China in a much less time than the 250 years which he lived after the dispersion? Add to this, that as, in his first migration from Ararat to Shinaar, it doth not appear that he had any other inducement for it but the change of pasture and climate, so his journies might be made as leisurely as he pleased; whereas in his second, from Shinaar to China, he hastened away from a crew of determinate rebels, bent on their own ruin, from whom he could not part too soon, nor go too far, to avoid sharing in their punishment. However, though we seem thus far to give up the point in favour of the Armenian Ararat, we are so far from looking upon the main argument insisted upon in proof of it, viz. the sons of Sennacherib fleeing thither for refuge, to be at all conclusive on that side, that we think it might with much more reason be urged on the other; and that the vicinity of Armenia to Assyria, if it was not then subject, or at least tributary to it, would never have permitted two such sacrilegious parricides to flee thither for sanctuary, or to raise forces for their own safety; especially if we consider that, in their flight from Nineveh thither, they must be forced to cross over too considerable a part of the Assyrian empire, and be in continual danger of being seized: whereas by steering their course towards the north-east, or towards the other Ararat, they could be much sooner out of those dominions, and be in greater safety when got to their journey's end. We beg leave here likewise to add, that the argument urged by Dr. Shuckford in favour of the Indian Ararat, from Moses's expression of the builders of Babel's tower coming מִקֶּדֶם from the east^b, is far enough from being satisfactorily answered by the opposite side^c; and that the induction of one or two doubtful parallels, allowed to be irregular, ungrammatical, and ungeographical, and which are the only ones in the whole Old Testament in which the particle מ appears to bear a different sense, is not a sufficient authority to determine in any other case that is free from those defects. In the parallel insisted upon, the geography of the place plainly shews, that, in the words Mikaddem, the particle mem cannot signify, as it every-where properly doth, from, but rather to, or towards (E); but, in the other case, the point from which those builders set out, whether from the eastern or western Ararat, being the matter in dispute, must be determined by some better proof than that; and the learned Mr. Basnage was so far from being satisfied, that, in this last case, the words Mikaddem might be taken to signify towards the east, notwithstand-

^c See before, Introduction, p. 494.

(D) The dispersion is said by Moses to have happened about the 100th year of the flood, out of which number less than thirty cannot be supposed to have been taken up in hatching, ripening, and executing, the impious design that occasioned it, the procuring the proper materials, and the rearing of their stupendous edifice to some considerable height; so that the latest they can be supposed to have come to the plain of Shinaar must be about the 70th year after the flood (6).

(E) This we say upon the supposition that the Hebrew word was originally so written; whereas, from the well known situation of the places, one would be apter to suppose it to be an error of the transcriber, who mistook a מ for a ל, and wrote Mikaddem, from the east, instead of Bikaddem, into or towards the east; such oversights not being unfrequent in the books of the Old Testament. This plainly appears from the instances mentioned by Basnage (1) out of the book of Kings (2), compared with the parallel text in the Chronicles (3); and that in the former, where David is said to have gone to Baal-Jehuda, to fetch the ark from thence, the grammar requires it to have been originally written מִבְּעָלִי, Bebaale, instead of מִבְּעָלִי, Mibehale, that is, the particle ל instead of מ, or to instead of from.

If we should be asked why the same error may not have crept into both, as well as into one of the texts? we can only say, that we shall be ready to acknowledge the possibility of it, when the one can be proved as ungrammatical and ungeographical as the other; neither of which can be said of that which we are now upon.

a ing the parallel above-mentioned, that to avoid giving them such an unnatural and ungrammatical sense, he has made those builders to fetch a wide compass about, from Armenia to Mesopotamia, in order to bring them from the east into the plain of Shinaar. The truth is, that those learned pens, who have declared in favour of the Armenian Ararat, have endeavoured to overwhelm their antagonists with a confused heap of testimonies from antient authors, geographers, lexicographers, historians, &c. Hebrew, Chaldee, Arab, Greek, and Latin, which have lived a vast number of centuries one after the other, and all of them at some thousand years after the flood; to say nothing of the pretended antient arts, relics, common tradition, medals, and other such precarious arguments, as if their number could be of any decisive authority in a point of that remote antiquity, and make up in bulk what is wanting in evidence; although the greatest part of them have been since so effectually confuted, that there is just reason to wonder they should appear afresh in print †.

b So that, for any thing that hath hitherto been urged on either side, though we readily own that the Armenian Ararat is commonly meant by the sacred historians in most places where that word occurs, yet the Indian may still be that on which the ark rested, if they are not indeed only parts of one and the same continued ridge, reaching quite from Armenia to India.

VIII. NEITHER need we here be much deterred at the insurmountable difficulties which are thrown in Noah's way to China, whether he set out from Shinaar, Armenia, or India. Those pretended impenetrable forests, long and insurmountable ridges of mountains, and vast sandy deserts, which lie now between them, are mere illusions, which could have no being so soon after the deluge, to whatever cause they might owe it afterwards: for, 1. With regard to those monstrous forests, the whole globe must be supposed to have been too well peopled at the time of the flood to have any room for such wild plantations; or, if any such there had been, they must have been all pulled up by the roots by the violence of the waves which covered the whole surface of the earth. 2. As to the long and high ridges of mountains which lay in the way, what insurmountable difficulties can we imagine there could be in going over them, if we rightly consider the condition they must have been in immediately after the flood, and during some centuries beyond, that is, with their vallies filled and choaked up with a thick incrustated mud, which every-where subsided after the waters were dried up? Can we call a gradual declivity on both sides, covered with a pleasant continued verdure, an insurmountable difficulty? for this is all that can be supposed those mountains could then present, to obstruct those travellers journey, till the rains and the rivers, which sprang from the tops, had gradually washed away all that mud and earth; which could hardly be done till some centuries after.

THE same may be said, 3dly, of those now unpassable deserts, whose sands must, by their own weight, have subsided under such a thick crust of the same mud and earth, as nothing but a vast length of time could wash away, or sink through them. If such, then, was the surface of the earth for a much longer number of years than were sufficient for Noah and his colony to have reached the Chinese territories, though they had set out even from Armenia; or for his descendants to have marched from the Bactrian hills to the plains of Shinaar, as Dr. Shuckford supposes; is it not a mere illusion to lay such pretended insurmountable obstructions in their way, as were not in being till some centuries after, and then represent such journies as absurd, monstrous, and against the nature of things? But,

IX. THERE was still an easier and speedier way for Noah and his colony to have reached China, namely, by water. He could not so soon have forgot the structure of the ark, which had preserved him in a more perilous navigation; so that, upon his meeting, in his way from either place, either with the Indus, Ganges, or any other large river, which he could not but conclude must disembogue itself into some sea, or large reservoir, he had nothing to do but to fit out a sufficient number of vessels for himself and company, and sail down it, and thence steer his course as nearly as he could eastward, till some milder climate than those sultry ones he had left behind, or the prospect of some pleasant and fertile coasts, invited him to the shore. He might also proceed farther into the country, either by land, or by the help of some of those noble rivers with which China abounds, till he met with a settlement to his liking; the farther from his other descendants the better, and more out of danger of their disturbing his new colony. What would almost determine us to conclude that this was the way which that patriarch took to come into that country, is, that the Chinese, and their descendants, are the only people in all the known world, who, in the fabrication of their trading vessels, have kept strictly up to the original model of the ark, as will be shewn more fully under a subsequent article. But if the Chinese tradition be rather followed, which tells us, that Fa-hi first settled in some of the northern provinces, which are at a great distance from the sea-coasts, it will be more probable that he came thither all the way by land; unless we will suppose that he first landed on some of the southern coasts; and, either for conveniency or safety, removed farther northward, till the vast high mountains which divide that part of China from Tartary, appeared a to him a sufficient barrier to secure him, on that, from any invasion or disturbance from the other side.

How he came to steer so right.

As none of the suppositions above-mentioned can appear otherwise than rational and feasible (especially if we can, as we doubt not to do, remove all the other objections urged against Noah's being really cotemporary with Fo-hi, and consequently more probably the same with him), the only difficulty remaining with respect to the point in hand will be, how that patriarch, who must of course be supposed to have been but very little acquainted with the nature, form, and superficies, of the postdiluvian world, particularly with respect to its different zones, climates, soil, air, &c. came to steer his course so happily and judiciously, as to hit upon one of the pleasantest and most fertile spots in the whole world. To this it may be answered, that he might acquire a great part of that knowledge, by observing, as he travelled eastward, how b parched and barren every soil, and how sultry the climate, the nearer he approached to the sun, and vice versa; so that he could not be long at a loss how to make the best choice. And as to the extraordinary fertility of the country, we have already shewn, in the geography of it, that it is more owing to the ingenuity and indefatigable industry of the inhabitants, than to the mere natural fecundity of its soil or climate. As to the other part of the difficulty, it being raised on a wrong supposition, that the antediluvians had but a very imperfect knowledge of what we call the sphere, or globe, we shall now, in the

of astronomy.

TENTH place, make it evidently appear, that whatever not only the antient Egyptians, Chaldeans, Babylonians, &c. but even the Chinese, knew of astronomy, was, for the most part, if not wholly, derived from them. This being a curious point, which hath not hitherto been c sufficiently cleared up, we shall beg our reader's patience, if we dwell a little longer upon it, than we have on the former; especially, as the surprising harmony and uniformity which reign through the fundamentals of their several systems, will afford us a farther, and, as we think, a very convincing proof of the Chinese having received their own from no other, but the immediate hand of the patriarch Noah, after his settling himself with them in that country.

Convey it alike to all the post-
diluvians.

To make this clear, we beg leave to observe, that the whole basis of what the antient nations above-named comprehended under the notion of astronomy, was every-where the same, not only with regard to such points as were demonstrable from observation and deductions, but likewise to many more, which were altogether arbitrary, and, which is still more surprising, with respect to a much greater number of such as were imaginary, doubtful, and groundless, d or absolutely ridiculous and false. We shall, for the sake of such of our readers as are not so well acquainted with these abstruse matters, subjoin an instance or two of each sort, in the subsequent note (E), by which they will easily perceive, how early the superstitious and ridiculous notions of astrology intermixed themselves with the more useful and noble discoveries in astronomy, among all those antient nations, how separate and distant soever from each other.

(E) Among those of the first, or demonstrable, sort, we may reckon the division of the heaven into zones, and other circles, the declension of the ecliptic, the distance of the poles from the equator, the course of the sun, moon, and other planets, &c.; of the second, or merely arbitrary, sort, where the division of the ecliptic into twelve signs (whence came the twelve months of the solar year, which we have formerly shewn, from Moses's account of the deluge, were in use as well before as since that time), that of the signs into degrees, and that of the rest of the heavens into constellations, and others of the like nature. Among those of the third, or imaginary, uncertain, or erroneous, kind (which are still more numerous and various, as superstition and falshood commonly propagate farther and faster than truth), we may reckon the whole tribe of superstitious rules, which make up the astrological art; such as dividing the ecliptic into four triplicities, answering the four elements, and allowing to three signs to each of them; as, ♈, ♎, and ♊, to the fire; ♋, ♏, and ♍, to the earth; ♒, ♐, and ♑, to the air; and the remaining three to the water. The assigning to each planet a different nature and influence, as hot, cold, moist, dry, malevolent, or benevolent, as also certain houses, or signs, in which their influence is more or less strong and powerful; thus, ♄, which is allowed the most malignant of all, hath his night and day-houses, and is reckoned strongest, in ♋ and ♑, is exalted in ♎, detrimented in ♈ and ♏, which are opposite to, or half a circle of 360 degrees distant from, his two houses above-mentioned, and hath his fall in ♊, opposite to the place of his exaltation; ♃, which is allowed the most benevolent of all the seven, hath his two houses in ♈ and ♏, is exalted in ♎, determined in ♒ and ♐, and hath his fall in ♋; and so of the rest; only with this difference, that the sun and moon have but one sign, or house, allotted to each of them, whereas the other five planets have each of them two. 3dly, Of the same uncertain or fabulous kinds are the different influences of these planets, according to their aspects to, that is, their distances from, each other; thus, a sextile, or distance of two signs, or sixty degrees, is reckoned good; a square, or three signs, bad; a trine, or four signs, best; and an opposition, or six signs, worst of all. From these various configurations of the planets, and the nature of the signs they chance to be in, and from numberless other rules of their art, equally uncertain, not to say imaginary and fabulous, they pretend that all sublunary affairs are so intirely governed, that not only the conception, birth, life, death, &c. of every living creature, the production, growth, perfection, and virtues, of all vegetables, minerals, &c. but the rise and fall, good or ill fate, of empires and countries, good and bad seasons, wars, pestilence, drought, famine, and, in a word, all the good and evil which happen in this world, is intirely owing to them, and may be foreseen and foretold by that pretended art, in which the astrologers of all nations followed almost the very same rules; and, from all which, we cannot but of course conclude, that they must all have received them from the self-same hands.

NETHER were the former confined to a mere speculative theory, or embraced only by a few crazy enthusiasts, but taught by the most learned, encouraged by the most powerful, men in every kingdom, and consulted by great and small, in the most important emergencies. Now there are but two ways to account for this general conformity, both in theory and practice, as well in points of an arbitrary, uncertain, and fallacious, as in those of a more certain and demonstrable, nature; viz. either by supposing, with several learned men, that Adam was created with a perfect knowledge of the nature, courses, and influence, of the heavenly bodies, and transmitted it to his posterity, by whom it was, in process of time, corrupted with an intermixture of the astrological and superstitious notions mentioned in the last note; or else, that his descendants acquired it, by the help of those frequent observations, which their longevity, serener atmosphere, and other advantages, they then enjoyed, enabled them to make, till, in process of time, their degeneracy, and natural propensity of prying into futurity, sunk them into all the astrological superstitions we have been speaking of.

LET the reader then suppose which of the two cases he will, he must be still forced to conclude, that the astronomical sciences, as well as the astrological superstitions built upon it, must have immediately flowed from the old into the new world: for, had those two systems been the product of the postdiluvian world, they must have been both completed, either before the general dispersion, or since. The former is altogether incompatible with their condition so soon after the deluge, that is, with the smallness of their number, the shortness of the time, their frequent migrations, and the few opportunities they had of making so many exact observations on the heavenly bodies, under such disadvantages.

NETHER can it possibly be supposed to have been done after the dispersion; for then, instead of that surprising conformity, which we observe to reign among all their systems, as well of astrology as astronomy, we should have met with nothing but the widest difference between them; at least, this must have been the case among nations so vastly distant from each other, with regard to the arbitrary points, and all the imaginary and groundless parts of their several astrological systems, whatever agreement there might be in those more demonstrable ones of their astronomy. And as for the Chinese, as they were the most distant from, as well as least conversant with, the rest, they must, of course, have differed more widely from them all; whereas, by all that we can judge from their antient writings, either in the astronomical or astrological way, they plainly appear to agree with them in all the fundamental rules of both, whether of theory or practice. From all which, we may fairly conclude, that they, as well as the rest of the eastern nations, must have received them from Noah and his three sons, some time before either he separated himself from them, to go eastward, or they were dispersed from one another. But how inconsistent this is with the contrary supposition, of China not being peopled till some long series of years, or rather ages, after the flood, let the reader judge.

How the astrological came so soon to intermix itself with the astronomical part, we shall endeavour to account for in the sequel; but, with relation to the latter, we beg leave to add, that nothing can more plainly evince their having received it from the antediluvians, than the little progress and improvements they made in it afterwards: for, can it be imagined, that the few men who were then in the world, by the mere strength of their genius, and by the help of the few occasional observations they made within the short space, which elapsed from the flood to the general dispersion, could be able to compile so exact and excellent a system of the heavenly bodies, and yet not be able, in a much greater number of ages, to raise it to any higher perfection? And yet nothing more clearly demonstrates this, than the great ignorance we find all those nations in, till we come to the time of the Greeks and Romans, concerning the cause, and method of calculating, of eclipses, and the jejune hypothesis of epicycles, by which they pretended to solve the swift and slow, the stationary and retrograde, courses, which they observed the inferior planets to move in; which epicycles, however strange and irregular, did yet pass current among all the old astronomers, till within these two centuries, when the Copernican system opened their eyes to a more satisfactory solution of that, and other puzzling phenomena, of the Ptolemaic.

THE reason of this universal neglect of astronomy, appears plainly to be their fondness for astrology; and that their learned only studied the former, for the sake of diving deeper, or, at least, of being thought so to do, into the pretended mysteries of the latter; and, as this was the most encouraged, and sought after by the great ones, and, of course, the most gainful to the professors, it is no wonder they should neglect the other, though the more noble and useful, for the sake of that. The Chinese, equally wrapped up with the same superstition, are the only antient nation that pretends to have made any considerable improvements in it, and to have found out the art of calculating eclipses, from the earliest times; and yet we have sufficiently shewn, in a former section, that all this boasted skill consisted rather in a diligent and curious observation, and recording of these, and other heavenly phenomena, than in foretelling them. In the former, no nation was more careful and exact; but that their skill fell vastly short with respect to the latter, plainly appears from their being wholly ignorant of the above-mentioned irregularity of the motion of the inferior planets; inasmuch, that they never took any notice of it, much less did they ever attempt to account for it, either by the supposition of epicycles, or by any other way, till the whole matter was unravelled to them by the European missionaries ^a.

THE sum and substance of what hath been said, under this tenth head, is briefly this:

1. THAT the exact harmony which we have observed to reign between the astronomy and astrology of the Chinese, and that of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and other antient and far distant nations from them, not only in demonstrable, but in arbitrary, uncertain, imaginary, and erroneous points, is an evident proof of its being derived to them all from Noah, and his three sons, as it was to these from the antediluvian world. ^b

had some sort of writing.*

*The best records preserved

2. THAT all this great variety, both of true astronomical knowledge, and of astrological superstition, could neither be preserved by mere strength of memory, nor conveyed by bare oral tradition (F), but plainly supposes those antediluvians to have had some better helps, whether by painting, delineating, engraving, cutting in wood, stone, or metal, or by some other way, nearly equivalent to our writing or printing. The age of the world, and the longevity, vigour, and other advantages mankind then enjoyed, will not permit us to doubt of their being capable of making some such inconsiderable discovery, for preserving and communicating their knowledge; and the plainness and simplicity of the original Chinese characters, which they boast to have received from their founder, makes it highly probable, that the art of writing was at least brought to that low pitch about the time of the deluge. If so, then it will as probably follow, that Noah, who had lived to see the greatest improvements made either in that, or any other branch of learning, spent some time in that long 100 years warning, which God had given him of the approaching deluge, in collecting and securing the best of these monuments, for his own and his posterity's use and instruction, and esteemed them as the most valuable relics of the old world. ^c

ACCORDINGLY, we are told, by Josephus *, that Setb first began to reduce astronomy into a regular system, which was gradually improved by his descendants, down to the time of the deluge; which they might the more easily do, considering their extraordinary longevity, pastoral life, serene sky, and other advantages, already named. Noah, who was heir to all their discoveries, and, without doubt, added many considerable ones of his own, all which he took care to communicate to his three sons, is, on that account, rightly supposed to be the Atlas of the heathen writers. His descendants so far imitated his example, as to be able to make some very considerable observations on the planetary system; particularly, that remarkable one which is recorded by those two celebrated astronomers of antiquity, Adrastus Cyzicenus and Dio. Neapolites, to have happened in the planet Venus, in the reign of Ogyges, when that luminous planet was observed to have received a very great change in its course, magnitude, colour, figure, &c. This singular phenomenon is likewise mentioned by Castor, and from him by Varro, and from them by St. Augustin †. It is true, none of the afore-mentioned authors tell us in which of the Ogyges's reigns it happened; but it is commonly supposed to have been in that who is surnamed Priscus, and is reckoned to be the same with the Patriarch Noah; and that this wonderful change was occasioned by the vicinity of that planet to the earth, at the time of the general deluge ‡; which is highly probable, considering, that she is nearest of all the seven to the earth, except the moon; and that, during the ten months in which the waters prevailed on the globe's surface, she came at least three times to her apogee, or greatest nearness to it; so that it can hardly be supposed, but that she must have received some very considerable change, or impression, from the vast atmosphere of fluid that then surrounded it ^d.

(F) It is, indeed, hardly to be supposed, that they could preserve, much less convey, the ideas of such a great number of circles, lines, &c. as compose the celestial sphere, together with the signs of the zodiac, and all the other constellations, without some such method as we are speaking of; especially, if we take in the names, nature, magnitude, situation, distance, &c. of those fixed stars that compose each constellation. With respect to these last, we are told (6), that some antient Chinese maps exhibit a number of them; which, though not visible to the naked eye, are yet found in their proper places (allowing for their progressive motion), by the help of a good telescope, an instrument which doth not appear to have been known in China before the coming of the European missionaries thither. But whether these stars were discovered by the antediluvians, who, probably, enjoyed a better sight, and, doubtless, a clearer atmosphere, or whether, since the flood, by any other instruments unknown to us, is not in our power to divine. We are indeed told, by Diod. Siculus, on the authority of Hecateus, that the antient druids made use of some such instruments, by which they could draw the moon so near, that they could perceive seas, mountains, &c. in it. But if the Chinese had ever any of that kind, they have since quite lost all remembrance of them (7).

- a on all sides, and much more so still, as often as she came in conjunction with the moon. Which being granted, doth plainly shew, not only how soon after the flood they began to make such curious observations on the planetary system, but likewise that they must have received the theory of them much earlier, viz. from the antediluvians, otherwise they could never have taken notice of this surprising change, in so many particulars as are above-mentioned. Origen accordingly tells us, that there had been found in Arabia Felix several manuscript copies, mostly treating of astronomy, which were universally allowed to have been transmitted to the new world by Noah; and Tertullian, who had seen, and read, some of them, assures us, that they were written on that subject; though, as we may probably suppose, not without some intermixture of the then reigning astrological stuff, foisted in by the transcribers of them.
- b HENCE those who kept so close to, and were most conversant with, that patriarch, must, of course, have received a double advantage by it, above those that dispersed themselves from him; for, in the first place, though it be reasonable to suppose, that he imparted his knowledge to them all alike, yet the latter being forced, after the dispersion, to suspend that study whilst they went in search of new settlements, and soon after that in the pursuit of their frequent wars against each other, that science must have suffered no small decay; whereas the former, The great advantage his colony received from them and him. whom we style Noah's eastern colony, had not only the constant use of his valuable records, but likewise the benefit of his expositions and lectures, both during their peregrination; and after their settlement in China; so that it is no wonder that they should make so much earlier a progress in it than the rest of the world: and accordingly the Chinese annals tells us that Fo-hi laid the first foundation of that, and other arts and sciences, and that his four or five immediate successors (G) brought them gradually to the perfection they were raised to afterwards°, till the arrival of the Europeans among them.
- c BUT, 2dly, there was still a much greater advantage which they reaped from the lessons and example of the good old patriarch above all his other descendants, namely, that it preserved them from falling into the horrid idolatries which the rest gradually sunk into; for though, like all other antient nations, the Chinese ascribed some particular influences to the heavenly bodies, to which all sublunary things were in some measure subject (H); yet neither they, nor their descendants, ever degenerated so far as to worship them, till after several centuries, that is, till 64 years after Christ, when the accursed heresy of Fo was accidentally brought thither from India, and with it an inundation of the most abominable idolatries, but which are nevertheless held in the greatest abhorrence to this very time by all their philosophers, Literati, and better sort of people.
- d FROM what hath been observed under the last article, one may be enabled to make a probable conjecture at the nature of epidemical sin, which occasioned the destruction of the old, and the so speedy dispersion of the new, race of mankind. The former, we have shewn, were infected with the absurd notion of the heavenly bodies having a considerable influence over all sublunary events: from this they might gradually degenerate into that of their being the only

(G) These five last we shall prove in the sequel, on the authority of our Hebrew chronology, to have been cotemporary with Abraham, Ishac, Jacob, Amram, Levi, and Moses.

(H) What is still more surprising is, that they, as well as all the other antient nations, should so unanimously agree in ascribing such particular influences to the very constellations, which, being no other than a colluvies of fixed stars of different natures, magnitudes, distances, &c. circumscribed within certain limits or lines, so as to represent in some measure the creatures whose names they bear, can, at best, be supposed, when thus arbitrarily joined into one sign or figure, to acquire a new virtue, in the same manner as a certain quantity of medicinal drugs of various natures do, when jumbled together in one compound: and yet we find this unaccountable influence not only acknowledged by all the antient astronomers, but even taken particular notice of in the book of Job (8), where the Almighty being introduced, by the inspired writer, as making express mention of their virtues, would incline a serious person to think that notion better founded, than the almost infinite distance of those bodies seems to admit of.

The words of our version, though short of the energy of the original, run thus: Canst thou bind (prevent, or restrain) the sweet influence of the Pleiades, or let loose the bands of Orion? Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season, or guide Arcturus, with his sons? Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven, or how to appoint them their dominion over the earth? How far our version hath hit the right names of these constellations, is out of our province to inquire; the reader may consult the commentators about it, and more particularly the curious dissertation published by the learned Mr. Coster, of Oxford, on that subject. It is enough for us that the Hebrew words Chesid, Mazzaroth, Hay, &c. are agreed to signify some certain constellations; and that the terms of binding, loosing, &c. imply some kind of peculiar virtue or influence belonging to them, by the appointment of their all-wise Creator. And thus far all nations might agree in general; but that they should all be so unanimous in assigning to each its proper influence, can hardly be otherwise accounted for, than by supposing that they all received the same theory from one person, that is, from Noah. In which case it will be equally difficult to conceive how the Chinese, the most remote from, and unacquainted with, the rest of the world, should retain so great a share of it in common with them, if not led and settled there under him. Had their country been peopled by the same latter colonies that peopled north-east Tartary, they would have been quite as ignorant of astronomy and other sciences as they, instead of cultivating and improving, as they did, from the beginning of their monarchy.

directors and governors of this lower world, and consequently the only objects of their worship; a than which notion, nothing could be more capable of sinking them into that universal corrup- tion and degeneracy, in which the deluge overtook them^p. We must, however, here except the righteous line of Seth, among whom alone the true religion, that is, the belief of an over- ruling Providence, was still preserved; the last of whom were Noah and his sons, who were on that account reserved to replenish the new world with a more hopeful progeny. However, it but too plainly appears, that these three last were not all perfectly cured, by that severe punishment, from the antediluvian contagion, since it so quickly raged afresh, and infected the greatest part of this new off-spring in less than seventy years after the flood: for what else could they mean by building such a monstrous high tower, but to secure themselves against a second deluge? and what should put such a wild and impious notion into their heads, but a b firm persuasion, agreeable to the antediluvian belief above-mentioned, that, as the first was caused by the power and influence of the stars and planets in some certain configuration, so the same might again, or would most likely, happen whenever these heavenly bodies came to meet again in the same position[†]? It is true, they had an express promise and assurance to the contrary from God himself^q; and no doubt the good old patriarch took care to urge that, and all other proper topics, to deter them from that wicked enterprise; but the catastrophe shews how little regard they paid to either, or even to the punishment that so closely followed their rebel- lion, seeing they had not been long dispersed from one another, before we find them all alike immersed in the old idolatry, and the worshipping of the sun, moon, and stars, and all the hosts of heaven, whilst even the bare notion of an over-ruling Providence seems to have been c quite extinguished among them.

XI. THIS consideration affords us another probable argument of Noah being the Chinese Fo-hi, and planting his colony there; namely, the just and constant idea which that nation hath religiously preserved, not only during a long series of ages, but doth still to this day among their philosophers and better sort of people, of a divine over-ruling Power, who directs and governs all things, knows the secrets of all hearts, and to whom all men are accountable for their thoughts, words, and actions^r. Had China been peopled by Tubal, Meshech, or any other remote descendants from Noah, we should have found them, like all the rest, immersed in idolatry, and worshipping the whole starry and planetary tribe, under the names of Baal, Astarte, Milkom, Chemosh, Dagon, and such-like, without the least notion of a superior power d over-ruling them. Even the very heads of the line of Shem were so tainted with the same idolatrous infection, that it was the very reason why God called Abraham from among them, when he made choice of him to be the restorer of his true religion and worship^s: whereas the Chinese appear to have retained, from the earliest times of their monarchy, the sublimest ideas of, and deepest regard to, the divine and over-ruling Lord of heaven, not only from their Shu-king, and other canonical books, but from the constant and regular sacrifices which they offered up to him at all proper seasons, and the solemn manner in which it was per- formed; insomuch that no person, however great, wise, or good, was deemed worthy to perform the priestly function, but the emperor himself, as we have elsewhere shewn[†].

To this we may add another equally antient and laudable custom of theirs in all public cala- mities, such as civil wars, pestilence, famine, great droughts, &c. of applying themselves in the humblest manner to the Supreme Being alone for relief; and returning their most solemn thanks to him alone, as soon as they had obtained it (I). How opposite was this to the prac- tice of all other nations, who, upon all such occasions, used to celebrate solemn festivals to their false deities, carry their images about in solemn processions, and ascribe the glory of all their blessings and deliverances to them!

It must be owned, indeed, that the Chinese were infected, like all the rest of Noah's poste- rity, with the superstitious contagion of the starry influence over all sublunary bodies, and from the earliest times directed most of their astronomical observations to that end: but there

^p Vid. Genes. vi. 5. [†] See JOSEPHUS Ant. lib. i. c. 5. ^q Genes. ix. 8—13. ^r See their Shu-king, CONFUCIUS's Morals, and other philosophical works. ^s See Genes. xiii. & seq. Josh. xxiv. 2. [†] See before, p. 582. See also vol. v. ii. p. 410, & alib. pass.

(I) We find accordingly, in the Chinese annals, many singular instances of their pious antient monarchs, who, in all such public calamities, went at the head of a numerous court, all dressed, as well as themselves, in the meanest garb, and other marks of the deepest humility and repentance, to intreat the Lord of heaven to avert his just judgments from them; and here the good monarchs, addressing themselves to that Supreme Being in the most humble and pathetic terms, earnestly be- sought him, that, if his anger and justice could not be otherwise appeased, he would let the effects thereof fall upon them alone; and that their lives might be accepted by him, as a propitiatory sacrifice for the rest of the nation. The blessing, once obtained, was celebrated with public and solemn thanks; to which those princes added vast donatives, and other immunities, to the poorer sort of their subjects, especially to such provin- ces as had been the greatest sufferers. We shall have occasion, in the sequel of this history, to give some re- markable instances of this singular piety, in which those monarchs, as high-priests of the whole nation, seem to have acted so very conformably to the office of the sa- crificature, both before and under the Jewish law, that we could not forbear taking particular notice of it.

a was still this difference between them, that whereas the other nations believed those heavenly bodies to be free and powerful agents, and applied to them as to the sole directors of all sublimary events, the Chinese looked upon them only as necessary agents, whose power and influence were impressed upon them by an almighty hand, who had still the supreme rule and government over them, and, as such, addressed themselves to him in all great emergencies, without the least regard to any of the starry tribe, which they believed to be no other than instruments in his over-uling hand^c. But how they came to judge and distinguish so justly of both, above all other nations, will be difficult to account for, unless we ascribe it to the singular care which their good old patriarch must be supposed to have taken to forewarn them against that dangerous error, which he so well knew had been the main cause of the destruction b of the old world, and of the fatal degeneracy of the new, and the chief motive of his withdrawing himself so far from them (K).

XII. THIS last consideration naturally leads us to a new and no less probable argument in favour of our hypothesis; namely, the excellency of the religion, laws, government, policy, morality, philosophy, &c. of the Chinese, above all other antient nations, even those which are allowed the most learned and polite; and consequently every way worthy of so divine a patriarch and lawgiver. This is indeed a point we could with pleasure dwell longer upon, had it not been already so learnedly displayed by much better pens, that it is now universally allowed by all sides; but, on that account, we shall content ourselves with referring our readers to the short sketch we have formerly given of them^d, and shall only add here a remark or two from the whole, which will still farther confirm it.

FIRST, then, it is well worth observing, that, among the sublime ideas which their canonical books give us of the Deity, beyond what is to be met with in the theology of other antient nations, it mentions, in particular, the care which the Divine Providence takes to forewarn mankind by signs, prodigies, and other awakening methods, of the impending judgments which are going to fall upon them, in order to excite them to avert the divine vengeance by all proper acts of repentance^e; which excellent notion, taken in its full extent, can hardly be supposed to have flowed from any other source than from the threatnings, warnings, and dreadful omens, which the good old patriarch had been a mournful witness to, during more than a whole century before the flood: for, though other heathenish nations not only looked upon all such dire prodigies, but even upon every uncommon phænomenon, to be the fore-runners of some public calamities, yet it doth not appear that they looked upon the former as directed by the divine goodness to forewarn mankind against the danger of the latter: much less did they entertain any notion of repentance being the only effectual means to avoid it; choosing rather to have recourse to such horrid rites and sacrifices, as were more likely to hasten than avert the impending judgment.

SECONDLY, We find that they had, among their most valuable records, some signal prophecies of the Messiah's being to appear in human flesh in some of the western parts of the world; and which were so plainly understood, so firmly believed, and so religiously preserved, that their great philosopher Confucius, who lived near 500 years before our Saviour, could point out the very year of their cycle, or sexagenary, in which he was to be born. And we are farther assured, that in that very year, which was that in which the world's Redeemer was born, the then reigning emperor Ngai (which name signifies victorious) exchanged it for that of Ping, peaceful, or pacific^f; from which we may reasonably infer, that they must have likewise

(K) If it should be asked, how so wise and good a man as he could suffer this favourite colony to intermix still with such sublime and just notions of the Supreme Being, so much of the astrological superstition, and did not rather endeavour to extirpate all the remains of that old antediluvian leaven? it may be answered, either that the notion of the influence of the stars on this lower world might not appear to him so false, absurd, and ill-grounded, as it is now commonly judged^{*}, nor in any other way dangerous, than as it excluded the belief of an over-uling Providence, which last he doubtless was careful to prevent both by his lessons and example; or else it may be reasonably enough supposed, that some of the seeds of that superstitious notion might be privately preserved by some of his people, and suffered to spread itself by degrees amongst the rest, unknown to him, or perhaps, more likely, against all his endeavours to suppress it; so bewitching was that belief, and still is among the greatest part of the world.

We have dwelt somewhat the longer on this subject of the astronomy and astrology of the antients, as it is a point which hath been but slightly, if at all, considered, either with respect to the inventors of it (the honour of it being generally given to the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Babylonians, &c. and by few, if any, to the antediluvians); or, secondly, with regard to the Chinese, so far as they have excelled all other antient nations in cultivating and improving it; nor, lastly, with respect to the proofs which might be, and which we hope we have, actually drawn from its universal conformity, of Noah being the Chinese Fo-hi; which we therefore flatter ourselves will be a sufficient excuse for the extraordinary length of this article; we shall endeavour to be more succinct in those that follow.

had some clear notion of the character, and peaceable reign, of that divine person; and it was from a firm persuasion of this prophecy that the philosopher above-mentioned used to comfort himself with the thoughts that the HOLY-ONE, as he styled him, was to come from, or to appear in, the west². But how the Chinese, of all the descendants of Noah, came to preserve such lively traces of the promised Messiah, when all the rest, and even the family of Shem, of whom he was to be born, hardly retained any notion, till he was more clearly revealed to Abraham and his posterity, can no otherwise be accounted for, than by supposing that Noah left some authentic records of it among them, and that Confucius had been sufficiently conversant with them as to be able to find out the year in which he was to be born, and the part of the world where he was to make his appearance. If it be asked, how even Noah could so exactly know the time of his birth, whilst the latter Jews, who had much clearer revelations concerning it, and we may add the Christians too, are at such variance about it? The answer is easy, there being a constant tradition in Noah's family, as well before as after the flood, that Christ was to be born either at the very close of the fourth, or the entrance of the fifth, millenary (L); so that the difficulty among the Christians and Jews, about settling that remarkable period, proceeds merely from the difference of their chronologies with respect to the age of the world, of which we have given an ample specimen at the beginning of our Antient History[†]. If, therefore, the Chinese could so exactly point out that remarkable epocha, and fix the end of the fourth millenary so rightly, all that can be inferred from it is, that they have preserved their records more carefully, and in greater purity, at least from the creation to the birth of Christ, than any other nation we know of, whatever corruption they may have been suffered since to undergo, either to make them tally more exactly with the septuagint chronology, or to give the Chinese nation a greater antiquity: for it is hardly to be supposed they could have any other rule to fix that epocha by, but the tradition in that patriarch's family, of Christ appearing in our flesh at the end of the fourth millenary; and since, as it plainly appears that he was born exactly at that year, according to our Hebrew chronology; and that, in the very same year, the then reigning monarch did, out of regard to his character, exchange his name of victorious into that of pacific; we cannot but look upon this as a strong presumption that the Chinese chronology would be found more exact, and agreeable to our Hebrew, if it had not been lengthened and disfigured, to answer some of the sinister ends above-mentioned. This is not, however, the only proof we have to offer on that head, though the properest place in which it could be mentioned. The remainder, which we hope will be allowed of much greater weight and authority, will be better reserved for a subsequent article; in which we shall display such farther harmony between the Chinese and Hebrew chronology, from some authentic facts recorded in both, as will at once make them reflect a mutual and surprising evidence on each other, discover the fallacy of the pretended Chinese antiquity, and of its boasted agreement with the septuagint, and enable us to fix the beginning of their monarchy upon a more rational and authentic foundation than any hitherto extant.

Noah being their founder.

BUT, before we dismiss the topic of their excellent religion, laws, &c. we beg leave to observe how inconsistent the supposition of its having been founded by some of the more remote descendants of Noah must appear, to any unbiassed reader, with that purity of their antient worship and doctrine, which displayed itself so wonderfully from the earliest times, whilst all other nations were sunk into the lowest kind of idolatry, the most unnatural and inhuman rites, and scarcely retained the least awe or notion of a supreme and over-ruling power. If Noah must not be allowed to have gone into China, but to have settled any-where else amongst his other descendants, how comes it that neither the excellency of his doctrine as a preacher of righteousness, nor his authority as their common parent, could preserve them from the general corruption and degeneracy in theory and practice? And how can a few late stragglers, who, by gradual and long-continued migrations, searched for new settlements, be supposed to have been the only ones who preserved their faith and manners so long incorrupt, and lived in a manner the most agreeable to all the precepts and example that such an holy patriarch could have given

(L) This tradition, which is affirmed by the Jews to be as antient as the promise made to Adam after the fall (9), is founded on the creation being finished in six days, and God resting on the seventh; from which, computing a day for a thousand years (10), they concluded that the world would last 7000 years, that is,

2000 before the law, 2000 under the law, and 2000 under the Messiah, after which was to follow his glorious and universal reign of 1000 years, styled by them the great sabbath, and by the Christians the millennium, of which we have given an account in the Antient History of the Jews (11).

a them, had they been under his immediate care and government * ? Is it not more rational to think that they received their religion, laws, philosophy, morality, learning, and way of life, from him ; and that it was their deep regard to his authority that influenced this people to observe them with that constant tenaciousness, which they have ever since maintained ? whilst all his other descendants (the Egyptians, Babylonians, Chaldeans, Celts, Scythians, &c. down to the Greeks and Romans), chusing rather to be guided by what they called the light, though too often more truly the corrupt appetites, of nature, than by his excellent maxims and authority, gradually sunk into the most extravagant follies, monstrous impieties, and inhuman rites and superstitions, as every reader may see by the account we have formerly given of the religion and customs of those antient nations, in each of their respective histories : but it is time
b now to pass on to some other arguments.

XIII. THE Chinese records ascribe the invention of their antient characters, of which we have formerly given an account ^a, to Fo-bi, and his immediate successors ; and we have lately observed, that the antediluvians could not but be possessed of some such way of preserving and imparting their knowledge, of which Noah, apprised as he was so long before of the approaching deluge, and of his being designed to repeople the new world, must be supposed to have made the best collection. But as those characters, whatever they were, could not prove sufficient to answer all the variety of ideas which he had acquired by the different scenes which the new world continually offered to his observation after the flood, he must of course be under a necessity of inventing some new ones answerable to them. And hence probably proceeded both the primitive similitude, and the accidental difference, between those of the antient Chinese and Egyptians, the two most distant nations, not only in point of situation, but likewise with respect to their religion, learning, &c. whilst the descendants of Shem and Japhet seem to have wholly neglected that useful art ; at least it doth not appear that they had it among them till the use of letters was divinely revealed to Moses. However, as to those antient characters, or hieroglyphics, there can be no doubt but that the vast alterations which were made on the new world must have required a fresh supply of them ; and who could be fitter for such a task than Noah, who was so well acquainted with the old ones ? on which account he might easily enough be styled the inventor of the whole ; and it cannot be denied that those ascribed to Fo-bi bear the undoubted marks of a primitive and original one.

d If, upon the whole, therefore, Fo-bi and Noah can be shewed to be coeval, the invention of those characters will still add to the probability of their being the same person, only under two different names ; and at the same time account for the singular and even religious regard which the Chinese have ever paid to that way of writing, since, in that case, they could not but look on the author of it as a person divinely inspired.

XIV. AND hence may also have proceeded that surprising zeal, and tenacious fondness, they have always retained, above all other nations, not only for their religion, laws, discipline, &c. but likewise for their antient customs relating to education, behaviour, dress, eating, drinking, conversation, ceremony, œconomy, and the like : for it is plain that they look upon all the maxims and rules concerning every one of them to be plainly either expressed or implied in their canonical books, which they esteem to be of divine authority ; inasmuch that their monarchs thought themselves indispensably bound to observe them ; and those are most celebrated in their annals, who paid the greatest regard to them. And under this head may we not justly insist upon that singular and extraordinary respect which we have elsewhere observed is paid by the whole nation, from the highest to the lowest rank, by children to their parents ? This is indeed one of the duties they most strenuously insisted upon in their canonical and other philosophical writings ; and the unparalleled instances we have formerly given of its strict observance, fully shew to what a height they have carried it above all other people we now read of : but, whether in this, or in all other respects above-mentioned, how can it be supposed that a less authority than that of the good old patriarch, joined to a deeply-rooted consciousness of the efficacy of parental blessing or cursing, such as they had seen a remarkable instance of in the case of one of his three sons, could have ever enforced such a religious and indelible sanction on all his institutes, and inspired a whole nation with so lasting a regard to them, as even to despise and hate all the rest of the world for not observing them ?

XV. The same may be urged with relation to their agriculture, the invention of which they ascribe to the same Fo-bi, as Moses doth to the patriarch Noah soon after the flood ^b. From the words, indeed, of the sacred historian (and Noah began to be an husbandman, or, as the original imports, began his first essays in husbandry) we may reasonably infer, that the antediluvians were not much versed in it ; and therefore his first attempts seem to have been only of the rude and common kind, as planting, sowing, &c. : but, by that time he had travelled through so many different climates, and variety of soils, in his slow and gradual migrations towards the east, he might become so perfect a master of it, as to be able to leave his descendants such useful rules and observations, as might justly intitle him to the honour of being the inventor of it.

No-where

ed and im-

Their monarchs obliged to exercise it.

IN the like manner the Chinese records tell us, that Fo bi left some such excellent directions to his successors, for the encouragement and improvement of it; and that they proved such diligent and strenuous observers of them, that they enacted sundry laws, and caused divers treatises to be written, for the promoting and endearing it to all their subjects. And the reader may judge, by the description we have given of that whole country in a former section, to what a degree of perfection their genius and indefatigable industry have since raised it; insomuch that no nation under the sun ever cultivated it to better advantage, or gave greater encouragement to it, than this. We shall only add, that even their greatest monarchs are not exempted by their laws from putting their hands to the plough; but, over and above the many immunities, and other favours, they are under a necessity of granting to the husbandmen, in times of drought, famine, and the like, are obliged, at some particular seasons of the year, and more especially soon after their accession to the throne, to divest themselves of the imperial grandeur, and, in the homeliest rural garb, to perform some of the lowest exercises in agriculture, as we have elsewhere shewn^c: so that, upon the whole, as no nation ever more closely followed the steps of the first postdiluvian patriarch than this, it can hardly be supposed that a less authority than his could have enforced so strict and long an observation of those laws which are there enacted in favour of that most useful art^d.

The forbidding the use of wine another argument.

XVI. THE subject of agriculture naturally leads us to another argument on this head; viz. that the Chinese are the only people that we know of, before Mohammed's time, that ever interdicted the use of wine, or ever so religiously abstained from it, from the earliest date of their monarchy down almost to their late conquest by the Tartars^e. This singularity hath indeed been urged by the opposite side as an argument that Noah never set his foot in the Chinese territories; since this branch of husbandry is there wanting, which that patriarch is recorded to have made one of his first essays^f: but how justly or judiciously, let the reader judge. Noah, whilst yet with his sons, planted a vineyard; and being at that time, as is most likely, quite unacquainted with the strange effects of its juice, drank so plentifully of it, that it threw him into a deep sleep, in which he lay with his body so exposed, that two of his sons were put to no small difficulty to cover him with a truly filial decency; whilst his third had a most dreadful curse pronounced on him and his posterity, for exposing him^g. If, therefore, there had not been one single vine growing in the whole Chinese empire, could a better reason be given or imagined, why the good old patriarch would not suffer such a dangerous plant to be propagated within his dominions, than the disaster which befel him by it, let it have been of what nature it would^h. Could he express his displeasure at it in a stronger manner, than by the blessings he bestowed on the two former, and the curse he vented against the latter? or could any thing be a stronger motive for his interdicting the use of that dangerous liquor to his descendants, though Moses hath not taken any notice of it? And indeed to what purpose would it have been for him to have mentioned it, when he so well knew that all the rest of the world, his own kindred not excepted, shewed so little regard for it, and the Chinese alone were the only people that paid a due and strict obedience to it? But, what still more redounds to their honour, and confirms our hypothesis, is, that vines are as much cultivated among them as in any other nation, whatever be pretended to the contrary by the opposite side, and afford as great a variety of the finest grapes (M), which they content themselves with eating either ripe or dried, and only abstain from the juice of them.

The Chinese
vessels made

XVII. THE Chinese are the only people that we know of in the whole world, excepting the Japanese (who have taken it from them), who, in the structure and dimensions of their trading and other vessels of burden, have retained the original model of the ark. 1. They allow them six breadths to their length, which Moses tells us was exactly the proportion of Noah's ark^b; whereas other nations allow theirs only three breadths, except only in some

(M) We are told accordingly by Martini, Smedo, Nicuboff, and others, that the provinces of Shan-si and Shen-si are famed for the beauty and sweetness of their grapes; and those are more particularly celebrated which grow in the neighbourhood of the city of Ping-yang, where Yau, their eighth emperor, and great promoter of agriculture, who was a great lover of them, did, on that account, chuse to reside. Since, therefore, the Chinese allow themselves the use of other exhilarating and intoxicating liquors, which are neither so palatable, nor so easily made, it will be hard to account for their abstaining from such fine wines, as they might express out of their noble grapes, if it be not done upon some such religious account as we have been speaking of.

a small canoes. 2. They build them flat on the head, stern, and bottom; whereas all other nations have them sharp. 3. They commonly give them three tiers, or storeys, one over the other, and each of them parted by long galleries reaching almost from end to end, and subdivided into smaller apartments of different sizes: some for stowage of merchandizes, provisions. &c. and others for lodgings for passengers, and those that belong to the vessel; all which is likewise exactly according to the structure of the ark, and quite different from all other nations. This cannot but be allowed to be very singular; and, though we will not enter into a needless contest, about which of the two methods be most preferable, or best contrived, either for safety, expedition, or for carrying the greatest burdens; but readily own, that the latter is an improvement of the former; yet will it then be still more hard to conceive how the Chinese, who are in no way inferior to any other nation in ingenuity, and have moreover been inured to the maritime trade from the earliest ages of their monarchy, came to give all along the preference to their old way of building, unless we suppose it to be out of a singular respect they ever paid to the divine model above-mentioned, and to the venerable builder of it (N).

XVIII. To all the topics lately urged from the extraordinary regard they paid to every thing which they thought to be derived to them from their worthy founder, we may add the sacred antiquity and authority which their philosophers and Literati have always attributed to their Schu-king, and other canonical books, as well as to their other antient records, above all other nations. Of this we need no greater proof than, 1st, The many comments which have been written on them, and the high encomiums they have bestowed on their authors, whom they esteemed as men inspired by heaven, and endowed with a divine character and authority. 2. The great veneration that is paid by the learned to their commentators and expositors, such as Mencius, Confucius, and others. And, 3dly, the generous use they have always made of those books and comments, for the good and instruction of the people; and that most justly too, since there is nothing to be found in them but what plainly leads their readers to their original fountain the great Fo-hi, and his immediate successors, without the usual parade of any such obscure, remote, and incredible antiquity as we meet with in those of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and other antient nations: neither did they contain any thing but what was conducive to make men wiser and better, in proportion to their being conversant with them. It is therefore no wonder if, instead of secreting them from public view, and locking them up as the great arcana of their religion and government, as was done every-where else, they esteemed it their duty and glory to publish and explain them to all who had capacity or inclination to dive into them; rightly judging, that that was the most effectual way to preserve to those antient writings the veneration they so justly deserved; and to prevent at the same time their being abused and corrupted by designing men, as those commonly are most liable to be, which are purposely kept from public sight, and can only be admired by the ignorant.

XIX. To what hath been urged under the last head, some seemingly considerable objections have been started, which we shall now endeavour to clear up under this.

1. It is pretended, that there are many false and fabulous things inserted in the six or seven first reigns, which quite destroy their authority; and that the length which is allowed to them in their annals is very much disputed, nay discredited, by the most judicious writers, and even by those of that nation. To the first of these it may be easily answered, that there hath been scarcely any antient people under the sun that have not had something in their origin, and first beginnings, which hath the air and appearance of fable, but which would carry a quite different aspect, were we better acquainted with their mythology, antiquities,

(N) In speaking of that surprising structure, we know not whether we may not add another Chinese custom, which seems very probably to have taken its rise from it; viz. their famed festival of lights or lanterns, of which we have taken notice in a former section †, as having been observed throughout the whole empire from time immemorial, and with the greatest pomp and solemnity. We have there shewn what a lame and uncertain account some of their writers give of its origin and institutor; but which is so unsuitable and unworthy of the solemnity and grandeur with which it is kept, that the wiser sort justly look upon it as ridiculous, though they cannot substitute a better for it.

May we not therefore more reasonably conjecture it to have been instituted, from the very beginning of that monarchy, in memory of the many lamps with which the good patriarch was obliged to enlighten his gloomy habitation, during the twelve melancholy months of his confinement in it? And may not those shews which we observed are exhibited in some of those large lanterns by puppets, and other machinery, have been originally designed to represent some of the scenes of that dreadful transaction, such as his conveying all the living creatures into the ark, feeding them there, his coming out with them, his first sacrifices to God, and the like; the remembrance of all which, by length of time, became obliterated, as well as the reason of the institution of that pompous festival: but these conjectures we submit to the reader, only as being at least more probable than any which have been hitherto offered concerning it.

idiom, characters, and other the like particulars; so that all this pretended series of fables a may, for aught that appears to the contrary, be intirely owing to mistake and ignorance, and that in no case more probably than with relation to the Chinese, whose original character, language, &c. were understood by so few of their learned, and so liable to be misunderstood. And as to the length of the first reigns above-mentioned, though they are allowed to be much questioned, or even discredited, by the partisans of the septuagint chronology, or even by some of the Chinese writers, out of an affectation of a greater antiquity; yet if we can prove, from good authority, that those which have intervened between Fo-hi and Yau do as exactly tally, as any thing of that nature can do, with the coeval generations recorded by Moses between Noah and Joshua, whom we shall likewise prove to have been coteremporary with Fo-hi and Yau, according to our Hebrew chronology, it is to be hoped b that this will be looked upon not only as a sufficient answer to the objection above-mentioned, but likewise as no small confirmation of the Chinese annals, so far as relates to the length of those reigns; especially as nothing material hath been hitherto urged against it, except its disagreement with the septuagint, and Chinese chronology; according to which, that of all the subsequent dynasties and monarchies is calculated and determined, or rather hath been stretched out and lengthened at pleasure, as will be more clearly seen in the sequel.

HOWEVER, abating that one point, in which, to reconcile two chronologies together, they have been forced to spin out the period between the reign of Yau and the birth of Christ, by near 900 years above what our Hebrew makes it, there can hardly be any question, but in all other respects the history is as exact, faithful, and well compiled, as any extant; and c more particularly so with relation to the series of dynasties, the names, successions, and exploits, of each royal family, and respective reign, as Du Halde hath lately shewn^k; and if, in this last respect, it be confessed to be less copious and particular than those of some other nations, it will also be found less fabulous, and consequently more to be depended upon, than they, as we shall shew in the sequel.

Not the scarcity of facts, and other materials.

BUT to this two things are objected, which seem to carry some weight; viz. that their great Confucius, who is said to have lived about 500 years before our Saviour, complained much of the great scarcity of materials then to be found towards compiling such a history as might be worthy to be transmitted to posterity; insomuch that he was forced to content himself with these few observations on some extraordinary phænomena, and such other d common events as he could find upon record, instead of the illustrious achievements with which he would much rather have chosen to have embellished the reigns of those antient monarchs, had any such been transmitted down to his time. Well, be it so; can the sterility of those old records destroy the credit of those facts which they take particular notice of? Is it not rather a mark of their faithfulness, that they transmit nothing to us that might be liable to be questioned? The characters and exploits of those antient monarchs might have been as too commonly is the case, greatly exaggerated in their favour; whereas such uncommon phænomena as are there recorded, and could be observed by the whole nation, and more safely relied were upon, things which they justly thought more worthy to be transmitted to posterity. We shall have occasion, under our next head, to instance f in one or two particulars, which will sufficiently shew how curious, exact, and just, they were in observing and recording such kinds of remarkable events, whilst they appeared to have been quite negligent of others, which we should judge more weighty and proper for a national history.

All the antient records pretended to have been destroy'd by Shi-whang-ti.

BUT, 2dly, the universal destruction which Shi-whang-ti caused to be made of all the Chinese books and writings which related to history, or any other science, except law and physics, is here objected against the credit of all their antient records; and from this general havock, which happened, according to their chronology, about 213 years before the birth of Christ, they infer that little else could be recovered but some scraps and fragments, which were so liable to be mangled and corrupted by the collectors, that no credit can be safely g given to, or dependence had upon, them; insomuch, that these hypercritics much question whether any of those editions of them, which were since published, bear any resemblance to their prototypes; though the Chinese annals assure us, that Vu-ti, a wise and excellent successor of the tyrant above-mentioned, caused them to be every-where sought for, and written anew, within little more than seventy-three years after, and to be taught in all the academies of the empire¹. To which it may therefore be justly answered, that it is absurd to suppose that such an universal destruction of books so highly esteemed, could ever reach through every part of so extensive an empire, let the tyrant's authority have been ever so great, or his edict ever so severely executed.

That destruction could not be universal.

a THE Shu-king, and other canonical books, as well as the writings of Mencius, Confucius, and other great philosophers, were held in too great esteem, to be supposed to have been thus tamely given up to the flames, in every province, and by every owner of them. It is much more reasonable to think, from the short space of time it took up to have the greatest part of them re-published, and dispersed, that a good number of copies were preserved intire, either in some of the remotest provinces, or, at least, in some of those petty kingdoms, which were only tributary to, or independent on, him. Much more unlikely is it, that the many other kingdoms without the limits of the empire, some of which were very considerable, and among whom those venerable writings were held in equal esteem, should all thus basely join in so execrable a design. Sbi-whan-ti's whole reign, which lasted thirty-three years, could hardly have sufficed for the discovery of such a vast number of volumes, scattered far and near, without, as well as within, his dominions, much less to have forced them out of their owners hands; how much more so, if we consider that his edict did not come out till the latter end of his reign, as will be seen in the sequel? Let it then be but supposed, that two or three authentic copies were preserved intire, either within or without his empire, and afterwards purchased by Vu-ti, would they not have been sufficient not only to have supplied the empire with a speedy and copious sett of new ones, but likewise to have prevented their being mutilated or corrupted by the transcribers of them (N)?

b Thus far then we may fairly conclude, that neither of the two above-mentioned objections, plausible as they may appear at first, can be of weight sufficient to invalidate the authority of those canonical and other valuable books, much less the credit of the antient history, which, abating some few seeming exaggerated encomiums on their founder, and his three or four next successors, contain little else than an account of some preternatural or remarkable events, which are recorded to have happened in the subsequent reigns; and from which we can only infer, that the writers were more diligent in observing, and transmitting, such uncommon things, than curious to enrich their histories with the exploits, whether real or fabulous, of their antient monarchs. All those books recovered from obscurity.

c AMONGST that number, we have ventured to rank that remarkable record concerning Christ, and the year, and part of the world, he was born in; for it cannot hardly be supposed, that Confucius had it by immediate inspiration, which he doth not appear ever to have pretended to, but to have repeated it frequently, as a comfortable promise, handed down to, and well understood by, all the learned of his nation, both before and after him, as may be plainly inferred, from what we lately observed of the reigning monarch, at the time of Christ's birth, changing his name; and from what we have formerly mentioned, of the Emperor Ming-ti's fruitless embassy into India, in search of that holy and miraculous person*, about sixty-four years after. If therefore we suppose Fo-bi to have been posterior to Noah, it cannot but appear very probable, that he received that noble prophecy from him, as a matter of the highest importance, and worthy to be transmitted, as it really was, with the greatest care, to all his descendants, down even beyond the Christian æra. But, if it be proved, by an authentic fact recorded in the Chinese annals, and confirmed by the authority of the Old Testament, and the Hebrew Chronology, that those two were cotemporary, and consequently, from all that hath hitherto been urged, were most probably one and the same person, under different names, then may we reasonably hope, that all this united evidence will appear to every unbiassed reader, not only to amount to something more than a bare probability of Noah's being the founder of the Chinese monarchy, but likewise to afford us a much firmer footing for settling the beginning of it, than any that hath hitherto been offered, or thought upon: and that is what we shall now, God willing, endeavour to do, under the following head, with which we shall conclude this section. Confucius's remarkable prophecy of Christ.

d XX. THE fact on which we design to fix the main basis of the foundation of the Chinese monarchy, and antient chronology, is that surprising one recorded in their annals to have happened some time within the reign of Yau, their seventh monarch from Fo-bi, in words Noah and Fo-bi proved, from an authentic fact, to have been cotemporary.

* See before, p. 561, & (G). & 666, & seq.

(N) With respect to the canonical Shu-king, and its recovery, their records mention the following remarkable circumstance: that an old man, named O-wo-feng, who was still alive when the search was made after the lost books, did boast of having that one intirely by heart; upon which he was immediately ordered to pen it down, according to the best of his memory. He did so; and, upon its being afterwards compared with the original, newly recovered, they were found to agree in every thing, except in some few words, which, nevertheless, made no difference in the sense (1). We are told by the same author, that the five books called King had been recovered, together with the writings of Confucius and Mencius, so soon as the reign of Hiao-king, Ven-ti's successor, and were all published afresh in that of Hia-ou, about seventy-five years after the burning of the old ones. We omit some other frivolous objections urged against the authenticity of these new books, by some members of the French academy, and which the reader will find fully answered by the author last quoted, in his letter to them on that subject (2).

to this effect, that the sun did not go down during the space of ten days^m; and which, compared with that miraculous one mentioned in the book of *Joshua*ⁿ, will, we hope, be made evidently to appear to be, in all respects (excepting the length of its duration, which will be easily accounted for in the sequel), the very same, if it can but be fairly proved from the Chinese, as well as the Hebrew chronology, that that monarch, and the Jewish general above-named, were cotemporary. It is true, indeed, that this supernatural event, as it is related in the Chinese annals of that prince, hath been singled out, by some of the opposite side, to ridicule the vanity of their observations, and expose the pretended falshood of their antient records°. Nevertheless, since the miraculous phænomenon recorded in the book of Joshua, hath been so fully proved, from the express words of the sacred historian, and other corroborating arguments, to have been (not such an uncommon luor, mock-sun, lucid cloud, or aurora borealis, as Maimonides, Spinoza, among the Jews; Grotius, Le Clerk, and others, among the christians; have endeavoured to represent it, but) a real and supernatural solstice, obtained by the prayer of the Jewish hero^p; and which must of consequence have been equally observable in all those eastern parts, where that luminary had only passed their meridian some few hours. If it can be made to appear, from the joint testimony of the two chronologies above-mentioned, to have happened much about the same time, or, which is tantamount to it, that the distance of time between Noah and Joshua is much the same with that which the Chinese records put between Fo-hi and Yau, we may justly hope, that the mutual light and evidence which those two histories reflect on each other, will be allowed to carry a much better authority for our producing that extraordinary phænomenon in favour of our hypothesis, than any thing that hath been hitherto urged by the opposite side can do, to explode and ridicule it.

The miraculous solstice in Joshua's time the same with that recorded in Yau's reign. The length of the period between Noah and Joshua, and between Fo-hi and Yau, near the same.

Now, the remarkable phænomenon recorded by Joshua, happened, according to the Hebrew chronology, in the year before Christ 1451, and of the flood 897; of these, Noah lived 350^q; so that there elapsed only 547 years between that patriarch's death and Joshua's solstice. Within which period, Moses reckons seven generations; that is, from Abraham, who according to Archbishop Usher, was born two years after Noah's death, and Joshua exclusive: viz. 1. Abraham; 2. Isaac; 3. Jacob; 4. Levi; 5. Kobath; 6. Amram; and 7. Moses, Joshua's immediate predecessor. Just in the same manner the Chinese annals reckon seven reigns between Fo-hi and Yau, inclusive; viz. about the latter end of whose reign, the same phænomenon was observed in China. These, with the length of their respective reigns, are set down as follows:

	Reigned years.
1. Shin-nong , alias Xin-nung	140
2. Whang-ti , alias Hoang-ti	100
3. Shau-bau , alias Xao-bau	84
4. Chwen-hyo , alias Chuen-bius	78
5. Ti-ko , alias Cous	70
6. Chi	8
	480

AND 7. Yau, in some year of whose reign, the annalist doth not say which, the same phænomenon was observed in China.

Both from the Chinese and Hebrew chronology.

ALL these reigns added together, amount to 480 years; which period falling short of the 597 years, which elapsed from Noah to Joshua, by seventy years, doth naturally lead us to conclude, that the solstice happened in the 67th year of that monarch's reign; which being but the first of the administration of Joshua, brings the number of these reigns, and of the Mosaic generations above-mentioned, much upon an equality as to number and duration. So that, by this time, the reader may easily perceive the motives which have induced the sticklers for the Septuagint, and such of the Chinese writers as were ambitious to raise the antiquity of their nation beyond its true bounds, to complain of the uncertainty and brevity of this period, and to cry down the annals of it, as of no authority: and all that needs to surprise us is, that they have not taken the same pains to stretch it, as they have done that from Yau to the birth of Christ, to the exact standard of that chronology. But, it is likely, they never took notice how exactly it coincided with that of the Hebrew, and therefore contented themselves with condemning it, in the whole, as dark, uncertain, and not to a be depended upon, if it was not rather some judicial infatuation, that made them overlook so material a point. For nothing can more clearly shew the imposture of this new-invented chronology, than the singular agreement above-observed of the antient Chinese chronology, and our Hebrew one, with respect to the number and length of those generations and reigns, and its vast disagreement from thence downwards to the birth of Christ.

b Be that as it will, it is still well for us, that we have the length of those reigns conveyed by one of those particulars, and who cannot therefore be suspected of having altered any thing in them, but must be reasonably supposed to have faithfully copied them, as he found them in the Chinese records, and as he himself assures us he did. Neither can it, with any reason, be supposed, that either he, or any of his fraternity, would have transmitted to us such a supernatural event, as that we have been insisting upon under this head, unless it had been thus circumstantially mentioned in some of those authentic records they were allowed to consult, since such an imposture could not serve any other visible end, except, perhaps, that of corroborating the evidence of Joshua's miracle; and that could not be done, but at the expence and overthrow of their chronology.

c For, if the solstice mentioned in Joshua, and in the Chinese annals, be allowed to be the same, it must follow, from the list of those reigns we have given above, as well as from the authority of the Hebrew chronology, that the Emperor Yau, in whose reign it happened, must have ascended the throne in the year of the flood 830, or 1519 years before the birth of Christ; whereas the Chinese and Septuagint chronology place the commencement of his reign in the year 2357, or, according to Du Halde, 2327, before Christ; making it thereby, the one 896, and the other 906, years older than the Hebrew, or indeed than it ever can be proved to be by any other evidence, than the precarious authority of the two chronologies above-mentioned, and the pretended calculation of a few eclipses to corroborate them; all which have been so fully exploded by this time, and by much better pens, that it were needless to say any more on that subject.

d HOWEVER, the fixing the basis of the Chinese chronology on the year of this miraculous solstice, and the authority of our Hebrew, will (besides the evidence it bears against that of the Septuagint) prove of twofold benefit; viz. First, As it will bring down the reign of Yau much nearer to the times in which Fouquet, Maigrot, Fourmond, and other learned moderns, have endeavoured to fix it, and upon a much more unquestionable authority than hath been hitherto offered by any of them. And, secondly, It will, by the help of the table of the seven first emperors above-mentioned, enable us to trace that monarchy back to its very foundation, and settle the beginning of it upon a surer footing than any hitherto attempted. For if Noah or Fo-bi reigned there 115 years, and his six immediate successors 480, and if the solstice happened in the sixty-seventh year of Yau's reign, all which make up 662 years, it will bring back the first year of that founder's reign to that of the flood 235, and 2114 years before the birth of Christ; to all which may be added, that as he is recorded to have lived 350 years after the flood, if he separated himself, as it is probable he did, from his rebellious offspring, about the time of their defection and conspiracy in the plain of Shinaar, which happened, as near as can be conjectured, about the seventieth or eightieth year after, or a few years before the building of the tower of Babel, it will follow, that he spent very near 200 years in his migration from that place to the Chinese territories, and settling his colony there, before he became their monarch, and laid the foundation of that empire. So that the whole chronology of Noah, and his descendants, from the flood to the year of the solstice, or sixty-seventh of Yau's reign, may be clearly stated; as follows:

	Year of the flood.	Christ.
1. Noah , called by the Chinese , Fo-bi , justly offended at the impiety of his rebel-offspring, separated himself from them a little before the building of the tower of Babel ; and, steering his course eastwards, at the head of a select number of adherents, after 200 years peregrination, settled himself, and them, in one of the northern provinces of China — — — — —	235	2114
Here, having settled his colony, and established among them the religion, laws, and government, and imparted to them all the branches of learning which he had received from his antediluvian ancestors ^b , he died, in the 115th year of his reign, and 950th of his life ^c , and was succeeded by	350	1999
2. Shin-nong , alias Xin-nung , who greatly improved those arts and sciences left behind by Noah ; and, after a reign of 140 years, left the crown to ^d — — — — —	490	1589

a vertical sun, and almost as mountainous and woody, could escape the like disaster? it hath been already answered, in the antient Jewish history, that it might easily do so by the friendly interposition of thick heavy clouds, loaded with rain and hail, brought thither by the same Divine Providence which conducted the whole miraculous transaction^m; and accordingly we read, that such vast showers of the latter fell upon the Canaanitish army, as annoyed them more than the weapons of their enemiesⁿ.

There remains now only that we endeavour, according to our promise, to account for the difference between the sacred and Chinese historian with respect to the duration of the solstice in question; the former affirming it to have lasted no longer than one natural day, or 24 hours, over and above the time that had elapsed from sun rising to the mid-day, when it began; and the latter having lengthened it to 10 whole days. But, first, it will be here readily granted, that the great consternation which the Chinese were in might make the time appear much longer than it really was, especially as they had then no other way of measuring the day than by the course of that luminary. They might likewise compute its duration from the growth of some favourite plants or flowers, without considering that an extraordinary 24 hours sun might easily accelerate it into a tenfold proportion of a natural day. But, not to insist on that, it is well known that all nations in those remote times were wont to divide the day into equal portions, which they commonly called watches, or by equivalent names, consisting, with some, of two; with others, of three, or more hours. It is therefore very probable that the original records mentioned only ten watches; and that, in process of time (either through the carelessness of the transcribers, or the accidental erasure of a stroke or dot in the character or hieroglyphic which distinguished a watch from a day; or, which may be as likely as the other two, through a natural affectation, no less common to the Chinese than to the rest of the world, of magnifying the wonder), these 10 watches came to be changed into so many days. Thus far, then, any of those three ways will naturally enough account for the difference above-mentioned; but nothing can do so for such a supernatural phenomenon being thus circumstantially recorded in the Chinese annals, and under a reign so exactly coinciding with that of Josbna, according to the most authentic Hebrew chronology, unless we will allow it to be the same solstice that is mentioned in both records.

d By this time we may flatter ourselves that the notion of Noah's settling in China, and founding a monarchy there, will appear to every candid reader so far from absurd, monstrous, and contrary to the reason and nature of things, as some writers have thought fit to style it, that it may be fairly allowed to be consistent both with that and our Scripture account and chronology, how much soever it may clash against the septuagint, and some pretended calculations of eclipses of the Chinese missionaries; both which have been justly rejected by the most judicious writers of this century^o.

One objection, however, we must endeavour to clear up, before we close this section, as it has been so strenuously urged against our hypothesis; it is taken from the following words of Moses: These (that is, the descendants of Shem, Ham, and Japhet, and their descendants) are the families of the sons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations; and by these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood^p. From which it is concluded, that if the earth, certainly China, must have been peopled by some of those descendants, and not by Noah himself, much less by any new offspring he may have had since the deluge, of which Moses doth not make the least mention. The misfortune is, that those critics make no scruple to take the words the earth, or the whole earth, either in the most extensive, or in a more restrained signification, as best suits with their purpose. Noah might beget a new offspring after the flood, and with it people the empire of China; and that in no ways clash with the words of Moses above-quoted, who, by the earth, might intend no more than those families of whose various settlements he was then giving an account, without concerning himself farther about those who migrated towards China, the peopling of which, if he knew any thing of it, was quite foreign to his design. However, the reader may call to mind, by what hath been formerly said on that head, that this objection doth not at all concern our hypothesis, which only supposes Noah to have separated himself from the rest of his descendants at the land of Shinaar, the place of their conspiracy, and to have led with him as many as he could dissuade from joining with them in it. Children he probably had after the flood, as hath been already observed, but those might be but few in comparison of those who followed him into the east; so that Moses's words, the earth, may be still taken here in the largest sense, without glancing the least contradiction on our hypothesis, seeing China will be found to have been as effectually peopled by the descendants of Shem, Ham, and Japhet, as any other part of the globe.

How Moses could know the length of Noah's life.

If it should be asked, how Moses came in this case to know so exactly how long Noah lived after the flood? the most obvious answer is, That he might do so, as he did many other particulars relating to the creation, the antediluvian world, the deluge, &c. by immediate inspiration; it not being at all beneath the dignity of that sacred historian to take notice, that, the Divine Providence having determined to shorten the life of man, the patriarch Noah was the only one of all the postdiluvians who attained to the longevity of his antediluvian ancestors.

HOWEVER, setting aside inspiration, it is not at all improbable that he might learn that remarkable particular from the Midianites, among whom he had lived forty years, and the daughter of one of whose princes, or priests, he had married¹. Some of those sons of Abraham by Keturah, who were sent by him into the east², might by this time have advanced far enough towards China to have settled some commerce with it, by the help of those great caravans that were then much in vogue in all those eastern parts; and by that means have been informed of many curious things relating to that empire, among which none could better deserve their notice and observation than the name and extraordinary long life of its celebrated founder.

The impossibility of rectifying the Chinese chronology from Yau to Christ.

WE have now quite gone through all the topics we had to offer in favour of the hypothesis of Noah being the same with the Chinese Fo-bi, and the founder of that noble empire; and hope that by this time we have at least raised it to a greater degree of probability than it hath hitherto attained, as well as fixed its chronology upon a firmer basis than any yet attempted; by which means a way may be farther opened for greater improvements, and more curious discoveries. It were to be wished that the fixing the beginning of their monarchy, and of the reign of Yau, upon so authentic and unquestionable a fact as the miraculous solstice above-mentioned, and backing it with the authority of the Hebrew and antient Chinese chronology, could prove of still farther service to us in rectifying the remainder of that long period, from the reign of Yau to the birth of Christ. But that, we fear, will hardly ever be found practicable, till we can have recourse to more authentic records, if any such be still extant, than those which have been as yet transmitted to us by the Chinese missionaries, and on which the length of the dynasties and reigns manifestly appears to have been designedly stretched out beyond all due bounds in favour of the septuagint, and in order to fill up the extravagant excess of 900 years, which that chronology allows to this period above our Hebrew one; so that, upon the whole, our readers must be content to receive the list of the subsequent reigns from Yau to Christ on the same foot, in point of length, as those missionaries have been pleased to transmit it to us, and with the difference and disagreement which are still found between their several accounts of them.

Chinese cycles, how computed, and when invented.

THE Chinese reckon not their long periods by centuries, as we and other nations do, but by Kya-sees, or cycles of sixty years; the invention of which is attributed to one of their great mathematicians named Ta-nau, who was one of the chief ministers to the celebrated emperor Whang-ti. They style these cycles Lo-she-wha-kya, that is, the construction of sixty conversions†, or years (O). Nevertheless several learned moderns are of opinion, that this method of computing by cycles is of a much more recent date, though they own it to be next to impossible to ascertain the time of its invention: be that as it will, one of them rightly observes³, that there is some difference among the Chinese annalists about the commencement of that computation; some beginning it from the first year of Whang-ti's reign; agreeably to a Chinese treatise written on that subject; and others at the eighth year of it⁴. Du Halde differs still more from them, who begins his first cycle at the first year of the reign of Yau, by which he hath retrenched no less than five cycles and forty years from the Chinese chronology, and introduced thereby a double confusion into it; viz. first, by lessening the number of cycles; and, secondly, by dating his first from the first year of that monarch's reign, which falls on the 41st of the sixth cycle of the other chronologers; but as he plainly owns that he hath taken all that trouble merely to reconcile his own chronology to

The first cycle differently fixed in their and other annals.

(O) These cycles consist, on one side, of ten, and, on the other of twelve characters, importing the names of certain animals, and serve both for numbers and signs. The first ten are styled roots, and the others branches; so that every year is marked with one of each sort; and the whole is so contrived, that the same two signs never come together again till the sexagenary is out (4).

Ta-nau, the author of it, was one of the chief ministers of Whang-ti, and was appointed by that monarch to find out this sexagenary cycle, whilst the rest had likewise their respective provinces allotted to them, of which a fuller account will be given under that prince's reign (5).

- a that of the septuagint^w, we shall leave him to go on alone in his new track, in order to avoid leading our readers into the like perplexity; and follow that more plain and beaten one which Martini, and his predecessors, have trodden before; and in the subsequent chronology, and list of monarchs, begin the Chinese cycle at the first year of the emperor Wang-ti. In the like manner we shall set down in the margin the respective years of the cycle, in which any remarkable transaction happened, and in the same order as they have done. We shall, however, think ourselves obliged to dispense with adding to them the years of the flood; since their being calculated according to the septuagint, and not our Hebrew chronology, and consequently of no authority to us, would rather introduce a new confusion, without any possible use or benefit. As for those which follow the Christian æra, down to the end of their history, they being more consistent with it, and to be depended upon, we think they ought by no means to be omitted, and shall take care to set them down regularly as they come.

The reigns of the Chinese monarchs, from the foundation of their first dynasty, down to the birth of Christ.

- c HAVING endeavoured, in the foregoing section, to fix the foundation of the Chinese monarchy upon a better and surer foundation than any hitherto extant^a; and given an account, in our Antient History, of the reigns of Fo-bi, and his eight immediate successors^b, down to the beginning of their first dynasty, we shall readily excuse ourselves from repeating any thing that hath been said on that subject, except only what will be of farther use towards the fixing of that so much controverted epocha upon the same basis; and, for this, we need only remind our readers, that, as we endeavoured to trace the foregoing period upwards, from the preternatural solstice which is recorded in the Chinese annals to have happened some time in the reign of Yau; but which we endeavoured to fix, on the authority of the Hebrew chronology, to the 67th of that monarch's; so we may, with the same ease and clearness, fix the latter by the years that elapsed between the phænomenon above-mentioned, which was before Christ 1451^c, as follows:

Yau reigned in all 90 years (A), and therefore lived 23 years after the solstice, and died anno _____

His successor Shun reigned 50 years after Yau (B), and died anno _____ 1408

The first dynasty, called Hya, was founded in the year immediately following the death of Shun, or _____ 1358

- According to this computation, the beginning of this dynasty will be found to come short of the Chinese by no less than 850 years, according to Du Halde, who places it anno 2207 before Christ, and to carry it earlier by 936 years than Monf. Fourmont, who brings it down to the year 441, and consequently to be a kind of medium between those two extremes, and, as such, to be likewise more agreeable to the general opinion of the learned, who think the latter places his as much too low as the former do theirs too high. It will likewise have this farther advantage over them both, or indeed any other hitherto attempted, that it is founded on a more certain basis, the authority of the Hebrew chronology; whereas that of the Chinese is stretched beyond its due bounds, either out of affectation of a superior antiquity, or to bring it up to the standard of the septuagint; and the other is as unreasonably curtailed, upon no better ground than some uncertain conjectures, and a few vague and precarious parallels drawn from profane history; and all this not improbably from mere opposition to the Jesuitical writers, against whom some late French authors have been sanguine enough to say, that those six dynasties which preceded the Christian æra might be reduced to a much smaller number of years^d, that is, that six dynasties, containing the reigns of 111 monarchs, might be comprehended within a shorter space than 441 years; for so many the

(A) This is according to Martini (1), whom, for the reasons above-mentioned, we have chosen to follow, and who places his death on the 20th year of the 8th cycle (2), that is, according to the Chinese chronology, in the year before Christ 2258.

Du Halde, who hath introduced a new, or rather confused the old, order of the Chinese chronology, gives

Yau 100 years reign (3), which, if right, will only bring the foundation of this first dynasty ten years later, that is, in the year before Christ 1357.

(B) Both Martini and Du Halde allow him a reign of 50 years, that is, 33 by himself, and 17 with his worthy colleague Yu, whom he also appointed his successor (4).

Chinese records affirm to have belonged to those six dynasties, as the reader may see by the table we shall subjoin of them.

In the mean time, leaving these opponents to dispute that point among themselves, we may, we hope, safely appeal to every impartial reader, whether our calculations do not, by this time, appear the most rational, as well as the best founded. All we shall farther observe in its favour, from what hath been urged in the last section, is, that the period between Fo-hi and Yau, which, we are told, is given up by the Chinese historians, as well as by the Jesuits, as fabulous, or, at the best, as uncertain and indefensible, doth, by his surprising conformity to the length of the lives of the postdiluvian patriarchs mentioned by Moses, and coetaneous with it, bid fairest for being the most genuine and uncorrupt, and the most to be depended upon, of any that follow it, down to the birth of Christ: so that whatever alterations were afterwards made in the Chinese chronology, or, in other words, whatever number of years have been since added to the duration of the first six dynasties, in order to stretch them out to 2207 years, they must of course have been foisted into that period; whilst that which preceded it, from Yau upwards to Fo-hi, being given up as uncertain, if not fabulous, had the good fortune to escape their amendments. But as it is impossible to know or guess, until some more authentic annals can be produced, what addition of years hath been made to each of those six first dynasties, in order to stretch them to the length we find them in; so neither will it be expected that we should attempt any other emendation to the following tables according to Du Halde, than the fixing the year of the first dynasty according to the calculation we have given above: neither shall we attempt to alter the length of any of their reigns, which would be no less presumptuous than impossible, whatever other learned persons may venture to do, and large scope they may give to themselves in so dark and remote a province, of which those of Monf. Fourmont may serve for a taste to our readers; and whose tables we shall subjoin, opposite to those of the Chinese and Jesuits, out of Du Halde. As to the dynasties which follow the Christian æra, the reader will find less dissonance about them; and both joined together are as follows (C):

(C) As we have had occasion to mention, in a former volume, some modern, and, for the most part, short-lived dynasties of the same name with those antient ones, as Hya, Han, and which we are going to give in the following list, tho' not founded till some thousand years after them, that is, till the total dissolution of that of Ywen, or Mungl, in the year of Christ 1280; it will not be improper, in order to prevent all misapprehensions from the likeness of their names, to apprise our readers, that the founders of these modern ones meant no

a THIS dynasty begins, according to the Chinese annalists, on the 11th year of the 9th cycle, and with the reign of the emperor Yu, surnamed Ta, or the Great, who, as we have seen in their antient history, was preferred to the throne by Shun, their ninth monarch from Fo-bi, on account of great merit, before any of his own family^k; on which account one of his sons attempted to raise a revolt against him, but without success, he being abandoned by the grandees and the common people. His singular merit not only kept him firm on the throne, but made that, as well as the high-priesthood, which had been before united to the crown, to become both hereditary in his family; since which time it was made death by the law for any but the emperor to offer sacrifice.

b YU-TA was a very just and mild prince, always open to the advice of his ministers; and devised a most extraordinary way of giving all his subjects a free access to his person, whether to obtain justice or favour from him, or prefer a complaint against any of his officers (E); and is reported to have risen often from his table, or left his bath, or other amusements, to hear the grievances of his people. The book Shu-king mentions several of his noble instructions to princes, and other wise sayings. It was under his reign that I-tse invented the Chinese wine made of rice, elsewhere described^l; which the emperor no sooner had tasted, than he foretold the mischiefs which that pernicious liquor would cause not only to the empire, but likewise to his family; in both which he proved but too true a prophet: though, to prevent either as much as possible, he caused a law to be enacted, expressly forbidding the making and drinking of that liquor, under the severest penalties. But, as the art of making it could not be banished with its author, it was not long before the liquor became in vogue, and is still one of the greatest delicacies at the tables of the Chinese, as we have elsewhere shewn^m.

YU-TA was a great master of astronomy, astrology, and agriculture; and wrote an excellent treatise on the latter, in which he taught his subjects how to improve their own lands, by manuring, raising, and levelling them, and particularly by opening a course to the waters, to make them flow from the grounds which had too much, or lay under them, into those that wanted them. He reigned seventeen years with Shun, who had raised him to the throne, and ten by himself, and died greatly regretted by all his subjectsⁿ.

no more by it than to dignify these their respective new dynasties by the name or title of some of the most considerable among the antient ones: and accordingly one styled his own the dynasty of Han (5); another his by that of Hya (6), &c. and got them enrolled under those names in the Chinese annals, tho' they were all obliged to give place to that of Ming; so that, in fact, there have been no more dynasties, properly so called, than the 22 which follow.

(D) The Chinese word Chau, which our writers translate dynasty, doth not properly signify either that, or a race, family, or succession, according to M. Fourmont, but rather a certain number of years; the whole time which any race possessed the dominion being called the Chau of such a race, as Hya Chau, or the Chau of the Hya, that is, the whole space during which the Hya reigned; and so of the rest (18).

We beg leave likewise to remind the reader, that what the Chinese annalists style the ninth, is by Du Halde styled only the third, he having struck out the six preceding ones, from the third emperor W'hang-ti, or, as Martini and others write him, Hoang-tius, down to that of Yau, or Yuus, where he begins his own, contrary to all his brothers (19).

(E) We are told, that he caused a bell, a drum, and three tables, one of iron, a second of lead, and the third of stone, to be fastened to the gates of his palace, on which was an order fixed, that all those who wanted to speak to him, should strike on the instruments, or tables, according to the nature of their business. The bell was for civil affairs; the drum for matters relating to the laws, or religion; the leaden table for those that concerned the government, or ministry; the stone one was to denote a complaint against the injustice of any magistrate; and the iron one was to express some very severe treatment; and he is accordingly reported to have left his dinner twice, and his bath three times, in one day, to go and redress the people's grievances, at the first sound of those instruments (20).

However, with relation to his ministers who came to advise him, Martini adds a story which is more to the glory of his empress, than his own: for, being once so far exasperated at the boldness of one of them, as to resolve to cut him off, that amiable princess, having timely notice of it, came immediately to him, in a more sumptuous dress, and greater cheerfulness in her looks, than usual; and, being asked the occasion of it, gave him this noble answer: "You and I have a great reason to congratulate each other on your having such wise and faithful ministers, who, instead of misguiding you by their flattery, dare speak the truth without fear. It is the greatest happiness of a prince, to have those about him from whom he may learn the truth, which is but too often suppressed by the very fear of offending." This speech had the desired effect; the emperor's resentment was so effectually disarmed, that his ear from that time was equally opened either to advice or reproof. The reader may see, in the authors above-quoted, many other instances of his wisdom and prudence, but especially of his extraordinary tenderness and compassion, particularly whenever he saw any of his subjects dragged to any severe punishment, which we have no room to relate (21).

II. TI-KI, his worthy son, and inheritor of his virtues, succeeded him, to the great joy of all his subjects; but found the beginning of his reign unhappily disturbed by one of his tributary princes, who raised a war against him, with a design of making himself independent. Ti-ki put himself at the head of his army; and, by the assistance of six other tributary princes, soon quelled the revolt. But his subjects did not long enjoy the happiness they had begun to taste under his wise and mild government, before he was snatched from them in the ninth year of his reign; and was succeeded by his son. He left five worthy brothers, on whom he had bestowed as many governments in some of the provinces of the empire, which his son raised afterwards into principalities, that they might live in a manner suitable to their birth^a.

Tay-kang.
Year of the 9th
cycle, 30.
2188.

III. TAY-KANG, on his mounting the throne, instead of following the steps of his predecessors, left the care of the state to some of his favourites, whilst he gave himself up to hunting, to wine and women, and other unworthy pleasures. He spent whole days in pursuing of wild beasts, and let his numerous train of men, dogs, and horses, destroy the plains and harvest of his subjects, for which they made loud and heavy complaints; but, finding them all ineffectual, they were driven into such resentment and despair, that they revolted against him, whilst he was ranging the woods after his sport. The person to whom they applied was a nobleman named I, or Ys, who had then the command and love of the whole army; and who, being moved by their cries and misery, resolved to dethrone and banish him, which he easily compassed by the help of the rest of the nobility, who all unanimously joined with him, and set his youngest brother Chung-kang upon the throne, after he had reigned twenty-nine years^b (F).

IV.
Chung-kang.
Year of the 9th
cycle, 59.
Bef. Chr.
2159.

IV. CHUNG-KANG, though raised to the empire by universal consent of the nobles and people, refused to take the title of emperor during his brother's life; so that the years which elapsed between the deposition and death of the latter are not reckoned to the reign of the former. This conduct was universally admired, though that prince was not without some fear that I, or Ys, whose power and credit had so easily dethroned his brother, might one day make use of it against himself. To secure himself, therefore, against his intrigues, without appearing guilty of ingratitude, he not only seemed to place the greatest confidence in him, but protested that he could not be without the counsel of so wise and faithful a minister, and having him constantly near his own person. I, who made no doubt of shortly getting an absolute ascendant over him, and ingrossing the whole government into his hands, easily gave into the snare; and resigned the command of the army, as incompatible with his new post; and Chung-kang gave it to Chew, a faithful and experienced officer.

eclipse.

I, FINDING himself over-reached, and rather suspected than beloved by that prince, resolved to revenge himself by the total destruction of the imperial family; but, as that could not be done whilst so faithful and able a man as Chew was at the head of the army, he tried in vain all means either of rendering him suspected, or of destroying him by some other way. At length he had recourse to a new stratagem; which was, to gain the grandees over to him by his profuse generosity, whilst he artfully strove to secure himself of the favour and confidence of his son and successor, till he could effect his ruin without hazard. In the meantime the exiled Tay-kang died, and Chung-kang took upon him the title of emperor; but was soon after taken off by a sudden death, and left the throne to his son Ti-syang, after he had held it twenty-nine years^c. It was in some part of his reign, tho' authors are not agreed about the year, that the so much famed eclipse happened, of which we have had occasion to speak more than once^d, and concerning which the Chinese records affirm, that Hi and Ho, who presided over the tribunal of the mathematics, were put to death for having neglected to foretel and insert it in the ephemeris of that year (G), which was then a capital crime.

(F) Tay-kang did but too truly verify his grandfather Yu-ta's prediction of the dreadful mischiefs which rice-wine would bring on his empire and family; for it was now become so much in vogue, that it had let in an inundation of other vices. His mother and five brethren were obliged to accompany him in his exile; and Martini adds, that the Xu-king, or Shu-king, hath recorded in deep elegiac verses the doleful complaints, and severe reproaches, which these five made to that unhappy prince, a sketch of which he hath given us at the end of his reign (22).

(G) This eclipse (which is said by the Chinese astronomers to have happened in conjunction with the constellation Fung, a bright star on the south side of the lucid one at the head of Scorpio) is affirmed by the missionaries to have been verified by fresh astronomical calculations, and is much insisted on to prove the early skill of the Chinese in that branch of astronomy. We shall not repeat what we have said in a former section against that vain pretence (1); but only observe farther, that some of the Chinese historians suspect them to have suffered death not for neglect of foretelling it, but for being carousing with some of the friends of the traitor I when it happened, and probably for raising some sort of predictions from it in his favour (2).

- a V. TI-SYANG, alias Syangus, succeeded his father; but, instead of following his wife measures, and guarding himself against the intrigues of the traitor I, he made him his chief confident, and soon after transferred the command of the army from the faithful Chew to him; and, by that fatal step, put it again in his power to execute his long-projected design against the imperial family. His new post gained him a vast number of creatures, and his liberality the love of the army; insomuch that the infatuated emperor, who could now no longer be blind to his treacherous designs, was forced to flee for refuge to the courts of two of his tributary princes and relations. I tried all the means he could invent to disculpate himself; complained to him, by the most submissive letters, of his being falsely traduced by his enemies; and begged of him to return to his own metropolis, and he would soon convince him that he had not a more faithful or zealous subject in his empire. He went so far as to accuse several of the emperor's most faithful friends of sundry crimes, and to have them either banished, or put to death, and filled their posts with his own creatures.
- b He succeeded so well, that he looked upon himself as already on the throne, when his base treachery was punished in kind by one of his own creatures and confidents, whom he had raised from one post to another, and at length to the command of the army. Han-tso, that was the villain's name, an artful and ambitious man, saw plainly enough that it would be easy for him to mount the throne himself, by cutting off both his benefactor and sovereign; and, as the soldiery were intirely devoted to him, he made no scruple to order a number of them to assassinate I as he was hunting; which was done accordingly; and afterwards gave out, that it was done by the emperor's orders, and as a just punishment for his treason. His next step was, to send for Kyau, the eldest son of I, an active and violent youth, and to persuade him to revenge his father's death; to accomplish which, he furnished him with a body of troops, and advised him to march immediately at the head of them against the emperor; who, not having time to raise a sufficient army, was easily defeated by him. Kyau killed the emperor, and the two tributary princes, with his own hands; and Han-tso, to make sure of the crown, destroyed soon after the whole imperial family, excepting the empress, who, being then pregnant, escaped with much difficulty into the mountainous parts. Thus fell the unfortunate Ti-syang, after a reign of twenty-seven years; and the usurper, being now in possession of the empire, rewarded the son of I with a considerable territory, which he created into a principality.
- c HAN-TSO, alias Xao-kang, mounted the throne, and held it forty years, but was at length deprived of it and his life by the true heir of the imperial family; for the queen, who, as we hinted above, fled to the mountains, took refuge among the shepherds, and was there delivered of a son, whom she named Shau-kang, and brought him up unknown to any one; so that he was grown up to years of maturity, before Han-tso heard of it: but being afterwards informed, that the usurper was making a strict search after him, he retired from thence, and went and hired himself as a domestic at the court of one of the tributary princes, where he passed for a shepherd's son. It was not long, however, before his extraordinary air and behaviour gave that prince reason to think him much higher born than he pretended; and, having questioned him about it one day in the kindest manner, was by him informed of the whole mystery of his birth, family, and concealment; upon which he tenderly embraced him, and proposed him his protection and best services; and, as an earnest of it, gave him his daughter in marriage, with part of his principality for a portion. Shau-kang, having now a better opportunity of displaying his parts and merit, easily convinced him that he was worthy of the throne; and he, on the other hand, lost no time to acquaint all the nobles and ministers, who were in the interest of the late emperor, with the discovery, and with the excellent character of the young prince. By that time the tyrant was become so hateful to all the people, that they joyfully sided with their lawful prince; who, having raised an army, attacked, and took him prisoner, and put him to a shameful death.
- d VI. SHAU-KANG ascended the throne of his ancestors with universal acclamations; and, immediately after his coronation, ordered his forces to pursue the accomplices of the late treason. Kiau stood in his own defence, but, his little army being easily cut off, he was taken prisoner, and beheaded, and as many of the rebels as could be caught were likewise put to death; by which means the tranquillity of the empire was again happily restored, and the laws resumed their antient vigour. Shau-kang took all proper measures to reform all the abuses which had crept in during the late usurpation; and had the pleasure to see his orders readily obeyed, and his people happy and easy under his wise government. His reputation drew several ambassies from foreign princes, and his reign proved as glorious as peaceable. He died in the twenty-second year of his reign, and was succeeded on the next year by his son,

- VII. TI-SHU, alias Chus; in whose reign nothing extraordinary happened, except some a few revolts on the sea-coasts, which were almost as soon quelled as raised. The empire in every other respect enjoyed a profound peace during his reign, which lasted seventeen years.
- VIII. TI-WHAY, alias Hoay or Hoajus, succeeded his father; and was in such high esteem, and his empire in such a flourishing condition, that foreign princes sought his friendship far and near (H), and several of them put themselves under his protection. But the long peace he enjoyed made him become effeminate; and such a slave to his pleasures, that he spent the remainder of his reign close shut up in his palace among his women and eunuchs, without ever shewing himself to the people. All that time his favourites governed with such an arbitrary sway, that the subjects had no possible means to prefer, as usual, either request or complaint to him; and this oppression continued till the end of his reign, which had lasted b twenty-six years, when he died, and was succeeded by his son,
- IX. TI-MANG, alias Mangus; whose reign proved much the same as the former, except that he was not quite so immersed in pleasure, though equally indolent. He is recorded for no one remarkable thing, except his removing his court towards the Yellow River, and visiting some maritime places. He reigned eighteen years, and was succeeded by his son,
- X. TI-SYE, alias Is; who was so famed for his love of justice, and singular care to preserve his subjects in peace and wealth, that several of the petty sovereigns of the neighbouring nations became his tributaries, and came in person to pay their homage to him. Ti-sye not only granted these his protection, but rewarded their fidelity with titles and dignities, which they were not a little ambitious of; and sometimes with presents, much more than equivalent to the tribute they paid him^c. He reigned sixteen years, and left his crown to his son.
- XI. TI-PU-KYANG reigned fifty-nine years; during which long space it is surprising the Chinese annals have not found something worth recording, except some factions which reigned among the princes of the blood about the succession, which he however obtained after his father's death. This silence is attributed to the great tranquillity which his subjects enjoyed during his reign; but he did not take the same care to secure the crown to his son Kong-kia, whom he had nominated his successor; so that he was obliged to give way to the superior power of his uncle,
- XII. TI-KYONG, or Kung, who wrested it from him; and, after an usurpation of twenty- d one years, left it to his son,
- XIII. TI-KIN, who held it likewise from the right heir twenty-one years more; but became so contemptible to the people by his debaucheries, that he could not secure it to his son; so that, after his death, it was restored to Kong-kia, whom his father had deprived of it.
- XIV. KONG-KIA, alias Cung-kia, instead of learning wisdom by his forty-two years of adversity and misfortunes, no sooner saw himself on the throne, than he abandoned himself to his pleasures, and became one of the lewdest and most effeminate princes that ever reigned. None but the worst sycophants and flatterers could get access to him, or have any share in the government; by which means he became so odious to the people, and so contemptible to his vassal princes, that they refused to pay him either tribute or homage, whilst e his debaucheries and extravagancies had put it out of his power to oblige them to it. Neither did he take one step towards it, or rousing himself from his effeminate indolence; but, after a shameful reign of thirty-one years, left the crown to a son who inherited all his vices, as well as his throne^f. About four years before his death was the famed Ching-tang, who afterwards became the founder of the second dynasty^g.

a of cruelty and debauchery to please her (1). He became at length so odious to his subjects ^{His wicked} of all ranks, that they were on the point of dethroning him, when one of his chief ministers, ^{reign.} who had still some remains of tenderness for his person, undertook to represent to him, in the most serious and respectful manner, the imminent danger which his licentiousness and tyranny exposed him to; and was executed for it in his presence. His fury did not abate the zeal of the rest; some of them ventured even to present a severe memorial to him, in which they scrupled not to upbraid him with his murders, cruelty, and other scandalous vices; which so exasperated him, that he resolved to put the authors of it to death.

Among them, the great Ching-tang, lately mentioned, a tributary prince, of the race of Ching-tang Whang-ti, a wise and worthy person, having ventured to join his remonstrance to theirs, ^{raised to the throne.} b was for it cast into prison; where he had not lain long, before he was unanimously chosen by all the states to succeed him, and obliged to declare war against the tyrant; in doing which, he however took care to disclaim all title to the crown, and to declare that he only took up arms to bring him to reason, and a sense of his duty. His army was soon completed, every prince assisting him with troops; whilst Kya found such a general defection among his subjects, that he could raise but a handful of men. Neither succeeded he better in his application to the Tartars, whom he endeavoured to gain by the fairest promises; so greatly was he abhorred by them, that they plainly told him they would never take up arms in favour of so wicked a prince. Kya, seeing himself thus abandoned on all sides, had recourse to dissimulation and intreaties; and only begged of Chang-tang, that he would spare his life: which had c so great an effect on that noble prince, that he not only granted it to him, but restored him the crown; and, quitting the command of the army, retired to his own little state. For this ^{Restores him, and retires.} unexampled moderation he was greatly admired by all but the ungrateful Kya, who no sooner saw himself resettled on the throne, than he returned to his former vices; and, to complete ^{Kya's ingratitude,} all, raised an army, and marched against him as a rebel and a traitor. Ching-tang had by that time put himself in a good posture of defence; but, when both armies came to engage, he saw, with pleasure, all the imperial forces come over to him, and lay their arms at his feet, proclaiming him their emperor, and deliverer. Kya had now no other resource but flight; but was pursued, till he got quite out of the boundaries of the Chinese empire; and there ^{defeat, exile, and death.} ended his days, after an ignominious exile of three, and a reign of fifty-two, years*; and d with him ended the first dynasty.

(1) This monster of a woman, whom the Chinese annalists call Pi-bia (3), not only put that infatuated monarch upon committing the greatest extortions on the subjects, to supply her unmeasurable extravagance in building, furniture, &c. but prevailed on him to have a large spot of ground digged up in the form of a lake, and to be filled with wine; 3000 men were sent thither every day, who were obliged to kneel upon all fours round the borders of it, and to lap the wine like so many dogs, till they were drunk; after which they were ordered to reel to a neighbouring wood, where they found oxen, deer, hogs, and other beasts, ready dressed, and hanging on the trees, and there assuaged their hunger, as they had done their thirst before; and this used to be one of her mildest diversions.

Another, and more scandalous by far, with which she used to delight herself with him, was in a private apartment of the palace, where they kept a number of the finest young persons of both sexes, fetched far and near, and bought at a vast price, to shew all manner of naked and lewd postures, and play the most shameful tricks with each other. But the most inhuman of all was the butcheries she caused to be made of those brave ministers who dared to prefer a complaint or remonstrance, or even shew a dislike, against any of their detestable practices (4); so that, upon the whole, it may be justly said, that this first dynasty owed its extinction to a woman; the emperor being confessed to have had several good qualities, which might have made him a good prince, if he had not been so unhappily yoked to, and governed by, that monster of lewdness and cruelty.

(K) This was the name he gave to the imperial family, from which the whole dynasty took it, it being that by which the little state was called, in which he formerly had governed, in quality of a king, or tributary prince (5).

not the lawful heir, and did not think himself able to govern. The sequel proved how sincere he was, and above all artifice, in what he thus freely declared to them: for, when his grantees came to represent to him, that he was raised to it by the particular direction, which, being touched with the miseries of the people, had made choice of him for their deliverer (which, they told him, was manifest from the unanimous concurrence of all the states, and the universal joy of all the subjects, which plainly shewed, that they would have no other sovereign but him); Ching-tang, overcome by their pressing instances to accept of the government, made no delay to apply himself to the business of it, in such manner as should fully answer, if not exceed, the high expectations they had conceived of him.

He began, accordingly, with the choice of some faithful and able ministers; among whom was I-jin, or I-yn, a person of known virtue and wisdom, whom he placed at the head both of the council and army, by whose help and advice, he soon wrought a reformation through the empire. He repealed all the cruel laws of his predecessor, and enacted others, in lieu of them, full of wisdom and equity. The army, which had been formerly used to plunder, was brought under the strictest discipline; so that order and tranquillity were again restored through every province. In his reign were found some rich gold mines in the mountains that divide the provinces of Xan-si and Pe-cheli; the benefit of which he freely granted to the inhabitants, without any tax or profit to himself. He caused to be engraven on all the vessels which were for the use of the palace, the most excellent maxims of morality, that both himself and his officers might have continually before their eyes those principles by which they ought to square their conduct. In a word, he was so highly esteemed by all the neighbouring princes, that many of them readily became tributaries, and submitted themselves to his empire: and as for the people, they filled the air every-where with their praises of him, and prayers for him, and justly looked upon him as their great benefactor, as a tender father, and the author of all their happiness (L). And when he died, which was in the thirteenth year of his reign, the whole empire went into mourning, and every one lamented for him, as for the loss of a parent. His eldest son Tay-ting dying before him, he left the crown to his grandson, named

II. TAY-KYA, or Tai-kiaw, who, instead of treading in his grandfather's steps, began his reign in such a manner, as gave reason to fear he would soon become despised and odious to his subjects. To prevent which, I-in, the wise and faithful minister of the late emperor, after several fruitless admonitions, thought fit to make use of his authority, which was still very great; and having in vain represented to the young monarch the abuse he made of the power, which heaven intrusted him with, chiefly for the good of his people, made use of such a stratagem to reclaim him, as needed all his great reputation and credit to support and justify him in it.

*I-in's noble

He caused a house to be built near the tomb of the late emperor, and shut up the young monarch in it, that he might have time to reflect on his former ill conduct, and form his future one by the example, and near the ashes, of his excellent grandfather; and, at the same time, he declared himself guardian, both of the prince and empire. He kept him there three whole years, closely confined; by which time, the young monarch, now no longer blinded by the splendor of his fortune, had made such serious reflections on his past ill conduct, and on his want of those virtues that were requisite for the well-governing of so great an empire, as quite convinced those who were about him, that he was now a new man, and would steer a quite opposite course. Whereupon I-in went himself to him, and conducted him out of his confinement; and having placed him on the throne, proclaimed

(L) This excellent prince gave a signal proof of his fatherly tenderness, in the time of an universal drought, which lasted seven years, without one drop of rain, and had caused a grievous famine among his subjects; when attributing that calamity to his own faults, he devoted himself a victim for the welfare of the people. He first observed a rigorous fast; then laying aside the imperial ornaments, cut off his hair and nails, both which were then worn very long, he marched out barefoot, in the guise of a criminal, and, lifting up his hands to heaven, intreated the Supreme Being to spare his subjects, and let the whole weight of his wrath fall on him alone. This prayer he repeated six times, with the same fervency; and, at the end of it, the sky became covered with clouds, which poured down a plentiful and general rain, and restored the earth to its usual fruitfulness and plenty thro' the whole empire (6).

This famine is supposed, by some of the missionaries, to be the same which is mentioned in Genesis (7); but besides the improbability that such a calamity should spread itself so far over the earth, as to have reached from Egypt to China, the Chinese famine, according to them, falls about the year before Christ 1760, and that of Egypt in 1708, according to the Hebrew chronology; and the same will appear still more antedated, if the reign of Tau, their eighth monarch, be brought down so low as the time of Joshua, as we have lately hinted (8), and will appear to be more synchronical with that which happened in David's time (9); for though this last continued but three years in Palestine, yet the Jewish doctors affirm, that it lasted seven years in other parts, which they infer from the words of the prophet Gad to David (10); but we see no reason to suppose, that a drought or famine must be felt through so vast a tract of land, as lieth between the Mediterranean and the eastern or Chinese sea.

a him emperor a second time. The people, charmed with his behaviour, especially to that great minister, whom, instead of signs of resentment, he loaded with commendations, and tokens of the highest gratitude and confidence, did joyfully acknowledge their emperor, and bestowed the highest encomiums on him, and his now greatest favourite and confident. From that time Tay-kyä followed his advice in every thing, and governed with such singular prudence, that the tributary princes, who had begun to revolt, gladly returned to their duty; and all the orders of the state were perfectly submissive to him, whilst he lived. He reigned thirty-three years, and was succeeded by Wo-ting, another grandson of Ching-tang. Tay-kyä's death.

III. WO-TING, the worthy grandson of the founder of this dynasty, was, like his predecessor, intirely governed by the wise counsels of the faithful I in; and being deprived of him by death, on the eighth year of his reign, honoured his memory with a sumptuous funeral, worthy of the imperial majesty, and the vast esteem he had for so valuable a minister. His loss was, however, recompensed by his son I-pu, who inherited all his father's virtues and great qualities, for which he was deservedly advanced to the same honours, and merited the favour and confidence of several of his successors. Wo-ting reigned twenty-nine years, and was succeeded by his brother Tay keng; concerning whom, history hath left us nothing, but the years of their reigns. VI. YONG-KI, or Jun-giew, a third son of Wo-ting, but not by the same mother. In his reign some of the tributary princes, refusing to assist, according to custom, at the assembly which the emperors held from time to time, gave him some uneasiness. He reigned twelve years, and left the crown to his brother Tay-vu. VI.

VII. TAY-VU, upon his accession to the crown, is reported to have been terrified by some accident which happened in the palace; viz. a mulberry-tree was covered with leaves and fruit in seven days, and in three more withered and died; and some wheat, sown in the ground, grew up into full ears in about the same time; which that prince looked upon as the forerunner of some revolution. But upon his consulting I-pu, the wise son of I-in, about it, was answered, that virtue was out of the reach of omens; and that, if he governed his people well, nothing could endanger his peace and happiness. Tay-vu made the best use of this wise lesson, and applied himself so closely to the administration of justice, that he began to give audience early in the morning, and never stirred till he had heard all the parties who applied to him. His assiduity, and love of justice, made him adored by the people, and he looked upon as equal to any of his predecessors; so that his orders were all punctually obeyed, and the tributary princes never absented themselves from the great assemblies convoked by him. Among others of his wise laws, there is one still in force to this day, that in every town a certain number of old people should be maintained out of the public treasury. He reigned seventy-five years in peace, and died in the province of Ho-nan, whither he had removed his court. VII.

His reign at first was peaceable; but was since disturbed by some of the inhabitants on the south side of the river Yang-tse-kyang, who went in bands, and plundered the neighbouring provinces; against whom he sent a powerful army, which cut those banditti in pieces, and put an effectual stop to their inroads for the future. By that means peace was again restored in his empire; but he did not long enjoy it, before he was snatched away by sudden death, after having reigned thirteen years: and was succeeded by his brother, VIII.

However, he still retained him near his person, that he might consult him on all emergencies; nor was he suffered to govern his little state in person till after that monarch's death, which happened in the nineteenth year of his reign, when he was succeeded by his son, XI.

Happily for him, the authority of the Kolau Yen was still great enough to put an end to the contest; but it did not destroy the seeds of ambition which then reigned among those princes, but only suppressed them for a time. He governed with the same moderation and prudence the whole time of his reign; and, at his death, gave a signal instance of his impartial love for his subjects, in leaving the choice of a successor to his ministers, in case they judged that his son had not virtue and merit to govern them. - XVII. PWANG-KENG, though an usurper, soon altered, by his wisdom and valour, the whole face of affairs, and restored the empire from its tottering condition. His application herein was indefatigable; he made the great Ching-tang the model of his conduct, and revived sundry of his wise and salutary laws, which had been in some measure abolished by the negligence of his predecessors; and made it a constant rule not to intrust any of the important posts, either of the court or empire, to any but men of the greatest merit for wisdom and virtue: for though he did not disown, that his ambition of reigning had made him seize on the crown in wrong of his nephew, yet he took such care that his example should not influence others to the like treason, that he severely punished every action that had the least tendency to it in others. This soon brought all the tributary princes again to their allegiance, and established a perfect tranquillity thro' all the empire. To prevent its being again disturbed by the ambition of the brothers, in prejudice to their nephews, which had for so many reigns been the cause of such fatal contests and bloodshed, he enacted a law to secure the crown to the latter, though himself had no issue, but was succeeded by a brother. - XX. VU-TING was yet young when he ascended the throne, and committed the care of the government to his prime minister, whilst he paid the triennial mourning to his father, which he did in a house near his monument, in which he shut himself up closely, and all that time was imploring heaven to bless him with such virtues as were suitable to his station.

That

- a That time being expired, he returned to his palace; and saw soon after, in a dream, a man presented to him by heaven to be his prime minister; whose features, shape, &c. were so strongly impressed on his mind, that he drew an exact portrait of him, and caused the man to be sought for accordingly. Upon a proper search, they found a man who exactly answered Fu-ywe, an obscure mason, named Fu-ywe, who was then at work at a village; and brought him to court. Here they asked him a great variety of questions concerning government, the virtues proper for a sovereign, the reciprocal duties of princes and their subjects, the different charges of the empire, &c.; to all which he gave such just, wise, and excellent answers, as charmed the whole court. At length the emperor addressed himself to him in words to this effect: I now plainly see, Fu-ywe, that you are the person whom heaven hath appointed to assist me with your wise instructions, and I wholly commit myself to your direction; henceforth I look upon you as my father and guide; do you consider me as your pupil and disciple, and such a one as earnestly aspires after the highest degrees of wisdom and virtue, and will be ever ready to follow your wise counsels. Look upon me as an unpolished glass, to which you are still to give a greater lustre; as a man in a storm at sea, whose pilot you are to be; and as a barren soil, on whom you are to bestow the best manure: let me never want your salutary admonitions and reproofs; neither flatter me, nor spare my faults; that so, by your assistance, and that of my ministers, I may acquire the virtues of my grandfather Ching-tang, and restore, in these unhappy times, the peace, order, and happiness, of his government.
- HERE Fu-ywe, prostrating himself, as is usual, before the emperor, freely represented to him how much easier it was to know what was right, than to pursue it; and to procure good advice, than to be governed by it; but added, that where those two go hand in hand, a prince needed not to doubt of his being well beloved and obeyed by his subjects. He gave him accordingly a noble set of instructions, the best part of which are still extant in the Sbu-king; and Vu-ting proved such a strict observer of them, that he became an excellent pattern for good princes; and his reputation, which spread itself among the most distant nations, induced several to submit themselves to him. He reigned quietly and happily fifty-nine years, and was succeeded by his son.
- XXI. TSU-KENG had a peaceable but short reign of seven years, and was succeeded by his brother. XXI. Tsu-keng.
- d XXII. TSU-KYA, a stranger to his father's virtues, became so odious to the people by his pride and debauchery, that he caused very dangerous commotions in several parts of the empire, and such as seemed to threaten no less than the extinction of this dynasty. He reigned thirty-three or thirty-four years; and was succeeded by his son, XXII. Tsu-kya. Year of the 24th cycle, 6.
- XXIII. LIN-SIN, who proved no less a slave to his lusts; and, to prevent all interruption of them, forbade his ministers to trouble him with any affairs of the empire, by which he shortened his days; and, after a reign of six years, left the crown to his brother, XXIII. Lin-sin.
- XXIV. KING-TING, of whom nothing is recorded, but that he reigned twenty-one years, and died about nine years after the birth of Vu-wang, who became the founder of the third dynasty, XXIV. King-ting.
- e XXV. VU-YE, his son, succeeded him; and proved worse, and more impious, than any of his predecessors; and, having cast from him all fear of heaven, to deal in magical experiments, in which he found himself likewise disappointed, is supposed to have brought down the dreadful vengeance which fell on him, by his impieties and blasphemies against it; and was killed by thunder, as he was hunting, in the fourth year of his reign. About this time some of the eastern islands began to be inhabited by colonies sent thither from China, among which are reckoned those of Japan, of which we shall speak more fully in the sequel. XXV. - XXVI. TAY-TING, the son of Vu-ye, began his reign by declaring war against a tributary prince, whose little state, called Yen, is in the province of Pe-che-li; and Pe-king, the now metropolis of the empire, was one of the cities belonging to it. He reigned but three years, and left the war to be finished by his son and successor, XXVI. Tay-ting.
- f XXVII. TI-YE, upon his accession, sent one of his generals, named Ki-lie, against that revolted prince; whom he subdued, together with his whole state, and reduced to the condition of a private man. The emperor was so well pleased with that conquest, that he erected that province into a principality, and gave it to his general, and made it hereditary to his family. Ti-ye reigned thirty-seven years; and had three sons at his death, two by a wife of the second order, and the youngest by his empress; but as this was then young, and of no promising talents, his father was inclined to nominate the elder of the other two for his successor; but was opposed by the grandees, as being against their laws.  an inhuman delight in seeing the unhappy objects of her dislike put to that terrible and excruciating death. Her husband was no less given to cruelty and revenge, whenever any thing opposed his brutish will (M): and these executions were so frequent and terrible, that none of his ministers dared to advise or controul him. The noble Ven-wang was the only one who had courage enough to oppose his inhumanities; but though he was still respected by the tyrant, as well as by the people, for his extraordinary merit, and on that account met with a milder treatment, yet was he sent to prison by him, as a punishment for his rashness, as it was called, but in effect to put a stop to all future remonstrances from him. Upon the news of his impruregain his liberty, by presenting Chew with a most beautiful damsel; whose charms so captivated him, that she easily obtained his release. Ven-wang had all the virtues, learning, and evils that then reigned through the empire. But he died soon after, leaving his little principainto his views of dethroning the emperor. This prince discovered, on this occasion, a peculiar the head of an army, and give the tyrant battle, promising to assist him with what forces he wanted. Both he and Chew made all possible haste to raise a powerful army, and the former met the latter with a much more numerous one; but, as soon as the signal was given, the greatest part of them went over to Vu-wang. Chew, seeing himself thus abandoned, fled in despair to his capital; and, entering into his apartment, set fire to it; and, though all the pains were taken to prevent its spreading, it burnt with such fury, that half of the palace was reduced to ashes before it could be extinguished. This was the dreadful fate of the unhappy abroad,

(M) One instance of this he shewed towards a young lady of singular beauty, who had been presented to him by her father, in order to insinuate himself into that vicious monarch's favour; but she, being no less virtuous than beautiful, resisted his passion with such an heroic courage, that, in a fit of rage, he slew her with his own hands; and, cutting her body into small pieces, caused it to be served at her father's table. At the same time another minister, justly shocked at that unheard of barbarity, could not forbear expressing his abhorrence of it to the tyrant, who caused him to be put to death (11).

(N) He began, 1st, with an inquiry into, and redressing, all the acts of injustice which had been committed in the preceding reign.

2. He set many persons of merit at liberty, who had been imprisoned.

3. He sent for Kit-fu, the uncle of the tyrant, who had narrowly escaped death, by feigning himself mad, for having dared to reprove him, and consulted him upon all emergencies, as he was a great astronomer, politician, and noble patriot; and the instructions he gave him are still extant in the Shu king. He afterwards rewarded him with the kingdom of Korea, which he bestowed abroad, that many foreign princes, who had withdrawn their homage from Che-w, readily came to pay their homage and tribute to him, and put themselves under his protection; and as to his subjects, they had such an affection for him, that, upon his being attacked with a dangerous distemper in the second year of his reign, they expressed every-where the deepest concern for him. Among the rest, Che-w-kong, his prime minister, having caused sacrifices to be offered in the palace for his recovery, lifted up his hands on a sudden towards heaven, and prayed with a loud voice, that his own life might be accepted in lieu of the emperor's; and that so dear a blessing might be preserved to his realm, till he had fixed it upon a firm foundation, freely offering his own life at the same time to save that of his prince. His prayer, the history informs us, went not unheard; the emperor found himself much better by the very next day, and in a little time was quite recovered. The whole court and kingdom greatly applauded the action of the prime minister; and Vu-wang was so affected with it, that he inserted it with his own hands in the secret records which are kept in the palace in coffer of gold; and the memory of it proved, in process of time, of singular benefit to the empire, as we shall see in the sequel. He reigned only seven years; but with such fatherly tenderness, and with such indefatigable application to the public welfare, that he had quite restored the empire to its pristine tranquillity and grandeur; and was succeeded by his son Ching-vang.

II. CHING-VANG being too young to take upon him the reins of government, his uncle Che-w-kong, then prime minister, and a prince of known probity and wisdom, took upon him the care of the realm, and of his education; the latter of which he intrusted to the most proper persons, whilst he administered the public affairs with such prudence and disinterestedness, that all the tributary princes readily acknowledged his merit, and paid him tribute and homage, as to the faithful guardian of the young monarch.

His singular uprightness did not however free him from suspicion, and from being misrepresented to him as having some view of seizing on the crown, by the number of creatures he promoted; which obliged him to retire from court, to the great regret of all who knew his merit and integrity. The young monarch betrayed at first a kind of pleasure on his being freed from his uncle's tuition; but soon found, by his inexperience and ill success, that he was no-way equal to the burden; so that, to extricate himself from these difficulties, he sent for the secret records mentioned under the last reign, and there found it recorded how Che-w-kong had freely offered his own life to heaven, to save that of his father; upon which, quite ashamed at his unjust suspicion of him, he went in person to his retreat, and, with tears, intreated him to resume his former post, and assist him with his salutary counsels. Che-w-kong, softened by his behaviour, consented to his request: and, from that time, gave him daily fresh proofs of his fidelity to him, and zeal for the public welfare. The young monarch's reputation spread to such a degree, by his adhering to the instructions of his uncle, that the king of Cochin-China sent him ambassadors, with rich presents, to congratulate him on his having a subject of so extraordinary merit as Che-w-kong; who were received with the greatest marks of esteem and friendship, and sent home laden with tokens of his generosity (O). That great minister died, highly admired both at home and abroad, in the 100th year of his age, and the 20th of Ching-vang's reign; and that prince, to shew his gratitude to him, caused him to be buried near his own father's tomb, and with the same funeral pomp as was usually performed to emperors. He outlived him seventeen years, and governed with great moderation and applause; and, some time before his death, forbade the use of wine, at a solemn assembly of the states; alleging, that that liquor, being the gift of heaven, ought only to be used at those sacrifices which are offered up to it; otherwise it proves the cause of almost all the evils which happen upon the earth. He reigned thirty-seven years, and left the crown to his son.

flowed upon him and his posterity, without obliging them to any other homage than their coming to court at every new reign, to desire the new monarch's consent and protection.

4. He restored several illustrious families, which had been in some measure degraded from their nobility, and gave the descendants of the old emperor little sovereignties, to enable them to support their rank. One prince, of the family of Shin-nong, was settled in the province of Shen-si; another, of the family of W'hang-ti, was settled in a territory in that of Ho-nan, called the kingdom of Tsu; to a third, of the family of Yau, he assigned a district in the neighbourhood of Pe-king, named the kingdom of Su; and to a fourth, who was of the race of Shun, he gave some lands in the province of Ho-nan, under the title of the principality of Chin.

To these he added fifteen other principalities, which he gave to as many of his own relations; not foreseeing that so many sovereignties, though dependent on the crown, would prove in time the source of unhappy wars. He was no less generous to his ministers, some of whom he raised to estates not much inferior to the foregoing, and others he raised to the highest dignities in the empire (12).

(O) We are told, that, at their audience of leave, Che-w-kong presented them with an instrument, which on one side pointed to the north, and on the other to the south, that they might steer better in their way home, than they had done in coming to China. This instrument was called Chi-nan, which name the Chinese give to the sea-compass; whence some conclude that the prime minister was the inventor of it. We have already shewn in their ancient history (13), that that invention is ascribed to their third monarch W'hang-ti; but with as little probability, there being great reason to think that it is of much later date*.

III. KANG-VANG, finding the empire in a profound tranquillity, made it his chief study to govern his people with mildness, and to make them happy. It was one of his favourite maxims, that the joy of a prince depended on that which reigned among his subjects; and that he ought not to take any pleasure when they were in distress. He took especial delight in promoting agriculture, the care of which he committed to one of his ministers, named Chau-kong; whilst himself would sit under a willow-tree, to decide the disputes that arose among the husbandmen. In his reign, so great a regard is said to have been had to promises, that prisoners were let out every morning to till the land, and regularly came back to their prison at night, according to their parole. He reigned twenty-six years, and was succeeded by his son,

No kind of remonstrances had been wanting to obtain a redress; but all proved ineffectual; and he, at length, became so odious to them, that, in a kind of despair, they resolved to put an end, at once, both to his sports and to his life, by such a stratagem as should not easily be discovered. They had often observed, that he used, on his return from hunting, to cross a large river which runs through the province of Xen-si, and to have his barges waiting to waft him over to the city of Hang-chew; upon which, they prepared one that was so built, as to fall into pieces as soon as it was got about half way over. The emperor entered it, according to custom, with some of his grandees; and had scarce reached the middle of the river, when the planks fell asunder at once, and the vessel and passengers went down to the bottom. Thus perished that unhappy prince, in the fifty-first year of his reign (P), and was succeeded by his son.

V. MO-VANG, or Mous, was a prince of such excellent qualities, as soon gained him the love of his subjects, and made them wink at one remarkable failing he had, viz. an extravagant fondness for horses (Q). His success against some of his barbarian subjects on the southern part, who had revolted, and who were defeated by his troops under the command of his general Kau-fu, encouraged him to turn his victorious arms against the Tartars. This project was in vain opposed by his son-in-law, who represented to him the unreasonable injustice and ill consequences of it; for that prince went on with it, and advanced with a powerful army against them, as far as the borders of Tartary; whilst the Tartars, who were apprised of his march, retired as far back as the heart of their country, with their tents and cattle; so that Mo-vang, finding no enemies to fight with, was forced to come back, after having fatigued and impaired his army with long and difficult marches; which made him take up a full resolution never to undertake any thing of that kind without his approbation. He reigned fifty-five years, and was succeeded by his son.

His cruelty and remorse.

VI. KONG-VANG began his reign with such an unheard of cruelty, as would have eternally blasted his fame, if repentance had not made such a change in his mind, that he became one of the mildest and justest princes. It had been his custom frequently to walk by the side of a lake in the country of Mye, where at these times multitudes of beautiful maidens used to make their appearance. He singled out three of the most agreeable to his taste, and fell in love with them; but they, apprehending the danger, no longer appeared on that walk among the rest. Upon which, the enraged monarch, imagining that the country-people had conveyed them away, to prevent their falling a sacrifice to his passion, ordered them all to be massacred. However, the remorse he felt for his excess of passion, and the justice and mildness of the remainder of his reign, easily obliterated his crime, and he has been ranked among some of their best monarchs ever since. He reigned twelve years, and left the crown to his son.

VII. YE-VANG, alias Is, did nothing, during a reign of twenty-five years, worth being recorded; and his name had long ago been buried in oblivion, had not his follies afforded matter of ridicule to some of the satyrists of that age, and rendered him despicable to posterity. His want of merit gave his brother an opportunity of seizing the crown from his children, and placing it on his own head.

(P) The Chinese annals mention several portents which seemed to foretell that monarch's fatal end; such as, an extraordinary overflow of a deep well belonging to the palace; and a much brighter and longer appearance of the moon above the horizon, and its darting a long fiery ray like the tail of a comet, as far as the sign Leo (but the moon's place is not mentioned); and some other such strange phenomena.

However, we are told, that in this monarch's reign was born the Indian philosopher Fo, mentioned in a former section (14), the founder of the Bonzaic and idolatrous sect which was afterwards introduced into China, together with his doctrine of the soul's transmigration, about 65 years after Christ (15).

(Q) His great foible was, to make a magnificent appearance before his subjects, and to ramble from one part of the empire to the other with a vast retinue of men on horseback, and spared no pains nor cost to have the finest horses brought to him far and near. However, he took care to cover these frequent and pompous excursions with the specious pretence of fatherly tenderness for his subjects, and under the name of visiting his most distant provinces (16).

a VIII. HYAU-VANG, Ygau-wang, or Hiaus, though an usurper, had address enough to keep himself on the throne, and gain the affections of the people. He was, however, so extremely fond of fine horses, that he raised an obscure fellow, named Pi-shu, to the dignity of master of the horse, merely for his superior skill in breeding, breaking, and managing, them; and, being one day highly delighted with his dexterity in riding, he bestowed on him a principality in the province of Sben-si; which is the more worth observing, because one of his descendants became afterwards the founder of the next dynasty, and destroyed the whole family to which he owed his advancement. He reigned fifteen years, and was succeeded by his son.

LI-VANG, or Liew, proved such a proud, cruel, and extravagant prince, that he soon reduced his subjects to the lowest misery by his continual exactions, which he as lavishly spent; infomuch that nothing was heard but complaints and lamentations among the people, and threatening manifestoes among the grandees. These only increasing his rage and jealousy, he caused strict search to be made after the authors of them; and at the same time forbade the people, under pain of death, to converse, or even whisper, to each other; so that nothing was seen in his metropolis but men shunning each other, and walking in mournful silence with their eyes fixed to the ground. At length one of his most faithful ministers, named Chau-kong, took the liberty to tell him, that he was not placed on the throne to make his subjects miserable; that it was much easier to stop an impetuous torrent, than to restrain their tongues, which only increased the violence of their resentment; and that the silence he had imposed upon them seemed to forebode something more dreadful and dangerous than the liberty they had of complaining.

d THIS tyrannic edict lasted three full years, when the people, driven at length into despair, rushed like a sudden torrent into his palace, and murdered all the imperial family, except the tyrant, who had but just time to escape their fury by flight; and his youngest son, whom the faithful Chau-kong had secretly conveyed to his own house. It was not long, however, before the enraged multitude were apprised of it, who on a sudden besieged the house, and with stern menaces demanded the prince of him. Chau-kong, seeing them so resolute that his authority could not restrain them from forcing their way in, after a severe conflict between nature and loyalty, delivered up his son to them instead of him, whom they inhumanly butchered before his face. He tried afterwards all possible means to reconcile them to their fugitive prince, and to re-establish him on the throne; but never could persuade them to it, so that it continued vacant for some years, whilst Li-vang was forced to live an obscure and miserable life, after he had reigned thirty-eight years, and wandered in exile about thirteen more.

f ONE of his first cares was, to recall all the wise and good men and philosophers, who had, during the late reign, retired into the mountainous and desert parts, to be more at leisure for study, and, by his mildness and generosity, to fix them near his person. By these means he became so highly admired for his virtues and mild government, that the tributary princes took a singular delight to pay him their homage, and to learn from him how to rule their respective little states, and all the members of the state were by degrees brought to their antient order and subordination. He likewise quelled some of the southern nations, who are divided from China by the river Yang-tse-kyang, and had taken the advantage of the late troubles to plunder several of the Chinese provinces, and forced them to submit to the laws and customs of the empire. but odious to his subjects, and brought on a series of great troubles, which ended in his ruin. A splenetic concubine named Pautse, or Paosua, with whom he was most passionately in love, seems to have laid the foundation of all his misfortunes, for whose worthless sake he put away his empress, and disinherited his lawful heir, who both went and took refuge at the court of his uncle, who had a small principality in the province of Shen-si. Many other things that infatuated monarch condescended to do, to divert her spleen, which, though not equally unjust, were no less ridiculous and unworthy of him; but one, in particular, which cost him his life and crown.

*Method of di-

He was then at war with the western Tartars; and had given express orders, that whenever the soldiers saw the fires lighted, they should immediately arm themselves, and attend his person; and, to divert his mistress, ordered that signal, which ought never to be used but in case of necessity, to be frequently used, without any other occasion than to set her a laughing at the hurry she saw the soldiers in, and the surprise and dislike they shewed at being so often falsely alarmed. Whilst he entertained her with this odd and dangerous diversion, he had sent positive orders to his brother to bring him back his son, who had taken sanctuary with him; and that prince refusing to obey, unless the young prince was declared lawful heir to the empire, Yew-wang declared war against him; and he, not being in a condition to oppose his forces, went and joined the Tartars, and in the night-time attacked the imperial camp. The fires were immediately lighted, to give the signal to the soldiers; but they had been so often deceived by it, that they looked upon it as the old game begun afresh, to give new diversion to his concubine; so that the Tartars easily forced the camp, and made themselves masters of the field. The emperor lost his life, after he had reigned eleven years; and was succeeded by his son.

XIII. PING-WANG, though heir to the crown, was not in a condition to put a stop to the confusion that then reigned, nor to the ravages which the Tartars committed where-ever they came; but, instead of defending his own dominions, removed his residence farther off from the province of Shen-si to that of Ho-nan; which plainly appeared to be done more to secure his own person, than his empire, against his victorious enemy; and this laid the foundation for new troubles: for, tho' the tributary princes joined their forces against the enemy, and actually drove them back, and recovered the territories they had made themselves masters of, yet the kings of Tsin and Wey, who were in the confederacy, and had signalized themselves against those invaders, made no scruple to claim an absolute possession of those territories, by way of conquest; and refused to pay homage to the emperor, under pretence that he had lent them no assistance. Their example was followed by several other tributary princes, particularly by the kings of Tsi, Tsu, and Tsin, who became the founders of three considerable kingdoms; the first in the southern part of the province of Shang-tong, the second in those of Hu-quang and Kyang-si, and the third in that of Shen-si. These three looking upon themselves as independent, followed only the dictates of their ambition; and, by mutual wars, sought only to enlarge their territories, and plunder those of their neighbours. The emperor tried in vain to interpose his authority, and to oblige them to live at peace. They despised his orders; and still went on with their wars, which were not at an end in the time of the great Confucius, whose history begins here.

XV. CHWANG-WANG, alias Chuang, was raised to the throne, contrary not only to the will of his father, who had named Kew, the son of one of his concubines, for his successor, but to the good liking of several of his ministers(S). Kew had still a strong party on his side, and with them formed a plot of assassinating him; which, though not discovered till three years after, was, nevertheless, discomfited, by the vigilance of the grandee mentioned in the last note; who having sent for the chief conspirator, under pretence of consulting him, caused him to be privately stabbed. However, though his death, and Kew's flight, which immediately followed, secured the crown to Chwang-wang, yet the revolted princes continued

(S) This was done at the representation of one of the grandees, of great authority at court; who justly observed to them the ill consequences which such an injustice to the lawful heir might bring on the empire at that juncture, and which must of necessity end in a civil war: to which he added further, that such a preference of the son of a concubine to the lawful son and heir, could not fail of giving a fatal blow to the imperial authority, which was in too tottering a condition, and rather wanted to be more strongly propped, than to be endangered by such a deadly shock. The rest of the grandees, and ministers, readily agreed to his wholesome advice; and that faithful minister kept such a watchful eye over the rebel Kew, that he discovered and defeated his plot against the emperor, before it could be put in execution (18).

a still dependent from him; and that of Tsi, being chiefly governed by his prime minister, had interest enough at the imperial court to engage the majority of the ministers to alter the succession in favour of Li-vang, his near relation, after the emperor's death, which happened some years after. Chang-wang reigned fifteen years, and was accordingly succeeded by him, in prejudice to that emperor's nephew, to whom the right belonged.

XVI. LI-VANG, from a tributary prince, being raised to the imperial crown, by the interest of Won-kung, the king of Tsi, above-mentioned, did easily exclude all the relations of the late emperor from it: for that tributary prince was, by that time, become so powerful, that he had enlarged his territories, at the cost of his neighbours on both sides, and to the no small prejudice of the royal authority, which was, in some measure, eclipsed by his overgrown power. He at length grew to such a height, as to assume to himself the title of Pa, that is, chief of all the other princes, and was acknowledged as such by the greater part of them. This title, however, which others likewise assumed, was at length abolished, after it had lasted about 100 years. As to Li-vang, he was forced to be passive, not daring to disoblige the king of Tsi, to whom he owed the crown; and, after a short reign of five years, left it to his son.

XVII. WHEY-WANG, alias Hoey, reigned very peaceably the first six years; but was, at length, attacked by the Tartars, who inhabit the north part of Shan-si; against whom he sent an army, under the command of the king of Tsi. This prince came upon them while they were besieging the city of Tay-tong-fu, forced their camp, and put them to the rout, rather by a superstitious panic, which had seized them, than any superiority, either of strength or ground. However, this victory, and the trust which the emperor reposed in him, gave him such an ascendant, that he wanted nothing but the imperial title; and his ambition was such, that he would have made no scruple to have dethroned him, had he not had cause to apprehend, that the other princes, who were his equals, would have opposed his design. Whey-wang reigned twenty-five years, and was succeeded by his son.

XVIII. SYANG-WANG, even from his younger years, had entertained no small jealousy of the overgrown power, and unmeasurable ambition, of the king of Tsi, but as he knew him to be too strong for him, he resolved to suppress him by craftiness, rather than by open force. Won-kung gave him soon after a fair opportunity for it; for having convoked, by the assistance of the prime minister, all the little sovereigns that were dependent on the imperial crown, which none but the emperor had a right to do, and designing, by that means, to make them acknowledge him as such, Syang-wang sent immediately his imperial letter to the assembly, by the hands of a skilful ambassador; who came accordingly, and laid it, as is usual on those occasions, on a table magnificently adorned; upon which, all the other princes paid their homage to it, which is the same as if the emperor had been there in person. Won-kung was the only one that hesitated about it, and was on the point of refusing, had not his prime minister reminded him of the danger, and of the jealousy which his refusal would create among the other princes. He was therefore obliged to comply, and to put off his design to a better opportunity; but his public, though forced, submission, had such an influence over the rest, that it confirmed them in their submission to the emperor, and helped to restore the government to its antient form.

SYANG-WANG had not long enjoyed the fruit of his stratagem, when his peace was disturbed by his son Sbo-tay, who, upon some disgust, left the court, and went to that of the king of Tsi. About the same time, one of his tributaries openly revolted, in the province of Shen-si. But the emperor was soon rid of both fears, by the defeat of the latter, and by the death of the ambitious Won-kung, who died of old age, and left his kingdom, in a distracted condition, between his five contending sons. Soon after that, having dismissed his Tartarian empress, whom he had married for politic views, brought on a fresh war from that quarter; in which the Tartar invited his fugitive son Sbo-tay to join, promising to get him declared emperor; which he readily consented to. The emperor was thereupon forced to fly, and wander about, begging the assistance of his tributaries, whilst his rebellious son had entered his capital, and taken the imperial title upon him. Syang-wang having obtained a sufficient succour, divided his army, and, with one part, recovered his metropolis, and caused Sbo-tay to be put to death, and, with the other, drove the Tartars out of his dominions, and restored the peace of his empire, which lasted twenty-two years. He died in the thirty-third year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son.

XIX. KING-WANG, alias Hiang, was a prince endowed with all the good qualities that could make his subjects happy, who thought they never could say enough in praise of his moderation and fatherly tenderness. But a sudden death snatched him from them, after a short reign of six years, to the great grief of the whole empire. He was succeeded by his son,

XX. QUANG-WANG, whose reign was equally short, mild, and undisturbed, the son and successor of Won-kung, in the kingdom of Tsi, being become so odious to his subjects, that he

A strange contest between two brothers.

XXIII. LING-VANG is recorded to have been born with hair on his head, and a beard on his chin; but is much more famed for the wisdom and prudence with which he governed his people; insomuch, that he still preserved the imperial authority in its full lustre, though most of the tributary princes were warring against one another. In the eleventh year of his reign, the death of Xeun-Cung, king of U, occasioned one of the most remarkable contests, between his two sons, that is to be met with in history. The eldest, to whom the crown belonged, was very pressing to have his brother accept of it, and the younger as strenuously refused it. At length, the elder constrained him to it, by force, placing him on the throne, putting the royal ornaments on him, and saluting him king of U. But the ceremony was scarce over, before the new king privately abandoned the palace, and went and hid himself in a desert; so that the elder was obliged to resume it, whilst his brother kept himself concealed, in the habit and occupation of a rustic, or plough-boy. About ten years after, or in the twenty-first year of the same reign, was born the so much celebrated Chinese philosopher Kong-fu-tse, or Confucius, of whom we have given an account, in a former section†. As for Ling-vang, he reigned peaceably twenty-seven years, and left the crown to his son.

XXIV. KENG-VANG, alias King, is justly blamed for his indolence and inattention to the affairs of the empire, at a time when the king of U, charmed with the government of his predecessors, was on the point of having submitted to him and his laws. So that, instead of sending his intended embassy to him, he dispatched it to the king of Lu, a prince of the family of Chew, and a strict observer of the laws of this dynasty. Several other princes thought it also high time to restore that peace and order in their respective states, which the civil wars among them had almost destroyed. The king of Ching, in particular, who reigned in the province of Shen-fi, shewed them a noble example; who, by the help and advice of his prime minister, reformed the abuses which had crept into his court, revived the antient laws, and made such a wise distribution of the lands, as pleased both rich and poor (X).

tions among the little princes.

* See before, p. 558, & (E).

† See before, p. 559, & (F).

(T) This tyrant, whose name was Lyn-chung, was become so hateful, for his cruelties, and want of application to government, that another prince, his kinsman, took the liberty to reprove him for it; at which he was so enraged, that he sent soon after a desperate ruffian to assassinate him in his own palace. The fellow came accordingly, early in the morning, pretending to have some business of importance with him from the king of Tsi; and being admitted into his presence, found him seated on his throne, receiving petitions from his subjects, and dispensing justice among them, with such affable greatness, as struck him at once with horror at the thoughts of staining his hands with the blood of so excellent a prince, and not daring to return to Lyn-chung, without performing his errand, slew himself at the door of the palace (19).

It will not be amiss to observe further, that when we distinguish between the empire and the tributary princes depending on it, the former must not be understood in that vast extent, as it has been since; for, even at this time, it is neither all yet inhabited, nor much less all subject to one prince. It is likely that it contained, at most, only two or three provinces, besides that of Shen-fi, which was the first inhabited, whilst the remainder was still either uncultivated, or, at most, governed by princes of their own, who paid neither homage nor tribute to the emperors, till several centuries after.

(U) The two philosophers who broached them were called Yang and Me; the former of whom taught, That all men were to be loved alike, strangers as well as kindred; the other maintained, That every man ought to mind himself, and his own affairs, without concerning himself about any body else, or even the emperor himself.

In this reign we likewise find the first mention of the kingdom of U, and of a smart war waged by the king of it, and some neighbouring princes, on account of a beautiful young damsel; which war, being foreign to our present subject, the reader may read in Martini (20).

(X) His regulations were chiefly contained under the four following heads; viz. 1. That the lands should be divided into nine equal parts, whereof one should be his domain, and cultivated at the public charge. 2. That all people indifferently should be permitted to fish in lakes, ponds, and rivers. 3. That the magistrates should have a particular care of all widows, orphans, and old men and women who had no children, and assist them in their necessities. 4. That the son or wife should not be punished for the crime of a parent or husband; and some others of equal wisdom, though of less moment (21).

^a KENG-VANG reigned twenty-five years, and was succeeded by his son Meng-vang, who reigned but a few months. During which, he had a son born, on whose account a deadly contest arose between two powerful parties; that of the court and ministers declaring for the infant prince; whilst the governors of the provinces, objecting against his tender years, and the uncertainty of his life, had proclaimed King-vang, his father's brother. Both parties proceeded to arms; but the last proving the stronger, and having made themselves masters of the capital, set him upon the throne, and confirmed him emperor. Meng-vang. reigns but few months. A contest about the succession.

XXV. KING-VANG's reign is not recorded for any particular action of his; whence it is supposed to have been a peaceable one. Confucius, who flourished at this time, in the kingdom of Lu, ends that long 200 years war of the tributary princes much about the same time. XXV. King-vang. Year of the 38th cycle, 19.

^b During the same reign, two very illustrious royal families received their finishing stroke, and total extinction; viz. that of Tsan, which had no less than twenty-five kings, within the space 636 years; and, about eight or ten years after, that of Chin, together with its kingdom, after it had continued 645 years, under twenty-four princes: the former was destroyed by the king of Sung; and the latter by that of Tsu. King-vang died in the forty-fourth year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son.

XXVI. YWEN-VANG proved so wise and mild a prince, that, had he lived long enough, he would probably have raised the imperial authority to its pristine glory. Of all the tributary princes, the king of Su was the only one who still refused to pay him the usual homage of coming to the grand assembly, for which he was proscribed, and declared a rebel; which is the first instance we meet with of that kind of punishment. Ywen-vang was likewise very successful in war, gained several battles, and subdued almost the whole province of Lu. About the same time, the kingdom of U, which had subsisted 650 years, under twenty petty kings, was subverted by the king of Ywe. Ywen-vang reigned but seven years, and was succeeded by his son. XXVI. Ywen vang. Year of the 38th cycle, 3.

XXVII. CHING-TING-VANG was surnamed the Chaste, on account of his living in celibacy after the death of his empress, and shewing an eminent example of continency to his subjects. He maintained the empire in the same peace and grandeur in which he found it. And in his reign the king of Tsu put a final end to the principality of Tsay, which had stood 676 years, under twenty-five princes. Ching-ting reigned twenty-eight years, and left three sons at his death, all of age, the eldest of whom, named Nyan, succeeded him; but was murdered by his brother Su, in the third month of his reign. Su reigned only five months, and was likewise assassinated by the youngest, who mounted the throne, without any opposition. XXVII. Ching-ting-vang. Year of the 38th cycle, 10.

XXVIII. KAU-VANG, though he pretended to have only punished one parricide by another, was yet greatly hated for that action; insomuch, that several tributary princes withdrew their allegiance from him. He was, however, a mild and good prince, and gave some eminent proofs of his paternal love for his subjects (Y). He reigned fifteen years, and was succeeded by his son. XXVIII. Kau-vang. Year of the 38th cycle, 38.

XXXIX. GHEY-LYE-VANG, alias Ghei-bew, began his reign about the beginning of the civil wars between the tributary princes, which lasted near 300 years, which epocha is from thence styled, by the Chinese, the years of war, or, warlike ages, when every petty sovereign strove to make himself independent, and lord it over his rivals, and the imperial dignity was brought so low, that these monarchs saw their authority trampled under foot, the provinces taken from them by degrees, whilst they hardly retained the bare name of sovereigns. The kingdom of Tsin was divided between four princes, who had conquered it, one of whom, famed for his battles, had formed the design of swallowing up the other three. He was prevented indeed by death; but his son, equally ambitious and unquiet, picked a quarrel with the kings of Han and Gay, and forced them to yield some territories to him. He next tried to do the same by the king of Chan, another neighbour; but was defeated, and slain by him, together with his whole family, and his head cut off, and made a drinking-cup of. The king of Lu made likewise war against that of Tsi, took some considerable places from him, and obliged him to sue for a peace. As for Ghey-lye-vang, we hear nothing of him, but that he reigned twenty-four years, and left the crown to his son. XXXIX. Ghey lye-vang. Year of the 38th cycle, 53.

XXX. NGAN-VANG's reign is recorded for nothing but for the wars which reigned between the petty kings, particularly those of Tsin and Ghey, in which the latter was the most successful; but U-ki, the general who had gained him several victories, being envied by his courtiers, withdrew himself privately to the former, and turned the scales against his old master, and became very great at this second court. Being here likewise envied by the grandees, he resolved to reform the government by limiting their authority, and lodging the power solely in the king. He had already, by his valour and merit, rendered him so powerful, and brought his kingdom into such a flourishing condition, that he was become formidable to all his neighbours; but his ministers so highly resented the blow which his brave general had given to their overgrown sway, that they caused him to be privately murdered in his own house. Ngan-vang reigned twenty-six years, and was succeeded by his son.

XXXI. LYE-VANG's reign was not more remarkable than his father's, except for the birth of the great philosopher Meng-tse, commonly called Mencius, the most celebrated one, next to Confucius, that ever China produced. In other respects, the imperial authority still went on to its decline, insomuch that the king of Tsi was the only one who paid him homage. The year in which he came to the crown was likewise remarkable for the extinction of the Ching dynasty, after it had lasted 432 years, under 23 princes, the last of whom was subdued and slain by the king of Han. Lye-vang reigned seven years, and died without issue, and was succeeded by his brother.

XXXII. HYEN-VANG, though he enjoyed a long reign, yet had little more than the title of emperor; the princes not only refusing him the usual homage, but threatening him with war if he opposed their designs. The Chinese records take notice of the nine celebrated brazen vessels which Yu, the founder of the first dynasty, caused to be made, representing the nine provinces of the empire; and which whoever was in possession of, was sure of the empire. These vessels are affirmed to have shaken of themselves in the reign of Ghey-Lye Vang, the 29th monarch of this dynasty, which was then looked upon as a presage of the evils which ensued. And now in this reign the contending kings began to strive who should get the possession of them; but the emperor, to defeat their design, caused them to be thrown into a deep lake, from which it was impossible to get them out. In his reign we first hear of chariots of war being used by the Chinese. He reigned forty-eight years, and was succeeded by his son.

Shin tsin-vang.
Year of the 40th cycle, 38.

XXXIII. SHIN-TSIN-VANG, alias Xi-cin, had a fair opportunity of recovering the lost dignity of the empire, had not his sloth and cowardice hindered him from making the best advantage of the wars which raged among other princes. Not so did the king of Tsin, who raised himself by them to such height of power, that he kept the others in subjection to him; and had almost engrossed the whole imperial authority, though he had not the title of emperor. He defeated the confederate forces of the kings of Tsu, Chau, Han, Ghey, and Yen; and would have deprived them of their kingdoms, had not a more important concern called him elsewhere; viz. two independent princes in the western part of Se-chwen, who were at war, and each imploring his assistance. The hopes of joining two such principalities to his own kingdom easily prevailed upon him to engage in the quarrel; the upshot of which was, that he defeated and killed the one, and seized upon his territory; and obliged the other, whom he had assisted, to pay him homage, and an annual tribute. Soon after this, the king of Ghey, one of the five confederates, put himself under his protection, and became tributary to him; by which means that prince could more easily enter into and subdue the territories of the other four. All this while the emperor continued an idle spectator; and, after a short reign of six years, left the crown to his son.

XXXIV.
Ngan-vang.

XXXIV. NGAN-VANG, alias Sous, found the imperial authority reduced to so low an ebb, that though he wanted neither courage nor prudence to act as became his dignity, yet had not power sufficient to undertake any thing which might give the least umbrage to his rival the king of Tsin. This last, who aimed at no less than the imperial dignity, promoted underhand the wars between the other princes; and, as they all applied to him for help, he readily assisted them with forces to destroy one another, and lessen their number and strength: by which means the kingdom of Song, which had subsisted 381 years, under 32 princes, was destroyed by the kings of Tsi and Tsu; and the principality of Lu, which had been governed by 34 sovereigns, was subdued by the king of Tsu.

Dethroned by the king of Tsin.

HAVING thus far opened the way to the imperial diadem, Chau-syang began to discover his designs, by offering a public sacrifice to the lord of heaven, with the same ceremonies as the emperors alone were allowed to use: neither was there any prince powerful or courageous enough to controul him in it, except the king of Tsi; but his army was so small, that Chau-syang with ease defeated him; immediately after which, he sent part of his forces to dethrone the emperor. The unfortunate monarch, who had but few forces to oppose him, was likewise defeated at the first attack, and forced, in order to save his life, to submit himself to the conqueror's mercy, to own him for his sovereign, and to yield him the few cities which remained in his hands. He retired immediately after into the province of Shan-si, and died there a year after, in the 59th year of his reign; upon which, several princes hastened to go and pay their homage to Chau-syang. On the other hand, there were not wanting a others who still adhered to the family of Chew, and raised a grandson of the brother of Kau-vang to the throne.

XXXV. CHEW-KYUN, immediately upon his accession, sent to demand what assistance he could get, to make head against the usurper, and particularly from the kings of Tsi, Tsu, and Gbey, but they were too fearful of disobliging the new emperor to send him any; so that, seeing himself abandoned, and without hopes of maintaining himself on the throne, he chose to relinquish it, and end his life in a private state, after a troublesome reign of seven, or, according to others, nine years. Chau-syang did not long enjoy his new dignity, but died even before his rival had abdicated it. His son Hyau-veng-vang died also in the same year; but left the crown to his son Chwang-syang-vang, who, put an end to the third, and became the founder of the fourth, dynasty.

The fourth dynasty, called Tsin, or Cin, consisting of only four emperors within the space of forty-three years.

c CHWANG-SYANG-VANG began his reign with making an inroad into the kingdom of Gbey; in which he was so successful, and won so many battles, that those of Han, Tsu, Hyen, Chau, and Tsin, being afraid of being stripped likewise of their dominions, formed a confederacy against him; and, with an army of 200,000 men, gave him a total overthrow, and obliged him to quit his new conquests. The emperor died soon after, in the third year of his reign, and left the crown to his adopted son Shi-wang-ti, who is affirmed by the Chinese historians to have been born twelve months after his conception^a.

II. SHI-WHANG-TI, alias Ching, owed his good fortune, on his coming to the crown, to the ambition and jealousy which began to reign among the above-mentioned princes, which made them break off a confederacy which might otherwise have defeated all his measures; whereas the mutual wars which they waged gave him a fair opportunity of subduing them one after another, extirpating all the males of their families and tribes (Z), re-uniting all those principalities under him, and reducing them from thenceforth into so many dependent states of his empire. To these he added soon after so many other new conquests, that he divided the whole into 36 provinces (A); and having observed, in visiting his empire, that the northern ones of Shen-si, Shan-si, and Pe-che-li, were much exposed to the incursions of the Tartars, he first sent a formidable army against these invaders; and, having driven them far enough beyond his frontiers, set about his projected scheme of securing them for the future by the famed wall which we have elsewhere described^b. But as neither this stupendous work, which of itself would have been sufficient to eternize his fame, nor his great success and conquests, could satisfy his ambitious mind, unless he could obliterate the glorious deeds of all his predecessors, and stand as it were alone in the Chinese annals a fit object of admiration and praise; he published a decree, expressly commanding all his subjects, upon pain of death, to burn all the records of the kings, and all the writings of Confucius, Mencius, &c. which transmitted the virtues and actions of those illustrious emperors, excepting only such as treated of physic and architecture.

This decree, the baseness of which he endeavoured to conceal under divers specious pretences (B), was executed with the utmost strictness by the governors of the provinces; and

(Z) His revenge displayed itself still more against the king of Tsi, whom he caused to be shut up in a park planted with nothing but pine-trees; and allowed him such a small pittance, as quite drove him into despair; so that he refused it, and starved himself. On the other hand, the king of Han, by a timely submission, and surrender of himself, troops, and dominions, not only avoided the fate of the rest, but became a great favourite of that monarch, and ended his days at his court, with all the marks of distinction that belong to his rank (22).

(A) The Chinese pretend, that about this time the islands of Japan and Bengal were discovered and colonized by them. The account they give has too much the air of a fable to be depended upon; we shall therefore postpone the further disquisition about it till we come to speak of those islands in the sequel.

(B) One of his pretences was, that those books, though useful when the empire was divided among various sovereigns, in order to have the subjects all governed by the same laws; yet, as it was now under one monarch, the same spirit ought to govern and animate the whole. Besides, added he, those sciences, to which such vast numbers of men apply themselves, serve rather to encourage sloth and idleness, to the neglect of agriculture, which is the fountain of happiness to the people. He charged moreover those antient books with containing in them the seeds of rebellion and sedition, and those who studied them as men ever ready to promote it; inasmuch as if a wise prince's commands were not exactly agreeable to those antient laws, as it must frequently happen, since they must necessarily vary according to the several occasions and emergencies for which they were given, those learned men took the liberty rashly to condemn his conduct, and, with their seditious reflections, kindled a spirit of disobedience and rebellion (23).

many persons of virtue and learning were put to death for concealing those valuable records ; a though it is not improbable, that, in so vast an empire, some few copies might be still privately preserved, and come to light after the death of that tyrannic prince, whose memory has been odious to all posterity ever since. But as to what relates to the recovery of those antient records, we shall refer our reader to what hath been already said on that head^c ; from which it will easily appear, that the regret which the Chinese to this day express for that loss can only relate to some of the inferior, but not at all to those of the classic and canonic kind^d.

SHI-WANG-TI, after a war which had lasted near 25 years, settled such a profound peace in his empire, that he had leisure enough to new-model that government, by abrogating and mending some laws, and enacting others, as he thought fit : and, as he had several children, b some of his ministers advised him to erect new principalities for the maintenance of the younger sort ; but he, putting them in mind of the great troubles they had caused in former dynasties, chose rather to build them palaces in several cities, where they should be maintained according to their rank at the emperor's charge, but without any authority over the people ; which method hath been followed almost ever since, except that in the latter reigns they have been obliged to reside in the metropolis, and to follow the court. As he could not endure to be idle, he resolved upon making a new progress through the eastern provinces of the empire, and took his second son with him : but he fell sick upon the road, and, finding himself near his end, wrote a letter to his eldest son, whom he declared his successor. This, together with the seals of the empire, he delivered up to his second son, charging him to bear c them to his brother ; and died soon after, in the thirty-seventh year of his reign.

III. EUL-SHI, alias Ul-xi, instead of obeying his father's command, resolved to place the crown upon his own head ; and having with some difficulty, engaged the prime minister Li-tse, then in great authority, to his side, easily got the suffrages of the rest by his means. The eldest son raised some forces against him, in order to maintain his right ; but, finding that most of the provinces had declared for Eul-shi, was forced to submit ; and, the step he had taken being deemed treasonable, was ordered to kill himself. This perfidy and parricide met with the reward they deserved ; and that infatuated prince, taking a Ko-lau for his prime minister and confidant, who was a private enemy to the whole imperial family, was by him d persuaded to discard all his best friends, under pretence that they presumed to condemn his too great love of pleasure, and filling their places with his own creatures. A general discontent soon followed through the empire, occasioned by the exactions of the governors and ministers ; and one of the generals, who had been sent to quell some provinces, proved the very first who caused a revolt in favour of the son of the elder brother. About this time appeared the famed Lieu-pang, who, from a private soldier, was become captain of a company of Banditti ; and was a bold, courageous man, eloquent and active, and an enemy to the emperor's luxury. He had been saluted emperor by a great physiognomist, who, as a pledge of the certainty of his prediction, gave him his daughter, one of the greatest beauties in the whole empire, in marriage. It was not long before Lieu-pang was applied to by one e of the governors for assistance against the revolted general, who designed to seize on the kingdom of Tsin for himself, and was going to besiege one of the cities of it. The very name of Lieu-pang was by that time become so dreaded, that he easily made that general retire ; but the treacherous governor, seeing himself rid of him, shut up the gates against his deliverer. Presently after there happened a sedition in the city ; of which Lieu-pang having got notice by an arrow shot into the camp, scaled the walls, and took it ; and, the governor being killed in the action, the inhabitants declared for him, and he entered the place in triumph ; and, from a captain of vagabonds, became general of an army, and master of a rich booty, and began now to cherish the hopes of his advancement to the empire.

ALL this while the perfidious Ko-lau kept the emperor drowned in pleasure, whilst he pursued his own destructive measures, and indulged his creatures in all kind of rapine, which f were grown to such a height, that several provinces revolted before he had reigned two years, and chose their own sovereigns, particularly the kingdoms of Tsi, Yen, Chau, Ghey, and Tsu, which had been destroyed by Shi-wang-ti, rose up anew ; and the king of Tsu, having chosen Lieu-pang for his general, sent him with two others, and with each a powerful army, against the emperor, with a promise of giving the kingdom of Tsin to any of the three that should seize on the metropolis, and drive the tyrant out of it. Eul-shi sent a powerful army against them, which was defeated by one of them named Hyang-hya ; and the rest, not being able to obtain a reinforcement from the Ko-lau, went over to the conqueror. The Ko-lau, fearing this defection might discover his treachery, found no surer way of avoiding the due punishment of it, than by causing the unfortunate emperor to be assassinated by a ruffian, in the twenty-fourth year of his age, and third of his reign ; and, to conceal his having a hand in it, placed Ing-wang, the grand nephew of the deceased emperor, on the throne.

- a IV. ING-WANG, alial Ing, had not enjoyed the crown three days, before he discovered the Ko-lau to be the murderer of the emperor; but, as he dared not to act openly against such a powerful minister, he feigned himself to be sick, and sent for him, and ordered him to be stabbed as he entered the apartment; soon after which, his whole kindred, to the third generation, underwent the same fate; by which the empire was delivered from a rapacious monster, and his adherents. This did not deter Lieu-pang from pursuing his design, and marching against him. Ing-wang, on the other hand, raised an army, and strengthened it with a good number of veterans which he drew out of several of his garrisons. But Lieu-pang found means to alienate them, by sending a vast number of troops among them, under the notion of deserters; and, as soon as he found the imperial army ready to revolt in his favour, came suddenly upon, and easily defeated it. The emperor, finding himself thus abandoned, threw himself at his feet, and delivered up to him the seals, and other insignia of the imperial dignity, after he had reigned only forty-five days; and Lieu-pang entered the city in triumph, which he delivered up to be plundered by his troops; but with an express order, that they should not use any of the inhabitants ill. After that, he marched strait to the palace, where he found an immense treasure; and caused himself soon after to be proclaimed emperor, and became the founder of a new dynasty.

- c I. LIEU-PANG at first took only the title of king of Tsin, the capital of which he had lately taken, and exchanged his own name for that of Kau-tsu. But he had a rival who caused him much trouble, viz. the general Hyang-byu, lately mentioned, a man of an haughty and brutish nature, who, notwithstanding his pretended reconciliation to him, set the city and imperial palace on fire, committed many dreadful outrages on the tombs and bodies of the deceased kings of Tsin; and with his own hand murdered the dethroned emperor, under pretence that Lieu-pang had shewed him too much respect. He committed many other bloody murders and outrages, which, as they rendered him odious to all the foldiers, so they served as a foil to set off the justice, moderation, and clemency of Lieu-pang.
- d HYANG-HYU resolved next to murder the king of Tsu, to whom he owed his advancement, and to make a bold push for the empire; and marched towards the city of Kyew-kyang, in the province of Kyang-si, where that prince then resided; who, suspecting nothing of his treacherous design, came out to meet him, and was assassinated upon the spot. Lieu-pang, grieved at the murder of his noble benefactor, ordered the most magnificent obsequies to be performed to him; and, from that time, became a sworn enemy to Hyang-byu. These two had many a bloody contest for the imperial diadem; in one of which Lieu-pang having totally defeated him, the traitor slew himself, to avoid falling into his hands. This put an end to the war; and the states of the empire, being convoked, declared Lieu-pang emperor under the name of Kau-tsu. He kept his court at first in the province of Shen-si, but removed it afterwards to that of Ho-nan, where it continued the space of ninety-six years, under twelve emperors. He reigned twelve years; and, in his last sickness, nominated his son Whey-ti his successor, and appointed him a set of ministers in whom he might confide.
- e II. WHEY-TI, alies Hoey, was a prince who had many good qualities, but they were all unfortunately swallowed up, partly by his excessive love of women, and partly by his too great complaisance to his ambitious mother, whom he intrusted with the sole care of the empire, and who became odious to the whole nation for her cruelties towards those she did not like, and whom she commonly caused to be dispatched by poison. She went so far as to attempt to poison the king of Tsi, who was the emperor's elder brother, and was come to visit him in his sickness; but was happily prevented by the emperor, who snatched the cup out of his hand. Whey-ti reigned but seven years, and died oppressed with the many infirmities which his loose life had brought upon him. Lyeu-bew, his mother, fearing lest one of his brothers should be set on the throne, gave out that she had a child (which was a boy she had bought of a country-woman), and declared him emperor, and herself his guardian; and, to avoid being discovered, caused the mother to be strangled.
- f LYU-HEW, alias Liu-beva (C), was no longer suffered to bear the imperial title than it suited with the tyrannic views of his pretended mother, that is, about eight years; at the end of which she caused him to be murdered, and by that means discovered the secret artifice which her ambition had prompted her to. She had, by that time, raised a great many of her relations, from the lowest rank, to the highest dignities in the empire, and some of them to the sovereignty of provinces, for which they were to pay her homage; and all of them had behaved so insolently in their high stations, that the nobles had combined together to reduce them to their pristine obscurity, when that wicked princess was taken away by a sudden death, and delivered the nation both from her tyranny, and from that of her creatures, who were all massacred throughout the empire. The states immediately proceeded to the election of a new emperor; and raised Ven-ti, the second son of Kau-tsu, who was then sovereign of a small state, to that dignity.

III. VEN-TI proved so wise and virtuous a prince, that he quickly recovered the splendor of the imperial dignity, and restored peace and wealth throughout the realm. His frugality was such, that he forbade all utensils of gold and silver to be used in his palace, and the wearing of silks to his wives. He likewise remitted the duty upon salt, and one half of the other ordinary taxes; and ordered all the old people in every city to be maintained at his own expence. He ordered the copper money, which was no-where coined but in the metropolis, to the great disadvantage of the subjects, especially of those who lived at a distance from it, to be every-where struck; and prescribed the form of it, as we have elsewhere described it^c.

reign.

His next care was, to restore and encourage agriculture, which had been in some measure ruined during the late wars, and vouchsafed to cultivate the earth with his own hand, by which he also in some measure ennobled that profession. He revived the silk manufacture in his own palace, and obliged his empress and wives to set an example to other ladies of his realm. He was no less an encourager of learning; and permitted the books, which had been saved from the common destruction, to be sought out, and made public. In his reign the making of paper with ground bamboes, and Chinese ink and pencils, such as have been in use ever since, and have been formerly described[†], were found out; and the Tartars, who had taken the advantage of the late distractions to make several inroads into the empire, were stoutly repulsed, and driven at a great distance from his frontiers. He became at length so famed for his wisdom, virtue, and good government, that the most distant nations sought his friendship; and several provinces, particularly those of Quang-tong and Quang-si, voluntarily submitted themselves to his laws, and paid him homage and tribute. He died in the forty-sixth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign, and was succeeded by his son (D).

IV. KING-TI, alias Hiao-king, was no less remarkable for the mildness of his reign than his father; and one of his first acts was, to mollify the severity of the punishments which were then inflicted on certain criminals. However, as agriculture was so well restored by this time, he revived the taxes which his father had reduced to one half; alleging, that the treasury ought to be put in a condition to support the expences of the state. An unhappy accident, which happened soon after, had like to have been attended with fatal consequences to him: His eldest son having, as was then usual, given a feast to a number of young princes, amongst whom was one who was his great favourite, they carried their debauch so high, that it came to a quarrel, in which the emperor's son stabbed his favourite to death; upon which the father of the deceased swore he would be revenged on the imperial family; and engaged six tributary princes in his quarrel, who actually joined forces with him. It was on this occasion that the emperor sent the general A-fu, mention in the last note, with a powerful army against them, who had the address to draw them into a province where they could scarcely get any provision; whilst himself was well fortified in his camp, and had plenty of all things. When the confederates found that they must either fight or be famished, they agreed to attack his camp on all sides at once. They were, however, stoutly repulsed, and fell into a disorderly flight; but were pursued with such terrible slaughter, that the six princes were either slain by the imperial soldiers, or killed themselves, to avoid falling into their hands. King-ti reigned seventeen years, and was succeeded by his son.

His great moderation.

V. VU-TI, alias Hi-a-ow, was endowed with most excellent qualities, but naturally warlike, as his last name expresses it; and, to indulge that inclination, sent for all the wise philosophers, to consult with them about the conquest of some neighbouring country: but was greatly surprised to find them all against it, and to prefer peace before the most just war, which sooner or later proves fatal to a state. He did however yield to their advice; and

[†] Ibid. p. 605, & seq.

(D) The only fault this excellent prince is accused of, is, his having been weak enough to give credit to an impostor, who presented him with a costly liquor, the drinking of which he affirmed would render him immortal. However, when he found himself dying, he is recorded to have expressed himself thus to his son: "Should my death be followed by any war, as there is but too much reason to fear, be sure you take the

" general A-fu into your council, and commit every thing to his care: make no doubt of his long-tryed fidelity; and, as for his martial skill, I can only assure you, that he has not his equal in the whole Chinese empire." This advice proved of excellent use to the young prince, who might otherwise have lost his life and crown, as we shall see in the sequel.

a gave himself wholly to the cares of his government, which he only relieved at proper times by hunting; but even here, considering that his parks took up too much ground, and were a loss to the people, he contracted them into a narrower compass. He made several whole-some laws and regulations; and ordained, among other things, that, when a prince died, his estate should be equally divided among his children; and that, when any died without lawful heirs, their sovereignties should revert to the crown.

He was a great encourager of learning, and of the republishing those books that had escaped the public ruin, which he caused to be taught in the schools, together with the morals of Confucius and Mencius. His greatest foible was, his fondness for some impostors, who ^{Foible for im-} promised him immortality by the drinking of a certain liquor of their own making; and by ^{postors.} whom he had been persuaded to build a palace all of the most fragrant woods; and in the midst of it a brazen tower, in which he and they spent much time and pains in preparing that precious panacea. He was likewise inclined to listen too much to some pretended magicians, who promised to perform wonders before him (E), and for which he was justly rallied by the wiser sort. The Tartars having roused his martial genius by some fresh inroads, he ^{Conquests.} gained four signal victories over them, and drove them beyond the wall. From thence he carried his successful arms into the kingdoms of Pegu, Siam, Camboya, and Bengal, and divided his conquests among his generals, and other officers, who had helped to subdue them*. He built several cities there, and gave two of his generals the title of kings, who, by contracting in time the manners and inclinations of the Tartars, became the greatest enemies to their native country. A little before his death he nominated one of his sons by a concubine, ^{Death.} then but eight years old, to succeed him; and gave him for a guardian one of his ministers, in whom he placed an entire confidence; and, to prevent his empress raising any troubles in favour of her son, condemned her to death on some pretence or other, and only gave her the choice of it. Vu-ti reigned fifty-four years, and was succeeded by his son above-mentioned.

VI. CHAU-TI, alias Hiao-chan, though so very young, gave the greatest marks of a most excellent disposition; he was very observing of his wife guardian's instructions, and no less liberal to those who faithfully served the state. A dearth happening in his reign, he not only remitted the usual taxes of grain, but assisted his indigent subjects with corn for their subsistence. ^{VI. Chau-ti. Year of the 44th cycle, 36. Before Christ, 86.} He next concluded an honourable peace with the Tartars; but died soon after, to the great regret of his people, in the thirteenth year of his reign; and, leaving no issue, was succeeded by his uncle Hyau-ti, with the consent of the whole nation. However, he, proving a very debauched prince, without either affection for his subjects, or regard for his most faithful counsellors, was soon after deposed by them, stripped of all ensigns of the imperial dignity, and sent to the little sovereignty whence they had called him to the empire, after a short reign of seven months. The states chose in his stead,

VII. SWEN-TI, alias Si ven, the grandson of the emperor Vu-ti, who had been educated in a prison with the empress his mother, to which she had been confined on an unjust suspicion of destroying the princes and princesses of the blood by witchcraft. Here his misfortunes enabled ^{VII. Swen-ti. Year of the 44th cycle, 48. Before Christ, 74.} him to learn many excellent lessons from her, which made him worthy of the empire; and his keeper took such particular care of him, that, upon his accession to the throne, he rewarded him with a principality. He was mild and compassionate, easy of access, and assiduous to the affairs of state. He revived the office of censors, which had been suppressed by his predecessors; caused exact information to be brought to him of the behaviour of his ministers; gave frequent audience to his subjects, especially to the widows and orphans; and encouraged more particularly memorials being presented to him, because they gave him more leisure to examine ^{His mild government. Makes some wholesome regulations.}

* See before, pass.

(E) With relation to the first sort of those impostors, we are told, that one of them having set some of that liquor before him in a cup, one of his ministers, who had tried in vain to cure him of his credulity, took it up, and drank it; upon which the emperor in a violent passion, threatened to put him to death; to which he replied, with a smile, How can you put me to death, if this liquor hath made me immortal; and, if it hath not, how can such a poor theft deserve it? This answer disarmed his resentment, but did not cure him of his foible.

As to the magicians, of whom he was no less fond, one of them having promised to shew him a favourite concubine, whom he affirmed to have passed, after her death, into the world of the moon, where she enjoyed the effects of the immortalizing liquor, caused a tower to be built, into which he pretended he would cause her to descend by his art, as often as the emperor pleased. The experiment was tried, and that monarch assisted at the conjuring ceremony; but, the immortal lady proving deaf to the call, the magician was forced to have recourse to the following stratagem: Having caused a piece of white silk (whereon he had written the reasons why the concubine could not descend to him) to be swallowed up by a cow, he told the emperor, in a pretended surprize, and fearful tone, that that beast was pregnant with some strange wonder, and desired that she might be cut open. It was done accordingly, and the piece of silk found in her maw; but the handwriting proving to be that of the conjurer, he was put to death. This story, we are told, hath served for a subject of several comedies (24).

the case than by an audience. He reduced the multitude of laws to a certain number of articles; and abrogated the rest, as tending only to perplex matters, and perpetuate suits.

*Diffuaded from

In his reign the Indian princes, whom his grandfather had subdued, shook off the yoke; and he was preparing to march against them, but was dissuaded from it by his ministers, who reminded him, that the blood of his subjects ought to be dearer to him than any conquests; and that those, who refused the blessing of his wise government, were unworthy of it. There happened in his time some dreadful earthquakes, which rent whole mountains asunder, filled up vallies, and spread an universal terror through that whole superstitious nation, which looked upon them as forerunners of greater evils. Some time after a Tartarian king sent an embassy to Swen-ti, which was at first suspected of some sinister views; but upon its appearing, by the rich furs they brought with them, and the homage they came to pay him, that the intent of their coming was only to promote a mutual commerce, they were graciously received, and treated as envoys of an ally. Swen-ti reigned twenty-five years, and was succeeded by his son.

VIII. YWEN-TI, alias Iuen, is justly celebrated for his love of learning and learned men; for his tender regard for his subjects; and, above all, for his singular frugality, which made him discard a great number of superfluous domestics, with respect to furniture, diet, stables, equipage, &c. according to a favourite maxim he seldom lost sight of, That he, who could be contented with a little, would want nothing. He was however unhappy in the indiscrete choice he made of his ministers, whom he raised chiefly for their politeness and eloquence, without any other regard to their wisdom or experience; by which means his court was filled with factious sycophants, who drew him into all their measures, and got him by degrees to turn all the men of virtue and merit out of his service. He was guilty of another and grosser piece of injustice with regard to the troops which guarded the great wall, who beheaded the Tartarian princes whom they took prisoners as they were hunting on the mountains; for, instead of punishing their commander for his treachery (the former peace with that nation still subsisting), he rewarded him for it. This had like to have brought on a new war; the successor of one of those princes being then levying a numerous army, and making a powerful confederacy, against him; to ward off which, he was obliged to give him a princess of the imperial family in marriage, with a very rich dower. This storm was scarcely over, when he perceived that a more dangerous war was ready to break out, within the empire, among the numerous parties formed by the ministers, the apprehension of which is supposed to have hastened his death. He reigned sixteen years, and died in the forty-third year of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

Several of his ministers, having represented to him the discredit of such a shameful alliance, were all put to death. Many other brutal crimes he was guilty of; and many more he would have committed, had not a sudden death (F) put an end to his odious reign in the twenty-sixth year of it. In his reign Tan-gu, king of the Tartars, came in person to pay homage to him, and to confirm the peace which either he or his predecessor had made with the emperor Swen-ti. He was received in a magnificent manner, and a firm peace renewed between the two nations. He began with discarding his associates, and other persons of virtue and merit; then erected several principalities, which he bestowed on his own creatures; and at length caused some poison to be mixed with the emperor's food, which in a few days brought him to the last extremity. All this while the traitorous villain pretended to be under the deepest concern for him; offered sacrifices for his recovery, filled the air with the bitterest cries, and even devoted his own life for that of his prince, by which means his treason went unsuspected; especially as he did, after his death, place the crown on a young prince descended from Swen-ti, the seventh emperor of this dynasty.

VANG-MANG, having thus seized on the crown, gave his family the name of Tsin, which signifies New, as well as a new face to the empire, by the innovations he made in it. He divided it into nine provinces; and every province into districts, the government of which he gave to his own creatures: he likewise erected some principalities, to increase the number of his dependents. By these, and other such precautions, he thought his authority so firmly settled, that nothing could wrest it from him; when on a sudden he saw the empire all in a flame, and several armies marching against him, some commanded by the confederate lords, and others by the two brothers Lyew-siew and Lyew-ing, of the family of Han. These wars proved long and bloody, and attended at length with an almost universal famine, occasioned chiefly by the grasshoppers devouring the harvest; and this brought on fresh insurrections and robberies, which ended in the death of the usurper. His army was defeated, his palace forced, plundered, and burnt, his throat cut, his body mangled in pieces, and his head stuck on a pitchfork, and exposed to the view and diversion of the populace. Thus fell that base tyrant, after he had usurped the crown fourteen years. The victorious army, resolving to restore it to some worthy prince of the royal family, elected Whay-yang-vang to that dignity, who was a descendant of King-ti, the fourth monarch of this dynasty.

He was no less a patron to learned men, whom he invited to his court, and raised to considerable employments. His reign, however, was disturbed with some powerful and stubborn factions, which took him up near twelve years in reducing, though, in the success he had against them, he used such singular moderation, as made him the more admired and loved by all. He removed his court from Shen-si to Ho-nan; and the Chinese records mention a total eclipse of the sun, in the last day of the seventh moon of the 46th, or, according to Du Halde, the fortieth, cycle, which they pretend to have happened sooner than it ought to have done, according to their calculations (G). Quang-vu died in the sixty-first year of his age, after he had reigned thirty-three years; and left ten sons behind him, one of whom succeeded him.

(G) If this wonderful eclipse was the same which happened at the crucifixion of Christ (26), the Chinese annalists should rather have said contrary to, than before, their calculation; for it happened in the full moon, or when she was in opposition to the sun, and so could not cause that total darkness; and this a Chinese astronomer could not but know to be contrary to nature.

It is therefore probable, either that some error hath crept into the Chinese annals, or that the translator might mistake the word, and render it before, instead of contrary to. As to the supernatural one at our Saviour's crucifixion, we shall refer our readers to what has been said of it in a former part of this work (27).

His mother's excellent reign.

XIX. NGAN-TI being but thirteen years of age, his mother was appointed his guardian, and vested with the imperial dignity, which she preserved beyond the term prescribed by the laws, that she might do the more good to the people. It was then a time of great scarcity, and many of them must have perished, if she had not timely assisted them. She condescended to visit the poor, even as far as the prisons, to give them relief. Considering, in the next place, that an empire of such vast extent, as it now was, could not easily be preserved, she released a great number of conquered nations, and sovereign princes, from the usual homage and tribute, and reduced the Chinese dominions to narrower bounds (H). Her son married a lady, who, finding herself barren, took another woman's son as her own, to succeed to the crown; and, to prevent discovery, secretly poisoned his mother. Ngan-ti reigned nineteen years, and was succeeded by that son.

XX. SHUN-TI, the son of Ngan-ti, by a concubine, signalized the first years of his reign by several victories over the barbarians; and deprived the late empress of the funeral obsequies, for having poisoned his mother. He made a law, in the fourth year of his reign, which excluded men from the magistracy, except they were forty years old, or had some extraordinary merit to supply the want of age. In the ninth year of the cycle, one Ma-myen formed a considerable army of vagabonds, who plundered the cities and country, and, flushed with success, made a bold push for the imperial dignity; but was defeated, and slain, before he could accomplish his design. The emperor died in the nineteenth year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son.

This saying cost him his life; and Lyang-ki, justly fearing his resentment, XXIII. WHAN-TI proved a weak prince, and a patron of the sect of Lai-kyün, formerly spoken of². Under him the magistracy became venal, and the eunuchs were his chief favourites; which made all the learned men retire from his palace; nor could all his fresh invitations bring them back. Lyang-ki, the murderer of the late emperor, and his wife, was raised to the highest honours, in which he behaved with such pride and insolence, that he even ventured into the palace with his sword by his side, contrary to the laws. He was; however, forgiven; upon his submission; but being become odious to all, and especially to the eunuchs, who now ingrossed the whole power, his house was so closely besieged with a troop of them, that, finding no way to escape them, he killed his wife and himself. In the twenty-eighth year of this cycle, there happened such a dreadful famine in several parts of the empire, that the people were obliged to feed on human flesh. The emperor died in the thirty-sixth year of his age, and twenty-first of his reign. He left no issue, though he had a great many concubines, and was succeeded by a prince of the family of Chang-ti. XXIII.

XXIV. LING-TI betrayed a still greater fondness for eunuchs, and raised them to a higher pitch of power, whilst he shewed no less an aversion against those who were able to give him better counsel. He was, moreover, a prince of unsatiable avarice, sarcastical wit, and a sour humorist (I). The only good thing recorded of him, is his causing the wise instructions of the ancient emperors, contained in the five classical books, to be engraven on marble tables, and publicly exposed at the entrance of the academy. But the intolerable insolence of the eunuchs had rendered him so odious, great numbers of the nobility being put to death for endeavouring to suppress it, that, in a little time, several great armies appeared in the field, who styled themselves yellow caps, and were commanded by three brothers, who plundered several provinces; but were at length defeated and slain one after another. Some barbarian troops (so they call all strangers) made likewise several attempts on the frontiers; but were likewise defeated, as were also some remains of the yellow caps; about the fifth year of the following cycle, by an experienced general, who is reported never to have gone into a bed all the ten years that the wars lasted. Ling-ti died the year after, in the thirty-fourth of his age, and twenty-second of his reign, without naming his successor. d XXV. HYEN-TI had an elder brother, named Pyen-ti, who mounted the throne after Ling-ti's death; but, after a few months reign, resigned it to him; and is not therefore numbered among the other emperors. Hyen-ti was then but young, and his weakness and indolence, if not rather stupidity, proved the occasion of perpetual wars, both at home and abroad. China was divided first into three, and then into four parts, under as many sovereigns. The eastern part rebelled against Tong-che, general of the imperial army, who had murdered the emperor and his brother, burned the palace, and opened the imperial sepulchres, where he found an immense treasure, and then removed his court into the province of Shen-si. His crimes did not go long unpunished; he was murdered the year after, his body hung on a fork in the public market place, and all his riches confiscated. The yellow caps had likewise taken advantage of the reigning disorders, and were grown very numerous; but these were gradually cut off by Tsau-sau, who usurped the imperial authority. This last was stripped of it in the thirty-seventh year of the cycle, by his own son Tsau-poi, and banished into a small principality, which he gave him, where he died, fourteen years after, generally despised. Hyen-ti reigned thirty-one years; and with him ended the fifth dynasty. (I) Among other of his humorous whimsies, he is said to have established a fair in his own palace, for selling all sorts of curiosities, and to have taken a singular delight in seeing his concubines out-bid, wrangle, and abuse each other. Another diversion he took delight in, was in taking the air in his gardens, in a chariot drawn by asses; whence those creatures came to be preferred every-where to horses, in imitation of the court (29).

Hew-ti.

II. HEW-TI's reign proved a troublesome one, through the wars that raged among the other sovereigns, in which himself lost two famed generals, Chang-si and Quang-yu, the latter of whom is idolized as the Chinese Mars. Ko-lyang received likewise several defeats from the king of Gbey, though he always made a good retreat, at which he was most expert. That prince marched next with a prodigious army against the confederate kings of Han and U, with an intent to strip them of their territories; but, being come to the borders of the river Yang-tse-kyang, whose waves were then very rough and boisterous, he cried out, Doubtless these are the bounds which heaven hath put to the ambition of mortals; and immediately marched back. He was soon after defeated, by his own rebellious general Song-chau, who flushed with his many successes, as well as the great sway he had over the army, resolved to make his way to the imperial dignity. Upon which Hew-ti's son, seeing things in that desperate condition, went to his father: "There is," said he, "now no room to deliberate; and this moment must decide your fate, either to vanquish, or die with this sword in your hand, and your crown on your head." But the emperor wanting courage to give Song-chau battle, the young prince did so take it to heart, that, retiring into the hall of his ancestors, he first killed his wife, and then himself. Soon after this, the imperial army was cut in pieces, the palace plundered, and the cowardly emperor went and delivered himself into the hands of the conqueror, who gave him a small principality, in which he lived seven years an obscure and contemptible life, and died in the sixty-fifth year of his reign, and with him ended the sixth dynasty.

I. SHI-TSU-VU-TI was the son of the rebel Song-chau, which name he took upon his becoming the founder of this new dynasty. He kept his court in the province of Ho-nan; and was a magnanimous prince, had a quick apprehension, sound judgment, and was a professed enemy to all dissimulation. His reign was much disturbed by the warlike preparations of many petty princes who aspired to the imperial dignity; but the southern were often defeated by the northern ones, who, besides their being more hardy soldiers, were assisted by the Tartars, with whom they were in league. However, he subdued the latter, and then immediately marched into the southern provinces; and, having passed the river Yang-tse-kyang without any opposition, he besieged the metropolis of the kingdom of U, whose king, not being in a condition to oppose him, surrendered himself to him; and had a little state assigned to him, where he ended his days. He had scarcely reigned seven years before he found himself master of the whole empire, and out of danger of any enemy; and resolved thenceforth to enjoy the repose which his victories had procured him. He not only gave himself up to idleness and pleasure, but was indiscrete enough to disband his army, which roused up afresh the ambition of the petty sovereigns. He died in the twenty-fifth year of his reign, and the fifty-fifth of his age, and left a numerous posterity, but was succeeded by his eldest son.

Ruined by an
queen.

II. WHEY-TI's want of genius and ability was in a great measure made up by the abilities of four of his ministers; so that the beginning of his reign proved pretty successful, but the ambition or jealousy of one of his wives, or second queens, who made him remove his empress from the court, poisoned her only son, and caused all the nobles that were of her party to be put to death, soon threw the court and empire into the utmost confusion. Several battles were fought, and a great deal of blood was shed on both sides, till at length this virago was slain in her turn, with all that sided with her, and the emperor forced to flee for his life.

Poisoned.

SEVERAL of the petty kings, taking the advantage of these disorders, took the field; particularly the king of Tsi, who had such success, that he was in a fair way of having seized the imperial crown, but was slain in the attempt. The king of Han did the same in his northern province, and met with the same fate. At last the emperor was poisoned, in the forty-eighth year of his age, and seventeenth of his reign; and, leaving no issue behind him,

(K) He sent for them a little before his death, and addressing himself to his prime minister, named Ko-lyang, said to him: "If my son refuse to pay a due regard to your wise counsel, dethrone him, and reign in his stead." Then to his son he spake to this purpose: "How light soever a fault may seem to you, beware of committing it; and how small soever a virtuous action may appear, neglect not to do it. Virtue alone deserves our attention and pursuit; I have had too little of it, to serve you for an example; but follow the advice of Ko-lyang, and you will find in him a second father." Just before he died, he is reported to have expressed himself in words to this effect: "When a man hath attained to the age of fifty years, he hath no reason to complain of the shortness of his life; why should I then, who am so much past sixty (30)?" (L) Tho' the name of Tsin here seems to be the same with that of the fourth dynasty, yet we are told, they are differently written and pronounced, and have a quite different signification among the Chinese (31).

a the grandees elected the twenty-fifth son of Shi-tsu-vu-ti, founder of this seventh dynasty, for his successor.

III. WHAY-TI was a prince of such endowments as promised a happy reign, but the ambition of the petty kings did not suffer him to enjoy it long enough. One of those reguli, named Lyeu-ywen, was upon the point of dethroning him, when he was prevented by a sudden death; but his son Lyeu-tsung, following his steps, got possession of the palace, and plundered it, slew both the emperor and his son, after he had made the former wait on him at table in the guise of a slave, in the thirtieth year of his age, and sixth of his reign. He died by the means of a second queen, whom, by way of raillery, he had called old woman, though but thirty years of age; which so stung her to the quick, that she was soon revenged of him, he being found stifled in his bed in the twenty-fourth year of his reign. About the same time a mean fellow, named Lyeu-hu, who went selling of shoes about the country, turning soldier, became at last a general of a great army, and powerful enough to murder the emperor, and seize on the imperial dignity. Ngan-ti was killed in the twenty-second year of his reign, and succeeded by his brother; but his reign proved short;

III. VEN-TI was a prince much admired for his meekness, justice, and integrity; but too much bigotted to the Bonzas, whose chief protector he openly declared himself. After several wholesome regulations, by which he fixed himself on the throne, he declared war against the northern emperor (who was by that time grown so powerful, that he had already sixteen petty kings under his subjection), and gained many signal victories over him, by the valour and conduct of his prime minister Tau-tau-tsi; of whom growing afterwards jealous, he caused him to be put to death. The news of the loss of so brave a general soon inspired the northern princes to renew the war; and Ven-ti's troops, deprived of so brave a leader, were defeated in several battles; one especially was fought in the twenty-sixth year of his reign, with such dreadful slaughter on both sides, that the fields were overflowed with Chinese blood. Tay-vu-ti, the northern emperor, who still remained superior to his rival, caused a general massacre to be made of all the Bonzas throughout his own dominions, burnt all their temples, and destroyed their idols. Ven-ti was soon after murdered by his eldest son, in the thirty-fifth year of his age, and thirtieth of his reign: and the parricide served in the same kind by his next brother, who immediately revenged his father's death.

VIII. SHUN-TI, who fell likewise a sacrifice to the ambition of the prime minister above-mentioned, by whom he was murdered in the second year of his reign, and fourteenth of his age; and with him ended the eighth dynasty of Song.

(M) This dynasty and the four following ones, which together go by the name of U-tay, are accounted small in comparison of the others, both with respect to the small number of years, and of the emperors. All this time China was divided into two empires, the northern and southern, each of which had its proper monarchs.

The ninth dynasty, called Tsi, which had five emperors within the space of twenty-three years.

- a I. KAU-TI, having made his way to the throne by the murder of the two foregoing emperors, removed the court to Nan-king, the metropolis of Kyang-nan; but did not long enjoy the fruits of his parricides. He was more remarkable for his learning than his military exploits; and used to say, that if he could but reign ten years, he would make gold as cheap as dirt. Being one day dressed in a habit set over with precious stones, he on a sudden ordered them to be beaten into powder, saying, they were only fit to inspire a man with luxury and avarice. He died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and fourth of his reign, and left the crown to his eldest son.
- II. VU-TI began his reign with enacting a law, that the Mandarins should not hold their places longer than three years; and reviving an old one, which forbade intermarriages between persons of the same name. In his reign appeared the impious philosopher Fan-chin, whose till then unheard-of and impious doctrine is still professed, though privately, by many of the Chinese Literati; though there then and since appeared some of the most learned pens to confute it (N). About the same time Syau-ywen was raised to the dignity of Ko-lau, a man of consummate politics and boundless ambition, who soon after made his way to the throne by the murder of the succeeding monarchs. Vu-ti died in the eleventh year of his reign, and forty-fifth of his age, and was succeeded by the brother of Kau-ti, founder of this dynasty.
- III. MING-TI had been intrusted by his brother with the education of his two younger sons; whom he accordingly raised to the throne, and cut them off one after another in the short space of four months, and seized the crown. At this time the northern empire enjoyed a profound peace; whose monarch was so addicted to study, that, whether in his chariot, chair, or on horseback, he always had a book in his hand. Ming-ti died in the fifth year of his reign, and fortieth of his age, and left the crown to his third son.
- IV. WHEN-LEW proved so debauched and cruel a prince, was so averse to all good counsels, and so governed by his eunuchs, that the ambitious Syang-ywen could not have wished for a better pretence for his aiming at the crown. He accordingly joined with the king of Lyang, and forced into the imperial palace, burnt it to the ground, and built a more magnificent one; dethroned the emperor in the second year of his reign, and nineteenth of his age, and, for form sake, placed his brother Ho-ti on the throne.
- V. HO-TI was not placed on the throne by the traitor to enjoy it long, but that he might have an opportunity of depriving him of both that and his life at once; which he did by that time he had reigned one year; and, seizing on the crown, became the founder of a new dynasty.

(N) He taught, that all the events in the world were the effect of mere chance, that the soul dies with the body, and that the state of men after death is the same with that of brutes.

(O) Syau-ywen, tho' a tyrant and usurper, had governed the empire with such success and approbation near 26 years, when this mad fit came upon him of turning monk, had his head shaved, and wore a coarse garment, and lived upon herbs and rice, that the grandees of the empire in some measure forced him out of his retirement; but, though he returned to his palace, and resumed the government, yet he obstinately continued to live after the manner of the Bonzas; though, according to the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul, he dared not condemn any, even the greatest criminal, to death; which opened a door to licentiousness, and occasioned infinite murders and robberies.

At the same time the Bonzaic sect was in no less esteem in the northern parts. That empire had been a long time divided between two sovereigns, one of the eastern, the other of the western; but were at length united under the king of Tsi and Chew, when the empress of it, named Hu, built a monastery large enough to lodge a thousand Bonzas, and gave it the name of Yong-ching, or perpetual peace.

TOWARDS the latter end of his reign Hew-king, king of Ho-nan, his vassal and tributary, revolted from him; and, having made himself master of Nan-king, seized upon him. The emperor appeared before his conqueror with such majestic intrepidity, that he was not able to look him in the face; but, in a kind of dread, cried out, I could not have believed it so hard to resist a power which heaven has established; so, not daring to imbrue his hands in his blood, condemned him to a more lingering death, by retrenching part of his sustenance every day. He called for a little honey just before his death, to put a bitter taste out of his mouth; and, being denied it, expired in the forty-eighth year of his reign, and eighty-sixth of his age, and was succeeded by his third son.

YWEN-TI had then a Ko-lau, or prime minister, named Cbin-pa-sien, who was also sovereign of a small dominion, and who totally defeated the rebel Hew-king's army, and caused him to be beheaded. But this Ko-lau likewise revolted, and besieged Nan-king, where the emperor, a prince infatuated with the superstitious dreams of the Bonzas, kept his residence; but, being roused up by this rebellion, took a turn round the city-walls, and, seeing all was lost, broke his sword, and burnt his library, which consisted of 140,000 volumes, saying, There was an end of all sciences and military art. This done, he mounted his horse, and went and surrendered himself to the conqueror, who slew him in the third year of his reign, and forty-seventh of his age. He was succeeded by his ninth son.

It was he who ordered the night-watches to be distinguished by the beat of a drum, which method hath been observed ever since: and, finding that his son had not sufficient capacity to reign after him, appointed his own brother, then king of Ngan-chin, to succeed him; but his prime minister, and other grandees, making a strong representation against it, he altered his intention. Ven-ti died in the seventh year of his reign, and fortieth of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

One of his vassal princes having, out of some selfish view, sent him some presents of great value, he, to check his ambition, ordered them to be burnt in his own presence. In his reign the northern emperor having raised Lyang-kyang to the dignity of Ko-lau, and given his daughter in marriage to his son, made him not long after sovereign of the principality of Swi, in which he became so powerful in a few years, that he was in a condition to subdue all China. Swen-ti died in the fourteenth year of his reign, and forty-second of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

The emperor, to avoid falling into his hands, threw himself into a well; but was taken out alive, and dethroned in the seventh year of his reign. The conqueror became the founder of a new dynasty, and changed his name of Yang-kyen for that of Kau-tse-vu-ti.

He was descended from a noble family ; his solid penetrating judgment made amends for his want of learning, and his moderation and temperance gained him the love of his subjects. He reformed music and rhetoric of all that was soft and enervating ; and caused a certain portion of corn and rice to be levied on the subjects, for the support of the poor in time of famine. He was inexorable to the judges that suffered themselves to be corrupted : he had also made a law that punished the smallest larcenies with death ; but was afterwards persuaded to repeal it, as rather too severe ; and, by another, excluded merchants and mechanics from public employments. The preference which he gave to his eldest son, a prince of no merit, whom yet he designed for his successor, so exasperated his second son Yang-ti, that he murdered them both, and, by a double parricide, mounted the throne. Kau-tsu-ven-ti reigned fifteen years, and was slain in the sixty-fourth year of his age. He was however so much respected, that several petty princes put themselves under his protection, and caused the great Chinese wall to be newly repaired. He forbade his subjects to carry arms about them, which policy hath been in force ever since ; and commissioned a hundred of the most learned men to revise and reprint, after the manner of those days, all books treating of war, politics, physic, and agriculture. He likewise founded the degree of doctor, to qualify both the military and literary men for their respective employments. He attacked the Koreans both by sea and land ; and, though his first attempt proved abortive, yet in his next he obliged them, as vassals, to send ambassadors to implore his clemency. He was assassinated in his progress through the southern provinces, in the city of Kyang-nan, by a mean fellow, in the thirteenth year of his reign, and thirty-ninth of his age ; upon which Li-ywen, one of the petty kings, having got together an army of 120,000 men, placed the crown on the head of Kong-ti, grandson to the founder of this dynasty. severe enemy to corrupt judges, and all sorts of bribery; and, in a time of drought and scarcity, published an edict, ordering all his faults to be laid before him, that, by amending them, he might avert the anger of heaven. As to soothsayers, he always shewed a singular contempt for them; but when once, in the second year of his reign, he saw the fields covered with devouring locusts, he cried out with a deep sigh, Alas! I had much rather you would devour my own bowels, than thus destroy the harvest and lives of my poor subjects. On such times as these he would release the prisoners, and grant them a general pardon: though he was very cautious not to offend by too great an indulgence to them, lest, as he used to say, the impunity of the wicked should prove hurtful to the good subjects.

A Christian
ambassy.

In the eighth year of his reign came an ambassy to China, consisting of white men with fair hair and blue eyes, and whose dress, air, and manners, were altogether unknown to the Chinese, and met with a gracious reception at that court. These are supposed to have been those Christians of whom we have given an account in a former section¹, who left the noble monument of Christianity there mentioned, which was afterwards discovered anno 1625; and we find accordingly, that that monarch admitted it to be preached in his dominions in the 12th year of his reign, and even allotted a piece of ground in the imperial city for building a Christian church. In the tenth year of his reign he lost his empress, a princess of most excellent qualities (Q), by whose address he was reconciled to his prime minister, whom he had forbidden his presence for too frequently troubling him with his wife admonitions. The emperor grieved immoderately for her loss, and raised a much more magnificent monument for her than he had done for his own father; but, being checked for it by the faithful Ko-lau afterwards in the seventeenth year of this prince's reign, he caused a noble encomium of his own penning to be engraved on his tomb; after which, turning to his courtiers, he spake to this purport: We have three sorts of mirrors, one for the ladies to dress themselves by; the second, the antient books treating of the rise, progress, and fall, of empires; and the last, wise men, by whose example we form our own conduct: this last I had in the person of my deceased Ko-lau, whom, to my misfortune, I have lost, without hopes of finding another like him. About the latter end of his reign, the Koreans having revolted, he was upon the point of sending a formidable army to reduce them; but was prevented by death, which for a time put a stop to that expedition. He reigned twenty-three years, and died in the fifty-third of his age, leaving a set of the wisest and most excellent instructions to his son and successor.

Fatal fondness for Vu-shi.
Her cruelty and tyranny.

III. KAU-TSONG had reigned five years very peaceably, when he unhappily fell in love with Vu-shi, the young lady mentioned at the end of the last note; and, for her sake, repudiated his empress, and one of his queens, maugre all the remonstrances and opposition of his faithful ministers, and placed her on the throne. She soon discovered, however, that his love for the discarded princesses was far from being obliterated; and, in a fit of jealous rage, caused their hands and feet, and a few days after their heads, to be cut off. It was not long before the horror of her guilt threw her into a dreadful phrensy, in which she fancied herself pursued night and day by the ghosts of those two princesses, which obliged her to be ever shifting from place to place; the emperor, still more enamoured of her than ever, not only indulging her in it, but committing the care of the whole empire to her, and giving her the title of Tyen-bew, or Queen of heaven.

His death.

SHE was no sooner raised to this height of power, than she poisoned her eldest son, that the crown might thereby fall to her brother's children, and her family be settled on the throne; though she was disappointed of her aim: In the latter end of Kau-tsong's reign the Koreans returned to their obedience; and he, after having reigned thirty-four years, during above two thirds of which the Christian religion flourished in several parts of his empire, died in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and appointed his eldest son to succeed him; but he was set aside by his tyrannic empress, to make room for a younger, whom she might govern more at her pire as a father in his family; and I carry my subjects in my bosom as my children; what have I then to fear?

He was indeed so considerate in regard to them, that, having read in a physic-book written by the emperor Whang-ti (32), that a blow or bruise on the shoulders was apt to injure the vital parts, he made a law, still extant, that none should be bastonaded on the back, but on the buttocks (33).

(Q) It is observed of that excellent lady, that, whilst she lived, not one of that vast number of officers which belong to the court was condemned to any severe punishment; which is a circumstance scarcely to be paralleled in the Chinese history. She wrote likewise a book consisting of thirty chapters, on the due behaviour of women in their inner apartments; a piece highly admired, especially by the emperor, who styled it the rule that ought to be observed in all ages, but the sight of which made him the more sensible of his inexpressible loss.

In the eleventh year of his reign he admitted into his palace, probably to supply the place of the deceased empress, a young lady of singular beauty and wit, and about fourteen years of age; who, after his death, retired into a monastery of Bonzesses, whence she was fetched out by his son and successor, and placed on the throne, and became a great tyranness.

a will; for which reason that prince is by the Chinese looked upon as an usurper, and struck out of the list of the monarchs of this dynasty.

VU-HEW was the third son of that ambitious princess; she had poisoned her eldest in the late reign, as hath been hinted, and sent her second, after his father's death, into a small sovereignty, where he lived rather like an exile, whilst this third, whom she declared emperor, had only the name, without the power. When she had settled all things thus to her mind, her next care was to rid herself of all the nobles and grandees whom she suspected not to be in her interest; and, in one day, put a great number of them to death, who were of the best families in the empire. There was raised likewise, under her, a cruel persecution against the Christians, in the fifteenth year of Vu-hew's reign, which lasted fifteen years. Her Ko-lau, a man of virtue and courage, and equally grieved and ashamed of her tyranny and cruelty, did at length present so many noble remonstrances in favour of the lawful heir, who had, by this time, been banished from his throne fourteen years, whilst her other son was only looked upon now, and likely to be transmitted to posterity, as an usurper, that she was at length prevailed upon to recal him, and to assign him the eastern palace for his residence, till the death of Vu-hew, which happened about seven years after; upon which he ascended the throne, from which he had been deprived twenty-one years. A persecution against the Christians. 585.

IV. CHUNG-TSONG shewed himself little deserving of the regard which his father and prime minister had expressed for him, and, giving himself up wholly to pleasure and indolence, left the whole management of the empire to his empress, who had been the faithful companion of his exile. This princess, who, by the advice of the governor of the palace, intended to place her son Shang upon the throne, was strenuously opposed by the princes and petty kings, who took up arms against him. However, the emperor being made away by poison, in the fifth year of his reign, she caused Shang to be proclaimed his successor; but his uncle, who possessed a small principality, having made himself master of the palace, caused her and her daughter to be put to death; upon which Shang found no other way to save his life, than by surrendering the diadem to him. The lawful heir restored.

V. ZHUI-TSONG reigned but two years; during which, nothing is recorded of him, except that he died in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and was succeeded by his third son. IV. Chung-tsung. After Chr. 706.

VI. YIVN-TSONG proved an excellent prince, and the restorer of his family, then upon the brink of ruin. He was a mortal enemy to the luxury then in vogue; and, to shew a good example to his nobles, caused all his gold and silver vessels, and his embroidered cloaths, to be burnt before his palace. He was no less diligent in the promoting of learning; and was the first who honoured such of his generals as had signalized themselves by their services, with the title of petty kings, which used only to be given to princes of the blood. In one of his progresses through the empire, he divided it into fifteen provinces, and did several other public acts. But one blemish is justly cast upon him; viz. his being deaf to the wholesome counsel of his prime minister Ywen-chau, who strove to persuade him to suppress the too great power of his eunuchs, and to abolish the idolatrous sects of Fo and Tau. VI. Yivn-tsung. After Chr. 713.

He had reigned almost thirty years peaceably, when the empire was, all on the sudden, disturbed with some insurrections, his army defeated, with the loss of 70,000 men, whilst all avenues to his throne were so obstructed by his eunuchs, that he knew nothing of it. The author of this rebellion was a foreign prince, named Ngan-lo-shan, whom he had raised to the highest employments, even to the command of his army, and who took the advantage of his successes in the north to assume the imperial title. The palace was, at the same time, in no less a combustion, the emperor having divorced his wife, and put three of her children to death, without any just cause, and married his daughter-in-law. These disasters brought on new ones, and encouraged a band of robbers to attack the imperial army, which they routed with the loss of 20,000 men, the emperor himself being obliged to flee into the province of Se-chwen. He had reigned forty-four years when he made this shameful retreat; and his son So-tsung was obliged to mount the throne during his life, to save the empire from ruin. A rebellion in the north. Disasters in the palace. The emperor's defeat, and flight.

VII. SO-TSONG, being a brave warlike prince, soon destroyed the army of the robbers, and restored the public tranquillity; after which, he brought back his father from Se-chwen, and conducted him to his palace with all the honours due to his rank; but the unhappy prince died soon after, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and left the crown to his more worthy son. In the mean time the rebel Ngan-lo-shan had plundered the palace of Chang-ngan of all its riches, and, among other curiosities, of an hundred elephants and horses which had been taught to dance at the sound of instruments, and to present the emperor with a cup with their mouths. The rebel wanted to see that ceremony performed to himself, but those creatures could not by any means be brought to give him that satisfaction; upon which, in a fit of rage, he ordered them to be killed on the spot. He met, however, soon after with the reward of his treason, being murdered in his bed by his own son, and this by his general. VII. So-tsung. After Chr. 757.

VIII. TAY-TSONG was so successful in the choice of his ministers, that peace was soon restored to the empire, and the rebels reduced: but it was not long before five other tributaries revolted, and made themselves independent. The Tartars likewise, to the number of 200,000, made a dreadful irruption into the empire, in the eighth year of his reign, forced him to flee, and carried away an immense treasure into their own country. The emperor returned soon after into his palace, by the help of his celebrated general Ko tsu-i, a great patron of the Christians (R), and died in the seventeenth year of his reign, and fifty-third of his age, and was succeeded by his eldest son.

IX. TE-TSONG was a timorous and mistrustful prince, who minded only his flatterers; yet so far disinterested, as to refuse some considerable presents offered him from strangers; but he had the misfortune to lose his prime minister and general Ko-tsu-i, who died in the third year of his reign, aged eighty-five years, after he had enjoyed that dignity, with the utmost reputation, during the four foregoing reigns. The whole empire mourned for him, as for a father, three whole years; but the power of the eunuchs, which he had artfully suppressed, whilst he lived, became soon after so formidable, that it occasioned insurrections every-where. The emperor, in order to maintain the vast army he was forced to raise, to suppress them, laid such heavy taxes upon the subjects, as reduced them to the lowest ebb of misery, and occasioned an infinite number of robberies. By good fortune his troops proved every-where victorious, suppressed the rebels, and restored peace and plenty to the people. He reigned twenty-five years, and died in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

XI. HYEN-TSONG was a prince excellently qualified for the dispatch of the most intricate business of the empire, and of such firmness of mind, that nothing could shake him from a good resolution once taken. He was no less tender of his subjects welfare; and, in times of scarcity, had set open his granaries to their relief, sending his nobles through the afflicted provinces, with orders to see that every one was supplied according to their present distress. But he was, beyond measure, addicted to the superstitious follies of the Bonzaic sect, and had let his resentment fall very heavy on such of his ministers as had endeavoured to dissuade him from them. He was no less intoxicated with another notion, which cost him his life; viz. a firm persuasion of his being made immortal by the pretended supernatural liquor which those charlatans pretended to have the true receipt of; and having caused some of it to be brought to him, which is supposed to have been mixed with poison by one of his eunuchs, expired immediately after his taking it, in the 15th year of his reign, and 43d of his age. He left his crown to his son, whom he had appointed his successor.

XII. MO-TSONG was at first opposed by some of the grandees, who designed to place another prince on the throne; but their measures being frustrated, and they put to death, he was indiscreet enough to disband his army, part of which being thereby reduced to great straits, went and lifted themselves among the banditti, and increased their number, and the distress of the people. In his reign the imperial family of Tang, or of this thirteenth dynasty, began to decline apace, and his few successors helped to complete its ruin. He died in the fourth year of his reign, and the thirtieth of his age, after having taken a medicine prepared for him, and was succeeded by his son in the year following.

XIV. VEN-TSONG, a wise and good prince, grew so impatient at the exorbitant power of those eunuchs, that he had taken measures secretly to destroy them; but they being aware of it, fell suddenly on the ministers, and guards of the palace, and slew above a thousand of them, and together with them were several considerable families destroyed, in the ninth year of his reign. This misfortune, and others he foresaw, grieved him to such a degree, that, having in vain tried to alleviate his melancholy, by diversions, drinking, &c. he died of a deep consumption, in the fourteenth year of his reign, and was succeeded by his brother, though he left a son, whom the eunuchs set aside.

XV. VU-TSONG was a prince of a warlike temper, dreading neither danger nor fatigue, and worthy of the preference shewed to him. He drove the Tartars out of the province

(R) His elogy, we are told by the missionaries, is still to be seen in the ancient monument, formerly mentioned, wherein his liberality to the Christian preachers is highly extolled; and he is thought to have been very intru-

a of Shen-si, where they had fortified themselves, and cleared others of the banditti that infested them. He had so excellent a judgment, that he never was deceived in the choice of his ministers. He revived a law, still in force, though little practised, which obliged the Mandarins of the provinces, once in five, or at most seven, years, to send an account to court of all their miscarriages, and to beg the emperor's pardon for them^m; and if any thing was found in their confession either disguised, palliated, or excused, they were to expect no favour, but were immediately turned out. He is said to have suppressed the Christians, who had been so much favoured during some of the former reigns, and to have obliged the Bonzas to return to a secular life. He reigned but six years, and died in the thirty-third year of his age, and was succeeded by the grandson of Hyen-tsung, the eleventh monarch of this dynasty; the eunuchs having rejected his son from reigning after him.

XVI. SWEN-TSONG was no sooner upon the throne than he shewed himself a prince excellently qualified to reign, contrary to the expectation of the eunuchs, who had raised him to it with quite other views. His wisdom, equity, application, and love of his people, made him be looked upon and revered as a second Tay-tsung, the second emperor of this dynasty. All his merit, however, proved insufficient to suppress the power of the eunuchs, though his prime minister put him upon an effectual way of doing it; viz. by shewing himself inexorable to those who were guilty of any fault, and not to supply with new ones the places of those that died: but they, having got intelligence of this design, became such mortal enemies both to the prime minister and prince, that they ceased not to create new troubles against them. That wise monarch is however justly blamed for his fondness for the sect of Tau, and his eagerness of being immortalized by their pretended panacea, notwithstanding all the wise dissuaves of his best ministers; for he had no sooner drank the fatal liquor, than he felt himself devoured by worms that swarmed in his body; and died a few days after, in the thirteenth year of his reign, and fiftieth of his age. He was succeeded by his son, by the interest of the eunuchs.

XVII. I-TSONG soon became odious to all his subjects for his luxury and debaucheries. He reigned fourteen years; and, about three months before his death, caused one of the fingers of the idol Fo to be brought with great solemnity into his palace; and the Chinese attribute his death, and the troubles which ensued, to his stupid devotion for that idol. The eunuchs placed his son on the throne, who was but twelve years old, that they might enjoy the greater sway.

XVIII. HI-TSONG accordingly left the sole management to them; and, whilst he spent his time in music, riding, shooting, and other such diversions, nothing was seen on all sides but tumults and revolts, especially in the northern parts. The people groaned under the heavy load of taxes, and a grievous famine, occasioned by the overflowing of the rivers, and vast swarms of locusts which had destroyed most of the corn; all which still added to the number of the revolters. These had one Wban-tsau at their head, who went and besieged the imperial city; and, having driven their prince out of it, proclaimed their leader emperor, and gave to his family the name of Tsi.

e In the midst of these disasters, the command of the imperial army was given to a young man not above twenty-eight years old, named Li-ke yong, but nicknamed To-yien-long, on account of his being blind of one eye. This youth, however, attacked the rebel army with great valour; and, though repulsed at the first onset, yet rallied his men, and renewed the fight with such vigour, that he totally defeated them, and brought back the emperor in triumph. For this eminent service, he was raised to the principality of Tsin, and his son became soon after the founder of a new dynasty. The emperor died about three months after, in the fifteenth year of his reign, and twenty-seventh of his age; and was succeeded by the sixth son of the last emperor, whom the eunuchs placed upon the throne.

XIX. CHAU-TSONG, a wise and valiant prince, designed, by the help of his prime and other ministers, to have totally abolished the exorbitant power of the eunuchs; when they, on a sudden, having got intelligence of it, came unawares upon him with their soldiers, seized on his person, confining him in a remote apartment under a strong guard, leaving him only a hole in the wall for conveying his food to him.

The prime minister Tsu-yu, having discovered the place, sent suddenly a number of resolute fellows, who slew the guards, and rescued the emperor, and brought him back to his palace. After this, he invited Chu-ven, then at the head of the robbers, to come and assist his prince against the eunuchs, who arrived just at the time when that monarch had issued out an edict for extirpating them all excepting thirty of the youngest, to be reserved for the most servile offices of the palace; and executed his commission with such zeal, that many hundreds of them were put to the sword. But Chu-ven, who had thus far behaved with so much loyalty, being seized with a spirit of ambition, caused the faithful prime-minister to be slain, and obliged the emperor to remove his court from the province of Shen-si to that of Ho-nan; a which he had no sooner done, but the traitor put him to death in the sixteenth year of his reign, and thirty-eighth of his age, and placed the crown on his son, till he could safely take it from him.

XX. CHAU-SWEN-TSONG had not reigned two years, before he perceived that Chu-ven designed to sacrifice him as he had done his father; to prevent which, he offered voluntarily to resign the crown to him. The usurper took him at his word; and gave him a principality, which he enjoyed only three years, being slain in the seventeenth year of his age; and with him ended the family of Tang, and thirteenth dynasty; and Chu-ven, who then assumed the name of Tay-tsu, became the founder of a new, though short and inconsiderable one (S).

14th dynasty. The fourteenth dynasty, called Hew-lyang, which had only two emperors within the space of sixteen years.

I. TAY-TSU did not long enjoy the fruits of his rebellion and parricides; and even during the time he sat on the throne, many principalities fell off from their allegiance. He fixed his court in the province of Ho-nan; and was murdered by his eldest son, in the sixth year of his reign, and sixty-second of his age, but was succeeded by his third son. b
 II. MO-TI was then sovereign of a petty state; but, as soon as he heard of his father's death, he marched immediately at the head of an army against his brother, and totally defeated and slew him, and mounted the throne. In the third year of his reign the Sye-tans, lately mentioned, who had changed their name into that of Lyau, laid the foundation of their government, which reckoned a succession of nine princes within the space of 209 years. Chang-tsong, the son of the famed one-eyed general, lately mentioned for his great services done to the late emperor Hi-tsong, took the advantage of the then reigning troubles to seize on the crown, of which he thought himself more worthy than the usurper. He commanded an army accustomed to conquer; and, after taking several considerable places from him, engaged and defeated him; and Mo-ti, in despair, slew himself in the tenth year of his reign, and with him ended this dynasty. c Defeated, and kills himself.

15th dynasty. The fifteenth dynasty, called Hew-tang, consisting of four emperors in the space of thirteen years.

I. CHWANG-TSONG, like his father, was enured to the martial trade from his youth; and, in all his campaigns, lay on the ground with a bell about his neck, for fear of sleeping too long; tho' his earlier years were blemished by his luxury, and fondness for public shews; and would himself act a part in plays, to divert his mother and wives. He was no less given to avarice; insomuch that though his coffers were filled with gold and silver, yet could he not prevail on himself to open them for the relief of his subjects. He was at length wounded in a sedition raised among his soldiery; and died of it, in the third year of his reign, and thirty-fifth of his age; but it was never known whether the arrow that wounded him was shot designedly at him, or at random. He was succeeded by Ming-tsong, whom the father of the late emperor had adopted, though he was not born in the empire. d
 II. MING-TSONG proved worthy of the rank he was raised to; and was highly esteemed for his liberality, peaceable disposition, love of his subjects, and regard for learned men, though himself was quite illiterate. In his reign the art of printingⁿ was found out; and the celebrated Chau-quang-yu, who afterwards became the founder of the nineteenth dynasty, was born. Several other blessings which accompanied and followed Ming-tsong's reign are attributed to his singular piety, and the continual prayers he offered up to heaven for himself and subjects (T). He had moreover a great number of wise men, by whose counsel he made many e

(S) The five following dynasties are styled by the Chinese Hew-u-tay, or the five latter races or successions, and are accounted as petty ones, as well as the five that preceded that of Tang. They likewise resemble them in their wars, revolts, and parricides, which so often stained the throne with royal blood: but they differ from them in the number both of years and monarchs; the five former reckoning twenty-four emperors in the space of 198 years, whereas the following ones hardly continued one cycle, and reckon no more than thirteen emperors; and these latter being much disturbed by a warlike nation called Sye-tan, which inhabited the country now called Lyau-tong, and were much increased by the colonies that came thither from Korea.

(T) The Chinese historians tell us, that he every night burnt perfumes to the Lord of heaven; and addressed him in words to this effect: I was born a barbarian, and in a country of barbarians; yet, in the midst of the disturbances that troubled the empire, they chose me a many excellent regulations, and one among the rest which excluded the eunuchs from all public employments. He reigned eight years very peaceably, and died in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

III. MIN-TSONG had not reigned a full year, when She-king-tang, son-in-law to the late emperor, at the head of an army of 50,000 men, furnished by the people of Lyau-tong, made himself master of the palace, and deprived him both of his life and crown in the forty-first year of his age. He was succeeded by his adopted son Lo-vang, since named Fi-ti.

IV. FI-TI, not being able to make head against the murderer of his father, fled for shelter into the city of Gbey-chew; where not thinking himself safe, he shut himself up with his family, and every thing he had of value, in a palace, and, setting it on fire, perished in the flames, in the very first year of his reign. With him ended the fifteenth dynasty; and the rebel She-king-tang became the founder of a new one, and took the name of Kau-tsu.

The sixteenth dynasty, called Hew-tsin, consisting of two emperors in the space of eleven years.

c I. KAU-TSU was forced to purchase his new-gotten dignity at the expence of the honour of his country. The general of the auxiliary forces of Lyau-tong refusing to acknowledge him, and being inclined to assume the imperial diadem, Kau-tsu, not daring to enter into a war with him, was forced to buy a peace, by yielding to him sixteen cities of the province of Pe-cheli, nearest to that of Lyau-tong, and sending to him annually 300,000 pieces of silk. This imprudent donative, which could not but augment the power and pride of that warlike nation, proved the fatal source of numberless wars, which ravaged the Chinese empire above 400 years. He reigned but seven years; and died in the fifty-first year of his age, and was succeeded by his nephew, by the choice of the grandees.

d II. TSI-VANG had not reigned long, before he saw himself invaded by the Lyau-tongians, notwithstanding the treaty made with his predecessor. He opposed them with an army sufficient to have given them an effectual repulse, had not his general Lyew-chi-ywen, who himself aimed at the imperial dignity, given them time, by his slow marches and affected delays, to seize on the emperor; who, being dethroned by them, was glad to accept of a small sovereignty, where he ended his days. He reigned four years; and was succeeded by his treacherous general, who assumed the name of Kau-tsu, and became the founder of a new dynasty.

The seventeenth dynasty, called Hew-han, consisting of two emperors in the short space of four years.

e I. KAU-TSU, at the beginning, made so little resistance against the Lyau-tongian forces, that they made a terrible havock among the northern provinces; but, upon their entering into the southern ones, they were opposed by such bodies of Chinese, as made their general say, He could not have believed the conquest of China would have proved so difficult; so that, contenting himself with his rich plunder, he retired to his own country. In the mean time Kau-tsu died in the second year of his reign, aged fifty-four, and in the next was succeeded by his son.

f II. IN-TI, being obliged to employ his forces against the Tartars of Lyau-tong, gave an opportunity to the eunuchs of raising great disturbances, in order to recover their power; so that, whilst his army was gaining many signal victories against those barbarians, his palace was all in combustion; and the eunuchs had raised a sedition, in which the emperor was slain, in the second year of his reign. The empress immediately placed his brother on the throne; but he was scarcely seated on it, before the imperial general, named Kogbey, returned crowned with laurels from his glorious expedition, and was proclaimed emperor by his army. The empress, unable to support her son, was forced to submit to the victorious general, who from that time respected her as his mother; and, taking upon him the name of Tay-tsu, became the founder of the next dynasty.

to govern it. I make but one request, which is, that the heavenly Majesty would vouchsafe to watch over my conduct, and send me wise and experienced men, whose counsel may aid me to govern this state, without falling into any mistakes (38).

18th dynasty. The eighteenth dynasty, called Hew-chew, consisting of three emperors, within the space of nine years.

- I. TAY-TSU, upon his mounting the throne, removed his court to the capital of the province of Ho-nan, visited in person the sepulchre of Confucius, and honoured his memory with the title of king (U). Some believe that the Mohammedans first settled in China in his reign; whilst others place it much earlier, even as high as the thirteenth dynasty. He reigned but three years, and died in the fifty-third year of his age, and was succeeded by his adopted son. a
- II. SHI-TSONG was admired for his love of learning and skill in the art of war; though he still retained such singular modesty, notwithstanding his grandeur, that he always kept a plough, and a loom at work in his palace. In the time of scarcity he opened all his granaries, ordered his corn and rice to be sold at the cheapest rate, and the people to pay him when they were able; alleging, that they were all his children, and that it did not become a parent to withhold necessary food from his children. He likewise caused all the metal statues to be melted, and coined into money for their relief. His fame brought several petty princes to their obedience, who had for many years withdrawn it from his predecessors; and a method was proposed to him how to recover the provinces that had been dismantled from the empire during the late troubles; but death prevented his putting it in execution. He reigned six years, and died in the thirty-ninth year of his age, and was succeeded by his son. b
- III. KONG-TI was but seven years old when his father died, who put him under the guardianship of his prime minister Chau-quang-yu, who had done signal services to the empire during the late wars; but the grandees, excepting against his nonage, raised that minister to the empire. When they went to acquaint him with their choice, they found him in bed; and saluted him emperor, cloathing him with a yellow habit, which is the imperial colour. Kong-ti, who had reigned but a few months, had a small principality assigned him, and with him ended the eighteenth dynasty. Chau-quang-yu accepted of the crown on condition that the empress mother should take place of him on all occasions; and with him began c

- I. TAY-TSU, for that was the name he assumed with his new dignity, together with eight of his successors, kept their court in some of the northern provinces of China, that they might be at hand to suppress the incursions of the Tartars and Lyau-tongians; by which means the empire began to take breath after all its former disasters; and those commotions were happily succeeded by a long calm, which might have proved still more lasting, had all the princes of his family been as much addicted to learning and arms. He was indeed endowed with all the princely qualities that could make a people happy and flourishing; and ordered the four gates of his palace, which fronted the four cardinal points, to be always open, that his house, as well as his heart, might be open to all his subjects. d
- His fame was such for wisdom and moderation, that no less than ten petty sovereigns submitted to his government; and he was such an enemy to luxury, that he retrenched it altogether in his family, and would not suffer even his daughters to wear pearls. However, he honoured his deceased father, grandfather, and great grandfather, with the title of emperor; and his mother, an excellent princess, with that of empress (W). During a severe winter, reflecting on what hardships his army, then engaged in opposing the northern nations, were likely to suffer, he pulled off his fur gown, and sent it to their general; telling him, that he wished it was in his power to do the like to every soldier; and it is hardly to be conceived what ardor and zeal this action inspired his whole army with. He gave a still e

(U) We are told, that some of his courtiers represented to him, that such an honour did not suit with a man who had always been a subject not only to the emperors, but even to petty kings. To which he replied, that they were mistaken; for that he had been rather a master to kings and emperors, and that therefore too much honour could not be paid to him (36).

We have formerly observed, that it was the custom of the Chinese thus to honour the dead with such titles; and many of the founders of dynasties, and their successors, have done it to their ancestors, who never had any while alive, and merely to give the face of grandeur to their families.

(W) This noble lady, when congratulated by the grandees on her son's advancement, instead of expressing any joy at it, only reminded them of the great difficulty of ruling well; adding, that, if her son did so, she should gladly receive their congratulations; but, if not, that she should contentedly resign those honours, and finish her days in her pristine obscurity.

A year before her death she is said to have earnestly charged her son not to be swayed by his affection for his children in the choice of a successor; but to nominate his brother to that dignity: "for (said she) remember, my son, that you are beholden for the throne you sit on, less to your own merit, than to the infancy of the prince of the preceding family;" which advice the emperor exactly followed, as will be seen in the sequel.

- a more pregnant proof of his fatherly affection at the siege of Nan-king; when, reflecting upon the horrid slaughter that would be made in it, as it was on the point of surrendering, he feigned himself sick. His generals, alarmed at it, came and surrounded his bed, every one proposing some remedy to him. To whom he answered: "The only remedy that can effectually cure me, is in your power alone; swear to me, that you will not shed the blood of the citizens." They all swore accordingly, and he immediately appeared well; and, though they took all possible precaution to restrain the soldiers, so that there were but few slain by them, yet those few drew a flood of tears from him: and as the city had, with a long siege, suffered likewise by famine, he immediately sent one hundred thousand measures of rice to be distributed among them. Many other public acts he did, worthy of so good a prince; and died in the seventeenth year of his reign, leaving the crown to his brother Tay-tsong, according to his mother's desire, mentioned in the last note. Stratagem to save Nan-king.

II. TAY-TSONG was a great lover of learning, and erected a library which is affirmed to have contained 80,000 volumes. He was once besieging the metropolis of one of the revolted reguli, when he was alarmed with a tumult in the camp which was commanded by his brother Chau, occasioned by a design of the soldiers, as was reported the next day, of making him emperor. Tay-tsong, without betraying the least resentment, went on vigorously with the siege; and, a few days after he had taken it, Chau in the most familiar manner told him, he wondered he had not rewarded those who had signalized themselves at the siege. To which the emperor replied, I expected that you would have rewarded them. This stung Chau so to the heart, that he killed himself before night: which when his brother heard, he shed a flood of tears over his corpse, and caused the greatest funeral honours to be paid to it. II. Tay-tsong. After Christ, 977.

He fought several battles with unequal success against the Lyau-tongians, in order to recover the cities which had been yielded to them by Kau-tsu, founder of the sixteenth dynasty, though contrary to the advice of his more experienced general; so that we need not wonder at his pursuing that war with such fluctuating success, being as often defeated by, as victorious over, the Tartars, but without gaining any great advantage (X). He reigned twenty-one years; and died in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and was succeeded by his third son. Wars in the north. Death.

III. CHING-TSONG much deceived the hopes which his subjects had conceived of his reign (Y); and, instead of pursuing the advantages he had gained against the Lyau-tongians, whom his victorious forces had thrown into the utmost consternation, bought a shameful peace of them at the price of 100,000 taels, and 200,000 pieces of silk, to be paid annually to them. He was much intoxicated likewise with notions of magic, and other superstitions of the sect of Tau; and we have had occasion to mention elsewhere an egregious trick that was put upon him by one of those impostors, which was not a little to his dishonour (Z). III. Ching-tsong. After Christ, 998.

In the sixteenth year of his reign he caused an account to be taken of all the people employed in agriculture; who were found to amount to 21,976,965 able persons, exclusive of the magistrates, literati, eunuchs, soldiers, bonzas, watermen of all sorts, &c. all which amounted to an immense number. He caused likewise the antient books to be reprinted, and dispersed through the empire, and died in the twenty-fifth year of his reign, and fifty-fifth of his age, and was succeeded by his sixth son, whom he had by his second queen.

(X) These wars were much against the mind of his wife general Chang-tsi-hyen, who advised him first of all to settle the empire in peace, before he aimed at new conquests. However, we are told of a strange stratagem which that officer made use of to raise the siege of a city: he caused 300 soldiers to approach the besiegers camp, in the dead of the night, with lighted flambeaux in their hands; which so alarmed them, that they thought the whole Chinese army was coming against them: so that they, betaking themselves to a sudden flight, fell into an ambuscade which Chang-tsi-hyen had laid for them, and were most of them cut off (37).

(Y) A comet having appeared at the beginning of his reign, which was deemed to portend some calamity, he ordered, as usual, all his faults to be laid before him, that he might avert the omen; and at the same time remitted ten millions of the taxes, and set 13,000 prisoners at liberty; and, a son being born to him at that juncture, he attributed that long-wished-for blessing to the favour of heaven, which he looked upon now as pacified by his religious and charitable deeds above-mentioned; and his subjects looked upon the whole as a good omen of a prosperous reign; though it proved otherwise, through his excessive weakness.

(Z) His prime vizir, we are informed, being on his death-bed, told his children, that his conscience did not upbraid him with any neglect, except that of his not having advised the emperor to burn that pernicious book which they had made him believe was dropt from heaven, and he received with so much respect; and, as I cannot forgive myself that fault, said he, so then I desire I may be punished for it after my death; and therefore charge you to cause my head and face to be shaven; and my body to be buried, like that of a wretched Bonza, without cap or girdle. This was doubtless done by that wise minister, in order to cure the emperor of his vast respect for that cursed book; against which it is observed by the Chinese historians, that, from that fatal period, the respect due to the Sovereign Lord of heaven abated much among great numbers of their countrymen.

Liau-tong

IV. JIN-TSONG was then but thirteen years old; but the empress took the government into her hands, and held it till her death, which happened eleven years after his accession, and to whom he had always paid the same respect as if she had been his own mother. As he was of a pacific disposition, his sole aim, when he came to govern, was, to let his subjects taste the fruits of tranquility; but, this emboldening the Tartars to renew the war, he was forced to buy another shameful peace from them. He was, however, a prince of great piety; which he shewed not only in banishing all image-worshippers from his palace, but by his constant addresses to heaven during a long drought, and his thankfulness to it upon the return of the usual rains. He saved 500,000 of his subjects from perishing, by the timely supply he sent them of corn and rice.

His extreme desire of having a son made him divorce his empress, for which he was blamed by the generality of his subjects; but his most shameful false step of all was, his buying a peace of the Liau-tongian king, who demanded a restitution of ten cities which had been retaken by one of his predecessors, and instead of which he engaged to pay him a pension of 200,000 taels, and 300,000 pieces of silk; and suffered the word Na to be used in the treaty, which rather signifies a tribute than a pension. As he had no children either by his empress, or by that which he married after her divorcement, he was obliged to name Ing-tsong, the thirteenth son of his brother, for his successor. He died in the forty-first year of his age.

V. ING-TSONG's reign had like to have been embittered by a misunderstanding between him and the empress, who, though not his mother, had a share in the government; but that breach being made up by the strenuous endeavours of his wife prime minister, and she resigning her part up to him, he reigned quietly the rest of the time, which was in the whole but four years. He died in the thirty-sixth year of his age, and was succeeded by his son (A).

VI. SHIN-TSONG, a prince of more courage than conduct, was extremely desirous to deliver his northern subjects from the Tartarian yoke; but was diverted from it by his dying mother, who counselled him to sacrifice every thing to the peace of his empire. He was a lover of learned men, many of whom flourished in his reign, particularly Cheu, Cbang, Cbing, Chau, &c. authors of a new atheistical philosophy, by which they undertook to explain their antient books, and whom that monarch distinguished by titles and honours both before and after their deaths. One of their disciples, observing the emperor's grief at a time of drought, and that he endeavoured to appease heaven by fasting and prayer, had the boldness to tell him, that he tormented himself in vain, for that every thing that happened in the world was the mere effect of chance. Upon which the prime minister severely reproved him: "How dare you," said he, "teach such a doctrine? If the emperor was to lose all respect and fear of heaven, what crimes would he not be capable of committing?" These philosophers had some other equally dangerous notions, all which were learnedly opposed by the great Su-ma-quang, mentioned in the last note, and who was then in the highest esteem. Shin-tsong reigned eighteen years, and died in the thirty-eighth year of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

VII. CHE-TSONG being then but ten years old, his grand-mother governed with singular wisdom during the eight years she lived; and, when she died, would have obliged the prime minister to have discarded several of the young monarch's useless servants and flatterers; but, as she had not done it herself, his authority was not sufficient for it. He presented, however, a memorial to him, in which were the ten following instructions, expressed in twenty characters: 1. Fear heaven; 2. Love your subjects; 3. Strive after perfection; 4. Apply yourself to the sciences; 5. Employ persons of merit; 6. Readily hear advice; 7. Lessen the taxes; 8. Mitigate the severity of punishments; 9. Shun profuseness; 10. Detest debauchery. Che-tsong died in the fifteenth year of his reign, and twenty-fifth of his age, and was succeeded by the eleventh son of his predecessor Shin-tsong.

Whey-tsong.
After Christ,
1101.

VIII. WHEY-TSONG was equally a lover of learning and pleasure; and divided the government with his grandmother, to avoid having too great a share of business. He lost the esteem of his subjects, first, by raising the eunuchs to greater power than they had enjoyed of late, and some of them even to sovereignties, which were actually granted only to princes of the blood; and, secondly, by his superstitious fondness for the sect of Tau, whose books he caused to be collected; and was even infatuated enough to give one of his disciples the title of Sbang-ti, or Supreme Lord; and the Chinese make no scruple to ascribe all the a disasters that since befel the empire, to that blasphemous title, given in a sort of contempt of heaven.

HE joined forces with the Nyu-che, or eastern Tartars, against the Lyau-tongians, and obliged those few that remained unsubdued to flee into the mountains in the west; by which an end was put to the kingdom of Lyau-tong, after it had stood 290 years. He paid dear for his victories: the Tartarian chief, no less elated with his success, and resolving to found an empire, and give it the name of Kin, or Gold, soon broke all treaties with him; and, invading the provinces of Pe-cheli and Shen-si, made himself master of them, more through the treachery of some Chinese malcontents, than by force of arms. Wbey-tsung, in danger of losing a great part of his dominions, made him several considerable offers; and, at his desire, went in person to him, and with him settled the limits of the empire by a new treaty of peace.

ON his return to his capital, he was easily persuaded to alter his mind, that treaty being so shameful to him, that the most bloody war was preferable to it: but the Tartar, having intelligence of it, resolved to keep him to it by force of arms; and entered the province of Shen-si in triumph, where he invited the emperor to a second interview. Wbey-tsung, who dreaded nothing so much as a war, easily agreed to it; and, upon his arrival, was seized, and stripped of all his imperial ornaments, and confined prisoner under a strong guard. He died in the desert of Sba-mo, in the twenty-fifth year of his reign, and fifty-fourth of his age, and appointed his son Kin-tsung his successor.

c IX. KIN-TSUNG, according to his father's commands, put six of his ministers to death, who had betrayed him to the Tartars; but made so little preparation against them, that they penetrated into the province of Ho-nan, and, crossing the Yellow River without opposition, where a handful of men might have prevented them, marched directly to the metropolis, took and plundered it, and carried away the emperor and his queen prisoners, in the first year of his reign, whilst several lords, preferring death to an ignominious slavery, slew themselves. The conquerors left behind the empress Meng, who had been divorced, and excluded from public affairs, and who, being a princess of great wisdom and conduct, had preserved the empire, by getting the crown placed on the head of Kau-tsung, the brother of the late emperor.

d X. KAU-TSUNG had some few successes against the Tartars, which he might have improved to advantage; but though he was a lover of learning, yet he was too apt to slight the advice of his best experienced ministers, and confiding in a few parasites, of no honour or skill in governing. He was, moreover, so addicted to the Bonzaic sect, that he committed the care of the empire to his adopted son, that he might be more at leisure to vacate at his superstitions.

IN the mean time, Ho-tsung, the Tartar king, did all he could to gain the love of his new subjects, and shewed a more than ordinary regard for learned men, visited the sepulchre of Confucius, and paid him the same royal honours the Chinese did, telling his courtiers, that if he did not deserve them on account of his birth, he did on account of his excellent doctrine. He marched thence to the city of Nan-king, where the emperor had fixed his residence at first, but had been forced to abandon it, and laid close siege to it. He easily made himself master of it; and, among other prisoners, carried off a general, named Tung-pang, whom he strove, by the most advantageous offers, to gain to his interest; but that faithful officer not only refused them, but wrote, with his blood, on his vest, that he chose to die, rather than serve barbarians; for which he was immediately put to death. Another Chinese general was then marching, with all speed, to relieve that capital; which the Tartars having notice of, set the palace on fire, and retired towards the north; but had their rear almost cut off by him; and from that time never dared to cross the Kyang.

f A FEW years after, Kau-tsung made a shameful treaty with them, in which he did not scruple to own himself Chin, or subject, and Kong, or tributary. This peace was, however, broken, in the thirteenth year of his reign, by the Tartar, who came again into the southern provinces, with a formidable army, and took the city of Yang-chew; but attempting to cross the Yang-tse-kyang, near the mouth of it, where it is widest and most rapid, his army mutinied, and slew him, and withdrew with all speed towards the north, where several insurrections began to appear.

KAU-TSUNG resigned his crown to his adopted son, in the eleventh year of his reign, but lived about twenty-five years longer, and died without issue, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

g XI. HYAU-TSUNG, descended from the founder of this dynasty, reigned peaceably twenty-seven years; the new Tartar king She-tsung being of a more pacific disposition than his predecessor. In this reign flourished the great Chu-bi, one of the most celebrated interpreters of the antient books, who discharged the greatest functions in the state with honour. Hyau-tsung died in the sixty-eight year of his age, and was succeeded by his third son.

XI. Hyau-tsung. After Christ, 1163.

XII. QUANG-TSONG died in a fit of an apoplexy, in the fifth year of his reign, and fifty-fourth of his age, and was succeeded by his third son.

XIII. NING-TSONG, a prince of small abilities, was, with great difficulty, persuaded to accept of the crown, and, when he did, was wholly governed, or rather misguided, by his courtiers. In his reign the imperial palace was set on fire, and burned four days before it could be extinguished; and, some years after, a fire happened in the metropolis, which was Hang-chew, which reduced 530,000 houses into ashes.

It was in the twelfth year of Ning-tsong's reign that the famed Jenghiz Khán, head of the Western Tartars, laid the foundation of his vast empire, and gave it the name of Ywen, as hath been fully related in a former volume*. In the mean time, the Kin, or Eastern Tartars, having, according to custom, broken the peace, invaded China afresh; upon which Ning-tsong entered into a league with the head of the Western Tartars, in order to destroy a faithless enemy, which was perpetually disturbing him. This put the Eastern Tartars into the utmost consternation, and obliged them to send him new and advantageous offers of peace; but the emperor, incensed at their frequent breach of faith, and confiding more in that of the Western, rejected them with scorn (B). Ning-tsong reigned thirty years, and died in the fifty-seventh of his age, and was succeeded by Li-tsong, another descendant from the founder of this dynasty.

XIV. LI-TSONG was no warlike prince, but rather addicted to learning, and to the whimsies of the sect of Tau; but, nevertheless, carried on the war against the faithless Tartars with great vigour, in conjunction with his new ally. He took from them the city of Ho-nan, where their king kept his court, and next the capital of Shang-tong, after a long and bloody siege, in which the Tartars were forced to feed on human flesh, their king Ngai-ti, in a fit of despair, hanging himself, just before its surrender; which put an end to the empire of the Eastern Tartars, after it had continued 117 years, under nine princes.

NEVERTHELESS, the small remains of that nation, which was then almost destroyed, gave rise to the family which afterwards conquered the Chinese empire, and governs it to this day, with so much glory, as will be seen in the sequel. All this time Li-tsong only held the southern provinces of China under his dominion, whilst the Western Tartars had the empire of the north. Their king, called Kublai, or Koplay Khán, and by the Chinese Ho-pi-lye, a lover of the sciences, gained the love of his subjects, by the respect he shewed to learned men, and the honours he paid to the memory of Confucius. Li-tsong reigned forty years, and died without issue, in the sixty-second of his age, and was succeeded by his nephew.

XV. TU-TSONG had the misfortune to be encouraged in his debauches by a treacherous prime minister, no less vicious than himself, and fell into such pernicious counsels, as proved fatal both to himself and the empire. Many of his faithful ministers having in vain tried, by frequent and pressing memorials, to disengage him from his wicked Ko-lau; and, foreseeing the dreadful disasters that were likely to fall on the imperial family, retired to the Western Tartars, who were then pursuing their conquests in the north, and had already seized on the provinces of Yu-nan, Se-chwen, and Shen-si, and were entering into that of Hu-quang, most of the cities opening their gates to them; whilst Tu-tsong, drowned in pleasures, was gradually stripped of his dominions, without knowing any thing of it (C). He reigned ten years, and died in the twenty-fifth of his age, leaving three young children, who seemed only born to be the sport of fortune; the second of whom was raised to the throne.

XVI. KONG-TSONG being but an infant, the empress, who governed for him, sent an embassy to the Tartars, to beg a peace, upon any terms; but received a most haughty refusal. The Tartar general, at the head of 200,000 men, went still on with his conquests; and having seized the young emperor, in the second year of his reign, sent him to a desert of Tartary, called Co-bi, and by the Chinese Sha-mo, where he died.

XVII. TWANG-TSONG, his elder brother, was next placed on the throne; but the Tartars advanced against him with such diligence, as obliged him to go on board his fleet, with such of the lords of his court, and about 130,000 troops, that remained with him, designing to retire into the province of Fo-kyen. But being closely pursued by the Tartars, both by sea and land, he was forced to fly to the coasts of Quang-tong, the most southern province of

(B) We are told, that when the Tartar king heard of his offers being so scornfully rejected by the Chinese monarch, he said, as speaking to him, "To-day he (the Western Tartar) will take my empire from me, and to-morrow yours from you;" which came to pass accordingly (39).

(C) It was about this time that Marco Paolo, or Mark Paul, a Venetian gentleman, came into this country, and travelled through some of the finest provinces of it, and published that description of which we have spoken at the beginning of this chapter (40).

- a the empire, where he died of some disease, in the second year of his reign, and eleventh of his age; and was succeeded by his youngest brother Ti-ping, the last remains of the family of Song.

XVIII. TI-PING was then on board his fleet, which not being able to avoid engaging that of the Tartars, a bloody fight ensued, in which the latter gained a complete victory. Lo-syew-se, the prime minister, to whose care the young emperor, then eight years old, was committed, seeing his ship surrounded by Tartar vessels, took him up in his arms, and leaped with him into the sea. The rest of the grandees, and the distracted empress, followed his example. Nothing was heard but the most dismal outcries; and it is affirmed, that no less than 100,000 Chinese perished in this fight, either by the sword, or by water, into which the greater part threw themselves, in despair. XVIII. Ti-ping. After Christ, 1279. Forced over-board. Drowned.

THIS dreadful catastrophe happened near an island depending on the city of Quang-chew-fu, or Canton, capital of the province of Quang-tong. The sad catastrophe of his fleet; and end of that dynasty.

THUS ended the dynasty of Song, and with it the Chinese dominion; for Shi-tsu (before called Ho-pi-lye by the Chinese, and Kublai Khan by the Tartars), who was the fourth son of Tay-tsu (or Jenghiz Khan, who founded the empire of the Western Tartars), took possession of his new conquests, and was the first emperor of this new dynasty†.

The twentieth dynasty, called Ywen, consisting of nine emperors, within the space of eighty-nine years. Twentieth Dynasty.

- c I. SHI-TSU, founder of this dynasty, though a Tartar, and the first foreign prince that ever reigned over the Chinese nation, yet found a most effectual way of reconciling them to his government, and even of endearing himself to them, by keeping as close as possible to their ancient laws and customs, by his equity and justice, by his love and regard to learned men, and fatherly tenderness to all his new subjects; inasmuch, that the reign of this family is, to this day, styled by the Chinese, the wise government. He even caused a declaration to be published, that all persons should continue in the same posts and dignities which they enjoyed in the preceding reign; though many of the Chinese nobles refused his offer, and preferred a voluntary death to an honourable servitude. I. Shi-tsu. After Christ, 1281. His excellent government.

- d 100,000 men; but miscarried in it, they being all shipwrecked, except four or five persons, who brought him the melancholy news of it. He caused, in the same year, all the books of the impious sect of Tau to be burned; and ordered, that there should be but one calendar through the whole empire, which should be compiled at court, and published every year; and forbid all private persons to attempt the like under pain of death. Four years after, his only son, whom he had named his successor, died; and though he left children behind, yet was the emperor inconsolable for his loss. Fatal attempt on Japan. Orders an universal calendar.

- e AT his first accession to the Chinese crown, he had fixed his court at Tay-ywen-fu, the capital of Sben-si, but thought fit afterwards to remove it to Pe-king (D); and, being informed that the barks which brought the court the tribute of the southern provinces, or carried on the trade of the empire, were obliged to come by sea, and often suffered shipwreck, he caused the famed great canal to be made, which is at present one of the wonders of the Chinese empire, it being 300 leagues in length, and forming a great road of water, by which above 9000 imperial barks transport, with ease, and at small expence, the tribute of grain, rice, silks, &c. which is annually paid to the court (E). He reigned fifteen years, and died in the eightieth of his age, and was succeeded by his grandson. Causes the great canal to be made. His death.

- II. CHING-TSONG, a mild and wise prince, mitigated the severity of the Chinese punishments, lessened the taxes, with which several petty princes had began to burden the people; but II. Ching-tsong. After Christ, 1296.

† See before, vol. ii. p. 537, & seq. & alib. pass.

(D) This metropolis is, by Marco Paolo, called Kambalu, instead of Ham-palu. which, we are told, signifies, in the Tartaric tongue, the seal of the king or emperor; which mistake is inconsiderable in a stranger, if it be really one. But the above-mentioned etymon of Ham and palu is justly questioned; for not Ham, but Han, or rather Khan, signifies a king, in the Mongol language, which is originally the same with the Turkish; and possibly palu may be another mistake for balik or buluk, which, in the same language, signifies a city (41).

(E) A late missionary (42), who has published a curious abstract of the five first Mongol emperors, from the Chinese history, tells us, that those historians exaggerate the faults of this great monarch, particularly his fondness for the superstitions of his lamas; but say nothing of his virtues; though it is plain, from what we have said of him above, that he deserved their highest encomiums, on several accounts, besides that of the most useful and noble canal above-mentioned.

his bad state of health would not permit him to apply so closely to the affairs of the empire, as he was inclined to. He reigned thirteen years, and died in the forty-second of his age, and was succeeded by his nephew.

III.
Vu-tsong.
After Christ,
1309.

III. VU-TSONG was no less admired for his mildness, generosity, and regard to learned men, and, in particular, to the great Confucius. Being informed, that gold, silver, grain, silk, and other commodities, were exported into other countries, he forbade it, under the severest penalties. He reigned but four years, and died in the thirty-first of his age, and was succeeded by his brother.

IV.
Jin-tsong.
After Christ,
1313.

IV. JIN-TSONG was still more remarkable for his princely virtues, and great penetration and application to the business of state. He punished with reluctance, and rewarded with singular generosity. He forbade the petty princes to hunt from the fifth to the tenth month of the year, for fear of damaging the product of the earth. He set an extraordinary value on great men, and had them near his person; alleging, that if he could but make his people happy and prosperous, by their advice, no riches or felicity could be equal to his. He reigned nine years, and died in the thirty-sixth of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

Murdered.

V. ING-TSONG inherited all his father's virtues: but was unfortunately assassinated, in the third year of his reign, and thirtieth of his age, as he was entering his tent with his faithful Ko-lau, by some wicked villains, who were conscious of some enormous crimes, and in dread of a condign punishment. He was succeeded by the eldest son of King-byen-tsong.

VI.
Tay-ting.
After Christ,
1325.
Sundry calamities during his reign.

VI. TAY-TING, upon his mounting the throne, not only put the murderers to the most severe deaths, but exterminated their families. In his reign happened some very severe calamities, as earthquakes, falling of mountains, overflowing of rivers, droughts, conflagrations, &c. during which he gave signal proofs of his love for his subjects, by the timely aid he gave to them. He forbade likewise entrance into his dominions to all the Bonzas or Lamas of Tibet, who used to come in swarms, and, going from house to house, were a great burden to the people.

He reigned five years, and died in the thirty-sixth of his age, and the estates chose his second son to succeed him; but he refusing to accept of the crown, which, he said, belonged to his eldest brother Ming-tsong, who was then in Tartary, they sent for him from thence, and proclaimed him emperor.

VII. MING-TSONG, upon his accession, gave a grand entertainment to the court; but, in the midst of it, was suddenly struck with death, not without strong suspicion of his being poisoned; and his brother, who had refused the crown, was chosen in his stead.

Sends for the Lamas of Tartary.

VIII. VEN-TSONG proved a wise and affable prince, open to the wise counsels of his ministers; but was guilty of a weakness unbecoming his dignity, in receiving the Lama or chief Bonza of Tibet into his place, and suffering his nobles to pay him their honours, on their knees, and presenting him with wine, whilst the haughty priest received them, without making the least return (F).

He reigned but three years, and died in the twenty-ninth of his age, and was succeeded by Ning-tsong, the son of Ming-tsong, the seventh monarch of this dynasty; but as he reigned but two months, he is not reckoned among the other emperors. He was succeeded by his elder brother Shun-ti, who was fetched from the province of Shen-si, and placed on the throne.

IX.
Shun-ti.
After Christ,
1333.
Degenerates.

IX. SHUN-TI was the last of this Tartar race that reigned in China. Those princes, enervated by the pleasures of that fine and fruitful country, easily degenerating from the valour of their ancestors; whilst the Chinese, growing gradually brave and warlike by their subjection, deprived them of their conquest, and drove them clear out of their empire. Shun-ti, though otherwise a prince of great parts, was lulled into a downright indolence and effeminacy, by his favourite Ko-lau; and, to complete his misfortunes, sent for the Lamas of Tartary, who quickly filled his palace with female singers and dancers, and introduced idolatry and magic, together with lewdness and debauchery, which quite bereaved the young prince of the little valour that was left.

Chû heads the revolt against him.

In the fourteenth year of his reign, a Chinese, named Chû, who had been a servant in a monastery of Bonzas, going over to a numerous company of revolters, became their chief,

(F) The proud Lama did, it seems, receive all these honours, without stirring off his seat; which inspired one of the nobles with such disdain, that he addressed him in a quite different manner: "Honest man," said he to him, "I know that you are the disciple of Fo, and master of the Bonzas; but you don't know, perhaps, that I am a disciple of Confucius, and one of

"the chief among the Literati of the empire; and it is fit I should acquaint you with it, and advise you to lay aside all this ceremony." This saying, he offered him the cup standing; upon which the Lama thought fit to stand up, and, with a smile, took the cup from him, and drank it (43).

a and made a surprising advantage of the present juncture, making himself master of many considerable cities, and next of the provinces; and, in a celebrated battle, defeated the imperial army sent against him. His great success soon drew vast numbers of Chinese into his army, with which, having crossed the Yellow River without opposition, he easily subdued every place that came in his way, and meeting at length with the imperial army, cut it all in pieces. The emperor was forced to flee towards the north, where he died two years after, having reigned thirty-five; and with him ended the Tartar dynasty of Ywen, which was succeeded by that of Ming, founded by Chü above-mentioned, who, upon his mounting the throne, took the name of Tay-tsü. His success, and end of the Tartar dynasty.

The twenty-first dynasty, called Ming, containing sixteen emperors, within the space of Twenty-first two hundred and seventy-six years. dynasty.

b I. TAY-TSU, formerly named Chü, and Hong-vu, mounted the throne with a general applause, and fixed his court at Nan-king; and, the year following, made himself master of Pe king, after one day's siege, erecting that country into a sovereignty, which he gave to his fourth son. He likewise honoured his father, grandfather, &c. with the title of emperor; and then enacted some wholesome laws, to preserve the national tranquility (G). His court was soon crowded with ambassadors, who came from all parts, to congratulate him, particularly from Japan, Korea, Formosa, the Philippine, and other southern islands. But the joy that reigned at his palace was soon after allayed by the death of his empress, to whose wise counsels, he said, he owed the crown. He was a prince of great wisdom and penetration; and his piety was no less conspicuous in time of drought, when, they tell you, he hath gone and staid three whole days upon a high mountain, and by his prayers hath obtained plenty of rain. He had taken likewise special care to breed up his son in such excellent manner, that he might prove a father to his people; but the unexpected death of that promising young prince did so overwhelm him with grief, that he mourned for him three whole years, contrary to his own law. He reigned thirty-one years, and died in the seventy-first of his age, and was succeeded by his grandson, then but thirteen years old. I. Tay-tsü: After Christ, 1368. Excellent government. Piety. Grief for his son. Death.

d II. KYEN-VEN-TI gave early marks of an excellent disposition, by remitting one third of the taxes, and other popular acts; but his uncles, ill brooking the preference that was given to him, which was ascribed to the intrigues of the Ko-lau of the late emperor, soon raised great disturbances in the empire. Young lo, in particular, who had been raised to the sovereignty to Pe-king, took up arms against him, and a bloody battle was fought between him and the imperial army; which was soon followed with new offers of peace on the court side: but Young-lo refused to hearken to any, unless the emperor's ministers were delivered up to him. This not being granted, he marched directly to the imperial city, where, the gates being opened to him by a traitor, he committed a most horrid slaughter, and reduced the imperial palace to ashes. The body of the young monarch being brought, half consumed by the flames, to the conqueror, drew a flood of tears from him; and he ordered him to be interred with all the pomp due to his rank. But, this did not allay his resentment against his ministers, many of whom he put to most cruel deaths; whilst others chose to kill themselves; or to escape his fury in the habit of Bonzas. Thus perished that young monarch, in the fourth year of his reign, and seventeenth of his age, and was succeeded by Young-lo, who then took the name of Ching-tsu, and seized on the crown. II. Kyen-ven-ti. After Christ, 1399. Invaded by Young-lo. Burned his own palace.

e III. CHING-TSU was a generous and magnanimous prince, but much dreaded, on account of the cruelties with which he began his reign. He obliged a great number of Bonzas, who had taken the habit before they were forty years old, to quit their convents; and ordered all the books of chemistry, which treated of the immortalizing liquor, to be burnt. In the seventh year of his reign, he removed his court from Nan-king to Pe-king, leaving his son in the former, with the same number of courts and ministers as were established in the latter. III. Ching-tsu. After Christ, 1403.

(G) Among which, the following ones were the most important; viz.

1. That those who possessed sovereignties, should not extend their power beyond their own territories, nor meddle with public affairs.

2. That the eunuchs should be excluded from all employments, civil and military.

3. That the women should not be suffered to turn

Bonzesses, nor men to turn Bonzas, before the age of forty years.

4. That the antient and modern laws should be reduced into one body, of 300 volumes. It was, we are told; a whole century before that work appeared.

5. That the twenty-seven months of mourning for the death of a parent should be reduced to twenty-seven days (44).

He encouraged learned men, and caused some philosophical works to be published, expository of the antient classical books. When some fine precious stones were brought to him from a mine lately discovered, he ordered it to be shut up; alleging, it only fatigued his people with useless toil; whereas those stones, however valued, could neither feed nor cloath them in times of scarcity. He reigned twenty-three years, and died in the sixty-third of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

IV. JIN-TSUNG gave early instances of his tenderness and liberty, in the speedy relief he sent to the province of Shang-sung, then labouring under a famine (H). He was likewise much given to astrology; and having spent a whole night in observing the stars, and found some uncommon change in the heavens, sent for his two Ko-laus, and told them, that his life was at an end and gave them some signal marks of his love and gratitude for their fidelity to him. His son, then at Nan-king, was sent for with all speed; but came too late to receive his last commands. He had reigned but a few months, and died in the forty-eighth year of his age. And this year is reckoned to the reign of his son, contrary to the Chinese custom, which includes that of the emperor's death with those of his reign.

V. SWEN-TSUNG was attacked by the Tartars, who had made an irruption into the empire; but were severely repulsed, and defeated by him. Some years after, the king of Cochin-China, whom he had nominated to that dignity, being slain by a band of rebels, these immediately sent an ambassy to crave pardon for it. Swen-tsung not being then able to send an army against them, without great inconveniency, not only granted them pardon, but sent them home with some titles of honour. About the same time, the palace having took fire, burnt with such violence several days, that great quantities of gold, silver, copper, tin, and other metals, which were melted together, formed a mass of a mixed metal, which, like that which is reported to have happened at Corinth, hath been much esteemed ever since, and bears a very great price. Swen-tsung reigned ten years, and died in the thirty-eighth of his age, and was succeeded by his eldest son.

VI. ING-STUNG, then but nine years old, and under the guardianship of the empress and court eunuchs, began his reign with rebuilding the nine gates of the imperial city; and, in the third year, forbade any honour to be paid to Confucius in the idol temples. In the mean time, the Tartars, taking the advantage of his youth, made continual inroads into his northern provinces; against whom he marched, in the fourteenth year of his reign, at the head of a powerful army, even beyond the great wall, but his forces, weakened by want of provision, were totally defeated, and he taken prisoner, and carried into the furthestmost part of Tartary. The court, in the greatest consternation at the news, placed his son, then but two years old, on the throne, under the guardianship of the captive prince's brother, who soon seized on the throne. In the mean time, the empress having sent a great quantity of gold, silver, silks, &c. to ransom the emperor, the Tartar conducted him to the frontiers of China; but there pretending that the ransom was too small, and being, perhaps, bought by the brother on the throne, conducted him back, in a few days, into Tartary. He reigned fourteen years, and was succeeded by his brother.

VII. KING TI mounted the throne; but an agreement being soon after made for the release of the emperor, some of the grandees went to receive him on the frontiers. Here the Tartar pretended a-new, that the retinue was too small to accompany so great a monarch; and insisted that a greater number should come, and in greater pomp: but the emperor forbade it, and sent the court word, that he renounced the empire, and designed to end his days in solitude; and, to avoid all ceremony, entered the capital by a private gate. Here the two brothers having embraced each other, with great tenderness, King ti, attended by the whole court, accompanied him to the south palace, which he had chosen for his retirement.

KING-TI had, by this time, resolved to declare his own son his successor; but that was opposed by the prime minister (I); and the young prince dying about a year after, and himself being soon after taken ill of an incurable disease, Ing-tsung, was again

(H) It being represented to him, by his ministers, that it would be proper for him to consult the tribunals about the means of relieving so much people, he replied, "When my subjects are in distress, we ought to fly to their relief, with the same speed as we would to stop an inundation, or extinguish a fire;" and, upon their reminding him that a distinction ought to be made between those who stood in more or less need of relief, "With all my heart, he said; but let them not be too nice and dilatory in their scrutiny, nor be afraid of exceeding my intentions, by being too liberal."

(I) King-ti had designed to declare his son his successor on the next birth-day; and, willing to try how the prime minister would take it, said to him one day, "The birth-day of the prince my heir falls on the second day of the seventh moon." To which the Ko-lau replied, "Give me leave to tell you, that it is the first day of the eleventh moon." Plainly intimating thereby the birth-day of Ing-tsung, who was the lawful emperor. Upon which King-ti let aside all further thoughts about his own son.

As Ing-tsung did afterwards resume the empire, Du Halde, and others, have made two reigns of it, though but one monarch: we have only followed the series as it happened, without the needless addition.

a brought out of the southern palace, and re-ascended throne, a year before his brother's death.

KING-TI had reigned seven years, and, upon his death, the emperor was desired to stigmatize his memory, and to have his name erased out of all public records, as a punishment for his usurpation: but he rejected the proposal, and contented himself with ordering his funeral obsequies to be performed only as for an emperor's brother. After that, he reigned seven-years longer, and died in the thirty-first of his age, and left the crown to his eldest son.

VIII. HYEN-TSONG, who was the son of the second queen, owed the crown to the empress's barrenness, and proved a warlike prince, and frequently defeated the plundering Tartars, who were often making inroads into his territories. The king of Korea, about that time, proposed an easier method of paying his homage to him, than by sending an embassy; but he absolutely rejected it. He reigned twenty-three years, and died in the forty-first of his age, and was succeeded by his eldest son Hong-chi, who since assumed the name of Hyau-tsong. VIII.

IX. HYAU-TSONG was much addicted to the superstitions of the Bonzaic sect; yet, in the eighth year of his reign, one of the most considerable of them, having been the ring-leader of a rebellion, and being taken prisoner, was executed, without regard to his function. About the same time, a famine raged through several of the western provinces, to such a degree, that the parents were known to eat their own children; whilst as grievous a pestilence, a calamity scarcely known in China, raged and laid waste the eastern ones. These were followed with such terrible earthquakes, that many thousands of people were buried alive. The latter end of this reign was no less remarkable for the irruptions and depredations which the Tartars made in the empire, and at length, for the death of the emperor, in the eighteenth year of his reign. He was succeeded by his son Vu-tsong, whom he had caused to be proclaimed his successor, with great pomp, five years after his coming to the crown. IX.

X. VU-TSONG, a wilful and debauched prince, enjoyed but a very uneasy reign; the calamities of the former still continuing, and he deaf to all advice that was given him towards a remedy. At length several provinces, particularly those of Shang-tong and Ho-nang, oppressed with famine and heavy taxes, revolted, in a kind of despair, and, like an irresistible torrent, spread dread and devastation where-ever they came; and if any forces were sent against them, they only put a stop to the evil for the present, to break out soon after with greater fury. His unhappy reign,

In the thirteenth year of his reign, he took it into his head to march against the ravaging Tartars incognito; and he was, with great difficulty, diverted from the dangerous project, by one of his Ko-laus (K). The next year, he resolved to retire into the southern provinces, from which his ministers all joined to dissuade him; alleging, that it would be interpreted by the Tartars as a shameful flight; and so exasperated was he at their opposition, that he suffered them to continue, on their knees, five whole days before his palace, notwithstanding the badness of the weather. At length, a sudden inundation which followed, and was by him looked upon as portending of some evil, made him relax, and set aside this project also. He reigned sixteen years; and, a little before his death, sent for the grandees, and appointed his empress guardian to his second son, then thirteen years old, whom he appointed his successor, and died in the thirty-first year of his age. and death.

XI. SHI-TSONG, or Kya-tsing, began his reign with several public acts (L); such as, repairing the great wall, relieving his subjects during the scarcity, and enacting some wholesome laws; but is much blamed for his fondness for poetry, for the superstitions of the Bonzas, and, in particular, for the immortalizing liquor, which he caused to be sought for far and near. The Tartars, having invaded his territories, were totally defeated, and above 200 officers taken prisoners. The next year, their king sent to beg pardon, and to ask leave for his subjects to come into China to sell their horses; which was granted at first; but, as that commerce was like to prove a continual source of quarrels between the Mandarins and the merchants, it was absolutely forbid again. His success against the Tartars,

ABOUT the thirty-fourth year of his reign, the Japanese shook off their homage to him, and about 4000 made a descent into the province of Che-kyang; but were either destroyed, or forced to flee to their ships. The next year, 10,000 more came on the same errand, and met a worse fate, they being all cut off to a man. This did not prevent their making fresh attempts in the following years; but still with the same ill success. and Japanese.

(K) He was so provoked at their opposing his mad project, that he drew his scimitar to slay the first that spoke another word against it; upon which one of those Ko-laus stretching out his neck towards him, as if to receive the blow, quite allayed his passion, and made him open his eyes to the danger of his design.

(L) The famine and poverty then raging, obliging many parents to prostitute their daughters, two young maids, to avoid the disgrace, drowned themselves; which, when the emperor knew, he erected a fine monument to their memory, giving them the title of The two illustrious virgins.

TOWARDS the latter end of his reign, a severe memorial was presented to him, complaining of his ill conduct almost in every branch of his government, and more particularly of his extravagant search after the immortalizing liquor. He had no sooner read it, than he trampled it under his feet, in the first folly of his passion; but, growing cold again, he took it up, and, upon a second reading, shewed some signal tokens of remorse. He did not live long enough, however, to give any further proofs of it; for, falling sick a few days after, he had no sooner drank the pretended liquor, than he expired, in the forty-fifth year of his reign, and fifty-eighth of his age, and was succeeded by his son.

XII. MO-TSUNG, alias Shin-tsung, began his reign with releasing some of those whom his father had too severely imprisoned, and with other acts of clemency; but could never brook the advice of ministers, and often degraded them for it. He repealed, in part, the law which forbids the subjects having any employments in their own native provinces, by excluding out of it inferior Mandarins, tax-gatherers, and inspectors over literature. He fell sick in the sixth year of his reign; and putting his son, then but ten years old, under the guardianship of the empress, and of the Ko-lau Chang-kyû-ching, declared him his successor, and died not long after. That prince was called Van-lye, but, upon his accession to the crown, took the name of Shin-tsung.

XIII. SHING-TSUNG shewed an excellent disposition, and prudence much above his years, and paid the utmost regard to his master Chang-kyû-ching, and behaved with singular assiduity, justice, and uprightness, in every branch of his government: and every day, from four in the morning, applied himself to examine and answer the petitions that were presented the day before: and, for the greater ease and conveniency of his subjects, ordered a book to be printed every three months, containing the names, rank, degree, and country, of every Mandarin in the empire; which custom is still observed. He married in the seventh year of his reign, and immediately his wife was proclaimed empress.

THREE years after there was such a dreadful famine in the province of Shan-si, that numberless people died of hunger; insomuch that sixty great pits were dug in different places, each of which held 1000 dead bodies, and, on that account, were called Van-jin-keng. The same year was remarkable for a great defeat of the Tartars, of whom 10,000 were killed on the spot; but much more for the death of the prime minister Chang-kyû-ching, whom the emperor caused to be interred with great pomp, and singular marks of honour. These, however, proved of but short duration; his enemies laying such accusations against the deceased about two years after, that both he and his posterity were deprived of all their titles; their estates confiscated; and his son, either through grief or fear, killed himself. A grievous frost, which happened in the eleventh year of his reign, and had congealed the greatest rivers, invited again the plundering Tartars into China, who were most of them cut off. The famine, which followed soon after, obliged that monarch often to address himself to heaven for relief, and to contribute largely to the assistance of his subjects; but when it was represented to him, that his misconduct, and the avarice of the ministers of his court, drew these calamities down upon his people, he not only proved deaf to their remonstrances, but punished the authors of them (M).

ABOUT the twenty-first year of his reign, the Japanese broke into the kingdom of Korea, seized on several cities, and put all to fire and sword where-ever they came. The king himself was obliged to flee; but having soon after obtained a seasonable succour from the emperor, intirely routed them. After this defeat, they sent an ambassy to the emperor, to beg his pardon for the irruption, and to intreat him that he would bestow some title upon their chief. Both which were granted; and the title of Je-pwen-wang, which signifies king of Japan, was given to him; but with express orders, that he should send no more ambassies to China. By this time the Nyu-che, or eastern Tartars, who were become formidable, and divided into seven dynasties, after a long and bloody war, coalesced into one, under one prince, who laid the foundation of a new kingdom. As to the Tan-yu, or western Tartars, they lived peaceably within their own territories, without making any further inroads into China.

IN the forty-fourth year of his reign, the chief of the Tartars, highly incensed at the insolence with which the Chinese Mandarins treated his merchants trading into Lyau-tong, and much more at their treacherously seizing on their prince, and cutting off his head, resolved now to seize on some of the Chinese cities which lay most convenient for him; and accordingly the son of the deceased king, named Tyen-ming, entered the province of Lyau-tong

(M) During these troubles, a comet also appeared towards the east, which was thought to portend still some greater disasters to the empire; upon which a Ko-lau, named Song-guen, presented a memorial to the emperor, setting forth, that the figure of the meteor forewarned him to rid his court of certain ministers, who took bribes, and preserved their posts by the basest flattery. For this he was condemned to death by the exasperated monarch; but, his son coming to him, and begging he might be permitted to lay down his life to save his father's, Shing-tong relented, and changed his sentence into that of banishment.

a at the head of a powerful army, and took the city of Kay-ywen; but at the same time sent a letter, with his complaints, to the emperor, offering to restore the city, and lay down his arms, upon proper satisfaction being made for such a cruel injury. The Mandarins, to whom the emperor communicated the letter, slighting it so far as not to vouchsafe an answer to it, so exasperated the Tartar prince, that he vowed to sacrifice 200,000 Chinese to the ghost of his murdered father. He accordingly marched with an army of 50,000 men into the province of Pe-cheli in triumph, with a design to attack the imperial city; but, being repulsed by the Chinese forces, he retired into Lyau-tong, where he assumed the title of emperor of China. Two years after, having, by a stratagem, drawn the Chinese forces farther towards Tartary, he surrounded them at once, and made a dreadful slaughter among them; and their general was found among the slain. On the next year the emperor opposed them with a powerful army, and 12,000 auxiliaries out of Korea; and a long and obstinate battle was fought; in which the Tartars being at last victorious, marched directly towards Pe-king; which threw the court into such consternation, that the emperor would have retired into the southern provinces, had not his ministers represented to him how much such a shameful flight would inspire the enemy, and dishearten his subjects. Under these disasters the emperor died, in the forty-eighth year of his reign, and fifty-eighth of his age, and was succeeded by his son Quang-tsung, who, upon his accession, took the name of Tay-chang.

XV. HI-TSUNG, though a timorous prince, and too much swayed by his court-eunuchs, yet made a vigorous opposition against the Tartars; augmented his forces, sent for fresh auxiliaries from Korea, and saw his army reinforced from several quarters; particularly by an Amazonian lady, at the head of several thousand men, which she had brought from the province of Se-chwen, where her son held a small sovereignty. He also fitted out a powerful fleet, in order to humble the enemy both by sea and land; and, upon this occasion, he sent to Macau for some Portuguese engineers, to serve the artillery, to which the Chinese were very little used; but, before they came, the Tartars were driven out of the province of Lyau-tong, and the capital recovered from them; so much the more easily, as the inhabitants detested the cruelty of Tyen-ming, and he was then engaged in another war in Tartary. He was, however, no sooner returned from that expedition, than he renewed the siege of that city with fresh vigour; in which the Chinese lost 30,000 men, and he 20,000, and at last carried it by means of a traitor. As soon as he was master of it, he published an edict, commanding all the Chinese, under pain of death, to shave their heads after the Tartar fashion; upon which several thousands of them chose rather to lose their heads than their hair. In the mean time one of the ablest Chinese generals, named Mau-ven-long, being sent with fresh troops against the Tartars, so strongly fortified the citadel of Shang-hay, that he made it impregnable, and, by that means, shut up the entrance into China from Tartary.

Strange firmness of the Chinese.

THE third year of Hi-tsung's reign was dreadfully disturbed by crowds of robbers and seditious people, whose number and rapines daily increased; and the next year was remarkable for the Christian monument dug out near the capital of Shen-si, and mentioned in a former section^a; as also for the death of the emperor, in the seventh year of his reign, and thirty-second of his age; who was succeeded by his brother Tsong-chin, or Zun-ching, since called Whay-tsung, the fifth son of Quang-tsung.

Hi-tsung's death.

In the same year died Tyen-ming, the king of the Tartars; a prince, who according to the Chinese account, was distinguished chiefly for his fierceness; and was succeeded by his son Tyen-tsung, who proved the reverse of his father, and a prince of great clemency, meekness, and goodness.

XVI. WHAY-TSUNG, the last emperor of the Chinese race, and more commonly known by the name of Zun-ching, was a great lover of sciences, and a favourer of the Christians, though he continued still bigotted to the Bonzaic superstitions. He had most of the princely qualities that could render him capable of governing; was an enemy to luxury, and to the court-eunuchs, and took the most effectual way to remove them (N), even from the very beginning

(N) He had at first forbid all his Mandarins to have any conversation with them; and soon after gave them leave to go and visit their native country for a month, and money to defray their journey, and afterwards sent them an express prohibition to return.

There was one among them, named Ghey-tsung, who had raised himself in the former reigns to the highest pitch of power, wealth, and insolence; but upon this emperor's mounting the throne, whom he knew to be an enemy to the whole tribe, dispatched himself by poison, to avoid a more severe punishment; upon which his immense riches were confiscated, his body torn in pieces by the populace, and the temples and monuments which his flatterers had reared to his honour, levelled with the ground.

of his reign. In the mean time the revolvers multiplying in the provinces, whilst his forces were engaged against the Tartars, he resolved to make peace with the latter, that he might the more effectually suppress the former; and, to that end, sent one of his generals, named Ywen, into Tartary, at the head of an army, with full power to negotiate a peace; but that traitor made one on such shameful terms, that the emperor refused to ratify it; upon which he took the following method to oblige him to it:

MAU-VEN-LONG, the faithful and expert general mentioned under the last reign, was then at the head of the imperial forces, and him the villain invited to a feast, and poisoned; and then sent word to the Tartars to march directly to Pe-king by a different road from that which he took with his army; which they did, without meeting with any opposition, and laid siege to that capital. Ywen was thereupon ordered to its relief; which he did, not suspecting that his perfidy was found out; and, upon his arrival, was put to the torture, and then strangled; which the Tartars no sooner knew, than they raised the siege, and returned into Liau-tong, laden with the richest plunder.

IN the eighth year of Wba-tsung's reign died Tyn-tsung, king of Tartary, and was succeeded by his son Tsong-te, father of the founder of the following dynasty, and a mild and affable prince, who had been privately brought up from his infancy among the Chinese, and was a perfect master of their language and learning, as well as of their genius and customs; all which gained him the love and esteem of the Chinese generals and Mandarins, who insensibly fell off from the emperor, whose ill success had quite altered his temper, and rendered him thoughtful, uneasy, diffident, and cruel. This and the following year proving a series of robberies, murders, and intestine wars, the revolvers grew to such a height, that they composed no less than four armies commanded by as many generals, who were however reduced soon after to two, named Li and Chang. These agreed to divide the provinces between them: Chang, taking the western ones of Se-chwen and Hu-quang, left Li to seize on part of Sben-fi, and then of Ho-nan, whose capital, named Kay-fong, he laid siege to, but was repulsed with loss. He renewed it six months after, with no better success; the besieged chusing to feed on human flesh, rather than surrender to a rebel. The imperial forces coming soon after to its assistance, their general made no doubt of drowning the whole rebel army, by breaking down the dikes of the Yellow River; but, by ill fortune, they had time to escape to the mountains; whilst the city, which lay lower than the river, was quite overflowed; by which unforeseen accident about 300,000 of its inhabitants perished.

AFTER this disaster, Li marched into the provinces of Sben-fi and Ho-nan, where he put to death all the Mandarins, exacted great sums from the officers in place, and shewed no favour to any but to the populace, whom he freed from all taxes: by this means he drew so many of the imperial army into his interest, that he thought himself powerful enough to assume the title of emperor. He next advanced towards the imperial city, which, though strongly garrisoned, was divided into factions; and into which he had found means to convey a sufficient number of his own men in disguise, who were to open the gates to him soon after his first appearance. They did so accordingly on the third day, and he entered the city in triumph, at the head of 300,000 men; whilst the infatuated emperor kept himself shut up in his palace, ignorant of what was done without it, and only busying himself with his Bonzaic superstitions. It was not long, however, before he found himself betrayed; and, under the greatest consternation, made an effort to get out of the palace, with about 600 of his guards. He was still more surprised to see himself treacherously abandoned by them, and deprived of all hopes of escaping the fury and insults of his rebel subjects; so that, preferring death to the disgrace of falling alive into their hands, he forthwith retired with his beloved empress^b (Du Halde says, only the young princess his daughter) into a private and distant part of the garden, or, according to Palafox, into a small wood, without being able to utter a word to her, such was the excess of his grief. That princess, however, too well apprehended his meaning; and, after a few tender, but silent embraces, retired into the wood, and there hanged herself in a silken string. The emperor, pierced to the heart at the doleful sight, staid only to write these words on the border of his vest: I have been basely deserted by my subjects; do what you will with me, but spare my people; which being done, he cut off the young princess's head with one stroke of his scymetar, and hanged himself on another tree, in the seventeenth year of his reign, and thirty-sixth of his age (O). His prime minister, queens, and faithful eunuchs, soon followed his

(O) Palafox (45) adds, that the unhappy monarch, being quite chilled with horror, called for a glass of wine, though at all other times averse to that liquor; and, having drank it, bit with his own teeth one of his fingers, till the blood gushed out, and wrote with it, not the abovementioned short sentence, but a long and more a his example, and killed themselves^c; and with his life ended the Chinese monarchy, to give place to that of the Tartars, who have reigned over the whole empire ever since with an absolute sway. The sad catastrophe of his family.

It was not till after some time, and with great difficulty, that the body of the unfortunate Wbay-tsong was found, which, when brought, and laid before the rebel Li, as he sat upon the throne, the inhuman wretch used with the utmost indignity; after which he caused two of his sons, and all his ministers, to be beheaded; only his eldest son happily escaped by flight. His body insulted, and his sons murdered, by Li. It is scarcely credible how soon every one submitted to the usurper; and prince U-san ghbey, who commanded the imperial forces in the province of Lyau-tong, was the only one who refused to acknowledge him, which obliged him to march against him at the head of a powerful army; and, having invested the place where he was governor, the more effectually to move him to surrender, shewed him his father loaden with fetters; and swore that he should be instantly sacrificed, if he refused to submit. U-san-ghbey opposes him. The brave U-san-ghbey, when he beheld his father in that condition, from the top of the city-walls, burst out into a flood of tears; and, falling on his knees, prayed to heaven to forgive him, if he sacrificed his filial duty to his allegiance to his prince; and the good old gentleman, applauding his son's noble resolution, submitted to his fate, and was accordingly put to death. Noble resolution. U-san-ghbey, resolving at once to revenge his prince and his father's death, immediately struck up a peace with the Manchew or eastern Tartars, and invited them to his assistance against the usurper and his rebellious forces; which Invites the eastern Tartars. Tsong-te, their king, easily consented to, and, without any delay, joined him with an army of 80,000 men; upon which the usurper raised the siege, and marched directly to Pe-king. Not thinking himself safe there, he plundered and burnt the palace, and, with the immense treasure he had got, fled with his troops into the province of Shen-si, no less loaden with the curses of the people, than with the spoil of the imperial city (P). Li burns and plunders the palace.

Tsong-te died almost as soon as he had set foot in China, after he had declared his son Sun-tsong te's son his brother A-ma-van. The young prince was presently after conducted to Pe-king; and received with the acclamations of the people, as their great deliverer. Nothing was heard on all sides but the shouts of Van-swi! Van-swi! Long may he live! long live the emperor! may he live a thousand years! This memorable revolution, which put a final end both to the twenty-first dynasty, and to the Chinese government, and made way a second time for that of the eastern Tartar, happened in the twenty-first year of the seventy-third cycle, which answers to that of Christ 1644 (Q). End of the Chinese monarchy.

WHAT became of the traitor Li, and of his army and immense treasure, is not certainly known. Some say that he retired with them into the province of Shen-si, one of the six which he had made himself master of; and that he settled and fortified himself in it, the best he could, against the new conqueror: others think that he was slain in an engagement by U-san-ghbey. However that be, we hear no more of him from the time of his retreat from Pe-king; more mournful epistle, in which he complains of the treachery of his officers, but absolves his subjects of the guilt, and prays that they may escape the punishment of it. He deeply laments the ruin of his empire, which had flourished in such power and splendor so long a series of centuries; and the extinction of his antient and royal family, who had held it so long, and with so much glory; and concludes, that, since he hath lived to see the loss and ruin of them, and of all that was valuable in life, he thought it high time to put an end to it. But that author mentions nothing of his cutting off his daughter's head, as Du Halde doth (46).

(P) The villain, who had hitherto hardly encountered with any but unarmed and disheartened enemies, and had succeeded more by treachery than valour, was so exasperated to see himself now opposed not only by the imperial army, but by a much more numerous and warlike one of the Tartars, that, not content to give up that rich metropolis to be plundered by his rebellious troops, whilst he did the same by the imperial palace, he vented his rage on the inhabitants by the most bloody and execrable cruelties during his short stay; and that under pretence of punishing them for those remaining faint sparks of loyalty which they had dared to shew for their lawful sovereign, which rather consisted in an universal abhorrence they testified, than in any resistance they ventured to make against him.

What forces the king of Tartary brought with him into China, we are not told; except, in general terms, that they were without number, both of horse and foot. They were commanded by the three uncles of that young monarch, who served him so faithfully with their wise counsels as well as valour, and behaved with such moderation and equity towards the Chinese, as the more easily reconciled them to his government (47).

(Q) The Chinese historians, or at least our European memoirs from them, have not been so careful to transmit to us the year and month of the Tartar and his army entering into China, nor the length of the reign and life of this last Chinese emperor. We are only told in general, that, after their arrival, the conquest of the whole empire was completed in three years and some months; and that Quang-tong, or Can-ton, the last city which surrendered to them, was not taken by them till January 1647; from which it is probable to suppose, that they entered about the end of the year 1643, and that the new emperor was crowned some time in the year above-mentioned (48).

I. SHUN-CHI, or Xun-chi, began his new reign with rewarding the noble U-san-ghey, by bestowing upon him the dignity of king, and title of Ping-si, which signifies the pacifier of the west; and assigned to him the city of Si-gnan-fu, capital of Shen-si, for his residence, which had been lately ravaged with fire and sword by the usurper Li. But this did not hinder U-san-ghey from sorely repenting of his error and rashness in calling the Tartars to his assistance against that tyrant, or, as he himself used to phrase it, in sending for lions to drive away dogs. In the mean while the young monarch, who was now absolute master of the northern provinces (R), began to turn his arms to the conquest of the southern ones; rightly judging, that he should never enjoy the one quietly till he had got possession of the other.

On the other hand, he did not think it proper to leave the kingdom of Korea behind him, a fierce and warlike people, who had a king of their own, but who was a vassal to the Chinese, and now of course to him. He marched accordingly against them at the head of a powerful army; and, though the Koreans fought with much vigour and intrepidity, yet they still found themselves inferior to the Tartars. At length their king thought it the wisest way to secure his crown by a timely submission; which Shun-chi readily accepted, and brought back his forces with honour; and ordered the Korean king to follow him to Pe-king, where the articles of peace and homage were soon after concluded; and, having received his crown and sceptre from the emperor, and paid him the homage agreed on, returned to his own subjects. Shun-chi then ordered his army, under the command of one of his uncles, to march directly towards the south, where a grandson of Shin-tsong, or Van-lye, the thirteenth emperor of the foregoing dynasty, had been proclaimed emperor, under the name of Hong-quang, or Hung-guan, which signifies splendor, and had most of the nine southern provinces under his subjection. This young prince had many amiable qualities, and had been educated under the late and last emperor with great care, whilst the empire was at peace, and was looked upon as the last refuge of the Chinese; but was with great difficulty prevailed upon by the Mandarins to accept of a crown, the weight of which he foresaw would soon crush him to death. However, he was prevailed upon at last; and took all proper means to fortify his capital of Nan-king, and to strengthen his army; but, with all these precautions, found himself unable to resist the superior force of the enemy, which came and besieged him in that city, and soon made himself master of it. Hong-quang was pursued in his retreat, and taken prisoner, by the Tartar general, who immediately slew him, or, according to others, sent him to Pe-king, where he was strangled. Being returned to Nan-king, he gave the government of it to the Chinese Mandarin, who had enjoyed some of the greatest posts under the two or three last emperors, and made him viceroy of that province.

(R) It is surprising to think what quick progress he made in the conquest of those northern ones, considering their vast extent, and the number and strength of their cities; for he made himself master of them all within the space of about a year, that is, by the latter end of the year 1644. It is true the Chinese had neither the heart, nor were they at that time so loyal to the family of their ancient princes, as to make any considerable resistance; nevertheless there were several that did, though with so little success, as gave even but small encouragement to others to follow their example. But the new emperor, who would himself be always at the head of his vast and powerful army, had such excellent counsellors and generals, particularly his three uncles lately mentioned, that he fell immediately into the most effectual and expeditious way of reducing them.

His method was, not to trouble himself, when he entered into a province, what great towns he left behind, but to bend his forces towards the metropolis at once, which he first caused to be summoned; and, if they submitted, he treated them with all possible humanity, appointed such governors over them as they could not but approve of, and often some of their own nation, and left the rest of their polity in the same state in which he found it, without making any alteration. If they refused, then he ordered his numerous troops to bring them the second summons; which they did with such force and fury, that they gained the place in a short time; in which case they must submit to the fate of war, which was generally very hard and cruel, if it were to serve as a warning to the rest. By these means, whether the metropolis submitted of its own accord, or was forced to it, the rest of the cities seldom failed of opening their gates to him; and the reduction of the capital proved the reduction of the whole province (49).

Another thing that greatly forwarded the conquest not only of these, but of the southern ones afterwards, was, that the emperor, in all his declarations, always ascribed his great and surprising success not to his valour, or to the number and courage of his troops, as might be natural for such a young monarch to do, but to the will and favour of heaven; which squaring exactly with the notion of the Chinese, they not only readily yielded to it, but were glad to plead it as an excuse for their so shamefully abandoning the interest and cause of their natural princes, of their laws and liberties, and so tamely submitting to a foreign yoke; for, if that was the absolute will and decree of heaven, how could it be in their power to oppose it, or what could they do better than submit to it? This was, it seems, their excuse then, and is so still, whenever any other nation upbraids them with their slavery.

- a He marched thence into Che-kyang, and besieged the capital; where Lo-vang, then king of it, and a prince who had refused the title of emperor, appeared upon the walls, and, on his knees, begged the Tartars to spare his subjects, and to accept of his life as a victim for theirs; and then went out, and submitted to their mercy, and had the good fortune to obtain it. Not long after this, another grandson of the late emperor Shin-tsong, named Loug-vu, and by others Long-vu proclaimed emperor in the province of Se-chwen, which, with those of Fo-kyen, Quang-tong, and Quang-si, were the only four that still remained unsubdued; and, though he was not in a capacity of recovering those that were lost, he was still made to hope that he might be able to preserve these. He was the more easily flattered into this hope, as there had appeared in his interest at sea one of the bravest commanders, whom many of the nation had joined, and who was then very powerful, and successful enough to alter the face of his affairs.
- b This captain was the famed Ching-chi-long, a person originally of an obscure extract (S), but then one of the richest and most considerable traders in the province of Fo-kyen; who, at his own charges, had fitted out a numerous fleet against the Tartars; and was followed by such an innumerable multitude of Chinese vessels, that he became head of one of the most formidable fleets that ever appeared on those seas; and had openly declared for the young Chinese monarch, against the usurping Tartar. Some relations do even affirm, that he was the chief person who caused him to be crowned emperor; and indeed the immense wealth which he had amassed by sea and land, and the vast number of vessels and troops which he had under his

(S) Ching-chi-long, called also Chin-chi-lung in the Dutch ambassies, and by foreigners Iquan, Icoa, Equan, and Ikoan, was born in some obscure maritime place in the province of Fokyen, of very mean parents; but, being a sprightly lad, went to seek his fortune abroad, first at Macao, among the Portuguese, where he served a merchant for some time, became a convert to Christianity, and took the name of Nicholas, or, as others have it, Gaspard. From thence he went to Japan, where he soon raised himself in the service of a rich merchant; and, from his factor, became the commander of his trading vessels, with which he used to carry on a considerable traffick into Cochin-China, Kamboya, and other places, not only for his own masters, but for a number of other merchants, who likewise intrusted him with some of their richest commodities.

Being come to Kamboya, he received letters, that both his master and they were dead; some of the plague which had raged in Japan, and others, of the famine that followed it; upon which, without any regard to Christianity, which he had so lately embraced, he forged their wills, and made himself heir to all the wealth they had intrusted him with; and, to avoid being questioned by the Chinese Mandarins about their validity, resolved to turn corsair; and, with the wealth he had made himself heir to, purchased a number of other vessels, and soon became commander of a formidable squadron, by the many other pirates who joined him, and put themselves under his colours; insomuch that he, and one more of the same profession, had the sole command of those seas, and plundered all that fell in their way, without distinction, but under a mutual agreement not to act offensively against each other.

The emperor and court, to whom they were become dreadful, and yet were not in a condition to suppress them by open force, bethought themselves of a stratagem that would in all likelihood effectually do it. Accordingly he received a letter from the emperor to this purport; That, being thoroughly apprised of his valour and success, and of the great services he might do to his prince and country, he promised him not only a general pardon and amnesty for all his piracies, but to make him chief admiral of all his sea-forces, and captain-general of all the sea-coasts, or any other dignities or employments he should desire, on condition he joined immediately the imperial navy, and assisted it in ridding the seas of the other piratic fleet. The same offers were made at the same time to the other commander, in a letter sent to him from the same monarch. What effect it had upon the latter, is not known; but Ching-chi-long, though he presently suspected the artifice, yet depending on his strength and good fortune, made no hesitation to go and fall upon the other; and, after a long and bloody fight on both sides, wherein he proved victorious, struck off his head, and took as many men of his men and vessels as he could, the greatest part of which readily lifted under his flag, as they only exchanged masters, without altering their condition. By this means Icoan became more powerful than ever; and, when the imperial fleet came to join him, they dared not do otherwise than congratulate him on his late victory, and great success; whilst he, by virtue of the emperor's letter, and a sufficient force to oblige him to stand to his promises, began to act according to the tenor of them, without betraying the least diffidence of the court's sinister views, and to oblige all trading ships to receive their passports from him; insomuch that none of them, whether Chinese, or of any nation, dared venture to sea without them.

He had but one thing to fear, the resentment of the court, on account of his cruel exactions on all those trading vessels, his taking all that had not a pass from him; and many other such extortions, by which the commerce was greatly obstructed, and the maritime provinces greatly impoverished. But, as he was perfectly well acquainted with the ways of the court, and that the emperor, surrounded as he was by his eunuchs and ministers, knew little or nothing of his subjects' miseries, but what they pleased to acquaint him with, he found means to bribe them so high and effectually, as to stop all complaints from coming to his ears; they caring but little how he plundered and robbed the people, whilst they so plentifully partook of the spoil. Nothing was heard among them but the highest encomiums on him, and the vast services he did to his prince and country, whilst the continual complaints sent to them from the desolate provinces were wholly suppressed by his large presents from being so much as heard. By this time he was grown to such a height of power and insolence both by sea and land, that, upon a disgust against the imperial officers at Canton, who were in arrear to him about 20 or 30,000 ducats of his stipend, he went on shore into that populous city with only 6000 of his own men, caused a tribunal to be reared in one of the squares, and there summoned those officers, with some public notaries, and obliged them to pay him the money on the spot; and, having given them authentic receipts for it, went back to his fleet without the least molestation. This was the condition to which Ching-chi-long had raised himself at the time of the Tartars invading the Chinese empire, and which we thought necessary to give our readers a sketch of, for the better understanding the rest of this transaction. command, had rendered him so powerful, and the vast bribes with which he had been continually cramming the chief eunuchs and ministers had confirmed his interest at court to such a degree, even during the preceding reign, that he alone seemed to govern the empire; so that, if he had not been faithfully attached to the royal family, he might much more easily have seized on the crown than either of the two rebels Li and Chong lately mentioned; and much more so after the fatal death of that unhappy monarch, and the wars that raged all over the empire: but his fidelity to the royal blood would not permit him to listen to, much less to form, any such design (T); and this it was that induced at length the Tartar monarch, who looked upon him as one of the most powerful obstacles to his reducing the few remaining provinces, to try to gain him to his interest by the greatest offers, and fairest promises (U). These he rejected with haughtiness and scorn; and, being fully resolved to defend his prince to the last, sent an embassy to Japan, to procure some forces from that monarch, which was however refused on account of its being sent not by the emperor, but from a subject. This did not discourage him from making a noble defence; and several battles, we are told, were fought with great bravery on both sides; till at length the brave Ching-chi-long was taken prisoner, and sent to Pe-king; upon the news of which, the unfortunate Long-vu soon found himself disappointed of all his hopes, all the cities of that province opening their gates to the conqueror; and himself, whether betrayed by Ching-chi-long, as some pretend, or hurried through his ill fate into their hands, was deprived at once of his life and crown. And then it was that Ching-chi-long, now in the hands of the Tartars, and envied and hated by the court more on account of his great wealth and glory than of his fidelity to his prince, went over to the Tartar interest, to rid himself from the many prosecutions they had laid against him; which step he could then take with less dishonour to himself, not only as Long-vu, for whom he had declared himself was now dead; but as he knew his powerful fleet to be still under the command of his own son the brave Ching-chi-kong, of whose loyalty to the imperial family of China he was fully satisfied. Some relations pretend that he was not taken prisoner; but invited to a grand feast at court by the Tartar monarch, and was conducted thither with honour; and that he accepted of the invitation, in hopes of obtaining the highest dignities there; but, as this doth not appear suitable to his character and behaviour in other cases, we rather think he was carried thither prisoner.

HOWEVER, the Tartars had by this time so far proceeded in their conquest, that there remained but few that stood firm to the imperial family; and these one of the conqueror's uncles, named by some relations Peli-pu-wang, or Peli-pa-ovan, was sent with a powerful army to reduce, who was moreover made viceroy, or, as others say, king, of those provinces, which were Quang-si and Quang-tong, besides that of Fo-kyen lately surrendered to him. He sent accordingly a vast body of troops into that of Quang-tong, where one of the imperial family of China had been proclaimed emperor; but had only a few dastardly troops, which had

(T) This is the common opinion, though there are not wanting those who give him a quite different character, and charge him with having aspired to the crown, when made general of the Chinese forces, and to have betrayed the young emperor to the Tartars, for which he was afterwards cast by them into a prison at Pe-king, where he died (51). We shall only observe at present under this head, that the Dutch then settled at Formosa, or rather Taywan (52), having given him some umbrage, either by their carrying on too great, or perhaps some illicit, trade with China and Japan, for which he sent them a threatening message that he would drive them from that island, they sent him an embassy, and agreed to pay him 30,000 crowns a year for their liberty of commerce; and, among other presents, a golden sceptre and crown, engaging themselves to assist him with all their forces, in case he took the step hinted at by the present: and we are told, that he never made any other shew or use of it, than to have it carried about among other ornaments of his wardrobe.

(U) These promises were made to him by the Chinese Mandarin lately made viceroy, in which, among other things, he assured him of his being made viceroy, or even king, of the two provinces of Fo-kyen and Quang-tong; or, if he insisted upon it, should only pay homage to the Tartar emperor for them. This offer Ching-chi-long not only rejected with scorn, but treated the Tartar as a robber and usurper; and vowed, that he would not only defend the few provinces still unconquered, but that he would use his utmost power to recover all the rest to the imperial family of China. It is true, when he was afterwards taken prisoner by the Tartars, and this haughty answer was laid before the emperor against him, he denied it to be his, as he was forced to do many other accusations laid to his charge. What was still more surprising, those very ministers of the Chinese court, whom he had corrupted by his vast bribes in the last reign, being now gone over to the Tartars, became his most inveterate accusers; so that, knowing their rapacious temper, he had recourse to his former expedient of cramming them with fresh gifts, which at once stopped their mouths, and all farther accusations; and he at length was acquitted with honour and applause.

As for the several battles which he fought against the Tartars during about six months before he was made prisoner, we only hear that they were very bloody ones, without any farther particulars of the success of them. The relations do not so much as hint whether he was taken in one of them, or in defending any of the imperial cities; neither is it certainly known what became of him at last, so dark and contrary are the accounts we have about it.

- a already (W) turned their backs more than once to the conquering Tartars, and were expected to do so again on their first appearance. The capital, where he then resided, was indeed very strongly fortified, and populous enough to have maintained a siege, had it been better garrisoned; nevertheless some relations affirm, that about twenty of the Tartarian horse, having entered it, and riding about the streets in a hostile manner, put the whole place into such a consternation, that the army, which was then about half a day's march from it, had nothing to do but to enter it in triumph, and take possession of it, without meeting with the least opposition^a; but that seems altogether invented to expose the Chinese nation for not having better defended their country and liberty; and it is more probable that that metropolis, which, besides its garrison, such as it was, contained above 200,000 inhabitants, most of them rich and opulent [to say nothing of its having been made a repository of immense treasures from other parts, as a place of more strength and safety], made a vigorous defence; and accordingly we are told by others, that it sustained a vigorous siege near a whole twelvemonth before it surrendered to the Tartar general, who, on that account, permitted it to be plundered three whole days. On the first night of their entering it, a powerful fleet, which brought a considerable reinforcement, appeared on the canal of Canton, and came up to the town; but, finding the place already in the possession of the enemy, were so exasperated at it, that they set fire to the new city, which was the finest and richest part of the whole, and then put to sea again. The city was plundered, and burnt to ashes; and the young emperor, being found concealed among some faithful friends, was put to death in the fortieth day of his reign, and with him all his adherents. The plunder which was found in it, during the three days it was left to the mercy of the army, amounted to an immense value; and the indignities and cruelties which were committed against the inhabitants, without distinction of age, sex, or quality, were no less dreadful. At length the generals put an end to both; and, having restored good order and government in that metropolis, set about the reduction of the rest of the province; and met with so little resistance in it, that they completed it in a very little time.
- THEY marched next into the province of Quang-si, where they met with a quite different reception; and where Thomas Kyu, then viceroy of it, and Luke Chin, generalissimo of the Chinese forces, both Christians and brave warriors, engaged them with such intrepidity, that they intirely defeated and put them to flight. After this, the victorious army proclaimed a new emperor of the Chinese family, named Young-lye, then king of the metropolis of the province of Quey-chew, and removed his court to Shau-king (X), alias Xao-chin, the only city in the province of Quang-tong that stood firm against the Tartars, and refused to submit to them.
- THE news of the late victory, and of their election of a new emperor, was soon spread thro' the other provinces; and so effectually revived the courage of the Chinese, that a commander, who had got together a new army in the province of Fo-kyen, began to recover several cities from the Tartars; whilst the brave Ching-chi-kong (Y), the son of Ching-chi-long, at the head of a numerous Chinese fleet, did the same on the sea-coasts. This new admiral, still more zealous for the imperial Chinese family than his father, performed many noble exploits against the Tartars, in which he met at first with great success. He took several considerable places from them, as the city of Hay-ching, in the province of Fo-kyen, where he cut in pieces the Tartar army sent to relieve it; that of Wen-chew, in the province of Che-kyang, Nan-king in Kyang-nan, and many others. The misfortune was, that his good success did not follow him long, before he met with so total a defeat, that he was quite driven out of China by the Tartars, and forced to direct his views another way, viz. against the island of Formosa, where he was in hopes to erect a new kingdom, after he had driven the Dutch out of it.

(W) The Chinese relations do not tell us the name of this new monarch, though they are more exact and full as to the other transactions that happened in this province, which being situate over-against Ma-cau, the Portugueses had a much better intelligence of them than of what was done in others more remote.

X) This young monarch had for his chief counselor an eunuch, named Pan-Achilles, who was a very zealous Christian, by whose interest Father Andrew Koffler was permitted to instruct his royal mother, his queen, and eldest son, in the truths of Christianity, who all received baptism from him; and it was expected, that this monarch would one day be the Constantine of the Chinese nation, which name they gave him with that view when he was himself baptized; and we are told, that these illustrious converts did, by his consent, depute Father Michael Boyn to Rome, to pay a filial obedience to the holy see in their names.

(Y) This is the same that is called Coxinga in the Dutch Ambassy, and whom they charge with having driven them out of Formosa, or Tay-wan, contrary to the articles agreed on between them: but they say nothing of the provocation they gave him of it, viz. their seizing some of his ships as they were sailing towards the eastern provinces with money to pay his forces there; by which disappointment they disbanded themselves; and he, in a fit of despair, and resentment against their treachery, sailed directly against them, and drove from that island, as we shall have farther occasion to shew.

HOWEVER, there were, besides those two, some others who appeared in arms at the same time for the new Chinese monarch, particularly the viceroy of Kyang-si, who shook off the yoke, and defeated the Tartars in several engagements. Soon after this there appeared two other chiefs in the northern parts, one named Ho, and the other Kyang, each at the head of a numerous army which they had newly raised. The first marched directly into the province of Shen-si, and made himself master of some considerable cities in that province; and the other, following him into it with an army of 140,000 horse, and a much greater number of foot, defeated the Tartars in two engagements; and threw them into such a panic, that they dared not appear any more in the field. Yet this did not deter the rest of them from pushing on their good fortune; for they made a second attempt on the city of Shau-king, where the Chinese monarch resided; and which made so vigorous a defence, that they were obliged to abandon it. They met a second repulse on the frontiers of the province, whither the Chinese monarch had gone to meet them, and was the first that had the courage to do so during this war, and gave them a fresh defeat. But the most dreadful general that took up arms against them was one named Chang-byen-chang, who acted more like a devil incarnate than a Chinese chief, making the most dreadful havock in the western provinces; and, after having exercised the most horrid cruelties in those of Ho-nan, Kyang-nan, and Kyang-si, turned his whole fury against that of Se-chwen, where he committed the most unheard-of outrages and barbarities (Z); and did not leave it till he had burnt the capital, and other cities, and filled them with ruin and slaughter. He next advanced towards that of Shen-si, where he was preparing to give the Tartars battle. He was already got near their army when he was told, that five warriors were seen upon the hills; upon which he went to view them, without staying to put on either helmet or cuirass; but was scarcely got in sight of them, before he was shot through the heart with an arrow. His army was soon after dispersed; and the people of that province, seeing themselves free from the danger of that bloody monster, readily received the Tartars, and submitted themselves to them.

BUT, by this time, so many ill successes obliged the Tartars to have recourse to stratagem; and partly by bribes, rewards, and promises, and partly by sowing divisions and jealousies among the Chinese commanders [which last proved the most effectual], regained in a few years all the places they had lost, and obliged the Chinese forces to submit. As for the city of Shau-king, it had suffered so much by that time, that, upon the Tartars besieging it afresh, Young-lye, not being in a condition to defend it against their powerful army, found himself obliged to abandon it to them, and to retire into the province of Quang-si, and afterwards into that of Xun-nan.

THE year after the reduction of Can-ton, which was the twenty-eighth of the seventy-third cycle, died the great A-ma-van, uncle and guardian to the young Tartar monarch Shun-chi, to the great regret not only of the whole court, and Tartar nation, but of the subdued Chinese also, among whom he was highly esteemed for his gentle treatment of, and singular humanity towards, them; so that he might be justly looked upon as the chief person who fixed the Tartar family now reigning upon the throne. His brother, who had a small sovereignty in the southern provinces, claimed a right to the guardianship of the young emperor; but he being then fourteen years old, and married to the daughter of the prince of the western Tartars, that claim was opposed by all the grandees, and the young monarch deemed capable of govern-

(Z) This monstrous brute, who could be affable to none but his foldiers, with whom he would converse and carouse with great familiarity, put the king of Ching-tu-fu, the metropolis of Se-chwen, to death, tho' he was a prince of the last Chinese dynasty; and, wherever he conquered, he governed with such a tyrannic sway, that if any man committed a fault, though ever so small, he caused him, and all the people that lived in the same street, to be put to death. He caused 5000 eunuchs to be murdered, because one of them refused to give him the title of emperor. A little after, double the number of Literati, whom he pretended to consult about some affairs, were likewise butchered, on pretence that they, by their sophistry and subtleties, stirred up the people to rebel. Being about to depart from Ching-tu-fu, he ordered all the inhabitants to be led out of that city in chains, and to be massacred in the fields, to the number of 60,000; and did not leave that province till he had burnt its capital, and several other considerable cities. He was no less cruel to his own troops, ordering them to kill their wives, because they were an incumbrance in time of war; and set them an example, by cutting the throats of three hundred of his own, reserving only twenty, to wait on the three queens (53).

As he pretended to be a great friend to the Christians, he boasted to some of the missionaries, that he had destroyed 20,000 Bonzas, on account of one of that order having raised a persecution against them; telling some of those fathers, that the Lord of heaven had sent him to punish those miscreants, who had intended to take away their lives. The same author adds (54), that he professed such a veneration for the law of Christ, that he promised, when he came to the empire, to erect a magnificent temple to God. For this he hath been represented by a late ingenious writer † as a person of Jewish extract, for claiming a commission from God for all his murders and villainies, and styled the Chinese Constantine, as being, in his opinion, so like the Constantine of Rome; but with what justness, or regard either to the law or gospel, let the reader judge.

a ing alone. They even caused the ensigns of their respective dignities to be hung at the gates of the palace; protesting, that they would receive them again from no other hands than those of Shun-chi. As soon as it was resolved that he should take upon him the reins of government, the young monarch did it in such a manner, as could not fail of gaining the hearts of all his subjects. Instead of shutting himself up in the imperial palace, as was the custom of the Chinese emperors, he began his reign by shewing himself in public, and giving free access to his person. But what charmed the Chinese nation above all things, was, his extreme moderation, and the singular and unhoped-for regard which he paid to their antient laws and government; in which, contrary to the usual custom of other conquerors, he did not make any alteration, except in a few particular cases; and would not so much as permit them to learn the Tartarian language, without his special licence. He also retained their six supreme tribunals, but would admit them to sit no-where but at Pe-king; and ordered that there should be a Tartar as well as a Chinese president in each of them, and that those of Nan-king should be suppressed.

b He continued to bestow the government of provinces and cities on the Literati; but abolished that abominable practice of their examiners, of licensing persons for money who were not duly qualified for it. He even condemned thirty-six of the former to be beheaded for that male practice, and caused the latter to undergo a fresh examination: pardoning those who were found qualified for their degrees, and banishing the rest, with their families, into Tartary, which is since become the common place of exile for great offenders; as the properest means of peopling those vast deserts is, that the children who are born there may more effectually contract a natural conformity to the manners and disposition of the Tartars. With regard to the Chinese troops, which, upon their submission, were incorporated with his own, though he left a great many of their own officers to command them, especially if they were either well skilled in the martial discipline, or were descended from considerable families, in which last case they were rather a kind of hostages to him; but still he commonly set some of his own Tartars over them. And as to civil employments, he was still less scrupulous; and let such of the Chinese, as were found qualified for them, enjoy them, as they had under their native princes; or even raised them to some of the highest, if their desert intitled them to it; though he frequently found occasion to lessen their exorbitant power, and in some cases to reduce it to a mere honorary title. But still all this was done with so much candour and judgment, as plainly shewed those necessary alterations to be more for the good of the empire than the support of his government.

THREE years after, Ching-ching-kong, alias Coxinga, who had been left commander of the numerous fleet belonging to his father, after having contented himself, for some time, with making incursions, and plundering the coasts of China, came, at length, and besieged the city of Nan-king, with about 3000 ships. A council of war being called, by the viceroy of the province, who was a young Chinese Mandarin, a Tartar chief declared, that it could not be defended, unless its numerous inhabitants were destroyed. Upon which the young governor bravely replied, "If that be the case, you must begin the butchery with me;" which stopped the Tartar's mouth, and saved the lives of some myriads of citizens. The siege had gone on about three week, when Coxinga's birth-day caused an universal rejoicing through the besiegers camp, which lasted three whole days; during which, there was nothing seen but feasting, carousing, and all manner of diversions. When the besieged came to be apprised of it, they unanimously agreed to fall out upon them, with all possible silence, about midnight, and found them all drowned in sleep, and so overcome with wine, that they easily surprised them, and destroyed about 3000 of them, and forced the rest to flee, with all haste, to their ships, leaving their camp, provisions, and baggage, behind. To repair this loss and disgrace, he ordered his fleet to sail immediately after that of the Tartars, and engaged it with such desperate fury, that he sunk and took a great number of their ships; and having put the rest to flight, cut off the noses and ears of his prisoners, and set them on shore, to the number of 4000. All these unfortunate wretches were, soon after, put to death, under pretence that they ought to have died sword in hand, but in reality to conceal the shame of that defeat.

COXINGA, after this victory, thought it dangerous to return to China, where the Tartars daily gained ground, and began to think of executing what he had threatened against the Dutch; and, in the year 1661, and seventeenth of Shun-chi's reign, set sail directly towards the island of Formosa, with a fleet of 900 sail, and took the islands of Pen-gu and Tay-wan in his way, the Dutch not having had time to fortify themselves in either of them; so that they surrendered to him, on his first appearance (B). He left 100 of his ships there, to guard them, and with the rest went and besieged Formosa, where the Dutch made such a stout defence against him with their cannon, that he began to despair of mastering them, as he had brought no artillery against them. On the other hand, he was afraid, if the siege lasted too long, lest they should send to Batavia for a reinforcement, and force him to raise it; and if he was drove thence, he knew not where to fix next, all which obliged him to pursue it, at all events. At length fortune so favoured him, that, after four months, they were forced to surrender to him, for want of provision. They were, however, suffered to carry off their effects with them, whilst he dispersed his troops all over that part of the island which is now possessed by the Chinese, and established his new kingdom there. From this time that island put on a new face, every thing there being settled after the Chinese form. He lived not long to enjoy this his new kingdom, but died in about a year after, and left it to his son Ching-king-may, who, having been bred up to study, took little care to improve what his father had, with so much pains, acquired. This indolence did not a little cool the zeal and courage of his people for some time, till a new occasion revived their martial spirit, as we shall see in the sequel.

By this time the Tartars had been so successful in the continent, that they had reduced most of their opposers. Neither had Shun-chi any competitor to the imperial crown, but the unfortunate Young-lye; and he had been driven out of China, and taken sanctuary at the court of Pe-gu, where he still was honoured with the title of emperor. The kingdom of Pe-gu being contiguous to the province of Yun-nan, and Shun-chi, having reason to fear some fresh disturbances from thence, sent some troops thitherward, with a threatening letter to the king of Pe-gu, that, if he did not deliver up the fugitive prince, he would put his kingdom to fire and sword. Upon which that monarch, not being in a condition to cope with him, immediately surrendered him, with his whole family, to the Tartars, who conducted him to Pe-king, where he was quickly after strangled. As to the two queens, his mother, and consort, who were brought back with him, they had each a separate apartment allotted them, in the royal palace, where they were honourably treated, and lived and died in the Christian faith, which they had been converted to by Father Schaal.

THE same year proved fatal to the emperor, who fell passionately in love with a young married lady; and having used her husband, a young Tartar lord, with some indignity, which broke his heart, soon after raised his widow to the imperial dignity. He had afterwards a son by her, whose birth was celebrated with the greatest magnificence; but the child dying in three months, and the mother soon after, that monarch, upon the news of it, was seized with such grief, that he snatched a sword, and would have killed himself, had not his mother

(B) The Dutch, who, as was hinted a little higher, had made an alliance with Ching-ching-long his father, and paid him a tribute of 30,000 crowns for their liberty, accused his son of treachery, and of coming upon them unawares; so that, trusting on the treaty between them, they had taken no care to strengthen themselves. And yet, it is plain, by their own confession and behaviour, that they were conscious of having done something to incur his anger, seeing they conceived such an apprehension at some of his naval preparations, that they sent him a fresh embassy, to know whether he intended peace or war with them. The ambiguous answer he gave to them, That when he looked towards one point of the compass, he designed to steer towards another, without explaining himself further as to their question, did no less alarm them; so that he was far enough from finding them so unprovided, as they pretend.

As to the cause of his treating them in that hostile and severe manner, though they tell us nothing of it; but represent his case as desperate, and him as having no place to take sanctuary in, and secure himself against the resentment of the Tartars, but his making himself master of those islands; yet, if we may believe other relations, they will tell us, that they had given him the greatest cause of wreaking all his rage against them, seeing they had intercepted some part of his fleet, in which he had sent money and provisions, to pay some of his forces in the north-eastern provinces, who were in the utmost want of both, and did actually abandon him, upon their hearing of those ships being seized; by which disappointment, his condition was become indeed as desperate, as they say, and he had no other resource left, but at once to go and avenge himself of their treachery, and to fortify himself, and his few remaining forces, in that island.

a and eunuchs prevented it. He ordered afterwards that thirty men should voluntarily sacrifice their lives to her manes, after the Tartarian custom; a ceremony justly abhorred by the Chinese, and since abolished by his successor. He caused her body to be burned on a magnificent pile, and, with a flood of tears, gathered up her ashes into a silver urn. After which, he gave himself up to grief, and to the superstitions of the bonzaic sect, which he used formerly to treat with contempt, and, in a few days, was reduced to such extremity, that his life was despaired of. Father Schaal, for whom he had always had so great an esteem, waited upon him, and strove all he could to divert, or reason, him out of his deep melancholy, but in vain; he heard all he had to say with patience, forbade him to kneel to him, and made him drink tea with him, and, with his usual kindness, dismissed him; and, as soon as he was gone, ordered four lords of his court to draw near to him, and, in their presence, accused himself of a great variety of faults he had been guilty of, during his government; such as, his ingratitude to his most faithful ministers, his disregard to the counsels of his mother, his avarice and idle expences in vain curiosities, his affection to the eunuchs, and inordinate passion for the late queen, and the afflictions which he had occasioned to his people. After this, he appointed them guardians to his youngest son Kang-bi, whom he declared his successor, though then but eight years old; then calling for his imperial mantle, he put it on, and shrunk himself in his bed, saying, Now I leave you; and expired in an instant, in the twenty-fourth year of his age, and seventeenth of his reign. On the next morning, the Bonzas were all driven out of the palace, and the corpse of the deceased emperor was inclosed in a magnificent coffin; and the day after, Kang-bi mounted the throne, and received homage of all the grandees of the empire. His sickness, and last words.

II. KANG-HI was not only endowed with all the princely qualities that could render him worthy of, and an ornament to, the imperial diadem, but was likewise very happy in his four noble guardians, who made it their chief study to preserve the empire in a peaceable and flourishing condition. They began with driving all the eunuchs out of the palace, except 1000, whom they kept only to be employed in the lowest offices of it. They next published an edict, commanding all the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, on pain of death, to leave their dwellings, and to retire, and settle themselves, three leagues distance from the sea; and by which all the maritime cities, towns, and fortresses, were to be demolished, and all commerce by sea absolutely forbid. By this means, the power of the great sea commander Ching-kong was indeed greatly impaired; but it no less affected the fishing trade of the subjects; so that an infinite number of families, who wholly subsisted by it, were reduced to want. II. Kang-hi mounts the throne. After Chr. 1662. Towns on the sea-coasts destroyed.

AFTER this, came forth a severe edict against the Christian converts, all whose churches were demolished; and the city of Ma-kau in danger of sharing the same fate, had not Father Schaal, whose interest at court was still very great, prevented it, by employing all his friends there to procure to that city an exemption from the general edict against Christianity. For this he, and three more of the same society, were, some time after, imprisoned, and loaded with irons and infamy, upon the petition of one of the Literati to the regency, in which both the missionaries and their religion were represented in the most odious colours, and both, in a short time, totally suppressed, as we have already shewn, in a former section.^c Severe edict against the Christians.

In the fifth year of Kang-bi's reign, died the great So-ni, chief of the four regents; when the young emperor, taking the government into his own hands, began to give eminent tokens of that great reputation which he afterwards acquired during the sequel of his reign, the most glorious and flourishing that ever was. Soon after the death of that regent, came on the disgrace of Su-ka-ma, the next in credit to him, against whom were exhibited twenty articles of accusation. Upon which his effects were confiscated, and a most cruel sentence pronounced against him; which was, however, so far mitigated by the emperor, that he was only strangled, seven of his children beheaded, and his third son cut into pieces. Which severe punishment was looked upon, by the Christians there, as justly deserved by him, for the ill offices he had privately done to them, and their religion. About two years after, arrived the Portuguese ambassadors at the Chinese court, and met with an honourable reception; which did not a little contribute to the establishment of that nation at the city of Ma-kau. On the next year, Father Verbieft, who had been ordered to examine all the faults in the Chinese calendar, made by the successor of Father Schaal, in the chair of president of the mathematics, was promoted to the place; and the other, named Yang-quang-syen, who had set all the Bonzas and Mohammedans against the Christian religion, was not only turned out of it with disgrace, but even condemned to die, on account of the many blunders that were found in his calendar. Verbieft, who did at the same time instruct the young emperor in the mathematics for about five months, made use of all his interest with that monarch to restore the Christians to his favour, by representing to him the injustice of those calumnies that had been raised against them; but So-ni the chief regent dies. all he could obtain was the recalling of the missionaries, and a declaration from the assembly of mandarins, that the Christian religion taught nothing that was evil, or tending to sedition: however, they were expressly forbid to build any churches, and the Chinese to embrace Christianity.

In the twelfth year of Kang-hi's reign, U-san-ghey, who had invited the Tartars into China, to suppress the revolters there, and had been since made a tributary sovereign of a small principality, as has been elsewhere hinted, being by this time become strong enough, not only to make himself independent, but to deliver his country from their yoke, had already taken such measures, as gave the court no small suspicion of his intentions. He was thereupon invited by the emperor to come thither; but sent back his deputies with this answer, That he designed not to come thither, unless in company of 80,000 men; and, as soon as they were gone, made a public declaration of his design. He had made himself master of the provinces of Yun nan, Se-chwen, Quey-chew, and part of Hu-quang; and, which is a mark of the imperial prerogative, had sent the Chinese calendar to the neighbouring princes, and, among the rest, to the king of Tong-king, who all refused it, and sent it back to the emperor; upon which U-san-ghey's son, then at court, was condemned to be beheaded. Soon after this, the kings of Fo-kyen and Quang-tong did likewise declare war against the Tartars, and were joined by Ching-ching-may; the son of Coxinga, and now king of Formosa; so that Kang-hi would have had a powerful alliance against him, if all those princes had acted in concert, and in behalf of the common liberty. But they were soon divided by such unhappy jealousies, as quickly turned the scale in favour of the Tartars (C), and left U-san-ghey to fight alone for the Chinese cause; who being by this time much advanced in years, and full of grief at his misfortunes and disappointments, died soon after, not before he had seen himself stripped again of great part of the provinces which he had gained before. For, immediately upon the fatal rupture of his allies, Kang-hi sent several armies, commanded by Tartarian chiefs, to reduce those of Che-kyang, Hu-quang, Fo-kyen, Quang-tong, Quang-si, and, in a word, all that refused to submit to him. Notwithstanding all which losses, U-san-ghey's youngest son Hong-wba was declared emperor.

THE latter end of this year 1624 proved fatal to the emperor, and to some of the northern provinces of China, on several other accounts. A dreadful earthquake, which happened on the second day of September, at Pe-king, overturned a great number of palaces, temples, and other public buildings, together with the walls and towers of the city, and many thousands of people were destroyed by it. The shocks, which continued from time to time for near three months, were so terrible, that the emperor, princes, and nobility were obliged to quit their palaces, and to live in tents, whilst the rest of the people, both in the city and parts adjacent, were in the utmost consternation. On this occasion the emperor shewed himself a very tender father, in the timely relief he sent to all his suffering subjects. Towards the end of the same month the imperial palace was set on fire; and burnt with such fury, that it was all reduced to ashes in a few hours; the loss is computed to have amounted to two millions eight hundred and fifty thousand taels. Four days after this dreadful fire, the emperor set out with his usual retinue to take the diversion of hunting, at his pleasure-house; and observing, at a distance, the stately monument which his father had erected to the unfortunate Whay-tsong, the last of the Chinese emperors, he went to it; and, prostrating himself to the ground, caused rich perfumes to be burnt before it; and then addressing himself to the dead monarch with tears, You know, said he, O great emperor, that it was not we, but your rebellious subjects, who were the cause of your death.

In the mean time the king of Quang-tong, though he had submitted to the emperor a little before, gave no small umbrage to him, not only on account of his enterprising spirit, but on his having made himself exceeding powerful and rich by carrying on a trade with the Spaniards and Dutch, notwithstanding the imperial edict against it; upon which an order was sent to him from court to march with his forces to suppress the rebels in the province of Quang-si, which he did accordingly, and divided his army into several columns, as occasion required. He was soon after artfully prevailed upon to return to his own palace, on some pretence; and had not been there many days, before two grandees arrived from court, and presented him with a silken halter, and the emperor's orders to strangle himself; which he was forced to

(C) Ching-ching-may was the first who broke this alliance, and fell out with the king of Fo-kyen, under pretence that he had not paid him the honour due to his rank; upon which he declared war against him, defeated him in several battles, and obliged him to submit to the Tartars. On some such pretence the king of Quang-tong broke his treaty with U-san-ghey, and put himself and province under the protection of the emperor; and it is likely that these discords and jealousies were artfully sown among them by some of that monarch's agents; and that the young king of Formosa, who had shewn himself so careless and indifferent about his new kingdom, was privately influenced from the same quarter to fall foul on the king of Fo-kyen, in hopes of ingratiating himself to the emperor, and obtaining the government of some rich province in the continent by the defeat of his antagonist; but lost his aim, by the latter's being beforehand with him in making his submission to that monarch.

a submit to. Above one hundred of his accomplices, and, among them, three of his brothers, were beheaded; after which, his immense riches were divided between his other brothers, one of whom was the emperor's son-in-law. On the next year the king of Fo-kyen, another of U-san ghey's treacherous allies, was likewise put to death, and his body thrown to the dogs, on pretence that, during his revolt, he had mal-treated some of the Mandarins who continued faithful to the emperor; and at the same time his brothers, though innocent, were beheaded. The Tartars were no less successful against Hong-wba, who had been declared emperor in the province of Yun-nan: where, having made themselves masters of the capital, Hong-wba, to prevent a worse punishment, killed himself: but they, not content with that, dug up the bones of his father the brave U-san-ghey, and carried them to Pe-king, where they were exposed on stakes, with marks of infamy, in several public places, and then burnt, and the ashes scattered in the air. Hong wba kills himself. After Chr. 1681.

b By this time the whole fifteen provinces were so successfully subdued, that the emperor determined to visit his own native dominions of eastern Tartary, and the tombs of his ancestors; and set out accordingly in the beginning of March, accompanied by the prince his heir, his three queens, and a numerous court and retinue, such as we have elsewhere described; and ordered Father Verbieft to attend him, and to be always near his person; by which means he hath been enabled to give us a better account of those parts than we could possibly have before. On the next year he made a new progress into western Tartary, with a great retinue and more numerous army (D); and continued to do so every year, and spent several months there, in taking the diversion of hunting; a thing which neither the Chinese, nor even the Tartar lords of his court, much complained against. But that politic monarch had his ends in it, as we hinted in the last note; and it must be owned, that he was a prince of such excellent abilities, such constant application to the affairs of state, such penetration and justice in the choice of his ministers, such watchfulness over them, and such tenderness for his people, to say nothing of his singular frugality with respect to his own person, and profuse munificence with regard to the public, that it is not to be wondered at if he had the happiness of keeping that vast empire in so perfect a subordination and harmony, tranquillity, wealth, and grandeur, during a long reign of sixty years, which, under a less able governor, would be ever liable to discord and confusion. Kang-hi visits his Tartar dominions. After Chr. 1682.

c In the same year, 1682, Ching-ke-sun, the son of Ching-ching-may, and grandson of the famed Ching-ching-kong, or Coxinga, then king of Formosa, was obliged to surrender that island to the Chinese, and to repair to Pe-king, where the emperor conferred upon him the title of count, and had some small government granted to him to maintain that dignity; after which we hear no more of him, or any of his descendants. Two years after, that is, Anno 1684, the Fathers Gerbillon and Pereyra, two eminent missionaries, were ordered to accompany the Chinese plenipotentiaries into Tartary, and to assist them in the settling of the limits between the two empires of China and Russia; an account of which, as well as of their travels through western Tartary, and description of those parts, the reader may see at the end of the second volume of Du Halde's empire of China. Those two fathers, and some others of the same society, were likewise much taken up in instructing the emperor in the mathematics, and reading and composing lectures in the Tartarian tongue, on algebra, geometry, astronomy, natural philosophy, physic, and anatomy: for tho' that prince was before a complete master of all the Chinese learning, and had bestowed his leisure hours in them, yet could he not be satisfied without being equally versed in the European sciences; and it was by the interest of those his tutors that a decree was obtained in favour of the Christians, who were before but barely tolerated, but were now allowed the free exercise of their religion throughout the whole empire. This decree bears date 1692, and in the thirty-first [of his reign, and was confirmed and published in the month of March following. Formosa surrendered to the Chinese. After Christ, 1682. (D) The army which accompanied him in his first progress consisted of 70,000 men, besides his numerous court, and the more prodigious number of their attendants. What addition he made to it in his subsequent journies, we are not told; but they were so troublesome, and so expensive, that some of his ministers presented very pathetic memorials against the frequency of them.

However, though the diversion of hunting was the pretence for this, yet he had much higher views in it; viz. 1. To keep his troops in exercise, and prevent their growing effeminate by the example of the Chinese. 2. It served to display the grandeur and magnificence of his court, both to his subjects and vassal princes, who were obliged either to accompany, or meet him in his progress, to pay their homage to him. 3. These troops made his power and authority more formidable, and kept those vassal principalities in greater awe, especially as they were sure to be visited once a year by him. Lastly, It gave him an opportunity of liberally rewarding those who best deserved it, by his large presents to them, by remitting some part of their tribute to him, by assisting them in time of need with some of his forces against any competitor; and frequently by bestowing some of his daughters, with a liberal dowry, on such as he esteemed worthy of that honour; by all which means he made himself as much beloved by the loyal, as feared by the disloyal or discontented, whether vassals or subjects.

Kang-hi's son and heir degraded.
After Christ,
1709.

HITHERTO his reign had been peaceable and happy, when, on a sudden, the forty-eighth year of it was disturbed with an unexpected event; and his second son, whom he had appointed his heir, and was almost his equal in dignity, was at once loaden with irons, and his children and chief officers involved in the same disgrace; which was chiefly owing to the intrigues of his elder brother. He was however found innocent, upon strict examination, and the accusing brother condemned to perpetual imprisonment; and public rejoicings were made through the empire, on his being restored to favour. This joy, however, proved short-lived; and he was soon after deprived of all the titles and privileges of his rank, for a real conspiracy against his father.

A new edict against the Christians.
After Chr.
1716.

SOME years after, the emperor revived two old edicts against the Christians; the one, forbidding them to build any churches, or make proselytes; the other, obliging every missionary to receive an imperial patent, wherein shall be mentioned his country, order, the time he hath been in China, and his engagement not to return into Europe (F). Upon this, three of the fathers went to throw themselves at his feet; but could obtain no other answer, than that none were prohibited to preach the gospel, but those who had not received the patent.

Great anxiety at court about the successor.

THE next year, viz. 1717, happened the general mourning for the emperor's mother, which we have elsewhere given an account of. Soon after which, the emperor was seized with a distemper which his court feared would send him after her, and threw it into no small consternation; especially as he designed to exclude his own family from the succession, and to bequeath the crown to a prince of the dynasty of Ywen, of whom there still remained above a thousand. Upon this occasion one of the chief Mandarins ordered his son to present a memorial to him, setting forth the great importance it was to the peace of the empire to have his second son appointed his successor; at which the emperor was highly incensed. However, he pardoned the son, because what he had done was in obedience to his father, but ordered the father to be put to death; which deterred the rest of his ministers from speaking any thing more to him about a successor.

Signal victory over the Eluths.

Conquest of Tibet.

IN the year 1720 he received the congratulations of the whole empire, on the news of a signal victory which his forces had gained over the king of the Eluths, who possessed the country of the Lamas, and had committed dreadful ravages there four years successively; by which means the kingdom of Tibet fell into the hands of the conqueror; a thing which Kang-bi had much at heart, as he had the glory of finishing that troublesome war. In the month of June of the same year another earthquake was felt at Pe-king, which lasted about two minutes, and killed about 1000 persons by the fall of houses.

The Russian
public entry.

ON the 22d of November following, the ambassador from the czar of Muscovy made his public entry into Pe-king, with a numerous and splendid retinue, all dressed after the European manner; and the gentlemen on horseback, on each side of him, rode with their swords drawn, which was a sight both new and extraordinary there. His reception at court was no less polite and grand; though the emperor, for wise and obvious reasons, refused to comply with the main design of it, which was, to establish a free commerce between the two empires of Russia and China, and to have obtained leave to fix a factory in the chief provinces of the latter; and was pleased to confine their number to two, the one at Pe-king, and the other at Schu-kou-pai-sing, upon the frontier of the Kalkas *. There was, however, a circumstance, in the ceremonial of his admission, which that envoy could not readily consent to; and his refusal had like to have broken off all farther negotiation, when that politic monarch found out an expedient which would oblige him to comply. We have elsewhere observed, that every one, of what rank or character soever he be, that approaches the imperial throne, is obliged to prostrate himself on the ground, and knock his forehead nine times against it †.

THIS formal piece of respect, which is paid all over this vast empire, not only to the emperor, but to princes of the blood, viceroys, Mandarins, and other ministers, his excellency could not reasonably suppose would be dispensed with in an audience to so great an emperor. On the other hand, as he had cause to apprehend lest his complying with it should be judged too derogatory to his character and dignity, especially at his own court, and endanger the loss of his head; so he had no less cause to fear lest his refusal should be interpreted, at that of Pe-king, as a want of respect to his imperial majesty, and occasion a mutual dissatisfaction between those two great monarchs. We should here observe to our readers, that this very year was the sixtieth of the emperor Kang-bi's reign, and was a kind of grand jubilee

(F) This new edict was occasioned by a memorial, presented to that monarch by a military Mandarin, full of the bitterest invectives against the Christians. The Jesuits used all their interest to have prevented it passing thro' the usual examination of the tribunals, but in vain; and, though Father Du Halde represents it as fraught with the most unjust calumnies against them, and the Mandarin as an enemy who sought to raise himself by their fall; yet those tribunals confirming the accusations, and the emperor, who was their friend and patron, ratifying the sentence, shews that it must have contained something more than bare calumnies and invectives.

- a through his dominions, and was to be observed with the utmost joy and magnificence, and nowhere more than in his capital; so that it is not improbable he might on that account suppress his resentment of the ambassador's refusal, that it might not be an impediment to his being an eye-witness of, as well as by his splendid appearance from adding to, the splendor and brilliancy of his court. However that be, the following was the expedient his prudence devised to settle the ceremonial above-mentioned, in such a manner as should not admit of any exception from either side: "Let the ambassador know, that it is my design that the same honour
 " be paid to the letter which he is to deliver up to me from his master, which our laws require " to be paid to my own person; for which end I desire that he would place the said letter on " a table, that I may send one of my chief Mandarins in my name to strike his forehead on
 b " the ground before it." His excellency readily complied; and made no difficulty to pay the same honours to the emperor as he had done to the czar his master's letter §.

ON the following year the court received the disagreeable news that the Chinese in the island Formosa Formosa re- had in a few months shaken off the yoke; and, being assisted by those of Fo-kyen volts, and is reduced. and Kyeu-mi, had killed all the Mandarins, except one who fled, and, had put all the imperial forces to the sword. This revolt was at first reported to have been fomented by the Dutch; but whether justly, or no, is not certain. However, those rebels were soon after severely punished for it by a new supply of forces which the emperor sent thither, who cut most of them off, drove their chief into the mountainous parts, and dispersed the rest.

- IN the year 1722 the emperor, being taking the diversion of hunting in his park of Hay-tse, The emperor taken ill. was on a sudden seized with a strange chillness, which obliged him to return with all speed to his pleasure-house; where his attendants soon found, to their great surprise, that his blood was so congealed, that no remedy could save his life. Perceiving himself near his end, Kang-bi assembled all his grandees, and declared his fourth son his successor; and expired soon after, Dies. on the 20th of December, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, and sixtieth of his reign. His body was that very night conveyed to Pe-king; and his fourth son Yong-ching mounted the throne on the next morning, about five of the clock.

- III. YONG-CHING, the emperor then reigning when the last relations came from thence, was Yong ching forty-five years of age on his accession to the crown, on which he was congratulated by all the grandees; and took the name of Yong-ching, which signifies lasting peace, or indissoluble concord. proclaimed. After Chr. 1722. He had a great number of brothers; but placed no great confidence in any, except his thirteenth, to whom he communicated all the affairs of state; but banished his ninth into Tartary, where he soon after died; recalled his fourteenth, who had the command of the Chinese army; and most of the rest, especially his eighth and tenth, fell under his displeasure Some of his brothers disgraced. on some pretence or other. He next banished and imprisoned several princes and grandees, on account of their protecting the missionaries: which shews he was no friend to their religion (G); and discarded all the fathers out of his service, except one, who was an excellent painter; which shews that he had not the same love for the sciences that his father was so famed for. In other respects he shewed himself a wise prince, indefatigable and assiduous, steady and resolute, witty and eloquent, and always ready to receive and answer the memorials presented to him. He governed wholly by himself, and no monarch could be more absolute or more feared than he was. This gave him an opportunity of enforcing a great many wholesome laws and regulations for the good of his subjects, in the framing of which he spent whole days and nights with a surprising indefatigableness. The most effectual way to gain his favour, was, to present him with some scheme tending to the public good, or to the relief of his subjects in any calamitous times, and he would spare neither pains nor cost to put it in execution. His assiduity and wise regulations.

- THIS was the excellent character of Yong-ching; which made therefore his severity against the Christians the more remarkable, as it extended itself in a manner unworthy of so wise a prince, even to some of the most illustrious of the imperial family; particularly on that of the elder brother of the founder of this dynasty, who, together with his whole family, consisting of eleven princes [besides sixteen princesses who were married to Mogol princes or Man-

(G) It plainly appears that he had conceived a singular prejudice against these missionaries from the very beginning of his reign, by means of some memorials presented to him by the Literati, setting forth, that the late emperor had lost a great deal of his reputation by permitting them to settle in the provinces, where they built churches, and made proselytes, where-ever they came; and their converts acknowledged no other doctors but them, nor, in troublesome times, would they follow any directions but theirs.

This memorial was backed by another from the governor of Fo-kyen, much to the same tenor, which was confirmed afterwards by the tribunal of rites, and by the emperor himself, and produced those dreadful edicts against Christianity, and its preachers, which we have formerly had occasion to mention, and in a great measure extirpated it out of the empire (55).

darins of Pe-king, and had each of them a numerous family], were all degraded, and sent ^a into a miserable exile in a desert place in Tartary, to which they were conducted by soldiers, and there closely confined under a guard of them. The manner of their being treated before their exile had likewise something of cruelty in it; for that venerable old prince, without regard to his quality, age, merit, or the services done to the empire, was beheld setting out for the place of his banishment with thirty-seven of his children and grandchildren, without reckoning his daughters and grand-daughters, who were near as many, and about three hundred domestics of both sexes, most of them baptized. All these disgraces not being able to shake their constancy, the princes were brought back to Pe-king in waggons, each loaden with nine chains. There they were made to undergo several fresh interrogatories, mixed with promises of being restored to their former dignities, if they would renounce their faith, and with threats of being used with still greater severities, if they persisted in it. All these methods proving ineffectual, the tribunal condemned them to die; but the emperor changed the punishment into perpetual confinement; which only proved a more severe kind of death, seeing most of them died soon after in their close dungeons, merely thro' hardship and want; and the rest were dispersed into other provinces, to end their days in prison, fetters, and misery. The ambassadors of Portugal and Russia, who were then at the court of Pe-king, could not enough admire the constancy and intrepidity of those illustrious confessors of Jesus Christ.

In the year 1730, and eighth of his reign, he lost his thirteenth brother, who used to share with him the burden of his government; and died of a languishing disease, occasioned by his excessive application; and the emperor was so inconsolable for it, that it nearly endangered ^c his own life. However, he caused the most magnificent funeral obsequies to be performed to him, which, because they somewhat differ from those we have elsewhere described, the reader may see a short account of in the margin (H); and, amongst other honours he paid to his memory, caused his name to be placed in the hall of the emperors; a distinction never conferred on private persons, except they have done some extraordinary and important services to the state. His funeral obsequies were hardly completed before the third brother was arrested, and closely confined. The occasion of his disgrace is not known; but it extended itself to his family, who were degraded from their rank and dignities.

On the 13th of November 1731 the city of Pe-king was almost overturned by a dreadful earthquake, such as China never felt before. The first shocks, which happened about eleven ^d of the clock in the morning, were so sudden and violent, that they were not perceived but by the horrid noise of the falling of houses, and the cries of the people; and one would have imagined that they had been blown up in the air by a general mine, and that the earth had opened underneath to swallow them up; so that, in less than a minute, above 100,000 inhabitants were buried in the ruins, and a still greater number in the country, where whole towns were utterly destroyed. What was still more remarkable in it, is, that the two first shocks were not felt with the same force through the extent of their course; but in those places where they met with less resistance, they were gentle, and hardly perceived; whereas they caused the greatest devastations where they met with the greatest opposition. Those two great and dreadful ones were followed by above twenty more small ones within the space of twenty-one ^e hours.

(H) A declaration was at first issued out, intimating that it was the emperor's desire that all the world should share in his grief, and in the honours to be paid to the deceased, without distinction of rank or quality; with this caution nevertheless, that such as did not think him worthy of those honours should be at liberty to decline it, tho' he appointed officers at the same time to give him an account every day of all who performed that duty to him.

His body being exposed in the great Ting, where none but princes of the blood are admitted, there was a hall made of mats erected in the middle of the great court, before the gates of the palace, with a throne in it, and before that a table, on which were placed only two candle-sticks, and a vessel burning with perfumes; for the dead prince was not only a petty king of the first rank, but had been honoured likewise with the title of Que-wang, or king. The entrance into this hall was by a folding-door, which was opened as often as the officers of the tribunals came in their turns to pay their honours to him, only a set number being admitted in at a time. These at first stood up behind the tables that were set up on each side of the hall; then, kneeling down, made six several prostrations, accompanied with deep groans, and other silent tokens of grief, and then as silently withdrew, to make room for others that came to perform the same ceremony. From this place the body was afterwards conveyed in pomp to a palace built on purpose, about two little miles out of the city, where the same ceremony was repeated; and here it was that the Mandarins of the city, the whole body of merchants, and the meaner sort of people, were introduced to pay him the last honours for a hundred days; at the end of which he was carried to another place, still more distant, and erected for the same purpose, and where the same rites were performed during the same space of time.

There were five such stations, at each of which the ceremony lasted an hundred days; after which he was conveyed to the sepulchre which the emperor had caused to be prepared for him, and which was four leagues in circumference. To this last the Mandarins and grandees of the provinces were to repair, or depute some of their sons in their stead, to pay the same respects to the deceased; after which they returned to their respective stations, and there caused monuments to be raised to him, with the greatest eulogiums to his memory (56).

a THE emperor was then at his pleasure-house, about two leagues from Pe-king; which was instantly reduced to such a heap of ruins, that it will require immense sums to repair it. He was then taking an airing in his barge, on the canal that runs through the gardens; and, at the dreadful sight, fell prostrate on his knees, with his hands and eyes lifted up to heaven; after which, he published an edict, as usual, accusing himself as the main cause of it, and attributing the judgment to the wrath of heaven for his offences, and want of care in governing the people. He next ordered an account to be taken of all the families that suffered by it, and an estimate of their damages, and advanced considerable sums for their relief; and gave, in particular, 1000 taels to the missionaries, towards repairing of their churches. The emperor's pity on that occasion.

b BUT, on the next year, those missionaries, who had been ten years before driven from the provinces into the city of Quang-tong, were now banished from thence into Ma-kau, a little city inhabited by the Portuguese, but under the dominion of the Chinese[†]. What was still more severe, they had but three days allowed them to prepare for their journey, and conveying away their effects. The only reason they give for this sudden change, and hard treatment, is, that they had disobeyed the emperor's orders; and preached the Christian religion, in open defiance of his prohibition. They were accordingly forced to embark, to the number of thirty, on the 20th of August, under a convoy of four galleys and two Mandarins. When they came to land at Ma-kau, the Mandarins caused their domestics, and other Christians who had followed the missionaries, to be loaded with irons, and sent back to Quang-tong; where, after being dragged in an ignominious manner through several tribunals, some were cast into prisons, others bastinadoed, others condemned to carry the Kan-ghe, or wooden collar, a month or two; and all of them gave signal proofs of their zeal for, and sincere adhering to, the Christian religion. Jesuits banished to Ma-kau. Their domestics severely treated.

c THUS far go the Chinese annals, which Du Halde ends with the twelfth year of Yong-ching's reign, or the year 1732, at which time he was reigning with an absolute sway over that vast empire. Since that time, we have been informed that he died Anno 1736; and that the missionaries entertain no small hopes of being restored under his successor. However, these late accounts give us but little reason to expect it, since they acknowledge, that, though they found a great number of Jews and Mohammedans upon their first arrival thither, yet they met with no Christians, notwithstanding their having been so numerous formerly. Neither can they have those opportunities of recommending themselves to the Chinese nation by their superior skill in the sciences, as they once had upon their coming thither; but, instead of that, must expect to meet with the most strenuous opposition both from the Literati and the whole bonzaic tribe, and their numerous followers, against their religion, which, they cannot now be ignorant of, is so contrary to the tenets of the former, and the interest of the latter; to say nothing of the dislike and contempt which the disciples of Confucius, the only esteemed and valuable sect in China, must have conceived against some of their superstitious doctrines and practices. Hopes of a return frustrated.

d WHAT hath since happened to them, their various applications to the new Chinese monarch, their apologies in behalf of themselves and their religion; the several memorials which those few Jesuits, who were suffered to continue at Pe-king in the emperor's service, presented to the throne and to the superior tribunals, and the small success which they have hitherto met with, being foreign to our design, and coming to us from thence by private letters from some one or other of those fathers, may be seen in their collection of letters from thence, and published by Du Halde[‡], from that time to the year 1744; and we the more readily refer our curious reader to those letters, because he will easily perceive, from the style and tenor of them, that though neither these, nor any thing else from that quarter, were ever written with a design to extenuate the severity of the Chinese government, and much less to ascribe the total extermination of Christianity to the misconduct of the missionaries, especially those of the Jesuit fraternity, yet contain such a variety of important transactions, and curious pieces, artfully worded, and circumstances, as we may suppose them to be, as will shew him, that it was not without the most cogent motives, and after the strictest and most impartial inquiries, that those two great monarchs Kang-bi, and Yong-chin his son and successor, yielded to the strenuous and repeated solicitations of their viceroys and governors, and especially of the superior tribunal, that of the rites in particular, to put an effectual stop to its further progress, by the banishment and utter proscription of all the missionaries out of their dominions. It is hardly possible for the most prepossessed reader in favour of that society to read their relations on this subject, written as they are by some of their ablest pens, without admiring the extreme indulgence and benignity of those two great emperors towards them, and especially their unparalleled condescension, patience, and assiduity, in receiving, perusing, and examining, every memorial and apology which were presented to them in their favour, either by themselves or their patrons, before they could be prevailed upon to proceed to those unavoidable severities. But, as the Vain efforts to re-enter.

bare mention of every such instance of their impartial lenity would carry us beyond our a bounds, we shall conclude this subject, and, with it, the Chinese history, with that remarkable apologetic speech by which the before-mentioned emperor Yong-chin condescended to answer their complaints, in a memorial lately presented to him, and to justify his whole conduct towards them, to three of the most considerable members of their society.

THIS curious piece, or rather the substance of it (for, being spoken to them extempore, they could have no copy of it; neither could they, if they had been permitted, have taken it down in short-hand, his words flowing with by far too great a rapidity for any pen to follow), hath been transmitted in French into Europe by Father De Mailla, one of the three who had the honour to be admitted to this interview. The other two were Fathers Kegler and Parrennin, persons eminent in their way, and still in great credit at court. These three, having b been admitted to the imperial presence, according to his majesty's commands, and after the usual prostrations, continuing all the time in a kneeling posture, he addressed his speech to them in words to this effect:

The emperor's speech to the three Jesuit missionaries.

“ THE late emperor my father, after having caused me to be brought up forty years “ under his eye, hath made choice of me, preferably to my other brothers, to succeed “ him on his throne. I make it a capital point of my duty not to deviate in any thing from c “ his manner of governing. Some Europeans in the province of Fo-kyen, who had attempted “ to dissannul our laws, and to pervert the people, have been complained against to me; and “ I have thought myself obliged to remedy that disorder. It is an affair which concerns the “ empire committed to my care; and I neither could, nor ought I now to act as I did when “ I was only a private prince of the blood.

“ You tell me, that your religion is not a false one: I believe it: if I thought otherwise,
“ what could hinder my demolishing your churches, and driving you out of them? A false “ religion is that, which, instead of recommending virtue, inspires men with a spirit of revolt, “ like that of Pe-lyen-kiao. But what would you say, if I should attempt to send a number d “ of Bonzas and Lamas to preach their religion amongst you? How would they be received “ by you? Li-ma-low (the Chinese name of Father Ricci, one of the first Jesuits that came into “ China †), came hither at the beginning of Ovang, or Vang, Li's reign. I shall say nothing “ of the reception he met with from the Chinese; I am not answerable for what was then “ done. But at that time you were but a small and inconsiderable number. You had neither “ Christian converts nor churches in any of the Chinese provinces; and it was not till under “ my father's reign that you began to build them, and that your religion was spread every“ where with such surprising rapidity. We saw it, but dared not speak a word against it;
“ but, if you have found means to impose upon him, do not hope to do the same by me.
“ You would have every Chinese to become Christian; your law requires it of you, I am well “ assured of it; but, in that case, what must be the consequence but that we shall become e “ subject to your kings? Your new converts own no masters but you; and, if any public “ disturbances should happen, will listen to none but you. I am very well satisfied, that at “ present we have nothing to fear from you; but, when your European ships shall come “ hither by thousands and ten thousands, will there not then be some danger to be feared?
“ China hath on the north the great kingdom of Russia, which is far from a despicable one;
“ it hath on the south the Europeans, and their various kingdoms, which are still more con“ siderable; and, on the west, a great number of others, which I am resolved to keep under,
“ and prevent their subjects ever setting foot into China. When Angelo, the Russian ambassa- f “ dor's colleague, was endeavouring to obtain the liberty of settling Russian factories in all our “ provinces, for the better carrying on a mutual commerce, that favour was denied to him;
“ and he was allowed to traffick no-where but at Pe-king and Techu-koo-pay-sing, on the fron“ tiers of the Kalkas. In the like manner I have permitted you to stay here, or at Quang- “ tong, so long as you give us no cause of complaint; but, if any such you give hereafter, “ I will neither suffer you to stay in the one nor the other, but drive you out of every one of “ my provinces.

“ THE late emperor my father hath lost a good deal of his reputation, in the opinion of “ our Literati, by the condescension with which he permitted you to settle in his dominions.
“ The laws of our wisest princes will admit of no alteration; and I will never suffer my reign
“ to be tarnished with any thing of that nature. When my children and grandchildren come “ to the crown, they may act as they shall see fit, and I trouble myself no more about it than g “ about what is done in Lapland. Do not, however, imagine, from what I have said, that † De hoc, vid. sup. p. 568, & seq.

- a " I have any thing to lay to your charge, or any design to oppress you. You cannot but " know how I behaved myself towards you when I was only a Regulo. The family of one " of your new convert Mandarins in Lyau-tong, who publicly professed himself one of your
 " profelytes, rose up in arms against him, for not paying the usual honours to his ancestors.
 " In that perplexity you applied yourselves to me; and I extricated you out of it, and com" promised the matter. What I do now is in quality of an emperor: the well-governing of " this empire is what ingrosses all my care and time from morning to night. I do not so " much as see my children, nor even my empress, or indeed any one except such as are " intrusted with public affairs; and this must be my continual application whilst the three " years mourning for my father last; after which I may perhaps have opportunities of seeing b " you as usual*."

His majesty concluded his speech with desiring them to acquaint the rest of their brethren with what he had said to them, and dismissed them with a small present. We shall leave it to our readers to make their own remarks upon this soothing behaviour to that fraternity; if not perhaps exaggerated by the relater in favour of it, who was himself one of them. This did not hinder him, however, from giving them soon after the most convincing proofs of his being fully determined to extirpate their religion, root and branch, out of his dominions; for, his council having represented to him the danger of suffering missionaries of any denomination to stay at Quang-tong (which was the last favour they had petitioned him for, as their ultimate refuge, and the only way they had left to secure an entrance into China), he made no difficulty

- c to recall his promise to them, and to order them all, and with the utmost speed possible, to be transported to Makau; contenting himself with issuing an order, to those who were to be charged with them, to treat them with all proper decency and humanity; which yet, if we may rely on our author, he suffered to be transgressed in almost every instance of their behaviour to those unhappy exiles.
- BEFORE they left his dominions, they had the farther mortification to see a whole family of their noblest converts condemned to perpetual exile in some of the barren parts of Tartary, and to see them depart thither under a strong guard, loaded with chains, and in a most deplorable guise. The head of it was no less a person than a prince of the blood, aged near 80 years, and descended from the elder brother of the emperor Shun-shi, the founder of the
- d dynasty now reigning. He had, during a long series of years, enjoyed with great applause some of the highest posts in the empire; and had done several signal services to the state, especially during the last reign; yet neither these, nor the affinity to his imperial family, nor his extreme old-age, and personal merit, could obtain him either a reversion or respite, or even an alleviation of his dreadful sentence. A pregnant proof this of the irreconcilable hatred which that monarch bears to Christianity, and of the severe treatment which any European missionary must expect, that shall venture into that empire upon the like design, so long as his reign lasts. Their only hope now is, that Providence will some time hence raise him a successor of a different character, under whose more auspicious government they may be enabled to gain fresh admittance, and repair by degrees the immense losses which their religion hath sustained
- e in so short a time within that extensive empire. Immense indeed, if, as we are told, above three hundred of their churches have been either demolished, or turned into public schools, hospitals, &c.; and if, as it is farther affirmed, the number of their profelytes amounted to 300,000†, who are since either returned to their old religion, or, at best, live in continual danger of some severe punishment for their faithful adherence to their new one. It is therefore, in all likelihood, to keep these hopes alive, that the public hath from time to time been amused with accounts, in the foreign papers, of their having since met with better success and encouragement there from the new monarch and his ministry; all which hath hitherto proved to be without the least foundation, the laws and government continuing in all appearance as
- f them; and all avenues to that empire, whether by sea or land, being still as closely watched as ever; insomuch that some Jesuits, having ventured to penetrate thither in strange disguises, by the way of Tong-king, have been discovered, and arrested in their passage through the most northern desert part of that kingdom, and have been since put to death by order of the Chinese emperor, to whom those princes are tributary, as we have seen before.

APPENDIX to the Chinese History.

Containing the description and history of the tributary kingdom of Korea.

WE have had frequent occasion, in this and the preceding volume, to remark, that the Chinese empire had three considerable kingdoms, which were either tributary vassals, or paid only a kind of tributary homage to it, without any farther subjection. Of the latter sort are those of Tong-king and Cochin-china, which, for that reason, and to avoid as much as possible our deviating from the geographical order we have prescribed to ourselves in this Indian history, we have already give an account of. This therefore of Korea, and indeed the most considerable of the three, is the only one of consequence we have left to speak of in this place, as being not only contiguous to some part of China on the north, but as being likewise held in stricter subjection by the Chinese than any other, but more especially by the Tartar monarchs, since their conquest of that empire, as will be more fully shewn in the sequel of this appendix.

S E C T. I.

Korea described.

KOREA, or Corea, called by the inhabitants Tio-cen-koak, by the Tartars Solko, or, as others write it, Solgon, and Solbo Kuron, and, by the Chinese, Kau-li-que (A), is a large oblong peninsula, situate in the most eastern part of China, between it and the Japanese islands. It hath by some late writers been supposed an island; but is allowed now, by the most recent authors, to be contiguous, on the north, to the eastern or Manchew Tartars, as it is on the north-west to the Chinese province of Lyau-tong. It is divided from the rest of the Chinese empire by the Whang-hay, or Yellow Sea; from Tartary by a strong natural rampart, consisting of a long ridge of high and inaccessible mountains; and on the east, from Japan, by the sea of that name; and on the south, is bounded by the Chinese ocean. Its extent from south to north is from 34° to almost 43° , and breadth from $8^{\circ} 10'$ to 14° east longitude from the meridian of Pe-king^a. Its utmost extent northward is bounded by the river Tu-men-ula, which name is common both to the Koreans and Manchews, and answers to the Chinese name of Wang-li-kyang, or river of 10,000 li's, or Chinese stades, which falls into the Japan sea. It was likewise parted from the Manchew Tartars, and part of the province of Lyau-tong, by a strong wall, not much inferior to that of China, elsewhere described^b; but some part of it was in a great measure destroyed by the Manchews in their irruptions into that peninsula, which they made one of their first conquests. The rest, especially on the more northern side, was still standing, and almost intire (B), till about a century past; since which it is become daily more and more ruinous^c; however, there is no going into Korea, either from Tartary or China, without express permission from the emperor.

Parted from Tartary and Lyau-tong by a wall.

How divided.

Number of cities.

THE whole country hath been differently divided by the Chinese monarchs, whose tributary it is pretended to have been from time immemorial. At present it consists of eight provinces, which contain in all forty Kyun, or grand cities; 33 Fu's, or cities of the first rank; 58 Chews,

^b See before, p. 640,

(A) The words Kuron, or Kuroun, in the Manchew, and Qua or Que in the Chinese, signify a kingdom. The Chinese books sometimes give it the name of Chau-tsyen, and other nations that of Kaoli, Troxembuk, and some others not worth mentioning, besides a variety of old ones which it hath borne through the several hands and stages it hath passed (1).

(B) Korea, on the side of Lyau-tong, or, as it was also called, Quan-tong, was parted from it by a wooden palisade, called from thence the palisade of Quan-tong, which was a kind of barrier between them; but, whether built before its conquest by the Manchews, or since, is hard to guess. However, after that time it was agreed that a space of land between the Manchew Tartars and this peninsula should be left uncultivated, to serve as a boundary between them.

Father Regis concludes his description of the latter with a curious conjecture, which is not at all improbable; viz. that it was formerly contiguous to the province of Pe-che-li, till the Whang-hay, or Yellow Sea, formed that large gulph which lies now between them. The reason on which he founds it is, that, in the Chinese abridgment of chorography, intituled, Quang-yu-ki, the city of Chau-tsyen, where Ki-pe, then king of that territory, resided, is in the territory of Yong-ping-fu, a city of the first rank in the province of Pe-che-li. From which he rightly concludes it improbable, that that prince should fix his residence out of his dominions, especially with such a large sea between them. He confirms his conjecture with some other speculations no less curious, which we cannot dwell upon. The reader may see them in that author; and by the map of that country, and the situation of the city of Yong-ping, may easily convince himself of the probability of the sea having, in after-times, made that large chasm between that city and the opposite coast (2).

a or cities of the second; and 70 Hyen, or cities of the third rank; in all, 201; besides a vast number of fortresses and castles dispersed in most parts of the country, and chiefly built upon hills, all which are well garrisoned by a proportionable number of officers and soldiers. The first or chief of the eight provinces is situate in the centre of the kingdom, and is called King-hi, or the province of the court. The next on the east of it is styled Kyang-ywen, or source of the river, and was antiently the country of the Me's; the third, on the west, hath its name from the Whang-bay, or Yellow Sea, and includes part of the old kingdom of Chau-tsyen, and country of the antient Mahan. The 4th, or northern, styled Ping-ngan, or the pacific, was formerly another part of the Chau-tsyen kingdom; and 5. Tswen-to, on the south side, was the residence of the Pyen-hau. 6. Chu-sin, or the faithful and pure, on the south-western side, is the antient Mahan, Kye-king, or the happy. 7. That on the north-eastern was the antient dominion of the Kau-kiu-li. And, 8. King-shan, on the south-eastern side, was formerly the seat of the Chiu-hau. Some late authors are of opinion, that the sea of Korea hath a communication with the northern ocean, because whales are sometimes caught in the former with European hooks and harping-irons sticking to their flesh. To which one of our authors adds, that, upon asking some of the Korean mariners, What countries lay on the north of theirs? they answered, None, nor any thing but a boundless ocean*. But we shall find a more proper place to make a farther inquiry into that pretended communication between the northern and Japan sea.

THE cities both in the inland and on the sea-coasts are built and walled much after the same manner as those of China, though much inferior in largeness, populousness, beauty, and richness. The houses are much in the same style, one storey high; in the cities of brick, and in the country mostly of earth. The metropolis of the whole peninsula is situate almost in the centre of it, and is by the inhabitants styled King-ki-tau, but by the Chinese Kong-ki-tau, because they reckon the word King of too great a dignity to be given to any court but their own. We know but little of it, except that the Chinese maps place it in latitude $37^{\circ} 38' 20''$, which is about five degrees and a half from the northern boundary, and its longitude about 11 degrees east of Pe-king. Its metropolis.

KOREA hath but two rivers of any note, viz. the Ya-lu and Tu-men, called by the Chinese Ya-lu-kyang and Tu-men-kyang; and, in the maps, by the Manchew names of Ya-lu-ula and Tu-men-ula; the words Ula and Kyang signifying each, in its particular language, a river. These two rise out of the same mountain, said to be one of the highest in the world, and called by the Manchews Shan Alin, and by the Chinese Chang Pesban, that is, the ever-white mountain; but take opposite courses, the one running westward, and the other eastward: they are both deep and rapid, and full of exceeding good water. As for the others which are less considerable, the reader may see their course marked in the map, according to the Korean Observations. Rivers of note.

THE northern part of Korea is but barren, woody, and mountainous, full of wild beasts, and but thinly inhabited. It neither produces rice, nor any other corn but barley, of which the inhabitants make a coarse kind of bread. But the southern is rich, and fertile of every necessary of life; breeds great quantities of large and small cattle, besides fowl wild and tame; and great variety of game. It likewise produces silk, flax, cotton, and other such commodities, all which are manufactured among them, except the silk, which they know not how to weave, but send abroad unwrought, either to China or Japan, the only two countries they have any commerce with. The passage to either is short, tho' not equally easy and safe at all seasons. The Korean coasts are no less difficult of access, they being full of rocks, shelves, &c. which make the sailing along them very dangerous to those who are not used to them: and what makes the Japan sea still more so, if what the Dutch Relation says be well founded, is, that there is a current that comes from another and greater sea on the north-east, in which are caught whales in great numbers, some of which are found with hooks and cramp-irons, such as the Dutch and Greenlanders use in the striking of them. This, if true, shews that there must be a passage of communication between Korea and Japan, which answers to the steights of Veygatz; but whether so or not, we dare not affirm upon that bare authority. However that be, the Koreans drive a considerable trade with those two neighbouring countries; and, besides the raw silks above-mentioned, export silver, lead, and some other coarse metals, rich furs which come from the north parts; and, above all, the famed root Jin-seng we have elsewhere described, which grows here in great plenty, and of which they make no small gain, besides their paying part of their tribute to the Chinese emperors in that valuable commodity. The last-quoted relation tells us farther, that they have mines of gold; and that their seas produce pearls, and variety of fish; and that the inland is infested with a kind of crocodile of a monstrous length, some of them being 18 or 20 *Dutch*ells long. They have likewise some very venomous serpents in the southern parts, and great variety of wild beasts in the northern, particularly Soil and produce. Commerce. A large sea on the N. E. Commodities.

Cattle. ticularly bears, wolves, and wild boars. They use their oxen for plowing, and their horses a for carriage. The people are commonly very stout and industrious, bold and warlike, and equally trained to the plough and to the sword (C), to domestic trades and to navigation (D), and yet are generally affable and civil to those that trade with them. Their manners, customs, Dress. and religion, nearly resemble those of the Chinese. Their dress, like that of the Chinese under the Tay-ming dynasty, is a gown with long and wide sleeves, a high square cap, a girdle, wide breeches, and leather boots; but the better sort wear this last of linen or sattin, and their gowns of silk or cotton; though the poorer sort are forced to take up with coarse hempen canvas. The northern provinces produce the stoutest men and best soldiers. The rich commonly wear fur caps and brocade clothes; and the women wear a kind of lace on their upper and under petticoats. The men of the highest rank, both in the northern and southern parts, b affect to appear in purple-coloured silk; and on public occasions, their clothes are adorned with gold and silver. The learned are distinguished by two feathers in their caps, and the whole nation in general are well-shaped, sprightly, and courteous, lovers of learning, and fond of music and dancing.

Language. THEIR language is different from the Chinese, or rather is a mixture of that and the Manchew Tartar; but they use the Chinese characters in their writings and books. They have some learned men among them who admire the doctrine of Confucius, and despise the super- Bonzas num- stitions of the bonzaic sect; but that doth not hinder that monkish tribe from being numerous all over the country: their idle life, and the gain and respect they extort from the people, invite them to it; and still more so, as they may renounce it when they please. As for the c common people, they scarce have any religion; and all the worship they pay to their idols is only lighting a stick of some odoriferous wood before them, and making a very low bow to them at parting. Their temples and monasteries are numerous; but are not suffered to be in their towns, but in the country, and mostly upon or by the side of their hills, and some of them contain between 400 and 600 monks. The same sort of worship runs through the whole peninsula; so that they seldom fall out about religion, except that the wiser and genteeler sort rather shew a contempt for those idols and temples; yet one common notion runs among Worship. them, that he that doth well shall be happy, and he that doth ill shall be punished, in another life. As for Christianity, there is not the least appearance of its having ever got footing in this country, even when the missionaries were in such high favour with the Chinese emperor, d without whose leave they durst not have attempted to introduce it; much less likelihood is here of its ever gaining admittance there, since the Chinese court made such severe laws against it.

THE Korean government is altogether monarchical and despotic; for though, as hath been already observed, their kings are tributary to the emperors of China, yet, excepting the tribute and homage he is obliged to pay to them, he governs with an absolute sway, and hath neither prime ministers, nor any other counsellors, that dare to controul or even advise him, unless he desires them. His council chiefly consists of the governors and general officers mentioned in the two last notes, who are obliged at proper times to attend the court, and to be every day there within call. These, though they have held the highest dignities, and many e times to a very great age, yet dare not offer their counsel unless it be asked, nor meddle with any affair of state unless they be appointed to it by him. There are few of them, except by Absolute will. a particular favour, that hold their posts above three years, especially among those of the subaltern rank; and many of them are turned out before that time, for some fault or other, the king having his spies every-where to inform him of their conduct; so that the fear of incurring his displeasure obliges them to concur with him in every thing, and to conceal their dislike to whatever he orders or doth.

HE suffers neither lords, nor any other grandees, to hold cities or towns, or even villages, by right of inheritance, but only during their lives, after which they revolve to him; so that their chief revenue consists only in certain lands which they hold of him during pleasure; and f Grandees, their income. a great number of slaves, which they keep to cultivate them; whilst the lands and places, which they enjoy under him, intirely depend on his will, and revert to him after their death.

(C) The Dutch relation above quoted tells us, that every province in the kingdom is obliged to send once in seven years all the freemen that are able to bear arms to his court, to do duty there for two months. Each province hath its general, who hath four or five colonels under him, and each of these as many captains, every one of whom hath either the government of some city, town, or fortress. The very villages have some inferior officer, who hath a proportionable number of men under him; and these, as well as the rest, are obliged to give an account every year of the people under their government; so that the king always knows what number of people he can raise upon any emergency.

(D) Three sides of the peninsula being surrounded by the sea, every maritime city is obliged to maintain a vessel, or galley, ready equipped, and furnished with all necessaries, at its own charge. These vessels have commonly but two masts, and about 30 oars, with five or six men to each oar, besides other common sailors, the whole amounting to about 300 each. They have likewise some few pieces of small cannon, and a large quantity of wild-fire, to serve upon an attack. Each province, therefore, is obliged to have its yearly admiral, who takes a particular review of all the vessels under him, and sends an account of it to the high admiral, who conveys it to the king.

a His chief revenue consists in a tenth, which the people pay to him yearly out of the product of their lands; and some customs laid on the commodities either imported or exported; other taxes are not known among them, except on emergent occasions.

WHAT their laws are we know not, except that Ki-tse, one of their first monarchs, of Laurel, whom we shall speak in the sequel, compiled a sett of them out of the Chinese Shu-king, which he reduced into eight, and caused them to be published in his new kingdom; and that they had so good an effect on his subjects, that theft and adultery were crimes unknown unto them, Singular honesty. nor did any of them shut their doors at night; and though many revolutions, which that kingdom hath gone through since, have made them deviate, yet our author^f assures us, they may be still justly looked upon as a pattern to other nations (E). They are not indeed so eminent Given to women. for their continence; since they abound with loose women, and the young men and maids are very familiar with each other. They marry without making such presents to each other as Marriages. they do in China, or using any other ceremony. The princes and princesses of the blood always match with each other, and the grandees follow the same rule in the families. They Mourning, keep their dead three years unburied, and so long wear mourning for their parents, but for a brother only three months. When the bodies are interred, they place by the side of the grave and funerals. the clothes, chariots, horses, arms, &c. of the deceased, and in general whatever they were fond of in their life-time, which are carried off by those who assist at the funeral. They are for the most part very superstitious, as are all the worshippers of Fo^g, and abhor the depriv- Kill no living creatures. ing of any creature of life. Their punishments are commonly of the mild kind; and such crimes as are esteemed capital in other countries, are punished only with banishment into some of the neighbouring islands. Petty crimes are punished with bastonading on the back; but Punishments. those who are guilty of ill language are put to death. When a criminal is to be punished, they commonly throw a sack over his head, which comes down to his feet; by which means they conceal his shame, and hold him faster in their power.

THEIR houses have but one storey, and are very plain, and thatched: they have no beds, Houses, &c. but lie on mats. They use plates and dishes, and most of their furniture is plain. They are moderate in eating and drinking: and are commonly healthy, and take no physic. Their wine is made of a grain which they call Paniz, which we take to be a coarser kind of rice, Wine. fitter for that purpose than for eating. We do not read of any vines, or of those exquisite fruits, and odoriferous gums and woods, among them, which are so plentiful in the warmer soil of China; but they have a tree not unlike the palm, whose gum makes an excellent var- Palm-gum. nish, and of so beautiful a yellow, that it looks like gilding. They make a sort of cotton paper, which is stronger and more lasting, and bears a greater price, than any in China. They Strange crea- tures. have few natural rareties, except a breed of horses not above three feet high; and a sort of hens whose tails are three feet in length. Their common weapons were cross-bows, and long sabres without ornaments, but they have since learnt the use of fire-arms from the Chinese.

THEY are wholly ignorant of the liberal sciences; and their Literati know so little of geography, that they divide the whole world into no more than 12 kingdoms, antiently all subject to that of China, but since become independent; and their maps extend no farther than e that of Siam; so that, when they hear Europeans talk of the many kingdoms which that and the other three parts of the world contain, they cannot forbear asking them with a smile, How it is possible for the sun to enlighten them all? unless indeed they give the name of kingdom to such contemptible countries, or inconsiderable islands, as hardly deserve that of a district, or barren hamlet. This is indeed very different from what we are told by other writers, that some of their books affirm, that the earth contains above 80,000 different countries; but this last they probably had from the Chinese †.

(E) This is in a great measure contradicted by the Dutch relation often quoted, which represents the Koreans as so naturally given to pilfering and stealing, that he says they are forced to have very severe laws against it. The reader may see an account of their several punishments in that author, amongst which that against adultery is one of the severest; except such as the king in some cases causes to be inflicted on traitors and obnoxious persons, which are commonly arbitrary, and against which it would be equally dangerous to make any objection or demur (2).

Origin, antiquity, and history, of the Koreans.

WE can say little concerning the origin and antiquity of the Koreans, except that it is as dark, impenetrable, and, according to some of their own accounts, as fabulous and absurd, as that of any other eastern nation; they making no scruple to cry up the heads of their several hords or tribes as the miraculous offspring of some god, demigod, or hero, after the manner of the old fabulous Greeks (F). They are however allowed by most Europeans to be of Tartarian extract; and their country to have antiently been inhabited by various tribes of them, the principal of which were the Me, the Kau-kyuli, and the Hau: the last of which were again divided into three hords, viz. the Ma-bau, the Pyeu-bau, and the Chin-bau. We have lately mentioned the several parts of the country which they inhabited, in speaking of their eight provinces, at which time they were governed by their respective princes, till in process of time they all coalesced into one kingdom, and were at length subdued by the Chinese ^a.

THE Chinese annals pretend, that the Koreans have been subject to them ever since the reign of Yau, their eighth emperor from Fo-bi, and continued so till the tyranny of Tau-kang, the third monarch of the Hya, or first dynasty (who, according to their chronology, began his reign in the year before Christ 2188), caused them to revolt. Kye, who ascended the throne 1818 before Christ, obliged them to become tributary to him; but his oppressive sway soon caused them to revolt, and even to seize on part of his dominions. Kye, being dethroned by Chin-tang 1766 years before Christ, reduced them soon after his becoming head of the Shang, or second dynasty. They again attacked China in the reign of Chong-ting, which began 1562 before Christ, and continued sometimes submissive, sometimes rebellious, till the year 1324 before Christ, when, through the weakness of the emperor Vu-ting, they subdued the provinces of Kyang-nan and Shaw-tong, and kept possession of them till they were again subdued by Tsin-chi-wang. ^b

THESE times, however, are allowed to be obscure hitherto; and the Chinese history, confirmed by the calculation of several eclipses therein mentioned, begins not the foundation of this Korean monarchy till the time of Ki-tse, a prince famous for his wisdom, and uncle to the then emperor Chew, the last monarch of the second dynasty, who caused him to be imprisoned, for the sound and free counsels he ventured to give him. Ki-tse, however, was soon after restored by Vu-vang, the founder of the next or third dynasty, who mounted the throne 1122 years before Christ, to whom he delivered the instructions contained in the Shu-king, book iv. c. 6.; but, being unwilling to live under a prince by whom his own family had been dethroned, he retired into that part of Korea then called Chau-tsyen, where, by the emperor's assistance, and his own merit, he was made king, and introduced the Chinese politeness; and, by his singular wisdom, so firmly settled himself on the throne, that his posterity enjoyed it successively till Ching-tsi-whang, who came to the Chinese crown in the year 246 before Christ, made Chau-tsyen dependent on Lyau-tong, allowing only to the descendants of Ki-tse the title of Hew, or Earls, till Shun reassumed that of Vang, or King, about forty years after. ^c

HE did not, however, enjoy it long before he was defeated in several encounters by Weyman (G), who at length put an end to the family of Ki-tse, and seized upon that crown. ^e He

(F) To give our readers one instance, for all, of this their vanity, the Kau-kyuli, who are descended from the Fu-yu, a people of eastern Tartary, give the following account of one of their antient heroes: A daughter of the god Ho-hang-ho being detained in close confinement by the king of the Kau-kyuli, conceived one day by the rays of the sun, and was afterwards delivered of an egg as large as a bushel, wherein was found a male child; who, when grown up, was called Chu-mong, or good archer, and made overseer of his studs. Chu-mong starved the good horses, and fattened the bad, by which means the king chose the latter, and left him the former. One day, as they were hunting, his majesty gave him leave to shoot what game fell in his way; and he slew so great a number of fallow deer, as made the king think of cutting him off. Chu- mong, perceiving his intention, fled; and, being closely pursued, and coming to a large river which he could not cross, cried out, Ab! shall I, who am the offspring of the sun, and the grandson of the god Ho-hang-ho, be prevented by this river from escaping? He had no sooner ended, than a vast multitude of fishes, binding themselves together, made a bridge, over which he passed to the other side, where he met three persons, one dressed in hempen cloth, the second in a quilted garment, and the third with sea-weeds. These three accompanied him to the city of Kyi-shing-ku, where he took the name of Kau, to signify that he was of the Kau-kyulian race (3).

(G) Wey-man, or, as others call him, Nyan, was a native of Pe-cheli, and took advantage of the confusion that then reigned in China, whilst Kia-tsu, alias Lyew-

a He was afterwards, though after several refusals, confirmed in it by the emperor Whey-ti, or rather by his mother, who governed during his minority, and by degrees brought the Me, the Kay-kyuli, and the rest of the Koreans, under his government. Yew-kyu, his grandson, about the year before Christ 110, having put to death the Chinese ambassador, the emperor Vu-ti sent an army against him, but without success; but it was not long before Yew-kyu was assassinated by his own subjects, who voluntarily submitted to the emperor; upon which Chau-tsyen was reduced into a province, and called by him Tsang-hay; and Korea divided into four more, viz. Chin-fau, Ling-tong, Lo-lang, and Huen-tu; and the emperor Chau-ti, who began his reign anno 86 before Christ, since reduced Korea into two provinces.

ABOUT sixty years after, the emperor Quang-vu-ti reduced the kingdom of Chau-tsyen, and made it dependent on that of Lyau-tong, then under the government of Chyi-tong, famed for his wisdom and probity. In the mean time the king of Kau-kyuli conquered the Me, Hau, Kong carried his arms into China for the first time, took the city of Huen-tu, and killed the governor of Lyau-tong in battle. Kong was however defeated in his turn by a son of the king of Fu-yu; and was succeeded by his son Swi-chin, who restored Huen-tu to the emperor, and paid him the usual tribute. But, in the weak reigns of Whan-ti and Ling-ti, he again invaded the country of Huen-tu, whence he was afterwards expelled by Kew-lin, governor of that province; part of his own kingdom was likewise taken from him, and the remainder destroyed under a succeeding dynasty.

c BUT here it will not be improper to observe, that the Chinese annals make not the least mention of the conquest which the Japanese made of this peninsula about the year 201 after Christ, under their emperor Tsin-ai, or rather of his martial empress Dsin-gu, a celebrated heroine, who assisted him in it; for, that monarch dying soon after his entering upon that expedition, left it to be completed by her; which she did with such success and speed, that the whole Korean kingdom was in a very few years reduced, and made tributary to the Japanese empire. How long they continued under that subjection, the Japanese history doth not inform us; but owns, that in process of time, and by the assistance of the eastern Tartars, they found means to shake off the yoke, and restored their government to its antient form, till again subdued by the Chinese. From that time the Japan emperors have made frequent attempts to recover it, sometimes with, but oftener without, success; so that they were glad at last to let them continue unmolested for a considerable space. Tay-cho, the secular monarch of Japan, was the first, who, after that long interval, revived his pretensions, but disguised them under the colour of designing to invade China, and desiring their assistance; but the Koreans seeing through his views, and having murdered his ambassadors, a war was renewed, which lasted seven years, and of which we shall give a farther account in a proper place.

d BUT to return from this necessary digression; Chau, or Kau, the great grandson of Song, lately mentioned, being made king of Chau-tsyen by the emperor Yong-kyu, the kings of Korea continued to be created to that dignity during the dynasty of Tsin, Song, Tsi, the latter Wey, and Chew, till the seventh year of Yang-ti, the second emperor of the Swi dynasty, when Ywen, then king of it, invaded Lyau-tong at the head of an army: for this Yang-ti summoned him to appear before him; and, upon his refusal, marched against him in person; but, the Koreans taking shelter in their cities, and defending themselves stoutly in them, the emperor was obliged to retire, for want of provisions. He attempted thrice more to reduce them, but without success. Kyen-vu, the son of Ywen, succeeded his father, and was honoured with the title of Shang-chu-que, or the pillar of the state, by the founder of the Tang, or thirteenth dynasty. At this time Korea was divided into five governments; viz. that of the court, or middle; and the other four respecting the four points of the compass; and Kay-su-ven, of the family of Ywen, then governor of the eastern canton, and a brutish and treacherous person, assassinated Kyen-vu his sovereign, used his body with the utmost indignity, and set up Tsang, a younger brother of the deceased, on the throne, but only under the title of Molichi, and reserved the power in his own hands. This traitor pretended to be the son of a river-god, in order to secure a particular regard from that superstitious people.

In the mean time the emperor Tay-tsung, being informed of his murder and treason, marched against him at the head of a powerful army, and was joined by the kings of Ki-tau-bi, Pe-tsi, and Sin-lo, took several towns from him, and sat down before that of Lyau-tong, pang, founder of the Han or fifth dynasty, was reducing all the several kingdoms into which China was divided under his government (4), to enter Chau-tsyen at the head of some disbanded soldiers, where he defeated and killed Chun, and destroyed the rest of the royal family (5).

which he took by stratagem, reduced to a city of the second rank, and called it Lyau-chew.^a He next took the city of Ngan-shi, to the relief of which two brave Moko generals came, at the head of 150,000 of their troops. These the emperor attacked in their trenches, and routed them. The generals, upon their submission, were kindly received; but he ordered 3000 of the Moko of Pin-jam to be buried alive; and caused a monument to be erected on the mountain at the foot of which he had incamped, in memory of this victory. Not long after, Kay-su-ven, dying, was succeeded as Molichi by his son Nan-feng; but a discord arising between him and his younger brothers, they came in person to the emperor Kau-tsong, who was then sending some forces to the assistance of Sin-lo, against whom the Koreans and Moko had declared war. That monarch sent an army against the Koreans, under the command of his general Li-tsing; and inquiring of the Kya-yeu-chong, or censor of the empire, his opinion^b of that expedition, was answered, that the secret memoirs declared, that the dynasty or race of Kau should not reign in Korea full 900 years, and that it would be ruined by a general aged 80 years. Now, continued the censor, this is the 900th year since the family of Kau succeeded that of Han, and the generalissimo Li-tsing is fourscore years old. Besides, the people are divided among themselves; and so distressed by famine, that the very wolves and foxes appear in their cities; by which prodigies they are intimidated, so that the destruction of the Kau dynasty is at hand. Accordingly the Chinese general besieged Pin-jam; and Tang, the titular king of Korea, with about 100 attendants, surrendered himself to him, and met with a kind reception; notwithstanding which, Nan-kyen defended the city with singular bravery, till one of the gates was betrayed to the imperial forces, and he was made prisoner. Then was Korea^c again divided into five provinces, consisting of 170 principal cities, and 690,000 families.

In the reign of the empress, or rather usurper, mother of *Vu-hew*¹, Paw-ywen, the grandson of Tsang, last king of this country, was created king, of the second rank, of Chau-tsyen, to which Korea had changed its name, instead of Kau-ti. In this state the government of it continued till the reign of one of its kings named Van-kyen, who assumed the dignity of king, subdued the kingdoms of Pe-tsi and Sin-lo, and removed the court from Pin-jam eastward to the foot of the mountain Song-yo. However, his three successors paid homage to the Chinese emperors, till the last of them, named Chi, was obliged to pay it to the Kitan Tartars, who had conquered the north parts of China, which were called Lyau, and taken six towns from Vang-sun, the successor of Chi, and obliged him to remove his court further^d from them: but he, making an alliance with the Nyu-che Tartars (H), who destroyed Lyau, and fixed themselves in the north of China, expelled the Kitans out of his dominions, and paid homage again to the Chinese monarch, and, for his bravery, was highly honoured by him. His successors were no less favoured by them; and indeed, considering the then reigning contests between the northern and southern monarchs of China, in which the Koreans were courted by both sides, their alliance was so considerable, that they might make their own terms with either; and the emperor Kau-tsong, upon his mounting the throne, was so afraid of their joining with the Kin, or northern family, that he sent them a grand embassy, to gain them to his side; but was disappointed by the Kin's sending thither Vang-chu with the title of king. Some time after, Che, then king of Korea, sent his son Cbing to pay homage to the emperor Li-tsong; but, his father dying about the time, he returned to take possession of his kingdom, and had it confirmed to him by that monarch. This prince had paid tribute 36 times, when Sbi-tsu, as the Chinese, or Hu-pi-lay, as the Tartars, call him (the son of the famed Jenghiz Khân, and the Koblay of Marco Polo the Venetian traveller)^k, was meditating the conquest of Japan, and designed to pass through Korea thither. In pursuit of which project he sent an ambassador to Japan, whom he ordered to pass through Korea, and to take his guides from thence; but, the Koreans not consenting to it, the emperor so highly resented it, that though Cbing had never neglected to pay his tribute to him, yet he seized upon Si-king, or Pin-jam, and called it Leng-nin-fu. But, upon Shin's succeeding his father Cbing, he married a daughter of the emperor, and received the seal of the emperor's son-in-law, with the title of king of Korea. He then took the name of Kyu, and his third successor was^f called Song, and from Van-kyen to Song are reckoned 28 kings of Korea, of the Vang family, within the space of 400 years. When Hong-vu, founder of the Ming or twenty-first dynasty,

- a mounted the Chinese throne¹, Kyu, or Chew, then king of Korea, sent an embassy of homage and congratulation to him, and was by him created king of Kau-li (or Korea), and was presented with a silver seal, and the antient privilege of sacrificing to the gods of the rivers and mountains of that kingdom. But, in the seventeenth year of that emperor's reign, the king's ambassadors having joined in a conspiracy against him, the Koreans were declared enemies of the empire. The matter, however, was soon after compromised, and that monarch satisfied, by a new embassy and submission; upon which he sent to Korea to buy horses; and, the king refusing to take any money for them, Hong-vu had them valued, and paid for them; but at the same time ordered him to deliver up the towns of Lyau-yang and Shin-ching, which they had seized in the province of Lyau-tong. Soon after this, Kyu, then on the throne, was deposed; and Vang-chang raised to it by Li-jin-jin, then prime minister of Korea, whose son Li-ching-que dethroned Vang-chang, and set the crown upon Vang-yau's head, and in a little time after took it from him, and placed it on his own. And thus ended the line of Vang-tan.

The sequel and conclusion of the Korean history.

- c LI-CHING-QUE, who then changed his name into that of Vang-tang, failed not to dispatch a pompous embassy, with considerable presents, to Van-lye, then emperor of China, with a petition to be confirmed on his throne; but both that and his presents were rejected; and Ching-se, who had drawn the petition, banished by the emperor. Soon after that, Tau resigned the crown to his son Fang-ywen, who obtained a confirmation from the emperor Yong-lo, who mounted the throne anno 1403; and sent him 10,000 oxen by way of tribute, in order to stock certain lands which that monarch had assigned to the garrison of Lyau-tong. Tau, the son and successor of Fang-ywen, sent his tribute in gerfalcons, or sea-eagles; but the emperor refused them, saying, that jewels and rare animals were not what he liked. We find little in their history worth taking notice of, till the reign of the emperor Van-lye, except that one of their kings, named Van-ky-whang, prevailed upon the emperor Sbi-tsung, alias Kya-tsing, the twelfth monarch of the Ming dynasty, to erase out of the book of the antient customs of the Ming, the article in which Ching-que was recorded for having deposed his lawful sovereign, and usurped his crown; because, said the Korean king, it was done at the solicitation of the grandees, and of the people. But, in the twentieth year of Van-lye, the fourteenth emperor of the Ming dynasty, Korea was invaded by Ping-syew-kyi, chief or king of Japan (I).

- THIS conqueror, according to the Japanese history, finding, in the annals of that empire, that Korea had been formerly subdued, and made tributary to it, and being now raised to the height of secular power, thought it a proper time to revive his pretensions to that peninsula, not without a farther view of opening to himself a way to the conquest of China. He sent accordingly an embassy thither, to demand of the Koreans a passage for his army through their country; and at the same time that they should acknowledge the emperors of Japan as their sovereigns, and pay homage to them. But the Koreans, instead of an answer, killed his ambassadors, and, by that hostile act, highly provoked him to hasten the war which he had premeditated against them. The Chinese, however, without taking notice of either of these circumstances, only pretend that he was induced to this invasion by the small distance there is between the mountain King-shang in Korea, and the island of Twi-ma-tau, belonging

(I) This conqueror is said to have been originally a slave, and afterwards a retailer of fish; and, being found asleep under a tree by a Japanese Quan-pe, or governor, who was then hunting, and was just going to kill him, awoke, and spake to him in such a taking manner, that the Quan-pe took a liking to him, and made him overseer of his studs, giving him the name of Ping-syew-kyi, or The man from under the tree. He soon after gave him some lands, and made him his chief confidant; but, being a little after assassinated by one of his counsellors, Ping-syew-kyi put himself at the head of his master's troops, under pretence of revenging his death, which he did by killing the mur-derer; but presently after raised himself to the dignity of Quan-pe, and made himself master, by fraud or force, of about 60 small provinces. This is the account which the Chinese and Koreans give of the great Tay-cho, who raised himself by his valour and merit to the secular empire of Japan. But we shall find a proper place, in the next chapter, to do him that justice which his noble actions deserved. In the mean time we thought it not improper to give this one instance, among many more, of the Chinese pride, and the contempt they have of the Japanese, by the disadvantageous light in which they have set one of their greatest heroes and conquerors.

to Japan, and then in his possession (K); for, by the commerce carried on between them, he was informed, that Li-feu, who then reigned in Korea, was a prince so wholly devoted to his pleasures, that he might be easily surprised. Accordingly Kyi sent two of his generals, with a numerous fleet, to attack it; who, landing their forces unperceived, took the city of Son-te, and several others, the Koreans being so softened by a long peace, that they fled upon the first approach of the enemy; and the king, leaving the government in the hands of his second son, retired first to Pin-yang, and next to I-chew, in the province of Lyau-tong. From thence he sent an embassy to the emperor, to beg his assistance against the invaders, to receive him as his subject, and promising to make Korea a province of the empire; but, whilst that was transacting, the Japanese had already demolished the sepulchres, plundered the treasury, taken the mother, children, and officers, of the king, and made themselves masters of the greater part of the kingdom. They had likewise fortified the capital, and posted their troops in the most important passes; and pretended still, that they had no design on the empire, but only to make the river Ta-to-kyang the boundary of their conquests; but were still moving nearer towards Lyau-tong, insomuch that he was forced to remove farther from I-chew to Ngay-chew. All this while he was dispatching couriers upon couriers to the Chinese court, to hasten the succours which came but slowly on; and some of them that arrived had been defeated and cut in pieces by the Japaners.

At length Song-ing-chang was sent at the head of 60,000 Chinese forces, and with the quality of King-lyo, or generalissimo; and dispatched Li-yu-song, a general under him, with those forces, through Lyau-tong; and the difficulty which their cavalry found in crossing the mountain Song-wang-shang was such, that their horses are said to have sweated blood. However, Li-yu-song had sent beforehand a proper general before him, to try to over-reach that of the Japanese, by endeavouring to persuade him that he was not coming with an intention to oppose him, but to create Kyi his master a king, for which he was invested with full power from the emperor. Hing-chang, that was the Japanese general's name, readily swallowed the bait, and sent twenty officers to meet Li-yu-song, who had ordered a party to take them prisoners; but they defended themselves so stoutly, that three only of them were taken. This action might have opened Hing-chang's eyes; but, being told that it happened through a misunderstanding of the interpreters, he was caught a second time, and sent a fresh message to compliment the Chinese general.

WE took notice a little higher, that the Japanese had fortified themselves in the capital, and other cities, particularly in that of Pin-yang, which was besides a very strong place by its situation, having the river Ta-tong-kyang on the south-east, and a considerable eminence on the north, then guarded by a good number of their forces. The Chinese general arrived before the city on the sixth day of the month of the twenty-first year of Van-lye's reign; and, having drawn up his forces in order of battle, began to march into the city, the Japanese, in their richest accoutrements, lining the way, and their general being placed on a tower to view the procession: but the Chinese officers behaved in such a manner, as soon alarmed the Japanese, and forced them upon their guard; upon which Li-yu-song made a feint to attack the eminence on the north side, and ordered the detachment to retire after the first charge, in order to draw the Japanese from their post; instead of which, they in the middle of the night attacked the Chinese camp, but were repulsed with loss. On the eighth day the general assault was given by break of day, and the attack made on the south side of the city, with great vigour on both sides. At length the Chinese, having scaled the walls, forced the enemy to retire to their fortrefs, whence a good number of them, with their general, made their escape about midnight; but had near 300 killed in the action, besides a great number of others that were drowned in crossing the river: a detachment of 3000 Chinese killed 400 more of them in their flight, and took others prisoners. On the 19th they took the city of Fu-kay by storm, killing 165 of the enemy, who, by so many defeats, were now stripped of four of the Korean provinces. From that time the Chinese proved so successful against them in almost every encounter, some of which proved very bloody on both sides, that they had only the capital left to reduce, to which Ching-king, another Japanese general, had retired. The Chinese general, who was within 70 Chinese li's or furlongs from it, marched with double speed against it with his light horse, upon a false report, which he too easily gave credit to, that the Japanese had abandoned it; and thereby fell into one of their ambuscades, near a bridge within thirty li's of the place; upon which a bloody battle ensued, in which great numbers fell on both sides; and, though the a enemy was put to flight, yet the Chinese lost the flower of their troops. They were moreover, on their approach to the city, much incommoded by the thaw and rains in their camp; whilst the Japanese were advantageously seated on a dry eminence, with a river in front, and a mountain on the rear. The town had likewise reared high machines filled with destructive weapons, upon which the Chinese were forced to retreat to Kay-ching.

HERE, on the 3d month of the same year, their spies brought intelligence that 200,000 Japaners were about the capital, and that they were plentifully furnished with corn; part of which Li-yu-song having fortunately burnt, the enemy, fearing a scarcity, agreed to peace, and yielded the capital; which he entered on the eighteenth of the fourth month, and found in it Surrendered 40,000 bushels of rice, and forage in proportion. After the surrender of the place, the Japanese sent an embassy of submission to the emperor; and, in the seventh month, delivered up the children and principal officers of the king of Korea; and the emperor, in the twenty-second year of his reign, agreed, at the intreaty of that prince, to accept of the tribute offered by the Japanese, and to create Ping-shyew-kyi Tay-cho, or king of Japan, on the following Ping-shyew-kyi made king of Japan conditions: 1. That he should deliver up all his conquests in Korea. 2. That he should send no embassy to China. And, 3. that he should swear never to enter into that peninsula ^m.

THIS peace had like to have been broken both by the indiscretion of the Chinese ambassador, by whom Van-lye sent the imperial patent to the new Tay-cho, and much more by the contemptuous embassy which the reinstated king of Korea sent to him on his being raised to the royal dignity. The first of these, a marquis of the first rank, but a person of a very lustful disposition, had been gratified in that favourite passion, on his arrival in Japan, by the governor of Twima, who sent three of the most beautiful women of that country to him one after another; but, the marquis being afterwards informed that the governor's wife was extremely beautiful, and having made no scruple to demand her of him, he resented the affront. About the same time a Japanese of quality, named Long, having disputed the way with the ambassador, had like to have been killed by him, but was happily rescued by his own retinue, so that the marquis had no way left to escape but by flight, and leaving every thing, even his very credentials, behind him. He wandered all the night, and at length, in a fit of despair, hanged himself; but was cut down by some of his followers, and fled back to China, where, by the emperor's orders, he was tried for his misconduct, and another ambassador sent in his room.

THE Chinese tell us, that Ping-shyew-kyi, having fasted and bathed three days, went in great ceremony to meet the emperor's patent, before which he prostrated himself fifteen times; after which he was created king in all the usual formalities, and expressed the deepest gratitude to the Chinese monarch for his new dignity. But soon after this, the king of Korea, being advised by one of his favourites to treat the Tay-cho with contempt, sent his compliments to him only by a deputy-governor of a city of the second order, and with a few ordinary presents of silk. Ping-shyew-kyi highly resented the insult; and said to the ambassador, Hath thy master so soon forgot that I conquered his kingdom, and have restored it to him out of mere regard to the emperor? What doth he imagine me to be, in sending me such a present by one of your rank? Whom doth he affront, me, or the emperor? but, since he treats me in so unworthy a manner, let him know that my forces shall not stir out of Korea till the emperor hath duly chastised him. On the next day he sent with his tribute, which was very rich, two remonstrances, the one acknowledging his obligations to the emperor, and the other demanding justice against the Korean king. He waited for the latter till the 25th of that emperor's reign, for a satisfaction for the affront; but, finding him rather inclined to side with the Korean king, as the sequel shews he did, he resolved to renew the war; and accordingly invaded Korea afresh with a fleet of 200 sail, and a powerful army under the command of his two old generals Tsing-ching and Hing-chang. These two, being thoroughly acquainted with the country, renewed the war with double vigour, and took Ngan-ywen-fu, the governor of which fled barefoot upon their first approach; and soon made themselves masters of many other considerable cities and passes on all sides, insomuch that the Chinese capital was in a great measure blocked up. The former had already fixed his quarters at Tun-sin, 600 li's, and the latter at King-shang, 400 li's from it. The Chinese, headed by Han-quey, laid siege to the latter with a numerous army; but, upon a report that the enemy had received fresh succours, fled; whereupon his forces dispersed themselves, 20,000 of them were killed, and their general punished for his cowardice.

IN the ninth month of the 26th year of Van-lye's reign, Lew-ting, another Chinese general, marched against Hing-chang; and proposed to him a conference, wherein matters might be amicably adjusted. To which the Japanese general agreed; and, on the next day, went to the place appointed, attended only by fifty horse. But the treacherous Lew-ting had laid an ambuscade for it; and, having appointed one of his officers to personate him, attended the meeting in the disguise of a common soldier. Hing-chang was received by the pretended a general with the usual honours; and, as he sat at table, could not keep off his eyes from the disguised Lew-ting, and crying out, Surely that soldier has been unfortunate. Lew-ting, surprised at his speech, went immediately out, and gave the signal to the ambuscade by firing a gun; upon which Hing-chang, suspecting the treachery, mounted his horse in an instant, with his attendance, who formed themselves into a triangle, and, with a dreadful slaughter, forced their way through the treacherous Chinese, and escaped. On the next day the Japanese general sent to thank the Chinese one for his entertainment; who had no other way of excusing it, but by pretending, that the firing of the gun was altogether accidental. However, though his treachery had miscarried, it did not hinder his attacking him openly, and a fierce engagement ensued, in which the Chinese were every-where worsted. The war would in all b likelihood have lasted much longer, and the Koreans have been severely chastised for their treachery by the highly incensed Tay-cho, had not his unexpected death, or, if we may believe the Japan history, some more cogent motives, induced him to recall his shattered forces: and put an end to all future hostilities, by laying them only under a tribute to him. What those motives were, will be better seen in the history of Japan; however, that brave hero died whilst his generals were on their way home; and Ijeas, whom he had appointed guardian over his son and successor, then but six years old, thought fit only to oblige them to send an embassy to him every three years, and to acknowledge him for their sovereign. And thus ended the Korean war, after it had lasted seven years; since which time they relapsed again, under the dominion of the Chinese Tartars, and drove out all the garrisons which the c Japanese had left there, as far as the coasts of the province of Tsio tsijn, which is the only place they have remaining of all their conquests in that country. The emperors of Japan seem to be satisfied with the possession of those eastern coasts, as a sufficient security to their own dominions; and keep some garrisons there to guard them, which are put under the government of the princes of Iki and Tsusima, two islands lying about the mid-way between Korea and Japan; whilst those Koreans are only obliged to send an embassy to court, to take an oath of allegiance to every new emperor. This was the condition they were in Anno 1693, when Kämpfer was in Japan. As for the rest of the Koreans, they have continued tributary to the Chinese ever since; and, to all appearance, been kept more strictly under them since the Tar- d tars became masters of China. The prince that reigned there when our author wrote his account was called Li-tun, and was descended from the family of Li. In the year 1694 he presented a petition to the emperor Kang-bi, the contents and occasion of which being something curious, and confirming what we have just now hinted of their being under greater subjection than formerly, we shall give it to the reader in the sequel (L). Whenever any of them dies, the emperor immediately deposes two grandees to confer upon the successor the title of Que-vang, or king, who receives the investiture upon his knees, and makes certain presents to the commissioners, which are settled and specified, besides 8000 taels in money. After that, he is obliged to send an ambassador the Chinese court with the usual tribute and homage; which last is paid by prostration and knocking his forehead against the ground before the imperial throne. If the Korean king is apprehensive of any disputes arising after his death, about the succession, he nominates an heir to the crown, and gets him confirmed by the emperor; nor dares the royal consort assume the title of queen, before she hath obtained it from him: all which ceremonials have been so exactly regulated, that disputes can never arise; and to this is owing the peaceful state they have so long enjoyed. We shall beg leave to subjoin the afore-mentioned instance of the extreme regard which the Korean kings pay to the Chinese monarch; which will not only prove what we have said, but shew likewise how much superior e

(L) This petition, for which we shall find a more proper place at the close of this appendix, was presented to the late famed emperor Kang-bi, lately mentioned, in order to obtain a permission from him for rectifying some wrong steps which he had taken with regard to his own private family, but such as one would have imagined were vastly below the cognizance of so great a monarch, and concerned only the restoring of a favourite barren queen, whom he had deposed, in favour of a concubine, who had brought him forth a son and heir. Yet this step, inconsiderable as it seems, was such as he dared not venture upon till he had previously obtained leave, by a petition couched in the most abject and servile terms, and backed with the most earnest wishes and suffrages of all his Korean subjects.

Neither was this request received at court as a matter of a trivial nature, seeing the emperor was pleased to refer it to the consideration of one of his high tribunals of ceremonies; by whom it was no sooner approved, than a proper Mandarin was dispatched to the Korean court, to reinstall the queen, and degrade the concubine. We shall have occasion, in the sequel, to add an instance or two more of this extreme subjection: in the mean time, that which we have given above is sufficient to convince our readers, that the Korean monarchs are far enough from enjoying the same despotic sway under the Tartar which they did under the Chinese monarchs, when it was reckoned treason to controul their will in any case, provided they took care constantly to pay their homage and tribute to them. All that we shall add with relation to their present state, is, that they send yearly an ambassador to receive the almanack, which is published at court the first day of the tenth month, for the ensuing year (7).

a the Tartars are to the Chinese, in point of governing their tributary provinces, and keeping them under a due subjection and dependence.

It happened in the 32d year of the emperor Kang-hi's reign, in the year 1694, when the prince then on the Korean throne, being dissatisfied at some changes he had made in his family, sent him the following remarkable request by his ambassador: "I, your majesty's subject, am a most unfortunate man. I had beheld myself a considerable time without an heir, when one of my concubines was at length brought to bed of a son, upon which account I thought myself obliged to advance her to a higher rank; and, from this false step, have sprung all my misfortunes. I obliged my queen Min-chi to retire from my court, and raised the concubine Chang-chi into her place, as I failed not then of informing your majesty: since which time, having duly considered that Min-chi was created queen by your majesty; that she hath had the government of my family a considerable while, hath assisted me in my usual sacrifices; that she hath paid her last duties to the queen my grandmother, and to the queen my mother, and hath bewailed her separation from me these three years; I am now sensible that she deserved a more honourable treatment from me, and am beyond measure concerned for my imprudent conduct towards her. In order, therefore, to yield to the earnest desires of my people, I am extremely willing to reinstate my beloved Min-chi in her pristine rank, and to reduce the other to her former low state of a concubine; by which means I shall again restore my family to its antient regular order; and the reformation of my household, begun there, will diffuse itself most happily through my whole kingdom. I, your subject, though I have had the misfortune, through ignorance and stupidity, to stain the honour of my ancestors, have nevertheless served your majesty these twenty years, and acknowledge myself indebted to your goodness for all I am and enjoy, as to my only shield and protector. I have no concerns, either public or private, which I would wish to be concealed from your majesty; and that is the chief motive which induced me to take the liberty, more than once or twice, thus earnestly to solicit your majesty upon this point. I blush, I must confess, at my boldness in thus transgressing the bounds of my duty; but as it is a point which is of such concern to the happiness of my family and kingdom, I thought I might venture to lay this my humble request before you, without wounding that respect with which I am," &c.

This petition the emperor referred to the tribunal of rites, and it was approved by them: in pursuance of which, a commissary was dispatched to the Korean court, to reinstate the queen Min-chi in her pristine rank; but, in the year following, that imprudent prince, whether elated at the condescension of his imperial majesty, or from what other motive unknown to us, having presumed to send a fresh address to the court of Pe-king, in terms less respectful than those of the former, he was condemned to pay 10,000 ounces of silver as a fine. And this may suffice to shew the extreme subjection the Korean kings are kept under by the Chinese, or rather Tartar, emperors; which severity, besides the politic maxims of that warlike nation, may have been owing, in all probability, to that noble, though unsuccessful stand, which the Koreans made, soon after the reduction of China, to shake off the yoke, and regain their antient liberty, of which we have had occasion to speak more fully in a former part of this volume †. To which we shall only add one more instance of it; viz. that when the emperor sends an ambassador to Korea, the king is obliged to go in person, attended by all his guards, and a numerous retinue of his household, out of his capital, to receive him: whilst, on the other hand, those of the Korean prince to the court of Pe-king are scarcely received with any ceremony, and are even obliged to give place to a Mandarin of the first rank. They are lodged in some private house, and kept under a kind of honorary guard, which never leaves them, whether they go abroad, or stay at home; but are to watch over, and give an account of, all their actions, behaviour, and even of their words, to some proper officers of the courtⁿ.
